"What can I say, dear aunt? Remember the days of my happy childhood. Was not your son, my dear, dear cousin, my constant, and almost my sole companion? Did he not forego even the sports he loved, to share in mine? Did he not quell the wild and bold spirit of his age to sympathize with my more timid and shrinking nature? Did we not part with tears, such as, thanks to your fond affection! I have shed but once? And then—forgive me, my best friend—has he not, since he left us, been the one subject of all our thoughts, all our speculations, and all our hopes? Of myself, then, how dare I speak? But Frederic! Oh, believe me, believe me; although his thoughts and his affections may, and must have, turned to home fondly and frequently, still even that home has not, cannot have been all to him; a thousand other circumstances and persons have crossed his path; a host of other interests have risen up about him. He is young, enthusiastic, and full of talent. What, and who, may he not have seen since he left us? Can you not understand and appreciate all I mean?"

"I understand that you have evoked a spectre which I must exorcise," replied Mrs. Mortimer with a placid smile. "You, at least, can appreciate the merits of that home to which our dear truant is about to return; while I can, on my side, decide upon the value of the fair face which you estimate so lightly. No, Gertrude, you do yourself less than justice. Frederic may have seen, and been struck for a moment, by prouder beauty than your own; but when he seeks a wife, believe me, my child, he will ask nothing beyond the bride whom his father's dying wishes have selected for him. Only be true to yourself; let him comprehend your nature in all its loving purity, and he will not resist its influence even before he learns that a will and a voice, doubly sacred because they reach him from the grave, had already decided on your union."

Silenced, but not convinced, Miss Mortimer could only raise the hand of her fond and indulgent relative to her lips with a thrill of silent gratitude far more eloquent than words. Young as she was, and reared as she had been in a retirement which almost amounted to seclusion, she at once felt all the delicacy and peculiarity of her position. The child of a younger brother who died ere his speculations had produced their anticipated results, and bequeathed her to the affectionate charity of the head of his house, she now, for the first time, became painfully conscious of her dependent situation; and of the thousand restraints which it imposed upon the dignity of her sex, when she should be thrown into constant contact with her wealthy and envied cousin; and thus not all the caresses of her aunt, whose imagination was busy with a bright and beaming future, could remove the sudden weight which had fallen upon her heart, and rested there.

Cheerful as she was constitutionally, the solitude of her girlhood, relieved only by the attendance of her masters, the indulgence of her relatives, and the society of the few mature friends of Mrs. Mortimer, had afforded her ample time for reflection and self-questioning; and although until this day she had never suspected that she loved the generous boy who had for long years been to her more than a brother, there had nevertheless occurred moments, in which her cheek had crimsoned, although there were none near to mark it, as she detected herself referring every little success in her studies, and every slight improvement in her person, to his approval, and to his praise. Now, however, her eyes were opened, and she trembled as she reflected how entirely she had suffered herself to be engrossed by his well-remembered image; and how eagerly she had wept and waited for each anxiously expected letter, when by some accident it was delayed; and with what impatience she had watched for the paragraph which was dedicated to herself.

As she grew from girlhood she had taught herself to forget that she was a mere child when they parted; although not a feature, not an outline had changed in her tenacious memory in either the face or form of her absent cousin. The high, pale brow circled by its dark and clustering curls; the proud lip, with its half tender and half scornful smile; the tall, slight, graceful figure, with its haughty carriage and promise of future strength; all were before her as though they had been limned in never-changing colors upon her heart and brain; and despite the calm confidence and security of her aunt, the trembling girl shuddered as she reflected upon the possibility that five long years, with their vicissitudes and chances, might have taught the man to overcome and to despise all the feelings and follies, and even the affections and preferences, of the youth; while she had idly and wilfully brooded over the past until it had tinged with its own hues, not only the feelings of the present hour, but even the happiness of her whole future life.

The young, the giddy, and the unthinking may smile at such a conviction in the breast of a girl of seventeen; but let them remember that circumstances form the character, and that nothing matures so early in woman as her heart.

Gertrude did not deceive herself. A grateful and loving nature had first prompted her to regard her cousin as the epitome of all human perfection, while he was present; and the continual and incantious panegyrics of her aunt, since his departure, had not only fostered, but even increased her mental enthusiasm. That Frederic, her own Frederic, should select any other wife than her gentle and beautiful Gertrude, never for an instant occurred to Mrs. Mortimer. That he should prefer any woman, however lovely and distinguished, to his fair and orphan cousin, none could have made her suspect, even for a moment; and thus she did not hesitate to pour forth all her heart, and all her hopes, into the very ear which should, for its own peace, have been deaf to such a theme.

The arrival of Frederic was every day expected; urgent letters having been dispatched to Egypt, where he was then travelling with a friend, to apprise him of his father's danger, from the moment when the attendant physicians had forbidden all further hope; but the tale which we are now telling is not of recent date, and the means of transport from so far distant a land were at that period widely opposed to those of the present day. Thus three months had already elapsed since the grave had claimed its tenant; and the first rush of grief had partially subsided, to give place in the heart of Mrs. Mortimer to the anxious desire of once more embracing her long-absent son. With her, sorrow had not exhausted itself in those wild, and phrensied, and ungoverned paroxysms which neeessarily induce their own remedy: it was rather a deep, and settled, and unfading regret; which, even while it admitted other affections and other hopes to their place in her bosom, was destined to end only with her life, and to become thenceforward a portion of her existence.

Her husband had left behind him an unsullied and honorable name, and she could dwell upon his memory with a well-grounded pride; while no portion of her wedded existence offered an occasion of remorse or of regret: and thus, even while her heart wept in secret over her bereavement, she had still a smile for other joys, and a sympathy for other interests.

"My boy will find but one sad change awaiting him," she resumed, after a long and meditative pause; "little has transpired in our quiet neighborhood to jar upon his early memories. The young have sprung up in strength, and the aged have declined in like manner; but he will be prepared by the alteration which he sees in himself for these trifling differences. Alas! it is at home—in the home he loved so well—that he must look for the one great and painful change; and that one we must endeavor to lighten as best we may, my child. After five long years of vicissitude and excitement, it will require all our exertions to counteract the monotony of a retreat like this; but we will not again suffer him to escape us; and nothing save this consideration could have induced me, at this early stage of my widowhood, to yield even to the representations of our good vicar, by making the acquaintance of the strangers at The Grange."

"It must, indeed, have been an effort"—murmured Gertrude, still thinking of her absent cousin.

"And one which was ill repaid," acquiesced Mrs. Mortimer; "for I know not why, but I am not prepossessed by either mother or daughter, although their reception was most gracious."

"And yet Mrs. Delamere has the appearance of a kind-hearted, although indolent woman; while her daughter is decidedly a beauty."

"A beauty!" echoed Mrs. Mortimer half indignantly, as her eyes rested upon the lovely face of her niece: "You have strange notions of beauty, my poor child. What! would you persuade me that you admire those bold black eyes, which seem to pierce to your very soul one moment, only to be lost the next beneath their long, thick lashes, as though they shrank before your answering gaze.—That haughty lip, which seems to smile reluctantly, and as if it would rather writhe with a sarcasm? No, no, Gertrude; showy she may be, and is; but Miss Delamere has no pretensions to be called a beauty. And then her manner—so self-centred, so decided, so essentially unwomanly, would counteract any loveliness, however striking. That she is clever, I do not doubt; but still not wise enough to forbear the exhibition of her powers, and to compel you to feel their extent; a most grievous error in woman, be her talent what it may; and one that unsexes her as much as a dereliction from propriety. Could you fail to remark that the pale, sickly-looking Mrs. Delamere was but the echo of her radiant and self-appreciating daughter? In one short half hour I fear that I have read her character. Would that The Grange had still remained untenanted; for, believe me, its present inmates will ill replace its former owner. The one is a cypher, and the other has no heart."

"Can this, indeed, be you, dear aunt?" asked Gertrude, looking up in wonder.

Mrs. Mortimer smiled. "I appear bitter and ungenerous, my dear child, and perhaps I am so; but that visit has left an uneasy impression on my mind. I foresee little gratification in such an acquaintance."

"And yet the dear old vicar says that they have already done so much good," said the fair girl persuasively; "that they have subscribed largely to the schools, made a donation to the almshouses, and desired him to furnish them with a list of the most deserving of the poor. Surely in this, at least, they have acted rightly. And then, think what a boon it will be to many industrious families who cannot readily obtain work in the winter season, to be secure of employment for several months, while the extensive improvements contemplated by Miss Delamere are carried out!"

"I admit all this, and cordially rejoice at it," replied the elderly lady; "and yet I cannot like this brilliant stranger. That she is a spoiled child of fortune is evident, and as regards that fact she is perhaps entitled to indulgence; but she presumes too much upon her individuality; and—to come back once more to my original declaration—I am convinced that she has no heart."

"Shall I not win you to think otherwise," asked Gertrude playfully; "when I tell you, that while I accompanied her to the spot upon which the new succession-houses are to be erected, she spoke most warmly of her sympathy in the delight that you would soon experience from the return of your son; and asked me a thousand friendly questions relating to him, which I answered with equal frankness? Tears started to her eyes as I told her of all the grief that you had suffered on his departure; while it was beautiful to see the smile with which she listened to my assurance that ere long your heart would be at peace, and all your anxiety upon his account terminated by his return. Indeed, dear aunt, at that moment she was very beautiful."

"You cannot, even thus, make a convert of me," was the reply of Mrs. Mortimer; "I feel that I shall never like Miss Delamere."

CHAPTER II.

And who was Miss Delamere? Who was this dark-eyed stranger, whose attractions Gertrude Mortimer strove to increase in her own eyes, simply, although unconsciously, that she might hear herself accused of exaggeration by her aunt! While the aunt, on her side, did not dare to admit them to her own reason, as though some evil were foreshadowed to her mind, as vivid as it was untangible, connected with an individual of whom she as yet knew nothing.

Upon this point, we have little to tell. The Grange, rendered vacant by the pecuniary embarrassment of its former proprietor, had been advertised for sale in the public prints; and after having been visited by an agent, had finally been purchased at a liberal price by its present owners: but of the antecedents of these ladies no one in the neighborhood knew anything. They had arrived, taken possession, applied for a pew in the parish church, and, as a natural consequence, been waited upon by the vicar; who, delighted at the interest evinced by Miss Delamere, in his schools, his almshouses, and his poor, had entreated Mrs. Mortimer to accompany his own wife in her introductory visit.

That the strangers were affluent was sufficiently apparent; for, even while commencing the costly improvements upon which they had decided, the well-organized establishment already formed at The Grange prevented every appearance of discomfort or disorder; and the superb furniture and articles of virtá scattered through the apartments, betokened long habits of elegance and even profusion.

The elder lady was, indeed, as Mrs. Mortimer had declared, a mere cypher. A little, withered, peevish, faded woman of fashion, for whom it was always too hot, or too cold; too early, or too late. Who constantly kept a bottle of ether upon her reading-table; enhanced, as far as was yet in her power, the ruins of her former beauty by the use of rouge, and the adoption of capborder of costly mechlin; could only exist in the twilight of a well-curtained room; and willingly displayed her still faultless foot to the admiration of her visitors. She said little; and that little in a low, drawling, monotonous, and unmusical voice, which did not invite conversation; while on no single occasion did she ever exert herself to emit an opinion upon any subject whatever; contenting herself, in reply to every question or appeal, by languidly closing her eyes as she answered,—"I really do not know; you had better inquire of Sybil."

And Sybil was never at fault. Let the theme be what it might, it failed to produce the hesitation of an instant. With a well-stored mind, great self-possession, and a full estimate of her moral and mental powers, as well as of her personal fascinations, she lost no single advantage with which she had been gifted by nature; but decided plans, purposes, and perplexities, with a quiet and unostentatious composure which no one ever appeared disposed to question or to disturb.

It must not, however, be supposed that Miss Delamere assumed the attitude of an oracle; or exhibited towards her indolent parent the slightest tinge of disrespect or neglect. On the contrary, although she never appealed to her tastes, being an enemy to all works of supererogation, she never failed to consult her wishes, and to receive in reply the languid, "Pray don't disturb me, Sybil; I care nothing about it. Only please yourself." And in obedience to this injunction, Sybil never hesitated to please herself; and frequently succeeded by the same means in pleasing others.

The evident affluence and high-breeding of the strangers; the unembarrassed deportment of Miss Delamere; her indifference to all those inconvenient conventionalities by which unmarried females are generally fettered; her unlimited command of money; and her universal acquaintance with all popular and even abstruse subjects, rendered their past existence a problem to all the gentry of the neighborhood, whose inferences and surmises were alike industrious and absurd.

Thus much, however, was evident. Mrs. Delamere was a woman thoroughly habituated to luxury, and that dolce far niente which can only be commanded by wealth; while the younger lady, whose dark, rich beauty was almost dazzling, was highly accomplished, occasionally even profound in her remarks, with great knowledge of the world, and specious and winning manners; she was always cheerful, witty, and at times slightly sarcastic; with moreover, that affected indifference to her own attractions which is the most ineradicable and refined vanity; and which can never be successfully attained until a matured experience has enabled its possessor to check all impulsive demonstrations, and to let the head lead, where in youth it is the heart that plays the pioneer.

Such was Miss Delamere at eight-and-twenty; and such an apparition in a quiet country town was well calculated to excite alike curiosity and surprise. The splendor of her toilette, remarkable, however, only for the material, and never for the exaggeration of its fashion—the perfect ease with which she drove her ponies through the crowded streets on market days, or galloped over the heights on her thorough-bred horse, followed only by a groom—or argued architectural details with the professional man employed to enlarge and embellish The Grange—or discussed points of logic, and even theology with the vicar, or medicine and metaphysics with the elderly and respectable physician of Westrum, were all alike subject of marvel; but never, even in her most enthusiastic moments, did Miss Delamere throw a single light upon the past.

Her communications were all in generalities; and while the usually taciturn mother occasionally alluded with evident unconsciousness to a Lady Anne So-and-so, and a Lord Such-an-one, never did the name of an individual, save as it might be connected with a political question, or a current rumor, pass the lips of the daughter; who appeared, on arriving at Westrum, to have virtually passed a sponge over her previous existence.

It is true, that with the past her new associates might, stringently speaking, have nothing whatever to do; but it is no less a fact that metropolitan circles will more readily admit strangers who present themselves among them rich in the positive advantages of wealth and fashion, than the old and self-appreciating families of the provinces, who, having grown ancient with the timber upon their estates, look upon the time-worn monuments of their race as a patent of local nobility, and dread all intrusion into their charmed, if not always charming set, with misgiving and jealousy.

Moreover, the Delameres established themselves at The Grange without a single introduction; and it was only the fact of their having, courteously enough, but very decidedly, caused it to be understood that they declined all acquaintance with the notabilities of the town, with the exception only of the incumbent and the physician, that inspired the "neighborhood" with any confidence in their real grade in society.

In accordanee with the request of the vicar, whose parochial interests were, as we have seen, involved in the concession, Mrs. Mortimer had consented to accompany his amiable and timid wife to The Grange; but, nevertheless, although the general respect and regard which was felt for the gentle widow made her example powerful, it was still a moot question with the owners of this "Hall" and that "House" if they should venture to commit themselves by too ready an exhibition of goodwill towards persons of whose actual identity they were altogether uninformed.

This irresolution, however, in no degree affected either the feelings or the energies of Miss Delamere. Her workmen toiled, her undertaking progressed, her conservatories were lined with the most costly plants; her fountains threw up their silver threads in the sunshine; her neat but exquisitely appointed chariot bore her periodically to her comfortably-curtained pew in the parish church; the London coach duly arrived, laden with boxes and packing-cases for her wardrobe; and she rode and drove, walked, and executed the most elaborate compositions upon her harp, as tranquilly, and with as much enjoyment, as though all the magnates of the country had left their visiting tickets at the porter's lodge.

It was evident that she could do without them; and this conviction ere long appeared all-sufficient as regarded her right to their civilities; and accordingly, after a lapse of time, having satisfied themselves that the current exponses at The Grange were duly met, that the religious tenets of its new owners were orthodox, and that, come what might, Mrs. Mortimer would necessarily incur all the responsibility of the result, one by one the neighboring families left their names at the door; not sorry to satisfy at once their curiosity, and the tardily performed duty of courtesy.

Nor could even the most fastidious indulge in a sneer or a doubt as regarded the taste of their new neighbors; for as they drove through the grounds, every modification bore testimony to the refinement and resources of the strangers. In no direction was an attempt at show or ostentation visible: the old timber—and where is the great landed proprietor who does not found his judgment upon both the feeling and the "ways and means" of a neighbor upon his respect for this venerable and venerated adjunct to a country place?—had been carefully preserved; and the new points of view which had been secured from the house, had simply caused the sacrifice of a few half-grown trees, or clumps of flowering shrubs. Not a bay or a garble of the fine old structure had suffered mutilation; but on either hand were rapidly rising commodious and handsome additions, in perfect keeping with the style and order of the orginial edifice, with which they were so skilfully combined, that it was easy to detect at a glance, how very soon time would, by blending the tints of the several structures, render it impossible to discover the boundary of each.

This fact had considerable weight with the squirearchy, who, whether priding themselves upon their ancient descent or their present wealth, had, ere they ventured upon their visit, already heard, and even seen so much of the young lady of The Grange, that they had become jealous, and anxious upon the subject of their own consequence; and trembled in secret lest they should see their antique glories crushed beneath the ostentatious profusion of "persons of whom they knew nothing."

One glance at the arrangements sufficed to convince them, however, that everything had been ordered rather with a view to personal gratification than idle or presumptuous display; and, costly as all the accessories of the place undoubtedly were, they became reconciled to the innovation when their self-love was satisfied that no attack had been premeditatedly made upon it; while the quiet and undemonstrative manners of Mrs. Delamere reassured all the local fashionables among the matrons that they need not fear for themselves. It is true that the rouge was admirably laid on, and the shawls and mechlins of the lady almost unapproachable in value; but she wore both the one and the other with such unmistakable indifference that it was at once evident they never occupied her thoughts.

The only stumbling block was Sybil. The methodical and somewhat straight-laced dames of the county could not decide what to make of her. She was so perfectly at her ease; so apparently unconscious that she differed in any respect from themselves; while she was, at the very instant, bewildering them with her acquirements, and astonishing them with her opinions; so cheerfully frank, while she evaded all their covert investigations; so full of the present, while she never adverted to the past; that they could not come to any decision as regarded her. It was true that nothing could exceed her courtesy; but still it was not the courtesy of an obliged person, but rather the desire to please of one who was quite conscious that she could afford gratification whenever it was her will to do so, and who was happy to oblige.

This was vexatious; for when people have compelled themselves, as they believe, to confer an obligation, they are not easily induced to submit to a reverse of the medal; and to see their intentions altogether misunderstood, or unappreciated. Still they could find no tangible fault with Miss Delamere: her extreme beauty and her perfect good breeding were admitted on all sides; and as no particular individual had the moral courage to allow that this very excess of good breeding had been a source of personal mortification, the result of the visit was declared to be satisfactory, although there was everywhere a mental reservation.

In the thronged circles of London life it is an every-day occurrence for beauty, talent, and fashion, to find themselves eclipsed by greater beauty, higher talent, or more decided fashion: the wheel of society is forever revolving, and its votaries soon become habituated and reconciled to the rotary movement which elevates and depresses each in turn; but the aristocracy of a country neighborhood stand still like their own oaks and elms, and do not so patiently endure the infliction of any rivalry.

Thus, although every one praised the beauty and the deportment of Miss Delamere, she did not impress them favorably: fathers trembled for their sons, mothers for their daughters, young ladies for their lovers, and expectant heirs for their college recollections and forgotten studies.

In short, the ladies decided that the handsome stranger was a flirt, and empty-headed squirelings that she was a blue-stocking.

CHAPTER III.

Meanwhile Frederic Mortimer was hastily traversing Italy, on his way to England. Italy, the land of his predilection, where, on his outward route, he had lingered over every natural or artistic beauty with almost a lover's tenderness; where he had each day discovered some new delight; whose skies and groves had filled his mental visions even in strange countries; and where he had resolved to rest awhile ere he finally returned to his home, in order that he might store his memory with a rich gallery of life-enduring pictures. The alarming letter, however, which was put into his hands at Cairo, reversed in a single instant all his plans; and it was with a throbbing and a trembling heart, that he found, on arriving at Alexandria, only a single vessel lying in the harbor bound for Europe; and which, moreover, was not to sail for several days.

Those days were torture to the affectionate heart of Frederic; for although the expressions of his careful mother had been measured, and she had abstained from informing him that all hope was over, still he read the truth in the constrained anguish which breathed throughout the whole letter; for there are certain misfortunes which we feel at once, without needing that they should be formally set forth in order to convince us of their existence.

At length the anchor of the small schooner was weighed; and with a fair breeze, she scudded in the direction of Trieste, her solitary passenger being Frederic; who, after having taken leave of his travelling companion, then preparing for an expedition to the Pyramids, had become totally absorbed by the one mingled hope and fear which pointed towards his home.

Once again on terra firma, he lost no time in prosecuting his journey; but not as he had formerly done, did he now traverse Italy. All which had before engrossed his attention and delighted his fancy, seemed to have disappeared; a gloomy veil hung over the whole landscape, and blotted out the sunshine: no longer eager to visit and to investigate every object of interest, he remained buried in a corner of the vehicle, absorbed in his own painful forebodings, and indifferent to all external objects. The most renowned cities, and the most picturesque points of view, were alike unable to arouse him from his abstraction: the affection of the son had overcome the impulses of the artist and the man of taste; and a cold dew stood at times upon his forehead, as he pictured to himself that his father might at that precise instant be breathing his last sigh, and looking in vain around the death room for the absent one who should have been there to receive it.

Frederic Mortimer, accustomed from his earliest youth to make his own tastes and pleasures subservient to those of others; not by compulsion, but from the imperative promptings of his own warm and unselfish heart, had not belied in manhood the promise of his youth. Calm, selfcentred, and somewhat grave, he was indeed; and altogether not divested of a certain pride which rendered him jealous of any want of affection or regard in those about him; but this frequent failing of silent and shy men was compensated by the outgushing tenderness of a nature ever prompt to bestow even more than it exacted in return.

Still this was Mortimer's leading defect; this anxious yearning to be loved, which rendered him exacting even with those who were nearest and dearest to him, while it exposed him to the risk of imposition in his general commerce with the world; and amiable as the failing might be in its origin, it nevertheless exerted an unhealthy influence upon his general character. Few, however, suspected the extent of this weakness; while all with whom he came into contact could appreciate his high and noble qualities, and the graceful gentleness by which he was distinguished.

Young, wealthy, strikingly handsome, and gifted with no ordinary powers of the mind, the son of Mrs. Mortimer fully justified her tenderness, of which he felt so perfectly secure, that no cloud had ever passed over his spirit as his thoughts dwelt upon his mother's love. To his father he had been equally devoted; and he had cherished his girl-cousin with a fond feeling of mingled admiration and proud support. Beyond these boundaries his heart had not yet progressed. Absorbed before his departure from England, by his studies; and during the college vacations, by those home duties which are so pleasurable in youth, he had never wasted a thought upon other and more precarious affections; while, throughout his wanderings in foreign countries, he had devoted himself rather to places than to persons; and seen, in the fair faces which flitted before him, merely suitable accessories to the various scenes on which he looked.

Such was Frederic Mortimer when he once more set foot upon English ground. Rich in affection; ardent in temperament, although grave in manner; thirsting to be loved as he felt that he could himself love; full of hope for the future, even although the present was clouded by a heavy sorrow; generous; high-hearted; ever ready to enhance the happiness of others by the sacrifice of his own wishes, where that sacrifice did not involve the one leading weakness; a devoted son, a frank and fearless friend, and an upright man.

A fortnight had elapsed since the bright noon upon which we introduced Mrs. Mortimer and her orphan niece to our readers; and the shades of evening were rapidly invading the glorious vapors which had marshalled the sun to its gorgeous setting, and which flooded the lawn with a golden light, as if reluctant to fade from the face of the fair earth so soon.

Gertrude stood in the bay of the summer saloon already mentioned, looking herself like the spirit of the hour, and fixing the gaze of her fond and admiring aunt by the exquisite glow of her beauty, as her rich hair was touched by the radiant beams; when she murmured as if unconsciously: "It must be so! That golden arch, shedding its dazzling reflection on all around it, and tinging the growing vapors with a thousand prismatic hues, must be the open portal of Eternity; through which the wonderful shadow of the Creator makes itself for a brief space visible to man, as if to invite him to win his entrance into the more solemn and perfect glories beyond! And do you know, dear Aunt?" she continued, turning with an enthusiastic smile to her wondering relative; "I have often imagined, despite the science of the learned, that the lovely stars, which we are taught to look upon as worlds, may in reality be nothing save the dust of heaven flung from the feet of the Eternal, as he moves in His majesty above the clouds of night!"

"These are strange wild fancies, Gertrude!" remarked Mrs. Mortimer somewhat gravely: "Our retired life has made a day-dreamer of you; but you must struggle against such unbridled imaginations as these. You are no longer a child; and the realities of the world will more than suffice to occupy your mind."

"Yet, surely, dear aunt, there should be some poetry in life? It is so disheartening to cast away all the bright visions of a wayward fancy. But hark! I hear the gate bell—the hour is too far advanced for casual visitors!—Aunt, dear aunt, I have a presentiment—nay, I feel convinced, that Frederic has arrived!"

Mrs. Mortimer sank back, half fainting, in her chair; and waving her hand impatiently, in a hurried and failing voice desired the fair girl to hasten and ascertain if her conjecture were indeed correct; an exertion which her sudden emotion rendered impossible to herself.

The heart of Gertrude had not deceived her. As she reached the hall, a tall slight figure alighted from a travelling carriage, and hastily murmuring, "My dear cousin, I am rejoiced to see you once again!—Where is my mother?" passed her without a second glance; and in the next instant had crossed her threshold of the saloon.

Saddened and disappointed, although trembling with a sensation of indescribable happiness, Gertrude retired to her own room, unwilling to intrude her presence until the first burst of maternal and filial affection had passed by; for she instinctively felt that there is a holiness in sorrow such as theirs, which should be looked on by no other eye, however dear.

The partial obscurity of the hall, combined with her own agitation, had rendered it impossible for her to distinguish the features of her long absent cousin; while it was equally evident that he had at once comprehended the extent of his misfortune by the mourning dress in which she met him; and engrossed by that solitary idea, had given no thought to herself. In vain did she argue to her own reason that nothing could be more natural than what had occurred; her heart was unsatisfied—that heart which had yearned towards him even from her girlhood. Had he merely touched her hand as he passed beside her, she would have asked no more, for she would then have felt that she had a place in his remembrance; but their first meeting had been a perfect blank, and this conviction chilled her to the soul.

Meanwhile Frederic had flung himself upon the neck of his widowed mother, and for a few seconds was totally incapable of utterance. Throughout his whole journey he had hoped even against hope; and he felt this truth bitterly as the extent of his misfortune was instantly revealed to him by the mourning dresses which now saddened his once cheerful home.

Fortunately for both parties, Mrs. Mortimer had already had time to look upon her bereavement with more resignation; and the presence of her son seemed for a while to restore to her all the happiness that she had irrecoverably lost. At one moment she thrust him from her, that she might admire his noble features and his manly form; and in the next, she drew him once more to her bosom, and covered his pale brow and cheeks with kisses, as fondly as she had formerly done when it was the face of a laughing boy which rested on her shoulder; and clasped him closer in her arms, as though she feared that he would again escape her; for the loss of one beloved object always endears us the more to those who are spared to us; and we instinctively lavish upon the living all the tenderness and affection which we once bestowed upon the dead.

Two long hours had elapsed ere either Mrs. Mortimer or her son remembered or remarked the absence of Gertrude; and the warm-hearted matron had no sooner done so, than with her hand locked in that of Frederic, and her mild eyes earnestly fixed upon him, she began to dilate, in terms of the most grateful affection upon the care and tenderness she had experienced from her niece throughout, not only his late heavy trial, but all the long years of his absence. Mortimer welcomed the subject gladly, for it at once afforded a relief to his thoughts, and enabled him to dwell, without self-reproach, or disrespect to the memory of his father, upon less gloomy images than those by which he had latterly been engrossed; and Mrs. Mortimer, with her heart and mind full of one absorbing idea, heard in every low-breathed exclamation of approval or affection uttered by her son, a realization of her hopes.

She said little of the beauty of her niece, for she was conscious that no eye could rest upon it with indifference; but she expatiated upon her high qualities of heart and mind, upon her enthusiastic and self neglecting affection, and upon her artless frankness.

The eye of Frederic beamed with delight as he listened. It was even thus that his memory had pictured her; and he could not forbear the recollection as his mother spoke, that such anticipations are but too frequently disappointed.

"This is, indeed, a sincere joy to me;" he said affectionately: "I have always dearly loved my pretty cousin, and I dreaded at times that on my return, I might find her changed by time into one of those cold automata so common in our correct, and somewhat frigid England. Nay, do not look reprovingly, my dear mother; for remember that I have been long unaccustomed to the cold conventionalities which chill so many warm young hearts in our own country, where formality is often mistaken for propriety, and the best years of life saddened by mere forms. I rejoice that this mortification is spared to me; and that I shall indeed meet once more the artless and frank playmate of my boyhood, changed only in person, but unbiached in heart."

Mrs. Mortimer became radiant with happiness; and the very excess of her satisfaction determined the worthy lady for once in her life to enact the diplomatist, and to withhold from her son the dying wishes of his father until the beauty and virtues of Gertrude had produced their effect; for single hearted as she was, she nevertheless knew enough of the waywardness of human nature to feel that it invariably shrinks from all that bears the appearance of compulsion; while the circumstances under which they now met were a sufficient excuse for the omission. If the first shock of Frederick's grief there would have been an indelicacy in calling upon him to strew the grave of his father with the roses of his own happiness.

No more time was lost in summoning Gertrude; but, alas! that which had already elapsed more than sufficed to convince the orphan-girl of all the difficulties and all the dangers by which she was surrounded. Mrs. Mortimer had willed taught herself mentally to overleap the years of separation which had rendered the cousins almost strangers—to forget the change which had necessarily taken place in both, and the peculiar delicacy of her niece's position; but the more Gertrude reflected in the solitude of her own chamber, the more appallingly they rose up before her.

Had her fond but ill-judging aunt withheld from her, as she had now done from Frederic, the dying injunction of Mr. Mortimer, she believed that she could once more have met her cousin with comparative composure and unconcealed delight; but that fatal confidence had raised up a barrier between them which the shrinking and womanly pride of her nature forbade her to overpass. Could she thus, she asked herself, suffer Frederic to read her heart; and to discover how tenaciously she had clung to the power over his affections, conscious that the dying breath of his father had given her a claim to them? Who could tell what attachment, with hopes, he might have left behind him in some one of the distant countries he had so lately traversed; and whence he had had even now returned compulsively long ere he had purposed to do so?

The more she reflected upon the personal and moral merits of her cousin, the more she satisfied herself that it was impossible for him to have passed unloved, and consequently unloving, throughout five long and adventurous years; and her repugnance to force herself upon his, perhaps reluctant, affections, became doubled by the conviction. No—come what might, though her heart might break, her youth be withered, and her life, so happy hitherto, be changed into a mere dreary and weary waste of feeling and existence, she would at least retain both her own respect and his; she would love him still and for ever—she could no longer withhold from him all the tenderness of her naturally fond and confiding nature; but she would love him in secret; she would not force upon him any demonstrations of an attachment which other ties and circumstances might have tended to render burdensome; she would forget the hateful secret so lately and so unfortunately confided to her by her aunt; and she would resolutely school herself into an external indifference which should leave her cousin free—free to misunderstand her motives—free to undervalue her feelings—free, in short, to love elsewhere, and to forget her.

To enable her to do this, she had, however, still to undertake another task, which, although light in comparison with that of controlling—she knew not for how great a length of time—her most hidden feelings, was nevertheless at once painful and invidious. She did not for an instant apprehend that in the first rush of sorrowful tenderness, her partial aunt, (anxious as she was to secure her happiness by what she considered as the most simple and facile means,) would find a moment to confide to Frederic the secret which had been made known to herself; and she instinctively felt that, in order to work out her noble-minded and dignified purpose, not a moment must be lost in securing the silence of Mrs. Mortimer.

This was the last struggle; for Gertrude at once became conscious, as she formed the resolution, that in thus flinging from her the only positive link between herself and her worshipped cousin, she was indeed leaving every thing to chance; while, unaccustomed to form even a fair estimate of her own attractions, she wept bitterly as she contrasted her probable influence over his affections with that of fifty other women whom he must have encountered abroad. Bitter indeed were her tears as she contemplated her voluntary self-abnegation; but never theless they were not all bitterness, for she reflected also upon the extreme attachment of Mrs. Mortimer for her son, and pleased herself with the belief that in immolating her own happiness to that of Frederic, should her forebodings prove correct, she should in some small degree compensate to her indulgent relative for the hoard of affection poured out upon herself, even at the cost of much present displeasure, and perhaps suspicion of her real motives.

Long and very painful were those two hours of vigil to Gertrude; and it was full of the resolutions which she had formed with a strong conviction of right, and a firm determination to adhere to them, that she at length obeyed the summons of her aunt, after having bathed her eyes to hide all evidence of her tears, and smoothed down the disordered ringlets which fell ovr her pale cheeks.

When she entered the saloon she almost shrank as the bright light of the lamp, which had just been carried in, threw its broad glare upon her countenance; but in the next instant her cousin sprang towards her, and eagerly clasping her hands within his own, poured forth his thanks and his greeting.

As he drew her towards him, evidently with the intention of pressing his lips to hers, she instinctively felt that the moment was already come in which she must commence the exercise of her self-control: and even as she replied to his ardent words, she turned aside her face, and the offered lips fell coldly on her cheek.

In his turn, Frederic felt his kindly impulses checked; and flung back upon him; "Pardon me," he said, as he released her haud; "I had forgotten for a moment, my dear cousin, that you are no longer a child. The heart is so apt to cling to the past; but you must forgive me." And as he looked earnestly at the beautiful girl who stood trembling and blushing before him, his voice became more tremulous as he added, "Indeed you must forgive me; I would not wilfully have offended you."

Mrs. Mortimer only smiled, for she saw in the assumed coldness of Gertrude simply the confusion natural to a young and timid woman suddenly brought into contact with a reeognized lover; while in the expressive eyes of her son she read at once his surprise and his admiration; and this was precisely what she had hoped and expected. Her satisfaction visibly diminished, however, as the evening wore on, and she discovered that, courteously, and even kindly, as her niece received all the attentions of Frederic, she betrayed no single symptom of affection. When he spoke she listened intently; when he addressed himself directly to her, she replied without trepidation or embarrassment: but her words were measured, and the faint smile which played about her lips, was evidently forced.

In this frame of mind her beauty, even faultless as it was, lost half its charm; there was no light in her eye, no bloom upon her cheek, her very movements were constrained; and Mrs. Mortimer, grieved and disappointed, sought in vain for the solution of what to her was a painful mystery. Fortunately for all parties—for Frederic himself, after the glowing panegyries lavished upon the fair automaton before him by his mother, was vsibly mortified and disconcerted in his turn—the fatigue of the traveller formed a natural pretext for his retiring early to rest; and, impossible as she would only on the previous day have believed such a thing to be, the disappearance of her cousin was a relief to the overcharged heart of Gertrude, which bled in secret at the restraint self-imposed upon ts best and holiest impulses.

CHAPTER IV.

Mortimer had no sooner left the room, accompanied by his mother, than Gertrude hastily seized her night-light, hurried in her turn to her chamber, totally forgetful of the fact that, for the first time in her life, she had omitted to claim the fond kiss of her aunt; nor did she recall the circumstance even after she had closed the door behind her, and flung herself into a chair to weep in secret over her coming trial. With the magnificent person of Frederic still before her eyes, with his low melodious voice still stealing upon her ear, with the touch of his lips still thrilling upon her cheek, she asked herself if she indeed had strength to fling from her the hope of one day being his wife; and the tears fell in torrents on her bosom, as she shrank from returning an answer even to her own heart.

She was still weeping and struggling against what, even amid her anguish, she considered as an unworthy weakness and infirmity of purpose, when her door softly opened, and Mrs. Mortimer entered. In an instant Gertrude dashed away her tears, and rose to meet her; but the affection of her fond relative was not to be so readily deceived; and taking the hand of the agitated girl, she drew her to the sofa, and seating herself beside her, looked steadily, almost sternly, into her face for a moment in silence. The heart of the conscious Gertrude throbbed convulsively, but she neither shrank from that searching gaze, nor made any attempt to commence a conversation which she felt convinced would to her be fraught with vital importance; she only suffered the tears which she had striven to restrain, again to flow free, and compressed the slender fingers which were clasped about her own.

"What means this emotion, Gertrude?" length demanded Mrs. Mortimer, more gently than her look had seemed to promise: "This sudden, and most unlooked-for change in all your mood and manner? In what, or how, can my son, my Frederic, have offended you, that you should treat him as one whose return was the most unwelcome in his mother's house—in his own home? What am I to understand? Already have you frozen him into indifference, a reception very different from that which he had anticipated for the companion of his youth, and the bride of his father's choice!"

"It was that very choice, that very conscientiousness, my dear, dear aunt," hurriedly interposed her listener, as intelligibly as her deep and sobbing respiration would permit her to articulate, "which compelled me to the coldness I have assumed. Oh! promise me at least one thing, I implore you—promise that you will conceal from Mr. Mortimer the expressed desire of his father. Let me not constantly be compelled to appear before him as the spectre of some earlier and dearer hope—as the wife forced upon him by a sense of filial duty—as an evil which I am unable to escape. Promise me that you will keep this unhappy secret; and leave the rest to fate. Then, indeed, I may venture not only to look at, and to listen to him, but also to a-sider him as a friend, and to strive to secure his esteem and affection: while, fettered as I am, I dare not—I ought not—to act otherwise than I am now doing."

"Gertrude," said Mrs. Mortimer with a regretful gesture, "your request comes too late. Startled as I was by your extraordinary conduct, I still hoped that it had been less conspicuous to your cousin than to myself; and anxious to learn the impression produced by your appearance, we were no sooner alone together than I hastened to dispel the regrets renewed by his first entrance into the chamber in which he had been so often visited by his father, by desiring to know what he thought of the little cousin whom he had left a mere child, and now met once more, almost a woman—"

"And what did he answer?" asked her listener eagerly.

"But a few words, Gertrude, and those few called the tears into my eyes. He admitted your beauty—he avowed that it far surpassed his expectations; and he declared that he never should cease to feel grateful for your affection to his widowed mother; nevertheless, my child, he said that your cold formality had cut him to the soul, when he entered his father's home, wearied in body, and stricken in heart, pining for the affection and tenderness of all by whom he had formerly been loved. Oh! Gertrude, my own adopted child, how cruelly have you disappointed both mother and son!"

"Aunt," exclaimed Miss Mortimer in an accent of acute anguish, "do not reproach me, or you will drive me mad. I must follow the path of duty. I should be unworthy of you, of myself, could I for an instant forget what is due to all of us. But surely, surely," she added deprecatingly; "you did me the justice to declare that I am not an ingrate; that my every effort, my every care, are for the happiness and peace of those to whom I am so deeply, so fearfully indebted? You did not suffer him to believe that I was an heartless egotist, incapable of sharing alike the joys and the sorrows of those about me?"

"You know my nature too well, my child, to suspect me of such deception. On the contrary, I assured him that he had altogether mistaken you; and that the coldness of which he complained was nothing more than the natural restraint produced by your knowledge of the will and wishes of your uncle."

Gertrude buried her crimson forehead in her hands as she gasped out; "And once more, what was his reply?"

"The only one which I could have anticipated from him. He instantly said that the wishes of his father should be obeyed."

The agonized girl groaned aloud.

"You are, in truth, inexplicable," pursued Mrs. Mortimer; "I had looked forward to the return of Frederic for the renewal of that happiness to which this roof has been so long a stranger, and to yourself as one of its chief promoters; and at the very moment when I anticipated the reward of all my care and all my anxiety, you wilfully and capriciously renew my sorrows, and teach me the utter unreasonableness of my hopes."

"He knows, then, that it was my uncle's will that I should be his wife?"

"He does; and he is ready to fulfil the wishes of a father who was to him alike a parent and a friend; for he is conscious that he could not confide his happiness to better hands. Seek, therefore, my dear girl, to overcome the puerile and unworthy fancy by which you have suffered yourself to be misled, and let him see you as you are, frank, joyous, and affectionate. And now, good night. You had forgotten me, Gertrude, when you retired to your room, but my heart cannot so easily be cheated of its dues.—Heaven bless you, my dear girl; may you awaken to-morrow with healthier feelings, and do yourself better justice."

And after a mutual embrace Mrs. Mortimer and her neice parted for the night; the one to reason herself into a belief that ere the morrow the mere girlish caprice of the evening would have yielded to a sense of coming happiness: and the other to pass the weary hours of darkness in a rigid examination of her own impulses and motives, and in a firm resolution to abstain from every action or word which might be misconstrued by her cousin into a desire to remind him of the claim which the mistaken affection of her deceased relative had given her over his fate.

Convinced, however, by the rebuke of her indulgent aunt, that she had overacted her difficult and painful part, she determined heneeforward to unbend just sufficiently, to prove to Mortimer that she was desirous to extend to him the same family affection which she had felt for his parents, but without exceeding by the merest detail her self-allotted task. Poor Gertrude! How little did she comprehend that she was, by these means, undermining her own peace. Her high-minded but mistaken policy produced its result. From day to day Frederic saw additional reason more highly to admire and esteem his gentle cousin, but nothing to engage his affections. Always placid, willing, and even eager to conduee to his comfort and convenience, Gertrude was ice itself as regarded his feelings; her very smiles were chilling, and effectually checked his enthusiasm; and when her aunt compelled her to display her talents, and thus to enforce the praises of her cousin, she received them with an apparent apathy that sealed his lips, at the very instant in which he would fain have poured out his whole soul into her ear.

And yet, how deeply, how devotedly did she dwell upon those half-uttered plaudits! How did she lie for hours upon her sleepless pillow, engaged in recalling every inflection of his voice, every expression of his speaking countenance! How often did she ask herself if it were indeed possible that he should ever love her! But as her breast began to heave beneath the welcome hope, the intrusive memory forced itself upon her mind, that all this fair-seeming was in probability the mere result of duty, the mere struggle to conceal a reluctanee which he was too generous to betray.

For a brief while Frederic did indeed struggle, but it was simply to recover the beloved companion of his youth; to awaken in the beautiful creature whom he felt that, would she permit it, he could worship with his whole heart, one spark of the hallowed fire which had been kindled in their early years; but after a time he began to accuse himself of vanity and cowardice, in thus seeking to compel an affection which shrank before his efforts. It is true that, in her unselfish heroism, Gertrude was too obtuse to distinguish the efforts of her cousin's heart from the mere common-places of a man resolved to immolate his own feelings to the will of a cherished father; and consequently she repelled the covert, and, as she imagined, languid advances of an honest passion, believing that Frederic only sought, with his natural generosity, to conceal from her the real indifference which he felt for the wife who had been chosen for him, but whom his own preference had not elected.

Wearied at length by a pertinacity which at once discouraged his hopes and wounded his self-love, Mortimer resolved to leave the issue of his fate to time, and applied himself diligently to the business considerations entailed upon him by his succession to the family property. But even here he found little to occupy his thoughts. His accession to the estates of his father was a mere matter of legal form; his mother's jointure was amply secured; there were no debts, no difficulties; his income greatly exceeded his anticipations, and his position in the county was at once insured and unexceptionable. His farms were flourishing, his tenants satisfied, no single cause for anxiety made a demand upon his mind; his home was the abode of peace, his mother devoted and affectionate, and still he was not happy; and perhaps the less so that he could not dwell upon one tangible annoyance.

The very calm of his existence was a trial, succeeding as it did, in the very bloom and buoyancy of his manhood, to the scenes of privation and excitement to which he had been for years habituated. The oil of peace had been poured too suddenly and too lavishly upon the troubled waters of his life, and with a nature eminently greedy of excitement and emotion, he withered under the peaceful monotony of an existence which left nothing either to apprehend or to hope.

His hurried and engrossing foreign experience, while it had engaged and satisfied his mind, had left his heart unoccupied; and that heart, in the calm interregnum afforded by his present mode of existence, put forth its claim in turn; the temple was prepared, the altar raised, but the divinity was still wanting.

How often did Mortimer feel inclined almost to curse the affluence which had descended upon him in a Danaën shower. How often did he detest himself; envying the fate of those who were called upon to wrestle with the world, and to exert all their moral and physical energies to secure one footing upon the slippery ladder where he saw himself enthroned midway without a single effort of his own. They, at least, had something to hope, something for which to strive; an aim, an end to their being; while he was a mere unit in the great sum total of the world, to whom a fixed position had been assigned, and who had no share in the common task that was going on about him.

Thus spoke his sense of fitness; but his pride hissed yet more loudly in his ear. What did his worldly advantages avail? He was young, wealthy, and handsome; his social position was undeniable; and, nevertheless, the fair girl whom he could have loved so well—the orphan to whom he would fain have restored a hundred-fold all the blessings of which she had been despoiled by fortune; the bride whose beauty would have been his pride, and whose love would have been his boast—poor, parentless, and dependent as she was,—scorned the passion which he had been ready to lavish upon her: and had shown him, gently and kindly, it is true, but firmly and undisguisedly, that even these worldly advantages could not command affection.

On the part of Mortimer, this mistake was however, rational enough; for the principle of action adopted by Gertrude was well calculated to mislead him. Like all young, ardent, and inexperienced persons, she exaggerated at once her difficulties and her duties; and while she increased in tenderness and attention to her aunt, she steadfastly maintained her coldness towards her cousin; who nevertheless became only more dear to her from day to day. A conviction which, far from inducing her to relax her studied demeanor, only determined her, by exhibiting her increasing danger, to persist in her original purpose. Did he enter the family sitting-room while she was reading aloud, her voice instantly ceased; were she at her piano when his step resounded in the hall, she immediately closed the instrument; although at his express request she opened it mechanically, and went through the task allotted to her with gentleness and care; but it always sufficed to her to know that her cousin was present, to check her enthusiasm, and to depress her energies.

It was impossible that Mortimer should long continue blind to a fact like this; but instead of looking upon it in its true light as an overstrained feeling of maidenly delicacy, he read it every action of the unhappy girl only a tacit demonstration of her unwillingness to fetter herself, and a desire to make him comprehend without the aid of words, which must have been painful to both parties, her reluctance to fulfil the contract which had been made without her sanction. The natural consequence ensued. Frederic became ere long ill at ease with his beautiful cousin, in whom he could not recognize the frank and free-hearted playmate of his earlier age, and forgot to make allowance for the change which a few years never fail to operate in a girl approaching to womanhood.

Nothing is so easily wounded as self-love, and, unconsciously to himself, Mortimer had depended upon the affection of his cousin. He remembered how often they had sat side by side under the same tree, engaged upon the same book, warmed by the same sunbeam; and his heart had yearned in absence to renew those innocent and happy hours. It was to Gertrude that he had looked to relate to him in detail the last incidents of his father's life: he could not enter upon such a subject with his widowed mother, and even the old and faithful servants of the family could give him but imperfect accounts of all that he pined to hear. It was also from Gertrude that he had anticipated the enthusiastic inquiries which travellers so love to answer: but although she listened eagerly to the anecdotes elicited by the questions of her aunt, she had never once propounded one of her own. Beautiful as she was, he soon taught himself to believe that, despite his mother's encomiums, she had no soul; and that the lovely face before him was a mere mask, behind which all was void. Piqued far beyond what he suspected, he became cool and reserved in his turn. Unable to comprehend or suspect the extreme delicacy which had dictated her reserve, he comforted himself with the belief that where all was pure and estimable there could be nothing to conceal; and that, consequently, the conduct of Gertrude was either the result of a coquettish affectation which it would be alike weak and unmanly to gratify, or, as we have already stated, a decided indifference, if not repugnance, to himself, which, much as it wounded his self-love, he was too proud to make one effort to overcome.

It is saddening to reflect how very seldom, when personal vanity is engaged in the analysis of the feelings of another, we are competent judges of what is beneath our eyes; how prone we are to misinterpret the most trifling actions and the most simple words; how the error deepens from day to day; and how we base convictions upon false premises, and cling to them the more pertinaciously from their very want of consistency and foundation.

Had Frederic been more just to himself, he might soon have probed the innocent heart of his cousin to its very centre; for there were moments when, with her whole soul hanging upon his words and yearning for his sympathy, she would have willingly forgotten the barrier which he had herself raised between them, and flung herself upon his bosom, ready to pour out before him all the treasure of her long-hoarded affection; but he did not look beyond the surface, he did not appreciate her timid apprehensions, and misjudged her nature.

Coupled with an ingenuousness as rare as it is beautiful, Gertrude possessed great firmness of purpose; and although she might err in judgment, her principles were faultless, and her generosity of heart unimpeachable. How many women are fated to become the sacrifice of their own virtues; and how seldom do they reap even a tardy reward for all the sufferings which they endure for conscience sake! Gertrude was one of these self-constituted victims; and it was her aunt alone who could appreciate the loveliness of her real character. And that Mrs. Mortimer did appreciate it in its fullest extent was proved by the fact that she could not bring herself for a moment to doubt, that, despite the mortifying coolness and distance of her nieece, she needed only time to convince Frederic of her excellence; and that the constant contact in which he was unavoidably thrown with one of the most lovely and amiable of her sex, must ultimately compel him to love his cousin with all the devotedness she so well deserved.

Of their union she never doubted; for where could he find a wife so thoroughly constituted, not only to promote, but to ensure his happiness? The mind and heart of Gertrude were pure as in her girlhood, her intellect well cultivated, and her disposition admirable.—Ergo Fredric must love her; and beyond this faith Mrs. Mortimer never looked: she forgot that her son had no opportunity of seeing his cousin as she saw her, and of appreciating her many excellencies. Hers was the experience of long years—the test of trial and sorrow, where she had found at once support and consolation; and, above all, a companionship which Gertrude resolutely refused to concede to her less favored son, who, wearied by the void produced by inaction after a long period of excitement, soon began to pine for change, and to believe that the monotony of his home would ere long prove unendurable.

That change, however, was not so distant as he apprehended.

CHAPTER V.

The Grange was a fine old place, with its sharp gables, and pointed windows, and shady recesses, and deep shadowy arches, telling of centuries passed away, when architects cared little to calculate the surface that they covered, and indulged themselves freely in the fantasies of wide and winding passages, strange, shapeless nooks, and staircases sufficiently ample to afford ingress to the baronial coach, as well as its occupant. None of the apartments were shaped like those of modern days; in each and all there was a niche or a bay; the one to hold a statue, and the other to admit a group of flowering plants, or a musical instrument, or an easel; and the Delameres had not long been its tenants ere these recesses found their appropriate ornaments. Costly bronzes, rare works in alabaster or marble, a library of choice books, valuable rather from their nature than their number; a harp, a guitar (at that period a scarce instrument in England), tapestry-frames, drawing tables, and all the elegant necessities of refined female existence, were lavishly but unobtrusively scattered over the reception rooms.

The result was admirable, and yet there was no appearance of vulgar stage-effect: the effect of a master-hand was every where visible, and each article seemed indispensable where all was in harmony. The morning room was a triumph of taste, with its rich draperies of sea-green damask, and clouds of transparent white muslin, its Venetian carpet and mirrors, and its solitary statue of Parian marble, the production of a classic chisel; its luxurious couches, and cushioned lounges; all only half revealed in the twilight which was permitted to invade the apartment, proteeted from the glare without by Italian jalousies and garlands of creeping shrubs.

The deity of this fair shrine was Sybil. It was here that she had placed her harp, her work-table, her writing-stand, and all the objects which conduced to her daily occupations; and it is here that we shall once more introduce her to our reader.

The morning was sultry; one of those languid and lovely days which, at the close of autumn, seem to condense within themselves all the glories of the past summer; when the gorgeous flowers that have withheld their blossoming during the fluctuating temperament of the preceding months, put forth all their brightness, as if to force a more powerful contrast with the coming winter; when the air, heavy with perfume, breathes voluptuously upon the leaves which it scarcely stirs; and the whole expanse of the clear sky spreads like a veil of azure, unflecked by a single vapor, above the green earth, which takes a richer tint from the light about it.

Miss Delamere was seated at her harp, but her fingers wandered listlessly among the chords. Her brows were slightly drawn together, as if by intense, and, it might be, anxious thought; but this rapt expression did not tend to decrease her extraordinary beauty. Her raven-black hair; reflecting, as the light touched it, that matchless purple tint so rarely seen, was banded smoothly from her lofty forehead low upon her cheeks, and drawn into a luxuriant knot on the summit of her small and finely-shaped head. Her magnificent arms were revealed in all their beauty beneath the folds of soft muslin by which they were covered, and her small foot moved like a fairy thing among the pedals.

Half buried in a lounging chair, Mrs. Delamere had placed herself at the other extremity of the apartment, in deep shadow, with her ether-bottle, her fan, and a volume of the last new novel beside her. She was not, however, either reading or thinking: Mrs. Delamere seldom read, and never thought. Both fatigued her; and Sybil read and thought enough, as she would have declared, had she possessed energy to do so, to exempt her from any such necessity.

They had been silent for a considerable time, when Miss Delamere suddenly raised her head; and throwing off, by an effort of will, every trace of the care which her features had worn only a moment back, asked, with a sunny smile, "And what thought you, Mamma, of our new acquaintance, Mrs. Mortimer, and her niece?"

"I have never thought about them."

"Then, do so now, I pray you. Is not the younger lady very beautiful?"

"Oh, yes; a blue-eyed girl—Was she pretty?"

"Very," said Sybil, with strong, and somewhat bitter emphasis. "She has one of those faces which Guido would have loved to paint, when he cinctured the brow of the Virgin with an aureole of angels."

"Ha!"

"There was soul in her eyes, too; and they were so intensely blue and limpid! They have haunted me ever since."

"Haunted you?"

"Yes; but in an evil spirit. I only love blue eyes on canvass. There is no strength of purpose in them. They were made merely to look upon summer sunshine,—storm and tempest would pale them. And yet—well, well! Perhaps it is better so: men regard women simply as toys; and toys should break, or the grown children would weary of them; they were meant to make this old earth look new, and we must change our suits, or they would become threadbare."

"And is all this à propos of Miss—What is her name, did you say?"

"Mortimer."

"Oh, yes. Is all this à propos of Miss Mortimer's eyes?"

"Yes, and no; but she is certainly very beautiful."

"I am glad you think so."

There was another tinge of bitterness in the light laugh with which Sybil greeted the congratulation; and it was somewhat impatiently that she thrust her harp from her as she rose, and approaching her mother, said softly, "You will be able soon to test my taste, Mamma, for we must return the visit to-day. We have already delayed the courtesy too long. Shall I order the baroueche, or will you trust yourself to my ponies?"

"Sybil!" exclaimed Mrs. Delamere with momentary energy, as she half rose from among her cushions, and raised her eyes to those of her daughter; "you know best, and I have no wish to interfere; but it seems to me that—Do you not know what I mean?—that we are spending a great deal of money."

"We are so."

"But really, my dear, can we do it?"

"We are doing it every day."

"Yes, yes; I see—I know—However, it is your affair, not mine; only, perhaps—"

"There must be no perhaps," interposed Miss Delamere, and again the finely-pencilled brows were slightly contracted. "The season of 'perhaps' is past. Will you decide, my dear Mother, in favor of the barouche, or the ponies?"

"Please yourself."

"The ponies, then, assuredly," said Sybil, she approached the bell; "and their toilette will be accomplished as expeditiously as yours or mine. Shall I ring for your maid?"

"Do so."

And the bell was rung; and while Sybil resumed seated herself at the harp, the Abigail assisted the reluctant Mrs. Delamere to rise from her chair, folded her shawl more conveniently about her, collected the fan, the novel, and the ether-bottle, and finally followed her languid mistress from the room.

The door had no sooner closed behind them than the head of the brilliant beauty fell heavily upon the instrument, her fingers forsook the chords, and she became plunged in a deep and gloomy train of thought. Once or twice she turned her large eyes searchingly on every side, and on every side they rested upon some object of luxury or beauty; but there was no reflected happiness in their expression; the brow was smooth, but the crumpled rose-leaf had marred the repose of the spirit.

With Sybil, however, such a mood of mind could be but of short continuance. After a time she rose and walked calmly and slowly to a mirror, where she gazed earnestly at the reflection of her own beauty, until a haughty smile played about her lip, and the light returned to her eyes. There was resolute triumph in the whole expression of her face and attitude.

At that moment she felt no regret that she had thrown down the gauntlet to fate, but was ready for the combat.

Sooth to say, she was no mean antagonist!

When the beautiful little pony carriage stopped at the gate of Mrs. Mortimer, the ladies were strolling about the grounds, and their visitors had already taken possession of the saloon, ere the bell recalled them to the house. Mrs. Delamere was, as usual, almost swathed in shawls; for although she never ventured to declare so much, she detested an open carriage, and fancied that she was perished with cold even in the hottest season of the year, whenever she risked her health in so hazardous a manner. Her wraps were, nevertheless, upon this occasion trifling beside those of those of her daughter; who, in addition to a mantle so disguising that it might have served as a domino, had flung over her close bonnet a voluminous black veil which completely concealed her countenance. Nothing, in fact, save her height, and the peculiarly graceful nature of her movements, could have distinguished her from the veriest dowdy of the neighborhood; nor, when Mrs. Mortimer and her niece, closely followed by Frederic, entered the apartment, did she raise the cloud of lace beneath which she was literally in eclipse.

Mrs. Delamere soon sank, in a state of semi-exhaustion, into a chair; and her hostess, as a matter of course, established herself at her side. But even after the presentation of Mortimer, the three younger members of the party remained standing in the full glow of the mid-day sun, before the open doors of the verandah; and only a few moments had elapsed, ere, at the suggestion of Sybil, they wandered out into the open air.

"You have a true English home here, Miss Mortimer," she said caressingly, as she passed her arm through that of Gertrude; "such a home as I should value beyond all the pomp on earth. There is no trace of yesterday in these fine old trees, nor in the time-tint of the venerable house they so nobly overshadow. I have a horror of the architectural mushrooms which seem to be scarcely of an hour's growth; there is no repose in them; nothing of the past; and where there is so little in the present to compensate for such a want, we may, and ought to be forgiven for loving to look back upon earlier times."

"Yes," said Gertrude fondly; "it is a dear old place; and although our neighbors occasionally endeavor to alarm my aunt by adverting to the presumption of the little post-town which has all but invaded her territory, I believe that she estimates it at its full value."

"And she is right," replied Sybil. "Proudly, indeed, may she ask, 'What's Hecuba to me, or I Hecuba?' What has this peaceful retreat in common with the busy, bustling, vulgar turmoil of third-rate provincial congregation of traders and gossips? I appeal to Mr. Mortimer," she added, turning her graceful head abruptly towards Frederic, who was walking at her side; "he has travelled, and must feel and appreciate all the charm of such a home as this."

"I trust that I am not insensible to its value, nor to that of its inmates," said the young man, with a slight bow; "and still less should I feel inclined to question its merits, did we often receive such guests as Miss Delamere; but I nevertheless confess that there are moments when I should scarcely regret to feel it placed somewhat nearer to the centre of mind and movement. The bee itself is at times cloyed with honey."

The expression of Sybil's countenance was invisible beneath her veil, but she felt the sigh of the fair girl upon whose arm she leant; and she had already seized the text of a long and earnest chapter, which no stranger had a right to read.

"How well I recognize the spirit of your exacting sex in that measured answer!" she said playfully. "The poet has assured us that 'man never is, but always to be blessed;' how much happier are we humble-minded women! Is it not so, Miss Mortimer? We who make our moral garment to the very measure of our means, and seldom look beyond the circle in which we are condemned to move."

"This from you!" exclaimed Gertrude with unfeigned surprise: "You, who appear to rule circumstances with a wand of ivory, and to make all obey your bidding?"

"You do not speak in epigrams, I trust," was the retort of Sybil: "Reassure me on the instant, or you will frighten me. My rule, believe me, does not extend beyond builders and gardeners, and I find even these difficult to govern. I will not have you look upon me as a maitress femme; I detest everything which unsexes a woman. Remember that my mother is out of health, that her energies are ruined, and that she requires one who can think and act for her; and that one must and should be her own child."

"My dear Miss Delamere—"

"Do not mistake me once more," pursued Sybil, as she clasped the slender fingers of her companion in her own: "You did not intend to wound me, nor have you done so; but I feel that I shall greatly prize your friendship, and I am anxious to put forth my claim frankly. The power which is wielded at the Grange is not mine; it has, if you will permit me so to say, a more vulgar origin; it is the mere power of gold, and I am simply the 'slave of the lamp;' a little vain, perhaps, occasionally, of the results of my agency, but scarcely to be considered as their author. All this is sad egotism, however, and will but increase the threatened tedium of Mr. Mortimer, who has so lately been conversant only with the grand and the beautiful; let us rather delude him into some bright memories of the past, and throw him back for a brief interval into the world of wonders and adventure."

"I begin to believe that it exists everywhere," said Frederic, fascinated, he scarcely knew wherefore, by the perfect self-possession and candor of the visitor.

"No doubt it does," acquiesced Miss Delamere; while Gertrude was fairly silenced, alike by the stream of words which she had encountered on the one hand, and by the effect which they evidently produced upon the other: "We only require eyes to see, and a mind to comprehend; but, as the Musselmaun never ventures to enter his mosque until he has performed his purifying ablutions, so neither can we estimate what is really passing about us before we have prepared our intelligence to receive the amount of marvel which has been prepared for the gratification of our moral sense. I fear that we are all sad spendthrifts of happiness; and, like the defrauded miser, never know the intrinsic value of our accumulated treasures until we are cheated of them. But let us talk of Italy, Mr. Mortimer; beautiful Italy! where I once spent two happy years. What a spell exists in the very name of Italy! It is a dream for the dying."

And they spoke of Italy, long and earnestly; but Frederic soon unconsciously felt his self-love somewhat piqued by the discovery that he had much to learn, and nothing to teach to his companion upon his favorite subject. She had seen all, had appreciated all, and had judged all. Perhaps had he suffered himself to reflect at such a moment, he would readily have found a key to the enigma, and have discovered that where he had only felt, Miss Delamere had studied and reasoned; that he had been the mere pilgrim of imagination and enthusiasm, where she had been the observant and calculating woman of the world; but he was in no mood for such an analysis; he was anxious to shine, to produce an effect, and he found himself worsted upon every point. He saw this, and after a time he became mortified and discouraged. The soft eyes of Gertrude were upon him, but their admiring gaze was wasted. It was not upon his cold and reserved cousin that he had been anxious to make a favorable impression; he had aimed at interesting, and perhaps attracting, Miss Delamere, and he began to believe that he had failed.

Sybil, however, read the expression of his speaking features as readily as she would have perused the pages of a printed volume; and by an easy transition she led the conversation to the marvels and monuments of Egypt, a land which she had never visited; and having once more succeeded in arousing the enthusiasm of Frederic, she immediately became all ear; encouraged his narrative by eager and well-placed inquiries; and made him, with consummate tact, the hero of the hour. To Mortimer she had appeared delightful when she talked; no wonder, then, that when she hung upon his words like one entranced, he should consider her tenfold more charming; and that as they moved slowly forward, and he remarked the finished and yet unstudied grace of all her movements, and the high-bred dignity of her gestures, he should put forth all his powers of mind and manner to secure her favor, and to enhance his merits in her eyes.

There was a tormenting mystery, too, in the thick and heavy veil which added to the charm of the interview. He could only imagine the play of the intelligent features that it concealed; and he felt like one under the influence of a wild and delicious dream.

When they re-entered the saloon, they found Mrs. Delamere languidly admiring a magnificent piece of unfinished tapestry-work which her hostess was courteously exhibiting with the amiable hope of amusing her unamuseable guest and the animated and judicious admiration o Sybil, who instantly joined their party, soo made ample amends for the languid and ev dently extorted encomiums of her half-sleep mother. Her knowledge of the different effec of startling contrasts, and delicate gradation tints, was not less astonishing to Frederic thr the intimate acquaintance which she had b trayed in their previous conversation with t merits of different schools of art, and works science; and a feeling of sincere gratificati took possession of his mind as he noticed t sudden animation of delight which lighted the fair face of Gertrude, as she saw the labo ous industry and taste of her aunt thus estim ed at its real value. Nor was he less pleas and surprised at the promptitude with whi Sybil, even interested as she was by the soci of her new friends, obeyed the signal of h mother, and prepared to take her leave.

No gesture of annoyance escaped her, though it was evident that she by no mea participated in the impatience to be gone ma fested by Mrs. Delamere; but as Frederic ru to order the carriage, she busily and judicio arranged the eternal shawls which had b partially flung off, and made her parting co pliments with grace and self-possession.

Hands were shaken and courteous words changed; and when the languid valetudinari had at length succeeded in reaching the h door, leaning listlessly upon the arm of Mo mer, Sybil sprang lightly into the fairy vehi possessed herself of the reins, and then, hav almost succeeded in convincing her compan that she was comfortably established am her wraps, threw back her heavy veil for an stant, and turned her dark and splendid full upon Frederic with an expression of inter and acknowledgment which for an instant ly dazzled him. The next moment, howe the jealous cloud of lace fell back; a gra bend intimated a final leave-taking, and beautiful ponies were in motion towards Grange.

They were fairly out of sight ere Mort changed his position; and even when h at length did so, instead of returning to the h he descended the steps and wandered once into the grounds. He had ample food for re tion. On his arrival at home he had been whole, and prepared to extend all his affec upon its beloved inhabitants. The convers on of his mother on the very evening of his ar had strengthened him in this purpose, for had held out the promise of the precise de which he had for several years vaguely pic to himself; but what was the result? Sh his period of sojourn beneath his ancestr roof had been, he had become wearied of its no tony, and discouraged by the indifference the very being whose memory he had che the most fondly; and yet, he remembered that this cold beauty was to be his wife. Suc was the will of a father whom he had never op ed during his life; and whom he believed it be still more impossible to disobey after his ath, when his every wish was doubly hallow by the fact, that it could no longer be enforc

Only on the previous day—nay, even an hour ack—he felt that he could have submitted to is fate without a murmur; for of escaping it e did not, and had never dreamed. He knew nough of the gratitude and veneration of Ger- rude for her benefactors to be convinced that, t whatever cost of feeling to herself, should he ffer her the alternative of declining his hand, ie would resolutely and conscientiously insist pon fulfilling the will of her uncle; and he as consequently prepared to make her his ride, and to trust to time and his own tender- ess to win from her the love without which he ould not disguise from himself that he must be retched.

The last hour had, however, worked a strange evolution in his whole nature. He had, at last, en the very being form whom his soul had ned, in moments of reflection; the very being hom he had hoped to find in his orphan-cousin; creature not only beautiful, but beaming with tellect; eager and enthusiastic in feeling; full that light of the soul which diffuses its own diance over all around it; charming without y visible effort to attract, fascinating without fectation, and graceful without mannerism; th a mind richly stored, and a gentleness es- ntially feminine.

What evil star, he asked himself, had brought e radiant Sybil across his path? What wretch- chance had induced her to immure her mental d personal loveliness in that retired spot, as to plunge him into a trial, perchance too ghty for his strength? Why were they ever led to meet, when he was fettered by an ob- lation through which it was impossible to eak? And then another thought, scarcely s painful to his mind, and still more so to his ide, beset him. He had not failed to gain the ections of his less gifted cousin? And was it refore probable that the dazzling being who w occupied his thoughts, would prove more ilulgent than one who had known and loved h in former years?

The doubt was rational enough; and yet, strange to say, Frederic, in his inmost soul, scarcely doubted; he felt that Sybil at least uld understand him—her many words, and h one look, had convinced him that she did s and he clung to the conviction despite his ter reason. He could only resolve to avoid h, and thus to weaken her spell; but he got that this was by no means easy in a ighborhood limited in its society, and depend- e upon its own resources.

Nevertheless, such was his determination; and the, as a commencement of his task, he compel- h himself to dwell upon the image of Gertrude —f his destined wife—and he recalled, with se thing approaching to happiness, her beam- in look when she saw the pleasure evinced by h aunt at the encomiums lavished by Miss Lamere upon her tapestry. But alas! even th slight gratification brought with it the image of Sybil; and he felt that hers was, indeed, no m n praise, and that his mother might well be exsed for appreciating such testimony to her tue.

No marvel was it, therefore, that Mortimer finally returned to the house even more dispir- ited than he had left it.

CHAPTER VI.

There are few more serious and real misfor- tunes for a man of active and enthusiastic dis- position, than to be entirely independent of personal exertion. When the necessaries of life compel the exercise of the mental and moral energies, every struggle, exclusively of feeling, becomes to a certain degree weakened and con- trolled by more immediate and sordid duties. Expediency whispers him to be up and doing; and he is compelled to give ear to the admoni- tion, if he would maintain his position in socie- ty. Thus his cares, divided, and subdivided by conflicting impulses, create a re-action by which each is in turn subjected to the domination of the other, and all are finally brought under the dominion of reason. But where no such necessi- ty for energy exists; where the position is de- fined, and the fate assured; where the purple and fine linen are independent of all personal exertion, the mind, free to enforce its full claim, seldom fails to revenge itself upon the pam- pered body, and to magnify its own trials. Ev- ery thing in creation requires extraneous ali- ment; and the spirit cannot constantly feed upon itself without becoming extenuated by the perpetual demand upon its resources.

And thus it was with Mortimer. How many envied him! What had he to wish for? Was he not an only son?—his own master?—rich enough to indulge in every caprice, however unreasonable? What more could he desire? And, in turn, he might have answered—"What? Not the indulgence of unreasonable extrava- gance; not the power of vain and foolish fol- lies; but peace—peace of heart; the peace which makes home a heaven, and life a boon; the peace which gold cannot purchase; and oft-entimes, God be thanked, even poverty can- not take away!" And from day to day, with no other and more immediate care to distract his thoughts, he felt that this peace was wanting.

He sat beside his fond and gentle mother; and there, indeed, had Heaven gifted him with the power of controlling all within his reach, he would not have sought for change; but as he dwelt upon the beautiful creature near her, who was fated to be his second self, another and a brighter vision interposed: and even while his brow was calm, his spirit writhed within him.

No, never—so he argued—never could they understand each other: the frigid temperament of Gertrude, which led her almost to consider as a crime every manifestation of feeling how- ever natural and innocent, could never assimi- late with his own ardent and exacting nature. She was pure, amiable, and good; it was im- possible to live under the same roof with her, and not to admit this; but we have already ex- plained the morbid craving of Mortimer for deep and excessive affection towards himself; and this he had failed to detect in the only being who was, perhaps, fated to love him better than all else on earth.

As time wore on, and the natural grief of Mrs. Mortimer grew less acute, her desire to see her son the husband of his cousin became more importunate. He had attained the age at which she believed that men are calculated to make at once the most happy and the most prudent of husbands. At five-and-twenty her own lamented partner had led her to the altar, and her whole life, until she became a widow, had been one interval of happiness; a fact which had alone been sufficient to convince her guileless and unsuspicious mind of a truth which she never sought to question. Perfectly unconscious, therefore, that she was driving the iron still deeper into his heart, she never found herself alone with Frederic, but, by some exertion of feminine tact, she led the conversation, whatever might be its original purport, to the subject of marriage; and even became eloquent as she enlarged upon it.

"In a life of celibacy," she said upon one occasion, when her patient but dispirited listener was seated placidly at her side; "when too long protracted, a man contracts habits and prejudices fearfully detrimental to all subsequent home-happiness. He fritters away his best and holiest feelings in idle and profitless dissipation, or in paltry and puerile follies; he accustoms himself to selfish and sordid indulgences; and becomes either minutely and contemptibly exacting with regard to certain trivial conventionalities, to which he attaches a fictitious importance that excites the pity, if not the ridicule of his associates, or, 'unstable as the wind,' he suffers himself to be made the sport of every caprice of chance, or, worse still, of momentary egotism, and sacrifices to the passing instant all the interests of the future. The glow of youth, and the bloom of manhood, have alike escaped him unheeded; and it is only when the fingers of Time have begun to weave threads of silver among the rapidly-thinning locks which formerly clustered in profusion about his brow, and when certain spasmodic twinges seize upon his burning foot or his swelling hand, that he compels himself at last to think of marriage, which has probably been from an early age the subject of his sarcasm.

"And then, how humiliating is it to reflect, that when the unmistakable commencement of decay at last works this mental revolution, the prudent and fastidious commentator upon other men's follies almost universally leads to the altar, and ties to himself for life, either a young and inexperienced girl, more fitted to stand in the relationship of his grand-daughter—a toy to fondle and to neglect at will—or a favorite female servant, famous for her culinary ability, or talent as a nurse. The latter alternative, degrading though it may be, is nevertheless the best, as it scarcely entails martyrdom upon either party; for the selfish sensualist, as he gloats over his gastronomic luxuries, forgets, at least for a time, amid his egotistical indulgences, the price at which they have been purchased; and probably cares little that the hand which smoothes the cushions of the gouty chair is as red as the leather with which it is covered. In the other case, however, the reflection is fearful! It is a realization of the German legend of the living body attached to the senseless corpse. Believe me, the superannuated bridegroom indulges in a fallacy when he imagines that he can educate the young wife whose personal qualifications have induced him to encourage the delusion that he can still repay her affection, or imbue her with his peculiar habits and feelings. The mind may indeed be tutored, but the heart is beyond the schooling of egotism.

"And, meanwhile, what is the fate of the poor victim of expediency? Either she sets at naught the tastes and wishes of her ill-assorted husband, plunges into dissipation, and revenges herself upon the world for the emptiness and joylessness of home; or she withers beneath the chilling conviction that her moral existence must be a blank. I am far from justifying either result; for, in this blessed country no woman can be compelled to such an union; but still we have the every-day experience that much may be done by a treaty, by expostulation, and by holding out brilliant, and, too often, fallacious prospects, calculated to operate powerfully and viciously upon an inexperienced imagination.

"It is only after the step is irrevocably taken that the truth, in all its terrors, becomes manifest to the victim; and that the young heart, frozen by its contact with one on which all the softer and more attaching sympathies have long been extinguished, shrinks appalled at the prospect of its own isolation, and rushes into the world in search of that companionship which cannot exist at its own hearth.

"It would be alike useless to trace, and painful to contemplate, the probable close of such a career; nor is its wretchedness lessened by the fact that the first, and deepest blame is attributable to the cupidity of parents and guardians, and the egotism of self-love. To be alike happy and honorable, marriage should never be allowed to present any marked and startling contrast either in age or station; for the balance of individual advantages is no sooner lost, than the charm, and even the holiness, of such a bond is gone."

"There are, moreover, other perils, my dear mother, scarcely less dangerous," observed Mortimer upon one occasion, "less visible, perhaps, but equally to be avoided; such, for instance, as incompatibility of tastes, habits, and dispositions," and he sighed as he ventured the remark.

"Undoubtedly," acquiesced his mother; "but, in assuming these, both parties must be careful not to nourish a morbid and unreasonable feeling. So much may be done where the heart is right, and the mind pure. The great point is to contract marriage before selfish tastes, habits, and dispositions are too deeply rooted. In your own case you have nothing to apprehend; for Gertrude has not a thought or a feeling which angels might not share."

Frederic sighed again; he did not doubt the truth of the assertion, but he would fain have seen more of the fond and devoted woman in the wife who was to share his fortunes; and then his importunate fancy turned back to Sybil, and he dwelt upon her remembrances of iat of a "bright and particular star," far better ilited to shine upon the horizon of his own eart, than the cold and insensible girl to whom had been offered through the volition of nother.

He marvelled if Miss Delamere had ever ved; but he soon succeeded in convincing mself that had she indeed so done, she would ot still have been Miss Delamere; for who ould have resisted her fascinations? Of her e he never thought, for Sybil was one of ose bright creatures who seem to control time, id to create about them a perpetual spring. et what could they ever be to each other? as not his destiny fixed and irrevocable? e might secure her friendship, but he dared t aspire to her love.

And, meanwhile, the intercourse of the two milies insensibly increased, and grew to intiacy. Mrs. Mortimer was half won over to e Sybil by the admiration and affection which e evinced for Gertrude; while Frederic only preciated the more highly a character so suerior as to place her above common and wonish rivalry, as she expatiated to himself on the perfections of his cousin.

"You are, indeed, an enviable person, Mr. ortimer," she said with a sweet smile, as they ere one day professing to make a survey of e improvements at The Grange; "nothing n be more faultless than the beauty of that vely girl; no cameo ever presented a more rfect outline than her exquisite features, and e is so gentle, so essentially feminine, her disition is so placid, and her manners are so ld, that it will in truth be a privilege to lead ch a being in safety and happiness through life."

"Her empire will be home," said Frederic, mpelling himself to reply.

"And where should it be?" asked Miss Delare earnestly. "What should a woman asre to beyond that? All else, believe me, is re delusion for our sex. Where the heart is, ere alone should the energies be exerted, and the home a palace or a cottage, it will suf-e. We are not, as you are, the slaves of amtion, of wealth, of power; our dominion is of me growth, and like the ivy, clings ever shly and closely to the same prop. Men will ver understand us; they think us light, trig and capricious; they cannot sound the pth of a true woman's heart."

"And yet," remarked Mortimer, as for an inant he glanced into the beaming countenance fore him, "you have not ventured beyond re theory in your own person."

"Oh, I!" said Miss Delamere, with a forced ugh; "I am altogether horse-de-combat. I am tented with my fate, and satisfied to remain spectator of the events which progress around Persons attract me occasionally, and I am nkful for the variety which such pre-possions afford, but I have learned to estimate preferences at their true value, and am quite are that what appears very desirable and deghtful to-day, incurs a great risk of proving lious a year hence. How few among us rely understand our true interests! But this is, rhaps, as it should be; for a perpetual change sentiment and feeling lends a constant charm to life, and destroys its monotony. We can afford to like, for a rational regard helps us delightfully over the rough paths of our pilgrimage; but we must be careful how we permit ourselves to love, for the error, once committed, is never to be repaired."

"You argue with the coolness of a philosopher."

"And you, like all your sex, have a contempt for petticoat philosophy, is it not so? Nevertheless, you may be forgiven. Your happiness is assured, and you are not called upon to resist."

"If you assume such a position I cannot discuss the point."

"Why should you seek to do so? Where no struggle is required, no victory is needed. I look upon you as the most enviable man I know: your station in society is exalted enough to satisfy any healthy ambition; you have a mother who is a model for her sex, and by whom you are adored. It is, perchance, scarcely delicate in me to push my definition closer, and yet you surely must forgive me if I again advert to your lovely cousin—what more can you ask of fate? May I not say of you what was said of the favored ones of old, that 'the gods have you in their keeping?'"

"And your own star?" asked Frederic in a tone of slight pique.

"Mine!" replied Sybil, with another of those ambiguous laughs which from her lips were always musical, even while it was not easy to detect their actual inspiration; "I doubt if any one of the luminous bodies has condescended to adopt the care of my destiny, it has been so essentially common-place. I am, however, fortunately satisfied, as I have already told you, to be a looker-on."

"And you have never loved; you, who could, and should, love well and deeply?"

Sybil turned aside for an instant in silence, and wrenched away the branch of a flowering shrub near which they were passing, as if by this action to throw off some painful and powerful feeling; apparently she succeeded, for in the next instant her voice was almost steady as she replied,—

"I may have done so; and now, like a wrecked merchant, only cling the closer to the security of land. None can warn more fittingly than those who have suffered."

Mortimer breathed quickly. She had loved then, and she was still Miss Delamere; although, from the very self-possession which she had so nobly assumed, it was evident that she had not escaped unscathed. He forgot Gertrude—he forgot his father's dying request—he forgot, in short, all save the radiant creature beside him, as he asked impetuously,—

"And having loved once, although unhappily, can you be now contented to live on like the crowd about you? Do you not—"

"No," said Sybil, laying her hand lightly upon his arm, and glancing with an arch smile into his face; "No, for trust me, I know well what you would ask. Even as the Spartans were accustomed to intoxicate their slaves in order that their children might see the vice of drunkenness in all its abhorrent coarseness, and so learn to avoid it, are women of my stamp permitted once to prostrate their best feelings before those of another; but, like the Spartan boys, they generally profit by the experience, and obtain a firmer power over their own susceptibilities; and this done, even if they do not secure happiness, they at least exhibit a counterfeit, which passes current as readily in the world."

"I do not comprehend such a compromise," said Frederic, somewhat coldly; "I have a different notion of 'the uses of adversity.'"

"Would you, then, trail your crape over the kennels of the world?" asked Miss Delamere, with a slight accent of scorn; "believe me, the dear friends about us have little real sympathy with any sorrow which leaves themselves unscathed; nor do I see the wisdom of nursing regret, where we have only to reassert our dignity, and to profit by our experience. We may occasionally feel the wound open afresh, but we can always conceal it; nor are we called upon to present our breast to a second stab. We learn a great lesson when we are first taught to accept life upon its own terms; and to gather the wheat and the tares together without murmuring."

"And am I to understand that you have attained to this privilege?" asked Mortimer, with growing uneasiness.

"I hope so; but, as this species of philosophy is not, as I am well aware, to be acquired at once, I do not expect to make you a convert. Nevertheless, I cannot afford to allow you to quarrel with my tenets, because you are the pupil of a more romantic school. They are the result of long and close observation, for I have never been accustomed to move over the rough paths of the world with my eyes shut; and since I have, by some strange chance, elected you into a temporary father-confessor, I will even confide to you thus much more—that I have seen so many fair promises turn out signal failures; so many charming buds of hope only produce a blight; that I have endeavored to profit by the examples which have been afforded me. I know one sweet girl especially, who resisted all warning, and who spurned at all opposition, in order to fulfil the dream of her young heart; but alas! she only sowed in faith to reap in bitterness. So much is required on both sides to render a married life really happy, that it is almost presumptuous to seek an exception in one's own particular case there should be such perfect conformity of tastes, feelings, and principles, such power of self-abnegation, such entire and absolute devotion to another; and above all, such a faculty of loving through weal and woe, that I have renounced all hope of ever meeting one who would care to incur so great a risk for my sake."

"You despair of such a result?"

"Even so, and am I so much to blame?" she asked with a winning smile; "and may I not trust that you will acquit me of cold-heartedness and egotism if I have taught myself to appreciate the world as it is, and to receive with gratitude the calmer enjoyments which it tenders to me, without exacting more? Because I will not be a voluntary martyr, must I submit to be thought an egotistical coquette? or to have it believed that I love pleasure and display, simply from the fact that I am incapable of all higher and holier affection? In short, will you still apply to me in your heart all those injurious epithets with which your sex generally overwhelm a woman, who, having attained years of discretion and reflection, still remains free, and declares her resolution to continue so?"

"No," murmured Frederic, nevertheless only half convinced; "but I hold that the man who is able to induce you to recant that resolution will be the happiest of mortals."

Sybil laughed, and placing her slender finger upon her lip, archly shook her head. "And now, reverend father," she said sportively, "we must never again recur to this subject. You are affianced to your cousin morally, therefore a married man—and I to my principles. Let us rather talk of your sweet bride-elect, who needs but your guiding and supporting hand to become all that you can desire to see her. Were she nothing better than a beauty, it is a theme which, conversant as I have now become with your ardent nature, I should dread to touch upon; but such is far from being the case; she is full of pleasant womanly feelings and acquirements, and altogether qualified to make your home happy."

"You have studied her merits deeply," said Mortimer, somewhat sarcastically.

"Was it not natural that I should do so? Mrs Mortimer was the first of our county neighbors who ventured within our anchorage without demanding a clean bill of health—You were yourself the first individual with whom I was brought into contact after my arrival, and with whom I had a taste, a pursuit, or a study in common—while Gertrude was pointed out to me as your destined wife. Do you wonder that I looked somewhat closely into her character, when I felt that it involved your happiness? But no—no—" she pursued hurriedly as she averted her head, and quickened her pace; "I have expressed myself ill, unfortunately—I should have said—"

"Nothing save the very words you uttered," exclaimed Frederic breathlessly. "You have admitted that you honor me with some portion of your interest, and believe me that I will study to deserve it."

From that moment, however, Miss Delamere resolutely turned the subject of discourse, nor could all the artifices of Frederic induce her to resume it. Enough had nevertheless passed between them to convince Sybil that Mortimer was utterly indifferent to his cousin, and by no means equally so to herself; while Frederic quitted her presence with the proud conviction that although Miss Delamere had resolved never to give away her heart, she had at least bestowed her regard upon himself. The conviction came at a fortunate period to heal the wounds of his self-love; and he ingenuously believed that his own feeling towards the beautiful Sybil was of a similar nature; but he did not estimate the perils of the trial to which he thus recklessly abandoned his peace of mind.

An individual of winning manners and acco lished intellect, whose habits and sentiments ssimilate with our own, makes great, although nperceptible progress in our affections before 've become cognizant of the fact. We imagine iat we are only gratified, interested, and un- erstood, while in truth we have in some degree eased to understand ourselves; and where we elieved that we were merely encouraging an ntercourse tending to make the hours pass less eavily, and with more profit to our personal eelings, we have unconsciously created a moral liment necessary to our after-existence; and ome morning we awaken with our brain and ur heart alike replete with new impulses, new houghts, and new sensations, of which we had ot even dreamed when we retired to rest upon ie previous night. We had lain down, like ulliver, in all the pride of our strength, only) find after our slumber that we are bound by thousand Lilliputian bonds, each a mere hair i itself, but collectively forming a net-work om which we cannot free ourselves.

The society of Sybil became daily more necessary to Mortimer. He no longer looked upon er as a mere acquaintance, with whom it was ccasionally pleasant to while away an idle our; but even in her absence he constantly eferred to her tastes and opinions, and coupled er image with all his pursuits. When he accientally recalled to recollection an unusually nteresting incident of travel, he reverted to it until he could relate it to Miss Delamere; and , in the course of his reading, he was struck y an able passage, or a quaint conceit, it was rthwith marked, in order that it might be subnitted to her judgment, or made conducive to er amusement; while she no sooner appeared an he instantly roused himself from the languor hich was rapidly becoming habitual to him, nd exerted himself to do justice to his natural nd acquired powers of mind.

And day by day, meanwhile, one sat beside im who was equally able to appreciate these fforts, but who felt that they were made for nother. Delighted to see her son gratified and mused, Mrs. Mortimer increased in courtesy nd attention to the inmates of The Grange, ever dreaming that the matured and decided eauty of Sybil could bear comparison with the nobtrusive loveliness of her gentle niece, and onsequently far from suspecting that she was iding and abetting in the downfall of her own isious; but Gertrude was more clear sighted Inexperienced as she was in the ways of the vorld and in the caprices of passion, she soon iscovered that Frederic saw and spoke only vith the eyes and lips of Sybil; and with a bitter joy did she congratulate herself from hour o hour, that she had voluntarily withdrawn rom a contest by which her pride must have been wounded, and her independence compromised. How often, entirely forgotten or overlooked by her cousin and his brilliant guest, did she continue riveted to her work-table by he spell which his presence never failed to exercise over her, listening to arguments in which he could well have sustained her part; and interpreting a thousand words and inferences which each party conceived to be sacred to themselves; how often did she catch the beam in the eye of Frederic as it rested on his beautiful companion, and feel the icebolt upon her heart!

Vainly, however, did she watch for any answering demonstrations from Miss Delamere. Sybil remembered her conversation with Mortimer; and although fully conscious of the empire which she had attained over his mind and heart, she never permitted its repetition. To all appearance she had, indeed, forgotten the circumstance, for she did not shun the intimacy which Frederic was so anxious to establish, but rather assumed towards him the bearing of an elder sister, desirous to enlarge his tastes, and to diminish his enthusiasm. Nevertheless, it was certain that although she might succeed in the former attempt, she produced no effect in the latter; for Mortimer was not the pupil calculated to grow calmer under the teaching of such a preceptress; and thus Gertrude remained a melancholy spectator of gaiety in which she was not called upon to share; and an attachment which she was not supposed to comprehend.

And yet—what would she not have given for one of those ardent looks, one of those heart-inspired tones! A year of life? Pshaw! what was a year of life to her, who, young as she was, had already begun to feel how dreary a boon existence may become when coupled with disappointment? At times, she asked herself what she had done to merit such a fate; but although she felt tempted to reproach her cousin for having so thoroughly misjudged her, never for an instant did her generous nature include in its transient bitterness the syren who had beguiled his affections. All that had taken place appeared, on the contrary, so natural, that as she gazed in admiring sadness upon the radiant woman with whom she had thus unfortunately been brought into collision, she felt at once humbled and disheartened; and, although she believed that she could love—that she did love—as well as Sybil, she shrank from every other comparison between them.

"Hers is the affection of a day," would she murmur in her solitude, "fed by his presence, and strengthened by his praise; while mine has been the silent worship of years, indulged in absence, alimented by hope, and encouraged by reason. But he has no faith in such a feeling—my secret is my own, and it is my sole heritage. The delusion is at length over; and the orphan girl is alone with her sorrow."

CHAPTER VII.

And, meanwhile, the passion of Frederic for Miss Delamere increased hourly; and scarcely a day passed in which he did not find or invent some pretext for a visit to The Grange. He was himself unconscious of the extent to which he had become enthralled. Never once had the idea of declining the hand of his cousin crossed his imagination; in fact, he rarely thought upon the subject; and when he chanced to do so, it was calmly and without repugnance, as an arrangement sufficiently remote to present no immediate impediment to his tastes and pursuits. Fully impressed with the conviction, that the event was one of at least equal indifference to Gertrude, he regarded it simply as he did every other question of duty and expediency; determined to act correctly and uprightly when the time should come, without troubling himself by speculating upon its probable consequences, either to his own happiness or that of his cousin. Doing full justice to the virtues and amiability of his future wife, he was satisfied that his married existence would be at least calm and honorable; and he believed that he should be able to render hers equally so; but beyond this faith he did not venture to trust himself. He felt convinced that they should never understand each other; and he endeavored to forget a necessity from which he made no effort to escape.

Nowhere could he so effectually do this as in the society of Sybil, the infinite variety of whose character continually invested her with a new charm; even the mystery by which she had surrounded herself was not without its attraction, for it altogether destroyed the common-place of ordinary friendship. To imply any secret involving her honor or truth, Mortimer felt to be utterly impossible; and often as he bewildered himself by conjectures on her previous existence, it never occurred to him that it could comprise any episode unfavorable to her dignity.

Moreover, Miss Delamere had frankly declared her resolution never to marry; and consequently their familiar intercourse was equally unimportant on both sides, while it was a perpetual source of gratification to each party.

Fascinated as he was, Frederic no longer possessed a sufficiently unbiased judgment to reflect upon the extreme singularity, if not indelicacy, of the convert confidence made to him by Sybil. He did not pause to remember that such intimate disclosures are very rarely volunteered by an unmarried woman to an acquaintance of the opposite sex; and never until long and tried friendship has removed the indelicacy of such a communication.

He saw in it only what Sybil had been anxious that he should see; an intention on her part to remove all feeling of restraint, and all tinge of imprudence from their constant and increasing companionship; and he was the more strengthened in this conviction by the fact, that she rarely lost an opportunity of impressing upon him the attractions and virtues of his cousin.

Several months passed on thus; and each succeeding week Mortimer spent less and less time at home; while he generally so contrived that when he was himself there Mrs. and Miss Delamere should also be its inmates. No party of pleasure was complete without them: no evening circle brilliant in which they were not included; and while he found a particular fauteuil, in which the languid mother was brought to confess that she was really as comfortably established as in her own, the tables of Mrs. Mortimer were constantly decorated with clusters of beautiful exotics gracefully presented by the attentive daughter.

Frederic was tenderly attached to his mother, and these delicate courtesies were therefore duly appreciated by him. But at length they awakened the anxiety of the very mind which they were intended to tranquillize; and even when Sybil relieved her at her tapestry-frame, and with marvellous skill wrought out the most charming and complicated fancies, investing the very labors of the needle with the poetry which she dispensed over all she touched, Mrs. Mortimer began to ask herself if these unwearied endeavors to please and to oblige, were really exerted solely for her own sake; and ere long, she felt the answer to be doubtful and unsatisfactory.

She remarked too, that when, on rare occasions, Gertrude made an attempt to conquer her depression, and to put forth her innate powers of conversation, although Sybil might have been pensive and absorbed a moment previously, she immediately threw off her momentary reserve; and with a wit which, like Aaron's rod, absorbed that of all around her, speedily repossessed herself of the attention of the whole circle.

From day to day Mrs. Mortimer reflected more seriously upon all these circumstances; and the result of her cogitations was a determination to lose no more time in recalling to the memory of Frederic his actual position as regarded his cousin. Satisfied that Gertrude, whom she loved as a daughter, was strongly attached to her son, she felt that she could not suffer her happiness to be made the sport of one whom she began to suspect of an unworthy but not the less dangerous coquetry; and, believing that the evil had as yet made too little progress to render her task one of much difficulty, she consequently felt less repugnance than she otherwise would have done in representing to Frederic the painful results which might ultimately accrue from his present unguarded system of conduct.

Accordingly as he one morning entered the library where she was engaged in writing, with his hat and gloves in his hand, and evidently about to leave the house, she looked up from her desk, and inquired with a forced smile, if he were again about to absent himself for the day?

"I think not, my dear mother," he replied somewhat confusedly, and with evident anxiety to escape; "I am only going to canter over to The Grange to inquire for Mrs. Delamere, who was somewhat indisposed when I returned last night; and should she not feel better to-day, is improbable that she will wish for visitors."

"In which case shall we really see you again in an hour or two, my dear boy? Gertrude and I promised ourselves such delightful morning when you should be restored to us, that we are almost inclined to feel mortified by your continual desertion."

"Do you indeed miss me so much, then?" asked Frederic affectionately, as he laid down his hat, and drew a chair to the side of his mother: "As to my cousin, I have long had proof that neither my presence nor my absence can affect her equanimity, and consequently deems no apology necessary in her case; but to yourself, my dear mother, if indeed my wandering tend to diminish your happiness, I cannot offer too many."

"Of late, my dear boy," said Mrs. Mortimer, with something which sounded like a sign; "I have had so few opportunities of conversing confidentially with you, that if you can indeed spare me half an hour, I would ask you to defer your visit until I have spoken to you upon a subject in which all my best feelings are interested. You consent? Then, Frederic, I will venture to remind you that you are now more than five-and-twenty, and that it is my dearest wish to see you married, and to find myself surrounded by new and and attaching ties before I am called upon to leave this world. I have, as you may remember, already spoken to you upon the same subject, but I now repeat my entreaty most earnestly; nor do I fear that I shall do so in vain."

She paused, but Mortimer continued silent.

"You have assured me," she pursued, after a time, "that you formed no attachment while abroad, but that you brought back to us the same pure and affectionate heart with which you departed; and I believed you, for you had never deceived me. You may, therefore, judge of my joy upon receiving this assurance, for your happiness has ever been the chief aim of my existence. You returned all that my prayers had asked—all that could satisfy the exactions even of a mother's affection; and on my side I rejoice to prove to you that throughout the whole of your absence, I had been unwearidly occupied in securing to you a wife worthy of your noble virtues. You loved your cousin, young as you were, even before your departure; while to Gertrude you were already more dear than any one else on earth. I took care, my dear boy, to foster and encourage that affection; for I knew your nature too well to fear either caprice or fickleness on your part. My efforts were, however, unnecessary. Her love for you grew with her growth; she has sat for hours at my feet, listening to my speculations and hopes, and mingling her old memories with mine. Let our conversations commence as they might, you were always their closing theme. When I hinted at the dangers to which you were exposed, she stopped me with her tears; and when I talked of the blessedness of your return, she was radiant with delight. Trust me, a woman can always read a woman's heart; while the task was doubly easy to one who, like myself, felt a twofold interest in the investigation."

Still Mortimer listened in silence.

"I was aware, however," continued his mother, resolutely, "that even the love of such a heart as hers would not suffice alone to married happiness. For your sake, therefore, my dear boy, as well as for her own, I studied to make her all that was estimable, both in mind and heart, and richly have I succeeded; the beauty of her person, faultless as it is, does not exceed that of her character. She is portionless, it is true, but she is your uncle's child, and you do not, happily, require any increase of fortune; while it is certain that you can nowhere find a wife more richly endowed with personal charms, mental qualities, or moral virtues."

"I admit the fact willingly," said Frederic with a pale lip, and an uncertain tremor in his voice, for the words and manner of his mother had enabled him, in a few seconds, to see further into the real depths of his heart than he had ever before done, and convinced him that he had been indulging a wilful and dangerous self-delusion; "far be it from me to depreciate in the slightest degree the merits and virtues of my cousin; and yet I fear that I could never secure her happiness; our dispositions and habits are utterly incompatible. She is too meek, too retiring; and you must forgive me if I say also, too unimpassioned to satisfy my exacting tastes. I can quite comprehend that her affection for yourself led her to feel an unaffected interest in all your anxieties upon my account; but, believe me, it was far more for your sake than for mine. My impetuosity would scare her—my enthusiasm irritate her feelings—my defects become insupportable to her. In fact, my dear mother, Gertrude is too perfect; her very placidity would chill me into stone; and thus we should become a perpetual torment to each other."

"You do not judge your cousin fairly, Frederic," said Mrs. Mortimer with increased seriousness, more and more convinced that her suspicions had not misled her: "you make no allowance for the peculiarity of her position; and you fail to recollect that you have made no effort to diminish its difficulty. It is true that she has not attempted to compel your affection, deeply as she would have prized it, for Gertrude is incapable of every thing unwomanly; but surely you would not construe her delicacy into a crime?—Are her meekness and retiring modesty, indeed, defects in your eyes? The objection is a novelty under such circumstances. It is true that others my be more brilliant in conversation, more showy in manner, more coquettish in disposition, and, consequently, more attractive for an hour; but these are mere drawing-room accomplishments, which have little, indeed, to do with home-happiness, and are a most fallacious foundation for married peace. Gertrude has not, I admit, been educated for the world, but—as I fondly hoped—for a better and a purer destiny."

"And I trust that she will yet fulfil her fate," said Frederic with a sigh. "There are many far worthier than myself, who will and must appreciate her many estimable qualities, and whom she may perhaps love: while I repeat my conviction that she feels nothing more than a sisterly affection for myself; and I confess that I have an utter abhorrence of all marriages of expediency."

Poor Mrs. Mortimer, exhausted by an effort at opposition so contrary to her nature, and depressed by a disappointment for which she had been totally unprepared, could no longer restrain her tears, they fell fast in silence until they were remarked by her son; who, instantly subdued by the sight of a sorrow of which he was himself the cause, hastened to entreat her, for his sake, to compose herself, declaring that he was ready to obey her wishes in all things.

As he uttered this assurance, however, the heart of Frederic sank within him, and he felt as though a cloud had settled upon the future. Now, indeed, he became aware of the empire which Sybil had acquired over his whole being.

She never might have consented to rescind her resolution, and to become his wife; but he could at least have lived on in hope—lived on, as he in truth had done for the last few months, scarcely caring to ask anything of to-morrow, but rich in all the happiness of to-day.

"It never could be my wish to urge you to any act repulsive to your own feelings, my dear boy," said Mrs. Mortimer, as she wiped away the large drops which were still coursing each other down her cheeks; "but for many reasons I felt it my duty to be frank with you, and even to press you upon this subject. Your father's dying entreaty, your cousin's devoted affection, and the perseverance with which I myself nourished that girlish love until I felt that it had become a principle of her existence, all determined me to the course I have pursued; but compulsion in such a case is, of course, unnatural and impossible. You are free to act as you see fit; only I beseech you to divest yourself of the erroneous belief that your own indifference to your cousin is returned by her. Would that it indeed were so! You have now only to express your will, and, should you desire it, the subject shall never again be named between us; and you, at least, shall not be made the victim of a fatal mistake."

"I will not disappoint your affection, my beloved mother," said Frederic, as he rose. "In obtaining the hand of a woman like my cousin, I ought to feel happy; and when you inform her that I will make it my study to deserve her affection, she will perhaps not scruple to admit it, since you assure me that such a feeling indeed exists." And pressing his lips to the forehead of his agitated companion, he hastily left the room.

Mrs. Mortimer no sooner found herself alone than she gave free vent to the grief which she had hitherto vainly endeavored to suppress. She could not conceal from her own heart that the concession of her son had been wrung from him entirely by his affection for herself; and she began to doubt in how far she would be justified in accepting it. She trembled, not only for his happiness, but for that of Gertrude; for what could be anticipated from an union formed under such circumstances? Then, however, the vision of Sybil rose before her, and she almost shuddered as she thought of the power which this showy and mysterious stranger had acquired over the mind and feelings of Frederic.

The more she reflected, the less did she find herself able to bring any definite or tangible accusation against her; but nevertheless there was a vague and undefined feeling of her unworthiness and craft which would obtrude itself, and a thousand petty circumstances flashed upon her memory, all tending to strengthen the impression; while, as she recurred to the original distaste which she had experienced towards Miss Delamere from the very moment of their introduction she became almost superstitious in her belief that it had been a warning to avoid her acquaintance, and she felt tempted to visit upon herself all the blame of her present trial.

That her idolized son should become the husband of a heartless manœuvrer was a dread so bitter that she could not reflect upon it without the keenest suffering; and that this would inevitably be the case should she reject the promise which she had so lately and with so much difficulty extorted from him, she felt fatally convinced.

Mrs. Mortimer affected no overstrained and narrow-minded bigotry of birth, or pride of purse; but she could not calmly brook the idea of seeing her only son married to a woman who found it expedient to conceal her previous history, and to live as though the present were all in all to her. Frederic owed much to himself and still more to the memory of his father, for although no aristocrat by descent, his family was ennobled by its honor and fair fame, while he himself was, as she well knew, ill constructed to bear disgrace, come in what shape it might. Yet here he was willing, and even eager, to in cur a risk upon whose amount he could not cal culate, and to entrust alike his respectability and his happiness to a woman whose fair fac and brilliant fascinations had undermined hi reason and hoodwinked his prudence.

The anxious mother felt that his peril must b overcome at once; she reflected also that Frede ric was incapable of forfeiting his word, an that consequently, the more time she suffered t elapse before his marriage with Gertrude, th longer she should subject him to a strugg which was evidently too painful to be born calmly; while once united to his amiable an adoring cousin, she could not entertain a dou that he would soon appreciate her endearin and attaching qualities, and repay her affecti with all the energy of his nature.

Thus reassured, Mrs. Mortimer became grad ally consoled; and, convinced that she was i suring at once the happiness of her son and th of his cousin, she closed her desk, and proce ed to the morning-room, where Gertrude w busily engaged in arranging fresh flowers upo stand near the window, in order to communic to her the message of her now declared lover.

Perhaps the gentle girl intuitively felt th such a tale would have been more fitly told Frederic himself. Certain it is that, for all ply, she only murmured, as she flung herself i passion of tears, into the arms of Mrs. Mortim "But, my dear, dear aunt, do you think that really loves me?"

CHAPTER VIII.

Meanwhile Frederic, dissatisfied with himse and conscious of the unmanly fickleness wh he had betrayed, forgot for a brief time e a the bitterness of his disappointment in the e milliation of his self-accusations. Aware t when the subject of his marriage with his co n was first broached by his mother, he had it least tacitly consented to the arrangement, d thus misled her into a belief that it was con ent with his own wishes, he felt that from t moment he should in honor have ceased to n sider himself free; and that not even he coldness of Gertrude should have induced m to treat her with the neglect and avoid ce which he had exhibited, until he had ascertained from her own lips that his suit was distasteful to her.

The reflection came, however, too late; for if she had indeed loved him, her heart must have been too deeply wounded long to retain a passion which his whole conduct had tended to discourage; while, should his suspicion that he was indifferent to her prove correct, and that he nevertheless determined to become his wife merely in obedience to the wishes of his parents, his prospect of happiness was even less promising. Where the self-love of each party had been mortified there could be little hope of a perfect intelligence at any period, however remote; and Mortimer, although unconscious of the extent of his moral infirmity, was prepared to believe that he could never experience a sincere attachment for any woman who had evinced towards him the coldness of his cousin.

How different had been the whole bearing and manner of Sybil! Bound to him by no ties of either memory or kindred, she had nevertheless met his advances towards a friendship, which now appeared doubly precious, with a warmth and frankness which to him were inappreciable. As the one repelled, so had the other encouraged him; and on the part of Miss Delamere, resolved, as she had declared herself to be, never to hazard her happiness to the keeping of another, there was, consequently, a beautiful disinterestedness which proved that she valued him for himself, without one ulterior project. The reflection crossed his mind at an unlucky moment; for, as he mentally argued, although he had been rash enough to love her, even forewarned by an assurance which should have proved an efficient safeguard against so profitless a passion, she was guiltless of all that had occurred; and it behoved him to act at once with a sincerity worthy of her own, by acquainting her, without loss of time, with the purport of his recent interview with his mother; and assuring her that any apparent change in his feelings of regard must be attributed to his compelled position, rather than to any actual diminution in that friendship and respect which would endure to the end of his existence.

The human heart is ever ingenious in its sophistry; and thus Mortimer, whose daily yearning for the society of Sybil was urging him to her presence, even while writhing under the effects of his past vaccillation, had little difficulty in convincing himself that he was bound to exonerate his conduct from the danger of misconception, by immediately pouring forth all the anguish of his spirit before the very woman from whom it should have been sacredly concealed.

Full of this one absorbing idea, he forgot that, at the most eventful moment of her life, his better feelings should have led him to the side of Gertrude; and that it was to her alone that he was bound to confess his error, and frankly to declare his real sentiments.

But the whole nature of Frederic had become changed since his acquaintance with Sybil. The indignant blood would have rushed to his brow, had the thirst of vengeance to his heart, had any help breathed an insinuation against his honor; and yet he was about to commit the twofold treachery of offering his hand to a woman whom he did not love, and of confessing his repugnance to this union to another whom he felt to be, in point of fact, her rival. Even his once devoted affection for his mother had been weakened by a more engrossing attachment. He no longer made her happiness his first and dearest care; there was but one bright point in the horizon of his existence, and all around it had become dimmed and faint.

And thus he slowly rode away from that home which had ceased to be to him what it once was; and from the two beings who loved him better than aught else on earth, heedless of the new wound which this untimely desertion must inflict on both, and intent only upon justifying himself in the eyes of one who had suddenly superseded them in his affections.

Never had the road between the town and The Grange appeared so long or so gloomy; for, as though haunted by a compunction which he could not resist, he traversed it almost at a foot's pace, dreading, nearly as much as he desired, the coming interview.

When he at length reached the lodge, the first object which met his eyes was Sybil; Sybil, in all her beauty, lingering upon a spot whence she could command the road by which he must arrive, and evidently awaiting his appearance. Never had she looked more radiant; a light danced in her deep eyes as she detected his presence, a slight flush rose to her cheek, and there was an earnest welcome in the gesture with which she invited him to alight and join her. In an instant Frederic sprang to the ground, flung the bridle-rein to his groom, and, drawing the arm of his fair hostess through his own, was hidden with her in the leafy depths of the shrubbery. The indisposition of Mrs. Delamere was alike forgotten by both; Sybil was full of reproaches on his unwonted tardiness, which had, as she declared, interfered most disagreeably with her day's arrangements, in which she had very inconsiderately, as it had now proved, done him the honor to include him; while Mortimer was oppressed by a remembrance of the communication which he was about to make.

It was strange that, with a perfect faith in the sincerity of Miss Delamere's declaration, that he could never be to her more than a valued friend, he should nevertheless find a difficulty in entering upon his task; but the human mind is a complicated machine, over which its owner sometimes lacks control; and thus Frederic strove to smile at the sallies, and to appear interested in the sportive rebukes, of his beautiful companion.

"Nevertheless," continued Miss Delamere, when she at length saw fit to conclude her smiling reproaches, "the lost time may yet be redeemed in this instance—a rare case, you must admit, Mr. Mortimer; and one which seldom occurs in life, where a past folly can hope no better result than a long repentance,—and therefore I will inform you, without further delay, that mamma—who, par parenthèse, is much better this morning—has consented to accompany me to the Hartwell ruins. How say you?

Will you be our escort, or rather, I should have said, our cicerone, for, to you they must be old acquaintance? We are, as you know, mere novices in the neighborhood, and need a guiding hand; therefore it will be an act and office of courteous charity for which we shall individually and collectively, be duly grateful."

"You are aware that I am only too happy to obey your orders, be they what they may," said Frederic with unaccustomed gravity.

"Yes, yes, chevalier sans peur et sans reproche," laughed Miss Delamere; "I well know that you are a very model of knightly virtue; but still I may be permitted to suggest that you might have accepted this challenge with somewhat less of the 'woful countenance.' Believe me, that its result will be even more innoxious than that of the windmills."

"Would that I shared the conviction!" said Frederic with increased melancholy; "but, listen to me for one moment, while I tell you that my appearance here to-day is less a pleasure than a duty; and believe, in your turn that there is no discourtesy in such an admission. You know but too well, that for months past my only hours of perfect happiness have been those for which I have been indebted to your friendship, those which I have spent in your society: you may therefore easily conceive that I must have a powerful and a fatal reason for approaching you with any other feeling than one of unmitigated delight; and yet such is the fact."

An expression almost of alarm passed over the speaking features of Sybil, as she compelled herself to ask an explanation of his meaning.

"Miss Delamere," said Mortimer, struggling with his emotion, "you have often congratulated me upon my probable union with my cousin, and I have been accustomed to receive your congratulations as calmly as they were offered; for I merely regarded the event after the fashion that all men regard death, as that which must one day happen, but of which the period is at once distant and indefinite. To day, however, I can do so no longer; for I have been forcibly reminded of my engagement, and urged to fulfil it. In short, I am no longer my own master; but am called upon to devote myself to my affianced bride. Do you now understand the reason of a gloom so foreign to my nature in your society?"

"Scarcely," replied his companion, with a forced composure which lent a strange coldness to her manner: "Miss Mortimer is so very beautiful—so very faultless—that you can have no excuse for such a caprice. But it is the privilege of your sex to disappoint all ordinary calculations; and doubtlessly the shadow will pass as speedily as it has gathered."

"This from you, Sybil!" said Frederic reproachfully.

"Is not the inference a friendly one? And are we not—have we not been—friends?"

"Such was my belief," muttered Mortimer.

"So much, at least, you may concede with safety," said Sybil somewhat haughtily; "I seek not, I have never sought, for more; nor do I comprehend why your approaching union with Miss Mortimer should degrade what was once a pleasure, as you have just confessed, into a duty. I have been frank with you, Mr. Mortimer, very frank. You will do me the justice to admit that I have never willingly interfered with the happiness or claims of your cousin. I explained to you without reserve, my feelings and my determination; nor have I seen any reason to alter or to recant either. That your absence will create a sensible blank in my every-day existence, I avow without hesitation; but I have neither right nor desire to repine at so inevitable a deprivation. We never could have become more to each other than we have been, and I cannot consequently marvel that we must now become less. To a being isolated like myself, the possession of congenial companionship is undoubtedly a great boon; but I advance no pretensions to retain it when it militates against the higher and dearer claims of another."

"Enough," said Frederic almost fiercely. "Enough! You know your power, Sybil, and you are merciless. I tell you, with a freedom equal to your own, that no such resolution as you have formed will ever resist the real impulse of a true woman-heart; and that, had I possessed the qualities which should have won you despite all your pride and all your philosophy, you would have responded to my affection. And oh! had it indeed been so," he added passionately, as he possessed himself of the small and trembling hand that still rested upon his arm, "I would have braved even my mother's tears and my cousin's scorn, to make you mine. No consideration upon this earth should have parted us. But I was not worthy of you; I am the victim of my own frantic self-delusion and must abide my fate. You, at least, are spared the pang of self-reproach; from the first you spurned and discouraged a passion to which you found no answer in your own breast, and you have acted generously and nobly. The fault and folly have been all my own; and I must endeavor to expiate them with what courage I can command. All that I venture to ask is, that you will not withdraw your esteem from one to whom it has become indeed precious, but to whom you have resolutely refused the dearer privilege of living for your happiness. The doom is now sealed; in a few months, probably a few weeks,—for I care not how nor when the destiny may be accomplished,—I shall become the husband of my cousin—of a woman who, however, beautiful and gifted, has never loved me, and whom I can never love. To friends I only must I look, therefore, for that remnant of happiness which will be requisite to render my future existence endurable; and where can I seek it so effectually as at your hands?"

"I am no changeling in either heart or feeling, Mr. Mortimer," said Sybil, slowly and affectedly disengaging her hand from his clasp. "So long as we continue at the Grange, so long will you be a welcome guest beneath its roof. I should have rejoiced to see you with more of the elected bridegroom in your mood and manner, but I suppose that I must accept you upon your own terms. And now let us part; we shall be wise not to discuss this subject more at length, for it is one which is in some degree painful to us both. Your groom is probably awaiting you long ere this, at the house."

"And our expedition to the ruins?" asked Frederic with sudden eagerness.

"Must be deferred," said Sybil, pressing her forehead with her hand. "I do not feel quite well, and fancy that I have already over-walked myself. We will throw that project, along with many others, into the casket of the future."

"Suffer me at least to pay my respects to Mrs. Delamere," persisted Mortimer, who could not conceal his mortification at this unexpected dismissal, and who was anxious before his departure from The Grange to overcome the sudden, and to him unaccountable reserve of Sybil.

"My mother has not, in all probability, left her room," was the discouraging rejoinder; "and is still languid from the indisposition of yesterday. I will faithfully convey your remembrances and good wishes. And here, most opportunely, is your gallant bay! He is, in truth, a noble creature: and were I addicted to the somewhat paltry vice of envy, I should be perhaps inclined to covet the possession of so fine an animal. As it is, I congratulate him upon having fallen into the hand of one who can alike appreciate and enhance his merits. Do not fail to offer my sincere regards to Mrs. Mortimer and her niece, and give Surrey his head if you would reach home in time for luncheon."

And with a graceful and calm bow, Miss Delamere turned away, and disappeared within the portico.

CHAPTER IX.

The reflections of Mortimer during his homeward ride were of strangely conflicting nature; for, while the extraordinary and sudden coldness of Sybil pained his heart, it nevertheless, by a singular antithesis, flattered his vanity. There was only one way of accounting for conduct so wayward and unexpected; and he felt satisfied, that even while she rejected his love, she could not endure the idea that he should become engrossed by another. And if this were indeed true, what did it prove? Assuredly that Miss Delamere had permitted herself unconsciously to feel a deeper interest in him and his affections than she apprehended to be possible under the circumstances.

The heart of Frederic throbbed proudly as the conviction grew stronger every instant. He felt that he was loved, and that he had compelled his love which had been so steadfastly refused to him; loved by a woman of genius and enthusiasm, who had instinctively yielded to a passion which she had foresworn, against which she had struggled, but which had proved too mighty for her strength.

And he had only learnt this truth when it was too late: when, for the second time, he had promised to fulfil the wishes of his mother, and to immolate his happiness to what he had been taught to consider as his duty. The effort had been sufficiently bitter when it was made, but what must it be now?—now that he was loved by Sybil—that the wildest dream of his ambition was realized, and that all he coveted on earth was within his grasp?

To his impetuous nature there was madness in the thought; and, shrinking from a renewed exhibition of his weakness to his mother, and goaded by a host of feelings each more powerful than that by which it had been preceded, he had resolved, long ere he had reached home, to throw himself upon the generosity of Gertrude.

He was conscious of the humiliation to which he must inevitably expose himself by such a proceeding; nor was he by any means blinded to the fact of its want of delicacy and consideration; but still, in the selfishness of his passion, he could not forbear a feeling of gratulation at the conviction, that by these means he could not fail to recover his freedom, for that the pride of his cousin would necessarily lead her to spurn all claim upon a reluctant hand, and to liberate him from his engagement on the instant.

Perfectly satisfied in his own mind, despite the assurances which he had received from his mother, that the feelings of Gertrude would suffer no pain from his secession, and that her vanity alone would be wounded; he gave himself no uneasiness as to its ultimate effect upon her happiness; but he could not feel so well assured that Mrs. Mortimer would display equal philosophy. He was aware that beneath her apparent placidity she possessed quick and strong sensibility, coupled with a stern and rigid sense of honor; and that the first would be painfully excited by his desertion of the being whom, next to himself, she loved the best on earth; while a failure in the last, in the person of her own son, could not fail to wound her to the very soul.

For an instant the spirit of Mortimer quailed, and he almost shrank from exposing her to such a trial; but in the next, the form of Sybil rose before him—Sybil, who by an effort might now become his own; and once more he nerved himself to his ungracious task.

Gertrude might still be ignorant of his morning conference with his mother—he forgot that he had been absent during two long hours—and should this hope be realized, his difficulty as regarded the interview with herself would be materially diminished, for he was, at least, guiltless of any attempt to win her affections; and she must consequently acquit him of a want of consistency, of which he was innately more disposed to feel ashamed, than of the more vital fault which he was about wilfully to commit.

Thus, careless alike of winning and of retaining his love, and unconscious that he had himself recently given her a right to consider herself as the arbiter of his destiny, it was not impossible that he might even so far work upon her sisterly attachment as to constitute her his advocate with his justly irritated and offended mother—for Frederic had suddenly become diplomatic in his provisions. In short, as he reined up his horse at the gate of the avenue, he had almost succeeded in bringing himself to believe that he had already overcome the obstacles which had seemed so appalling at a first glance; and that happiness and Sybil were to be won by a simple wish.

He had scarcely alighted, however, ere the illusion vanished. How easy are the conquests which we achieve before we encounter the enemy! How eloquent the addresses which we deliver before we are brought face to face with our interlocutor! But, alas for the promises upon which we pride ourselves! How often does the valor which had previously borne us up, evaporate before the presence of the adversary, and the aspect of the auditor!

And so it was with Frederic. He had no sooner entered the hall, recognized the door which in all probability alone separated him from his cousin, than he began to feel that the path which he had traced for himself was by no means strewn with roses; and it was consequently, almost with a sensation of relief that, upon entering the breakfast-room, he found it occupied by both his mother and Gertrude.

The welcome of the former was affectionate but somewhat sad; for she felt that his arrival had, under the circumstances, been too long deferred. She, however, uttered no reproach, while the conscious girl beside her, trembling with mingled fear and happiness, having greeted him with a forced smile and a burning blush, once more bent her fair face in silence over her work-frame. Suddenly remembering some important omission in her household arrangements, Mrs. Mortimer hastened to leave the room ere any other subject could be broached; and Frederic, who had not yet overcome his agitation, found himself tête-à-tête with his formidable cousin.

His first impulse was to walk to the window, where he stood for and instant, gazing fixedly on the objects beyond, but utterly unconscious in what they consisted; his next, to turn abruptly toward his silent companion, who still leant over her work, as though intent only upon its progress. He would have compensated the chance of escape with half his fortune, but it was too late; and finally, by a desperate effort, he flung himself into a chair which chanced to stand near her, and grasped the delicate hand that rested on the tapestry.

"Gertrude," he said, in an accent which she could scarcely recognise as that of her calm and indifferent cousin, and which, for an instant, she almost believed to be agitated by anxious affection; "you have much with which to reproach me. I feel that I must have disappointed most cruelly the anticipations of your fond and sisterly regard; but I trust to your generosity, to your forgiveness. Perhaps we have not understood each other. We parted as those ever part who have been dear to each other, while we met again almost as strangers. It is possible that I may have forgotten the changes which time never fails to produce on the feelings of a child who has expanded into a fair and beautiful woman; while, on your part, you may have omitted to make a due allowance for the influence which circumstances—which events—which, in short—But I will not dwell upon the past; only permit me to hope that we may, at last, although, perhaps, still in an imperfect manner, understand each other."

Gertrude raised her large blue eyes to his in inquiring wonder, but she could not articulate a syllable. Her heart throbbed painfully; a presentiment of some coming trial oppressed her, and once more her head sank upon her bosom.

"You have been informed, my dear cousin," continued Frederic hurriedly, for he had passed the Rubicon, and now only sought to terminate the interview as speedily as possible, "that, in his last hours, my father expressed a wish that we should one day be more closely united, while such was also my own most ardent hope when returned to a home so painfully bereaved. That was, however, as you well know, no moment in which to enter upon such a subject, and, perhaps the circumstance was fortunate for both of us. We had been too long strangers. We were ourselves unconscious of the changes to which we had been subjected, nor had much time elapsed ere I felt the fact; but believe me, my sweet cousin, that I no sooner found myself an alien from your heart, than I tacitly withdrew my claim."

Gertrude gasped for breath; but even overpowered as she was by this singular address coming so immediately at the close of the communication made only that morning by her aunt her innate sense of dignity prompted her at once to reply—

"You are free, Mr. Mortimer. On my side, I advance no claim upon your affections. You are the son of my benefactors—your will is my duty. Spare both yourself and me a discussion which must pain us both."

"You misconceive me, Gertrude," eagerly responded Mortimer, who, anxious to exonerate his own conduct, was blind to the intuitive delicacy of her motive, and, for the moment, even misunderstood himself. "If I could, for a moment, have flattered myself that I had created an interest in your bosom beyond that of mere relationship and habit, I should have acted very differently; but you have been consistent throughout. We have lived under the same roof, without one sympathy in common. I have done homage to your admirable qualities of mind and heart; I have felt, and ever shall feel deeply grateful for your devoted and filial affection towards my admirable mother; I acknowledge all the obligation which we owe you, but I base no presumptuous hope upon feelings which have borne no reference to myself."

"Frederic," said Miss Mortimer, who instinctively felt the real tendency of his expression and whose honest pride supplied her with temporary strength, "there needs no exonerating where there has been no wilful fault. We were not constituted for each other; and forgive me, my dear cousin, if I venture to entreat that you will, at least, spare yourself. You have repeated the concession of this morning, and I thank you—I have need to thank you (for that full acquiescence, wrung from a reluctant heart, might have involved us in one common misery) that you are frank enough—feeling that your affection for a beloved mother had led you into a fatal error—to confess your mistake at once, and to confide in my friendship to restore you to happiness. Be happy, Frederic, be happy!" gasped the soul-stricken girl. "Do not let the thought of me cloud the horizon of your existence. I know all that you could tell me, I have known, I have seen it long. My sister—regard has been too sincere to look blindly upon the attachment by which you are absorbed. You owe me no explanation, no excuse. Perhaps I could have wished that you had spared me the trial of to-day, but it is now over, and, henceforth, I entreat you to think of me only as a devoted friend."

"Gertrude, what can you mean?"

"Would you urge me to be more explicit? Surely it is unnecessary. My path is plain. I owe all to you and your parents. Suffer me to pay back the debt. You did not understand the heart that you have wrung; and the fault has perhaps been my own. Let me but see you happy, and I care not for myself."

"Happy!" echoed Mortimer; "can I be happy otherwise than by the happiness of those about me? You are incomprehensible. From the first moment of our meeting, you have shunned and avoided me. I come to you in all frankness to explain—it may be to atone—"

"I require no atonement," said the heroic girl, as she swept back the rich clusters of her hair, and met his gaze unshrinkingly. "Do not waste an instant upon me. My aunt must be reconciled to your change of purpose. Confide in my regard. I have been weak, very weak; I should have known by experience, that a sincere affection cannot lightly be rooted out, and I should have felt that it will admit no substitute. Frederic, you love Miss Delamere, and I covet no reluctant heart. Forget that Gertrude Mortimer exists, or remember her only as the baby-playmate who amused your boyhood; but never cease to remember that, in your orphan cousin, you have a friend whose every energy will be exerted to spare you one pang, to deliver you from one suffering. Only be just alike to yourself and to me. Only confess that you have bestowed your affections elsewhere, and that I am the sole obstacle to your happiness, and, then, believe that the obstacle is at once and forever at an end. Shall it not be so?" she asked, as she extended her hand with a smile so ghastly that all the anguish of a bursting heart appeared to have settled upon her livid lip. "Will you not do me the justice to confide in my affection, and to rely upon my truth?"

"Gertrude, I do not know you!" murmured Frederic, appalled by the change which had passed over her faultless features: "Can you indeed feel—and for me?"

No words would suffice to convey the expression of mingled tenderness and reproach which for a brief instant lighted up the tearful eyes of the orphan; but in the next moment they were again averted, and their long lashes fell like a veil upon her pallid cheeks."

"Gertrude!" gasped Frederic, as he started from his chair, and turned away; "you have been very cruel."

For a short time no sound was audible save the hurried tread of Mortimer, as he paced rapidly to and fro the apartment; but at length he paused once more beside the work-frame.

"I was prepared to love you," he whispered hoarsely; "I did love you; but you repelled me. My mother had vaunted your tenderness, your amiability, your devotion, and I yearned to possess myself of your affections. But how did you meet me, Gertrude? How? I cannot live without the love of those about me: not the mere commonplace of habit, whose attachment is shared alike by all that surrounds it; but deep and exclusive love—that love 'even unto death,' which fills the heart to overflowing, and can be poured only upon one object; I yearned for it—panted for it—I sought it at your hands; silently it is true, but earnestly; and it was refused me. I looked further;—I may deceive myself—but I at least believed that I had found it—I believe so still. You now possess my secret, Gertrude. My whole being is absorbed in the passion to which I have delivered myself up. My very existence depends upon its success. I am no longer master of my own feelings. If I have indeed wronged your timid nature—"

"Enough—enough," murmured Miss Mortimer almost inaudibly; "We are friends, Frederic—Do you now understand me? Friends—We must never again speak upon this subject. How can I now serve you? I am ready."

The low sigh of her listener was his first response. He felt all the cruelty of the step that he had taken when it was too late to remedy the evil. His mother had judged correctly—Gertrude loved him; but what was such a love to him now? His whole heart and hope were bound up in Sybil. He knew not, he could not know, a second affection. It was too late to shrink before the dread of giving pain to another; his existence was on the die; and his path, though it might be difficult, was plain.

I am aware that my hero will disappoint more than one of my readers; I early vaunted both his mental and moral qualities; I drew a glowing picture alike of his heart and head; and yet I have suffered him to fail under his first trial. I have, however, no apology to make—I am simply relating a tale of every-day life, in which all the actors are human; and did I venture to paint a perfect mortal, I should but caricature my fellow-beings.

It is possible that Frederic might have successfully withstood every other weakness, every other snare, laid for him by his own passions and prejudices; but in Sybil he had unfortunately encountered the arbitress of his destiny. He believed that she loved him passionately, because unwillingly; and that belief fostered his peculiar failing.

Nevertheless he was still the warm-hearted, affectionate, and generous being whom I formerly depicted—as upright as honorable, and as right-minded as ever; but he had learned to view most things through a species of moral prism, which distributed its tints according to his own morbid feelings. His passion for Sybil had colored all his thoughts; and, in short, he was as he himself expressed it, no longer master of his own impulses. His affection for Gertrude still continued, but its nature was changed; she was to him as a dear sister, but no more; her unobtrusive beauty and quiet virtues, when compared with the dazzling loveliness and captivating qualities of Miss Delamere, sank into shade, and were almost negatived; he respected her character, he felt her worth, but his heart refused to ratify the decision of his reason.

Weak, but still worthy, he was conscious of all the faultiness of his indecision, and pained by the suffering which it had induced, although incapable of sacrificing his own dream of happiness in order to mitigate its effects; and it was consequently, with deep feeling that he again took the hand of his cousin, as he said,—

"I accept the friendship so frankly offered, Gertrude; and in return I tender you the fondest affection of a brother. I know all your worth; perhaps I only appreciate its full value too late; but of this it is vain to speak. I throw myself upon your kindly offices. No one has more influence over my mother than yourself; exert that influence in my behalf. I fear that what you have to tell, and to defend, will wound her deeply; but she loves me, and will forgive all, if you become my advocate. May the day arrive in which I am enabled to repay your goodness! Believe me, I shall know how to be eloquent, when your happiness is to reward my exertions."

The pale cheek of Gertrude flushed for an instant. She could offer no reply to such an assurance, feeling as she did that for her, henceforward the word happiness would be a mere empty sound. She simply clasped the hand of her cousin in her own, and ratified by a look the promise she had already made.

She had scarcely done this when Mrs. Mortimer re-entered the apartment; a happy smile was upon her lips, and words of self-gratulation were ready to burst forth; for she believed that her absence had enabled Frederic to compensate to his cousin for all her past sufferings; but the light faded from her eye, and the congratulations died upon her tongue as she approached them: it was at once evident that both would be ill-timed; a conviction which was strengthened by the fact, that as she had appeared, her son hastily seized his hat, and hurried from the room.

"Gertrude!" she exclaimed anxiously; "What is the meaning of this? Can it be possible that Frederic has again deceived me?"

But Gertrude's strength was now exhausted; and she could only bury her face upon her tapestry-frame, and give free vent to the bitter tears of humiliation and blighted hope.

For an instant Mrs. Mortimer stood aghast; she could not mistake the nature of the emotion upon which she looked. It was evident that this was no outpouring of an oppressive happiness, which sought to relieve itself in a passionate burst of feeling; there was no struggling smile to reveal the latent joy; no effusion of affectionate tenderness towards herself to challenge her ready sympathy. She saw at once that the cold drops which trickled through the slender fingers were wrung from the heart's sorrow; and forgetting for an instant all the devoted love which she bore towards her son, she attempted at once to console her niece, and to relieve her own feelings, by giving loose to the indignant anger which his vacillating conduct had awakened in her generous spirit.

Only for a moment, however, did the noble girl suffer the outbreak of her irritation to have way. Rousing herself by a powerful effort, she lifted her pale face from its resting-place, and dashing away the tears which still crowded into her dim eyes, she hastened to declare that the blame of all that had occurred rested solely with herself; that her own vanity, her own weakness, had alone led to this distressing scene that her cousin had deceived himself in believing for a time that he could love her, and he frankly and truthfully declared his error before it had become a source of misery to both parties; that she had seen the folly and madness of her pretensions; and that, henceforward, she should regard him only as a brother.

Mrs. Mortimer listened in grief and admiration; but she was not to be misled. Throughout her whole life Gertrude had been to her an affectionate and confiding child, and she knew every impulse, and every emotion of the young pure heart which was now bleeding before her. She felt that the victim had been bound by her own hands to the horns of the altar; and although the soft voice murmured "Peace! peace!" there was no peace in the stricken spirit of the anxious mother.

"I see it all!" she exclaimed, in a hard, cold tone, utterly unlike the usual softness of her affectionate accents: "But Frederic deceives himself, as he has deceived me, if he hopes ever to obtain my consent to such a measure. I, you, my child, I can say nothing which would express my admiration of your generous and self-sacrificing conduct; but it shall not avail. He has acted unworthily in an unworthy cause. He has wounded me to the heart; smitten in my best affections; taught me to blush for the son who was at once my pride, and the hope of my old age. And for whom? For an adventurer, surrounded by mystery, and probably by disgrace; a woman hacknied in the world's ways, from whom he should have shrunk with the intuitive loathing of an honest heart; for a fiend who has brought dissension and sorrow into the bosom of his family. You plead in vain, Gertrude. He may be insensible to your affection, blind to your merits, incapable of appreciating your virtue; but he shall never disgrace the memory of his father, by bestowing in his name upon one who is unworthy to bear it."

"He loves her, my dear aunt."

An expression of cold contempt settled upon the fine features of Mrs. Mortimer.

"He has avowed to me," resolutely pursued Gertrude amid her sobs; "that his happiness depends upon Miss Delamere. Reflect upon this acknowledgment, I beseech of you. His happiness—the happiness of your beloved and only son. And can you wonder that it should be so? Remember her beauty, her wit, her marvellous acquirements; and confess that few indeed would be able to resist them. Forget me, and all that you had devised when thinking only of my weak attachment: Frederic is no longer a mere youth to be thralled by the force of habit; he has looked into his own heart, and felt the inefficiency of such a tie. Confess, too, my dear aunt, that I am nothing beside so brilliant a being as Sybil; I have long felt this truth, and it is one to which you cannot remain insensible. Let us forget the past; your affections and my gratitude will alike enable us to do this—in time."

I will hear no more," said Mrs. Mortimer, she rose from her seat. "The dream of my life is over; but I have still the authority which nature has given to the parent over the child. Frederic must choose between his mother and his mistress. Of your hand he has ceased to be worthy; but should he bestow his own upon the manœuvring woman by whom he is now surralled, he ceases to be my son."

Oh, in mercy revoke that cruel sentence, mother dear, dear aunt!" gasped out the affrighted girl, flinging herself upon her knees, and impeding the retreat of the excited mother. "Think of the hours of affection, of anxiety, of joy which you have passed together—think how his father loved him—have pity upon me who love him still!"

Mrs. Mortimer bent over the trembling suppliant at her feet, and pressed her pale lips to the still paler forehead which was upraised to meet them, but she did not swerve from her resolution. She felt that she had been made the tool and dupe of Mrs. Delamere; that she had been deceived by Frederic; and that she was the architect of her niece's misery. Her heart was wrung, and her pride was wounded. She had been so long accustomed to regard her son as being superior to his fellow men, that she could not brook this sudden dispersion of all her cherished illusions; and it was with a firm step and a tearless eye that she at length, supported by her indignation, and strengthened by the spectacle of Gertrude's wretchedness and heroism, passed into the library, and desired a servant to request the immediate presence of Mr. Mortimer.

The summons was, however, fruitless, for Frederic had already left the house.

CHAPTER X.

On quitting his cousin, the first impulse of Mortimer had simply been to absent himself for a time from home, until the influence of Gertrude had enabled her to reconcile his mother to his change of purpose. Ill at ease, and anxious, despite the evidence of his senses, to believe that the attachment of his cousin, of which he could no longer entertain a doubt, was the mere idle caprice of a young girl, who had for the first time been brought into contact with an individual of the opposite sex, he, however, no sooner found himself once more alone, than his thoughts reverted to Sybil. Sybil would not so readily have transferred her claim to another had his hand been pledged to her; but Sybil knew how to love and to love deeply. Her every word and look betrayed her. Had she not been all enthusiasm and frankness so long as she believed him to be free? And had not a sudden coldness and reserve succeeded to the knowledge of his betrothment? True, she had said, and repeated on many occasions, that she would never marry; but had he not as often smiled at a declaration in which he placed no faith? And was he not now justified in this incredulity?

He mentally reviewed all their late interviews, and at first he persuaded himself that there could be no doubt of her affection; but gradually he became less convinced of the fact. She was so beautiful, so full of mind and intellect—at once so fascinating and so accomplished, that it appeared presumptuous to believe that such a being could pass through the world's paths, as she had evidently done, calm and unfettered, merely to suffer herself at last to be won by the love of so obscure an individual as himself. She had, perhaps acted strangely and inconsistently at their last meeting, but who should say what dormant memories the announcement of his approaching marriage might have awakened? She had confessed to a former attachment; and was it not possible that the intelligence which he so abruptly imparted to her had struck some hidden chord which had for a time ceased to vibrate in her heart; and that thus her change of mood and manner might in no way bear upon her feeling for himself?

The suspicion was torture, and the cold drops stood upon the brow of Frederic as it became stronger every instant. Should this indeed be so, idly had he wounded the affection and pride of his mother, vainly had he tortured the sensibility of his cousin, cruelly had he deceived himself.

Any conviction, however bitter, was preferable to such an uncertainty, and in five minutes more, Frederic was galloping recklessly towards The Grange.

Great was his astonishment and dismay on perceiving that the hall was encumbered with trunks and packages, which a couple of servants were engaged in cording and heaping one upon the other; and still more utter was his despair, when he learnt that almost immediately after his departure, Miss Delamere had desired that the travelling carriage might be in readiness early on the following morning, to convey her mother and herself to the coast, where they were to embark for the continent.

The brain of Mortimer whirled, and his pulses throbbed with emotion. What could this mean? It was evident that the project was a sudden one, since no leave-taking had been contemplated. Could anything have happened in which the happiness or safety of Sybil was involved? Was he to lose her just as he had discovered that she had become necessary to his existence? Should she not, in such a case have at once appealed to him, for support and assistance? And yet how could she throw herself upon the protection of a man who had just declared to her that he was to become the husband of another? Mortimer was bewildered by rapidly conflicting feelings, and at length, scarcely conscious of the indiscretion of his conduct, he inquired of one of the busy servants the cause of Mrs. Delamere's sudden departure.

"I cannot say, Sir," was the unsatisfactory reply; "but I don't think it's a pleasure party, any way, for my young mistress looked dull enough, when she gave me her orders, and seemed as if she'd much ado to keep her tears down."

Sybil was unhappy, then! And once more Frederic began to connect this sudden grief with his communication of the morning, and to feel convinced that the intention of this abrupt journey was to avoid himself, and if this, indeed, were so, they might never meet again. Such an apprehension was too painful to be borne; and, without further hesitation, he traversed the hall and entered the morning room, resolved to learn the truth from the lips of Sybil herself.

Great, consequently, was his disappointment, when he found it occupied only by Mrs. Delamere, who sat in the accustomed chair, in the accustomed attitude, listlessly looking upon the open pages of a volume from which it was evident that she did not imbibe a single idea; and this languid and impassible object, jarring as it did upon the excited nerves of Mortimer, was ill calculated to calm his agitation.

"Ha! is that you, Mr. Mortimer?" yawned the lady, depositing the book upon a table near her; "I am glad you are come. Sybil is busy in her own room. We leave this to-morrow morning early."

"Shall you be absent long?" asked Frederic, with a cold thrill at his heart.

"I don't know; Sybil settled it all. I hate travelling, but she said we must go;" and she turned uneasily among her cushions.

"You have received no unpleasant news, I trust?"

"No, I believe not; but Sybil knows best. It is her own arrangement; I suppose she is tired of The Grange."

Tired of The Grange! Miss Delamere tired of The Grange! How bitter was the inference! But the very excess of his mortification gave Frederic courage to pursue his inquiries.

"You are not about to take a very long journey, I hope?"

"I really can't say; I fancy Sybil has not quite made up her mind, for when I asked the same question, she merely said, 'Anywhere; she did not care where we went, if we got away from this neighborhood for a time.'"

And as Mrs. Delamere closed her eyes with an expression of fatigue after so unusually lengthy a speech, the blood rushed to the brow of her auditor, and a proud smile rose instinctively to his lip.

All was clear; Sybil loved him, and feared to remain where she must so soon encounter him as the husband of Gertrude. The post arrived at Westrum before noon, and consequently it was certain that no intelligence of importance could have reached The Grange through that medium since he had left it in the morning. On his arrival, he had been received with smiles, and greeted with the tidings of a projected party of pleasure; it was only after he had told his tale that the brow of Sybil had grown dark, and her tone cold. And now she sought to avoid him.

Frederic was no coxcomb, but the inference was too palpable to be mistaken. This fatal departure might be prevented—must be prevented; for was he not now free to pour out all his spirit before the idol of his heart? Gertrude had relinquished her claim to his hand, and was even now reconciling his mother to the transfer of his affections; that mother loved him, and would never perseveringly oppose his happiness—and Sybil! Sybil, by the very excess of her delicacy, by the very terror of betraying secret, had convinced him that her affect were his own. The moment of inaction consequently past. He had merely sought love of Sybil tacitly; it now remained for to ask it.

He turned once more to Mrs. Delamere:

"And Sybil—Miss Delamere—Where is she?"

His companion had recourse to her other tle, for this pertinacity overpowered her. was so little accustomed to do the honors o conversation, that she sank under the pre tax upon her energies, and it was almost tishly that she replied; "I really don't kn I believe in her room. You can ring the and inquire of her maid."

Frederic hastened to obey, and the ser who answered the summons returned ac panied by the Abigail, who, with a compl heightened by the hurry of her arrange informed the anxious visitor that her mi had a short time previously walked int grounds.

With a hasty bow, Mortimer left the and started in pursuit of the fair wand but he traversed the conservatories, and e every temple and grotto in vain,—Miss lamere was no where to be seen. At leng almost in despair of finding her, and half ter to believe that he had been misled, he pl into a small dense thicket, which skirts the property, and ere long he discovered Sybil seated under the shadow of an ilex, with her head pillowed on her hand, and her face nearly hidden by the dark and luxuriant masses her hair, which had escaped from the comb that habitually confined it and now fell abo her shoulders to the ground.

For a moment he stood motionless—fi in admiration and astonishment. It was the first occasion upon which he had seen the brilliant Sybil in tears; and now he detected the large drops slowly trickling through her fingers. The careless abandon of her attitude, a the secluded spot which she had chosen in order to conceal her grief from other eyes, also told a tale of deep and bitter suffering; and his heart beat quicker as the conviction grew upon him that he should soon be privileged to dry those tears, and to turn that grief to gladness. Yet still he lingered. He could imagine the faultless face now so effectually concealed while the graceful figure, touched here and there by the straggling sun-rays, which flickered through the leaves above her head, was so beautiful in its unconscious harmony of attitude, that was only by an effort he could resolve upon breaking so bright a spell.

His step was noiseless upon the moss-grown turf, and thus he reached her side before she was aware of his approach; nor even then did she stir eye or limb until Mortimer, gently bending over her, whispered her name.

"You here!" she exclaimed, as she landed from the earth, and dashed away the moisture from her long lashes. "What can Mr. Mortimer come here to seek?"

"Your love, Sybil—your coveted at priceless love!" was the impassioned reply. "I have struggled in vain to obey you—to satisfy yself with your friendship—to immolate the ppiness of my whole life to a distasteful and doreed duty: I cannot do it, Sybil,—I had cerrated my powers of endurance. You must len to me, and love me, or my existence will hceforth be a blank. You are about to leave lgland, but that step, extreme and cruel as it shall avail you nothing; I will follow you to end of the earth; I will be proof alike ainst your coldness and your disdain. Till I rt you I was at peace; what I am now is ur own work, and you must abide the result your fascinations. Sybil, my precious Sybil, all I sue in vain!"

As the last words escaped his lips, the knee of Artimer bent before Miss Delamere, and her hid was clasped in his. He saw not the proud ad triumphant gleam which for an instant psed over her features, for before he again rsed his eyes to her face, all was once more cn and cold, and passionless.

Why are you silent, Sybil?" he pursued wh increasing emotion. "One word—I ask b for one—to be the most happy or the most nerable of men,—and you will deny it to n!"

What can I say!" asked Miss Delamere in aow murmur, but still without withdrawing h hand. "I know you only as the betrothed oyour cousin. From the first hour of our aquaintance I was aware of your engagement. I ave ever looked upon you as one no longer fr to act, or even to feel, beyond a certain wl-defined boundary. How then, could I love y, or seek your love! I am no idle girl who sc a suitor in every civil stranger, and an awal upon every courtly lip. My affections li not so near the surface that they may be wng or sported with by every touch of accid or vanity;—and I have told you more th once my steadfast purpose to resist all bdishments which might tend to peril my lirty of thought and affection."

I have no faith in such resolves," said Frederk doggedly, as he rose unbidden from her fe Were we two temper-chafed children," obsed Miss Delamere, lifting her large luminoeyes to his with a smile so beautiful that it mht have maddened an anchorite; "I might rert by telling you that I placed as little dependence upon the vacillating affection which hs hovered for months between two different objects, and was at length only decided by impue. Nay, now you are angry," she contned with another beaming look; "I had no intation to offend you, nor as a rational and thking woman, shall I reply to you in such te as. No, Mr. Mortimer, for it behooves us bo, at such a moment as this, to be just to ourelves and to each other. It is my departure frc The Grange which has hurried you into thstrange, and forgive me if I add, unwarrantab step which you are now taking. Your hai is not your own, for it has been promised; ev your heart is no longer in your gift, for it is dged; and I am not one likely to dispute eit r. It is true that I am about to leave Englan It was my intention to have written my farrell to your family this evening; the courtesy which I have received from your mother and yourself demanded this consideration, after which, all would have been at an end between us. A year ago the existenee of the one was utterly unknown to the other,—a year hence it would have been to each simply a passing and a pleasant memory; why do you seek to render it otherwise?"

"Sybil," said Frederic, as his whole frame shook with emotion; "you can no longer deceive me with mere words. It is not your heart that speaks. I will not, I dare not believe that you are a vain and passionate coquette, who has wiled away a few heavy hours in ensuring my misery—and this I must believe, or be assured that I have ceased to be indifferent to your peace."

"You are bold, sir," said Sybil haughtily, as she raised her tall figure to its full height, and prepared to turn away.

"I am bold," acquieseed her companion, clasping her arm in order to intercept her retreat; "I am bold, Sybil, for I am desperate. Only a few hours back, conscious that I could not live without your affection, I threw myself upon the generosity of my cousin, and she liberated me from my engagement."

"Impossible!" exclaimed Miss Delamere energetically; "Gertrude Mortimer may be cold and self-centered, but she was secure of your hand, and it is not possible that she could renounce her right."

Once more the brow of Frederic cleared, and his eye gleamed with delight! "I thank you for the doubt," he said tenderly; "it tells me all I sought to know. And you will love me, Sybil, will you not? For I swear to you that I am free."

"And your mother?" murmured his listener.

"Gertrude has undertaken to convince her that she had mistaken us both, and to prepare her to receive another and a dearer daughter."

"And yet this must not be," said Miss Delamere, as suddenly perceiving the disarray of her magnificent hair, she stooped and raised the comb which lay at her feet, and twisted the scattered tresses into a luxuriant knot on the summit of her small and graceful head; "Such a proceeding would be neither delicate nor generous. Even supposing that I had been weak enough to suffer my feelings to overcome not only my reason, but also a resolution formed years ago, I could not consent to build up my happiness upon the misery of another; or forget that the preferenee which would enable me to do so, could only have originated in a transitory fancy, too soon to be dispelled. The contest between Gertrude Mortimer and myself would be alike idle and unnatural. She is yet upon the very threshold of womanhood; her heart is an uninscribed tablet, save where your name has been written; she is beautiful; and, like the sensitive plant, retires before a touch. She has never trod the stony paths of the world, and been galled by their roughness; she is very woman in all that is womanly; needing care, and affection, and support. Remember, too, that it is to you that she has looked for these from her childhood; and that she has a right to claim them as the inheritance of your father's affection; and then, having reflected upon all this, reverse the picture, Frederic, and look on me"—

For a moment she paused, as if for some disclaimer from her companion, but he continued resolutely silent. For the first time Sybil had addressed him by his Christian name; and his triumph at discovering how rapidly and involuntarily she was betraying the state of her own heart, made him fear to trust himself with a word, lest he should afford her an opportunity of resuming her self-possession.

"I am not about to provoke an idle and ill-timed compliment," she pursued with a stifled sigh; "I seldom speak of myself; and when I am compelled to do so, heartily despise the flattery which mortifies me by the conviction of my own egotism. I am aware that nature has not been a niggard to me: I have been told the contrary too often to affect a childish ignorance of my personal advantages. But more than these are required to ensure domestic happiness. The flower that blossoms in a day too frequently fades on the morrow. Do you understand the metaphor? You have known your cousin from her birth—I am the mere acquaintance of a few brief months."

"They have comprised all of my existence which I care to remember," broke in Frederic impetuously.

Miss Delamere thanked him by a look—and such a look!

"Every action, almost every thought, of your cousin, has been revealed to you. Of me you know nothing, save that I exist, and stand beside you."

"I ask nothing from the past—all from the future."

"With me the timidity of girlhood has given place to a decision of character which the world loves to criticise, although it is its own work. I have my own principles, my own prejudices, my own peculiarities; and, worse than all, I need no guidance, no support; I can choose my own path, and follow it."

"Only let us tread it together," whispered Frederic, as he pressed his lips to the hand that rested on his arm.

"You are incorrigible," murmured Sybil, in a tone which betrayed her innate gratification; "but you must, nevertheless, listen to reason."

"I will listen to anything from your lips."

"But, having so done, you will not have done all: you must act as well as hearken. Mrs. Mortimer will never consent to receive me as her daughter. Where you feel, she will reflect. You know what have been her plans; and she is no longer young. In our early years we content ourselves with flowers, when we find that we cannot, as we begin by hoping to do, grasp the stars; but maturity and age are more tenacious of their projects; their aspirations are more rational and practicable; and, accordingly, they abandon them with less carelessness. I cannot condescend to be merely received on sufferance in any family."

"Sybil, dear Sybil, your delicacy is morbid; is misplaced. My mother already admires and esteems you; and she will no sooner become convinced that you have my happiness in your keeping, than she will learn to love you as her own child."

"Do not deceive yourself, my friend," said Sybil playfully; "that Mrs. Mortimer admires me—perhaps! She listens to my harp, applauds my singing, prizes my sketches of your dear old house—so much, indeed, unfortunately, that I have scarcely been able to reserve one for myself——"

"When you are its mistress, and that I can spare you for so long a time, you shall sketch it from all points."

"Nay, if you interrupt me every instant, I shall despair of making you understand my meanimg," said Sybil gently. "That she does all this I admit at once; but esteem!—oh, believe me! that I shall never be esteemed by Mrs. Mortimer, if I thwart her plans; though I should present myself, with my genealogical tree in one hand, and the whole history of my past life in the other."

"You have but to present yourself as my affianced bride, and that shall suffice."

"Four yourself I doubt not; and I thank you that you at least are satisfied to take me upon trust; but I have carefully studied the character of your mother. Gentle and womanly as she is, she is capable of firm and strong determination. From your earliest boyhood she had resolved upon your union with your cousin; and she will not, trust me, revoke her purpose."

"I am no longer a boy, and I have refused consent to this hateful marriage. Am I not free to act as I deem best, and to secure my happiness according to my own ideas?"

"Undoubtedly, but you are unstable. In either side there must be a struggle. Let me play the monitor for once. Support it in the worthiest and most prudent phase. Fulfil the wishes of Mrs. Mortimer; and let us part."

"And this is your advice?"

"Is it not that which I should offer? Better far better to be the victim of my own sense of right, than of another's scorn!"

"And is the strife of feeling then confined only to yourself and to my mother?"

"Not so—Oh, no! not so," said Sybil with emotion: "I do not for an instant forget your cousin. Poor girl! so young, so beautiful, and yet so wretched!"

"I spoke not of Gertrude," said Mortimer impatiently. "I ventured to believe that I, too, might have been remembered when you talked of the victims to be immolated upon the shrine of exaggerated sentiment and overstrained delicacy. But enough of this, dear Sybil; cease to imagine that, by rejecting my affection, you restore me to my cousin, for all is over between us. I might have loved her had I never known Sybil Delamere, but she is aware that it is now impossible; and I little understand her nature if she would condescend to accept the hand where she was conscious that the heart was withheld. Spurn my affection, if, indeed, such be your will; but I swear to you that you will never be the husband of another. Leave the Grange, if you still persist in your purpose, but wander where you may, I will pursue you while I have life."

This is truly 'Midsummer madness,' Frederi' replied Miss Delamere; "however, thus mch I concede—our journey shall be delayed."

For my sake, Sybil!" asked Frederic, as he exnded his hand.

For your sake, if you will have it so," was th reply; and the small fingers of the lady reed for an instant on the outstretched palm ofer suitor: "But build up no vain hopes upon th concession," she continued laughingly; "for I a not yet convinced—nor won."

How then shall I win you? Teach me, and I ll be a docile pupil."

Nay, I know not," said the lady almost pensi ly. "How gloriously the sun is setting!" sh continued abruptly. "He is a grand painte I often think that could I transfer a few of the mixed tints to the canvass upon my easel, I ould feel as Pygmalion must have done wn he saw the produce of his chisel live and bathe."

por Gertrude! She too loved to gaze upon thsetting sun, but she never mixed up herself ar her own vain triumphs with the glory upon wch she looked.

CHAPTER XL

long as the intoxication produced by the prence of Sybil continued to exert its influence, evy feeling and every thought of Mortimer we absorbed by the one loved object; and it w only when he had reluctantly taken his depaure from The Grange that he once more beca keenly alive to the irksome and painful nare of the interview which awaited him with hi mother. He well knew how devotedly she lod him, and how trustingly she had looked to s affection as the prop and blessing of her oage; and the tears sprang to his eyes as he aditted to himself how great must now be her dipointment.

hose tears were, however, not the bitter, and toften infructuous drops of repentance; they ro only before the impulse of genuine filial affeon. His manhood rebelled at the mental anmoral coercion to which he had been subjed, it is true; but his affection for his mother reained undiminished. She had only sought tocure his happiness; but she had failed by neecting to remember that human nature, even thest faulty, revolts at a control which sedefails to defeat its own object; and by beliing that her idolized son was exempt from alhe errors of his fellow-men.

here she had taught herself to expect perfeon, she was shocked at the slightest indicatio of mortal frailty; and where the failure wone which involved not only his own consisney, but also the happiness of another, and thvill of his dead father, the blow was heavier th she could bear.

sad conviction that such must be the case trelled with Frederic to his home; and how dry seemed the venerable house, which had tilow been ever lighted up by the beams of hi wn sunny heart! Once his breast bounded as e passed its threshold, but now all appeared wrapped in gloom—Sybil was not beneath its roof—Sybil, the enchantress, whom he was to win through tears, reproaches, and regrets!

But Frederic deceived himself. The spirit of his mother was crushed within her. She had no longer energy for reproach. All her remaining strength of purpose was concentrated upon one point. The heart-dream of Gertrude was dispelled for ever; and she must aid her in the wretched task of smiling at her own misery. The illusion which had taught her to look upon her son as a being made up of all that was great and good, without one failing to cast a shadow over the brightness of his character, was gone; and she meekly bowed her spirit before the bitterness of a life-long disappointment; but still there remained one pang to be inflicted, to which she was keenly and sensitively alive, and with which she was threatened, it is true, but against which she firmly determined to contend.

Thus when Frederic entered her presence, she received him sadly but tenderly. His fault had been the offspring of a few months, but her love had been the growth of years; and the heart weeps long ere its crimson tide is exhausted.

"I have seen Gertrude," were her first words, after she had welcomed him; "and she has related to me all the substance of the morning's conversation. You are free, my son, to act as you think best regarding your cousin. I could have wished it otherwise, but happiness is not our lot in this world. She has acted, as she ever does, with a noble self-abnegation which makes me proud of the adopted daughter I have reared; and cannot permit myself to muamur when she is silent. Suffice it, then, that I shall never again intrude this subject upon you. Better, far better, that you should reject the hand of such a being at once, then receive it only to involve both her and yourself in one common misery. She is too good, to loving, to be flung by like an outworn toy: and this feeling is my best and only consolation under a serious disappointment."

"Believe me, my dear mother," said Frederic, at once touched and astonished at the calm and self-possessed manner of his mother; "that as I once before assured you, Gertrude and I are totally unsuited to each other."

"Say rather," was the reply, "that your means of happiness were made too easy by my want of judgment. I did not understand you, my dear boy; I should have created difficulties, invented doubts, and discovered inconveniences, in a marriage with your cousin; but it is now too late to repent the past; and I have no intention of pressing the matter further."

"Did you know, or could you guess, how much I feel in thus thwarting your wishes, you would understand that no such puerile cause has dictated my conduct," urged Mortimer earnestly; "I do assure you that I act only upon conviction."

"May you never have cause to discover your mistake, but I confess that I do not hope so much," was the rejoinder of Mrs. Mortimer. "Remember, Frederic, that marriage is the most important step hazarded by either man or woman; that it is no transitory speculation which may be annulled when its fallacy is proved by a life-long venture, from which there is no honorable mode of escape, and which must decide the whole tenor of your after-existence. Thus then, it behoves you to look well to its probable result; neither to contract an engagement hastily, nor to suffer yourself to be deluded by a few social accomplishments, or personal fascinations. You do not marry for the world, but for your home; and the woman who dazzles the most in society is frequently the least calculated to form the blessing of the domestic circle."

"I admit the truth of your reasoning, my dear mother," said Frederic eagerly; "but surely it is quite possible to meet with one who unites all the necessary qualities to do both. I confess that I could not love a wife who was ineapable of sustaining her just position in society, as well as of performing her home duties; and I am exacting enough to require that mine should be equal to either emergency."

Mrs. Mortimer sighed deeply, but made no reply.

"Nay more," pursued her son; "I consider it only due to you to declare, without reserve or hesitation, that I have every reason to hope and to believe that I have found that one."

"Do you allude to Miss Delamere?" asked his mother coldly.

"I do. Sybil is the very being to realise every wish and every dream of my heart; and I believe that she loves me. Will you not, then, my dear mother, receive her with the affection which alone can render my marriage perfectly happy?"

"Has she told you frankly who she is, and what is her real position in the world?" demanded Mrs. Mortimer, with the same resolute composure which she had maintained throughout the whole of this trying conversation.

"She has not; but I am alone to blame, if blame there be. I would not insult her by a doubt, and I declined the confidence."

"And she permitted you to do so?"

"She simply yielded to my desire. Satisfied that she is all that is good, and pure, and high-minded, I had little curiosity to pry into the past."

Mrs. Mortimer sank back in her chair, and buried her face in her hands. She was about to make a mighty effort, and her composure was rapidly giving way; suddenly, however, she roused herself, forced back the burning tears which were endeavoring to escape, and looking steadily at her son, said sadly but firmly,—

"And can it really be true, Frederic, that you would introduce into the home of your ancestors, and the heart of your mother, a woman of whom you know absolutely nothing? — a handsome adventurer, whose wiles have overmatched your frankness?—a syren, who has blinded you to your own honor? And you ask me to look upon so doubtful a person as a daughter—as your wife? If this indeed be so—and I read no denial in your countenance— it behoves me, at least, to remember what is due alike to the name I bear and to myself. You are your own master. Should you decide upon placing your happiness and your respectability in the keeping of this ambiguous personage, I have no power to prevent the commission so egregio and dangerous a folly; but if you anticipate n consent and countenance to such a step, a cherish one hope of inducing me to become party to your disgrace—for that disgrace w inevitably result from such an alliance, I hav prophetic conviction—I now, and definitiv declare that you deceive yourself, for tha never will recognize Miss Delamere as daughter, until I am convinced that there ists no passage of her past life that she is an ous to conceal."

"Revoke that sentence, I beseech of you, dear mother!" exclaimed Frederic with stre emotion, as he approached her; but the ener of Mrs. Mortimer was almost exhausted: tears, no longer to be restrained, were falling showers upon her pallid cheeks; and she o retained strength to waive him from her as hurried from the room, exclaiming emphatical "Never!"

She had no sooner reached her own apa ment, and after a passionate fit of weeping l partially recovered her composure, than hitherto proud and happy mother, pressing throbbing temples in her trembling hands, be to reflect with earnest anxiety upon the positi of her son. Every report which had e reached her on the subject of Miss Delamer and the neighborhood had for months been with them—although when they first came her knowledge she had disregarded and almo forgotten them—now recurred vividly to r memory, and increased her alarm. The abr appearance of the mother and the daughter The Grange, unaccompanied by a single re relative or friend, and unprovided with any troductions; the lavish expenditure which ensued; the mystery in which the past histo of the strangers was enveloped; the cont exercised by the younger lady, her unquest able authority over the establishment, and e self-sufficing independence of her character all conspired to terrify Mrs. Mortimer, and o fill her with the most painful apprehensions

Where Frederic saw only single-hearted ss and enthusiastic feeling, his mother discov'd cold and worldly calculation; and while he lieved that he had won the love of Sybil ag st the dictates of her own reason, she felt convinced that he was the victim of a system f conduct as clever as it was premeditated.

Had Miss Delamere been a young and ix perienced girl, she might have felt incline to judge her less harshly; but Mrs. Mortimer id no difficulty in deciding that, despite all the ls of dress and manner, Sybil was at least the e al of Frederic in years, and much his senio in knowledge of the world; and that she ha re this become aware how often the heart w h might have resisted mere personal beauty, ay be won by the wiles of coquetry, and the ver tion of worldly wisdom.

The bloom and loveliness of youth can ot, under any circumstances, lose their charm; ut it is nevertheless certain, that a pure-mi ed girl never appears to less advantage than wen she is conscious of a passion which her intuve sense of propriety and modesty teaches h to conceal. There is an awkwardness in sinre rection which even leads its possessor to over-k her part; she shuns and repels where she ould fain attract; she affects coldness where r heart yearns to pour out its whole treasure feeling; and she looks and moves in opposin to her own secret impulses. The woman the world is, on the contrary, ignorant of all se moral refinements. Her words and ac-ns are weighed and calculated; she is ever dy to enhance her own advantages, both of nd and person; her whole deportment is gulated upon a given principle; she has a rpose to accomplish, and she works steadily ward towards its realization; her tears and r smiles are alike subservient to her will; she n adapt herself to every mood and to every cessity; for her the romance of life is over,

d its realities alone remain.

Thus reflected Mrs. Mortimer; and with bit-ness of spirit she felt how unequal was the ntest between her own gentle and pure-mind-Gertrude and the world-taught Sybil; and w equally ill-calculated was the frank and nfiding nature of her son to resist the bland-ments of so accomplished an actress.

Not once did she suffer herself to believe it ssible that she might, by these conclusions, ong Miss Delamere; she remembered the illiant fortune which Frederic had inherited m his father, and she felt convinced that erein lay the whole secret of her affection. is true that the style of living adopted at e Grange far outweighed that of her own ablishment; but this profusion had only been e work of a few months, and might terminate abruptly as it had commenced. None knew source, and none could consequently decide its permanency: like every thing else concted with Sybil it was a mystery, and conquently suspicious.

Turn whither she would Mrs. Mortimer found reposing place for her spirit; all her associans with the past, and all her visions for the ture, were alike destroyed. The home of ace had once more become a house of mourn-g, and she felt desolate even beside her own arth.

CHAPTER. XII.

From her solitary chamber Mrs. Mortimer at ngth proceeded to that of Gertrude; who, ostrated by the intense emotion which she d undergone, and the violence which she had ne to her own feeling while laboring to re-ncile the mind of her aunt to the views of ederic, had flung herself upon her bed in an tony of wretchedness, where the anxious Mrs.
ortimer now found her scorched with incipient ver, her eyes hard and glossy, and her cheek shed into a burning crimson.

"My poor, poor girl," she murmured fondly, she drew a chair near her pillow; "You are e first victim! But you must forget, or at ast despise him, Gertrude. Yes; though he my own son, the child of my hope and of y age, still do I bid you despise him. He is longer worthy of love like yours. He can no longer estimate a pure affection; and your pride must teach you to overcome an ill-placed attachment." Gertrude answered only by a burst of tears.

It is hard, very hard, for a young and pure heart, which has confided its all of happiness to the supposed love of an ardent and devoted suitor, to find itself suddenly cast back upon its own feelings by some cold worldly calculation, or some equally unworthy caprice; but to such a sufferer there is still some consolation left, in the memory of many, many happy moments, which even delusive as their promise has ultimately proved, were at least a source of joy while the illusion lasted, and soothed the self-respect of the victim; who, conscious that she was not won unsought, is thus enabled to pay back scorn, for scorn, where she has strength of mind to conquer her ill-placed passion.

But even this poor solace was denied to the stricken and shrinking niece of Mrs. Mortimer.
She had given away her heart unasked, and the tender had been rejected. The world had no greater mortification to inflict; life no keener suffering to endure. She loved, and her love was despised. She felt that her mission on earth was ended; and, young as she was, and possessed of every attribute to adorn and to enjoy existence, as she felt her temples throb and her pulses beat with fever, she began to hope that her overtaxed strength had failed beneath the mighty effort which she had been called upon to make; and that her life was about to be the forfeit of the struggle.

Alas, poor trembler! she little knew how much the heart of woman can endure, and still beat on; she had yet to learn that the bright face of the sun may be clouded, and the fair bosom of the earth be draped in pall, the eye of the sufferer still find force to look upon the changed aspect of all around it. Her experience had come early, and was yet imperfect; there was long and weary years before her to complete the lesson; a lesson which is often carried even to the grave, and never thoroughly learned.

"That he should hesitate even for an instant between you!" pursued Mrs. Mortimer with indignation, as she tenderly wiped away the scorching drops which fell upon the flushed cheeks of her niece; "I no longer recognise my son. But I have at once and definitely refused my sanction to his marriage with that artful woman at The Grange. No nameless adventurer shall lord it under the roof of the Morti-mers while I live to guard the honor of our house. Let him marry, if he will, some poor and honest peasant-girl: bitter as such a trial would be to me, I think I could support it, when I knew that she was honest. But this woman—what know we of her? What may we ever know? And to reflect that such knowledge might come when it was too late, and that we had received in our very home a woman whose name made the virtuous blush and the idle sneer. No, no—that I could never bear. Dear as he is to me, I would rather look upon him in a coffin, and follow him to the vault of his ancestors; for he would then lie there undishonor-ed, as the son of such a father must do."

And overcome by the vision which she had conjured up, the afflicted mother bent her face over that of her suffering niece, and their tears were mingled upon the pillow.

"May you not wrong her by these suspicions, my dear aunt?" gasped out Gertrude after a pause too painful for endurance: "Remember that we know absolutely nothing of these strangers, who may perhaps have been less reserved to Frederic. Let me conjure you to decide nothing rashly. His happiness the happiness of your only son, the child of your deep and untiring love, is at stake. Oh, let me implore you to be cautious; I know too well the misery of a blighted hope; spare alike him and yourself, for you, oh! how could you bear to see him fade away before your eyes, a withered and a wretched thing, careless of all save the grave to which he would be hastening?"

Mrs. Mortimer made no reply. In common with most other persons of gentle disposition and equal temper, it required some serious cause to rouse her into indignation and firmness; but the cause once in existence, her whole nature underwent a startling change. This was the first great trial of her life, for sorrow had touched her lightly, and had come only in the softening and inevitable course of natural events; and thus the whole force of her garnered-up powers of resolution and moral endurance were brought simultaneously into action, unshorn of any of their strength.

Proud of the name she bore, and of the son whom she loved so tenderly, she saw her best feelings attacked in their very citadel, and she armed herself in their defence with a jealous earnestness which rendered her deaf to all the reasonings of her more indulgent and forgiving niece; nor was the spectacle of that niece's suffering calculated to make her swerve from her purpose.

The appeal of Gertrude had, indeed, dried her tears, but it had effected no change in her resolution. Frederic had disappointed and outraged her affection; and this she felt that she must bear as best she might; but that he should dishonor alike himself and her, she was resolved never to permit, so long as her will maintained its influence over his mind. Thick sobs rose to her throat, and shook her whole frame, but she disregarded this physical struggle, and thought only of the moral evil with which she was threatened.

Thus, the enterview produced no comfort to either; for Gertrude bowed beneath her own sorrows, and bewildered by the sudden change in her hitherto gentle and placid protectress, did not venture again to plead a cause which ensured her own misery, but remained with closed eyes and trembling heart, a prey to rapidly-increasing illness and sickening dread. Come what might, to her the future was a chaos. Should Frederic obey the injunctions of his mother, and relinquish his suit to Sybil, he would assuredly abandon his home once more, and thus be entirely lost to her; while, wretched as was the alternative, in becoming the husband of Miss Delamere, he would, at least, remain where she could see him, and hear his voice, and be to him as a sister, and he would follow her to the grave for which she pined, and, perhaps, rest her when she was gone. And yet—she shuddered as she reflected upon the price which she must pay for these bitter indulgences, upon the sin of cherishing such feelings, towards the husband of another; and, worse than all, upon the impossibility of conquering a passion which could hope for pardon neither in her own heart nor in those of others.

As she writhed upon her bed of pain, vainly endeavoring to conceal her anguish both of mind and body from her companion, Mrs. Mortimer was aroused by the touch of a burning hand from a reverie into which she had fallen, and turned anxiously to utter some word of entreaty or consolation, when she saw the widely dilated and rigid eyes of the poor sufferer fixed unconsciously upon her, while her cheeks and lips had become as cold and pale as marble, and at once discovered that she was no longer able to give ear to either.

In an agony of terror she rushed to the bell to summon assistance; and ten minutes had scarcely elapsed ere the wild and ringing laughter, and incoherent words of the unhappy girl proclaimed a violent attack of delirium.

The bow, too tightly bent, had sprung from the unnatural tension; the pure and beautiful mind was prostrate, and wild visions were sweeping like impish revellers, across her tortured brain. She was at the bridal of Frederic, she was the handmaiden of the bride, and was attiring her for the altar; the bridal wreath was of roses, but she could not shake away the venomous insects that had nestled themselves among the leaves, and then she writhed and struggled in the arms of the weeping attendants in her efforts to dislodge the hideous intruders, but all was vain; and she flung the garland down, declaring that she could not bind poison about the brow of her cousin's affianced wife.

Then her fingers worked rapidly as she prepared the white and glistening robe; but a new a shade passed over her brow, and anguish closed her eyes, as she declared that it was wet with tears—salt and bitter tears—which fell like corroding drops of iron upon the delicate white lace, and marred its purity; and again she strove to wipe away the stains, and toiled, and writhed her slender limbs into a thousand painful distortions, until exhaustion once more terminated the paroxysm, and she fell back upon her pillow gasping out that she was summoned to her own funeral feast, where she would exchange her wedding-garments for a shroud, and her marriage-veil for a pall of crape.

Even to the beloved voice of her aunt the tortured ear was deaf, and the wrung heart closed; and long ere the arrival of the physician the fever was at its height.

And where was Frederic at this trying moment?

Once more on his way to The Grange, but himself scarcely conscious of the nature of his own intentions. Startled as he had been by the determined and unwonted energy of his mother, he was too thoroughly subjugated by the will of Sybil to be shaken in his purpose, and with the vacillation in which he had latterly indulged, he dreamed of delay, of temporising, of the ry of some medium of action which might nd to reconcile all the conflicting interests by hich he was surrounded; but the more he eted, the more he became convinced of the pelessness of such a result.

As this conviction grew upon him, he deter ined to make a last appeal to the hitherto un ilding affection and indulgence of his mother, fore he communicated to Miss Delamere the xpected opposition to which he had been bjected; for, strong in his faith in the purity d honor of Sybil, he dreaded her indignation the intelligence, while as an amende to Mrs. ortimer for her concession, should she be ought upon at last to comply with his en eaties, he resolved to avail himself of what he nsidered as the implied offer of his mistress, d to accept her revelation of the past, in order at all mystery might be terminated at once.

Cheered by this resolution, he had already rned his horse's head once more towards home hen he heard some one galloping rapidly be hd him, and in another moment a groom in e Delamere livery placed in his hand a note m Sybil. He tore it open. It contained only ew lines, but they sufficed at once to change h intentions.

"Come to me," it said, "I am wretched, and ve much to say. Mamma expects you to din r. Mention no word of this morning's con rsation. She suspects nothing." SYBIL.

There could be no mistake. Miss Delamere s about to volunteer the very confidence hich he had determined to solicit, and thus he uld go doubly armed into the presence of his ended mother, and all difficulties would be ercome. It was only by a violent effort that l could restrain himself from pressing the wel ome paper to his lips, and having made a brief ply to the messenger, he at once struck spurs to his horse and retraced his way towards The Grange.

The dinner-bell rang in vain, and Mrs. Morti er, to her extreme dismay, seated herself at ble alone. Never before had she felt so tho ghly desolate, for hitherto, in the absence of r son, Gertrude had been her companion, and she remembered that one of her children was w stretched upon a bed of sickness, while she d parted from the other in displeasure, her art swelled, and she hurriedly quitted the m to conceal her emotion from the servants. r Frederic's sake alone she had made an effort appear in her accustomed place; and he had ented himself without one attempt at ex nation or excuse; even although, for the first e in their lives, they had exchanged other rds than those of affection.

This, only this, was wanting to complete my retchedness," she murmured to herself, as she e more bent her steps to the chamber of the ering girl; "Now, indeed, my cup of bitter ss is full, for my son's heart is estranged from m!"

CHAPTER XIII.

t was a glorious evening, and the vivid sun bms which were carefully excluded from the sick chamber of Miss Mortimer, were streaming broad and bright over hill and valley, and tin ing all the foliage with a golden glow, when Frederic once more full of hope and confidence, sprang from his saddle at the door of The Grange.

Ardent in all his feelings, his previous depression had been succeeded by a wild and baseless joy, which sparkled in his eyes, and gave an unwonted animation to his whole person. Sybil had told him in her note that she was wretched; and he comprehended at once that this wretchedness had been induced by an instinctive delicacy, which upbraided her for the silence that, in their relative position, was a wrong done to his affection.

Now, therefore, he was about to receive the whole outpouring of her trust, and he congratulated himself upon the chivalrous generosity which had led him to believe in her without proof, and to love her without any other guarantee than her own sweet and guileless nature.

She was alone when he entered the saloon, and in an instant he was at her side, with her hand clasped in his.

"You have summoned me, Sybil, and I am here."

"I thank you," was the calm reply. "After you had left me this morning, I felt that I, at least, had said too much or too little, and that it was expedient we should meet again at once. My proceeding may appear strange to you, but you know the frankness of my nature, and will understand that I am never influenced by the young-lady tactics of common society. This is destroying the romance of our position strangely, is it not, Frederic? But I am aware that I have been to blame, and I am anxious to repair my error."

"Who would not sin to excuse themselves so sweetly? Although I am unconscious of the fault, I am ready to exact the penance."

"Thus, then, in our late conversation, you spoke plainly and undisguisedly, I could not, and I did not affect, to misunderstand you. You offered yourself to me unreservedly, to me of whom you know nothing, save that I have pleased your fancy, and for so much, I will admit, gained your affection. I urged feebly, I fear, but truthfully, my conviction of your mother's disapproval, when I should have done more, when it would have been at once more dignified and more worthy of myself to have concealed my own feelings altogether, and to have assured you at once, and definitively, that with this conviction nothing should induce me to listen to your addresses. Suffer me, therefore, to do this now, and at the same time to assure you of my sincere regret, that I should have allowed you to be misled, even for a few hours, as to my determination. Nay, you must hear me out. I am quite conscious of my debt of obligation to yourself; it is one which, throughout my life, I am never likely to forget, but I am too proud to avail myself of a trust so unbounded, and that same pride—"

"Sybil, you are ungenerous!" exclaimed Frederic. "Was it for this you summoned me? I know not how I have deserved so bitter a disappointment. All the world appear to have conspired against me."

"That is precisely what I apprehended," said Miss Delamere coldly. "You have confided to Mrs. Mortimer our conversation of this morning; and my warning has proved correct."

"And what, though it be so?" was the impetuous reply. "I am dependent upon no one. My mother—even my mother, whom I had hitherto been accustomed to consider as the most unselfish and unprejudiced of human beings, may fail me when I calculate upon her affection, but she cannot compel me to sacrifice the happiness of my life to a caprice."

"And may I ask what is the nature of my unworthiness?" asked Sybil, in an accent which, although it was intented to be playful, involved a strong tinge of sarcasm.

Frederic bit his lip and remained silent.

"Nay, nay, be not afraid to meet me with a candor equal to my own," said Miss Delamere pressing his arm sportively. "You will, I am sure, do me the justice to admit that even after I had weakly suffered you to see that my affections were no longer in my own keeping, I urged your mother's cause, and not my own. Surely, then, my feelings merit some consideration."

"You are aware how earnestly she had set her heart upon my marriage with my cousin," observed Frederic at length, conscious that he must offer some reply.

"And was this all?"

"You force me to be unmanly, Sybil; but it is your will, and I must submit. Forgive me, then, if I concede that this was not all. My mother does not, cannot know you as I do; her secluded life renders her apprehensive——"

"Rather say suspicious," broke in Sybil haughtily.

"Be it so; you are a stranger to her; and I, Sybil—forgive her when you remember that I am her only child."

"I understand and appreciate all that you would say," was the reply of his companion, as she rose coldly and indignantly from her seat; "Mrs. Mortimer fears to unite her son with probable disgrace. I will relieve her from so painful an apprehension."

"Sybil, Sybil, you will drive me distracted!" exclaimed Mortimer. "Am I then, to be the sacrifice of this struggle of misplaced pride? Are no concessions to be made to save me from wretchedness?"

"To you, and for you, I should have considered none too great," murmured Miss Delamere, falling back in the chair from which she had just risen, and covering her eyes with her hand, which however, failed to conceal the large tears that streamed thick and fast upon her cheeks; "But I cannot, and I should not, condescend to lend myself to a degradation such as this. Let us part at once: I am inured to suffering, and you will soon learn to forget that I have passed like a dark cloud over the horizon of your life."

"Sybil," said Frederic, almost inarticulately; "If for me you will indeed consent to sacrifice your own feelings, may I not entreat of you to humor my mother in this caprice! Believe me that it does not arise from any doubt of your integrity; it cannot: but from an overweening affection for myself. You can understand and appreciate her anxiety, when you remember that it is to me alone that she must look for support and comfort in her old age. You know, too, how tenderly she loves me. Surely then——"

"It is precisely because I do appreciate and know all this," said Miss Delamere; "that I recal also what is due to my own dignity. Once more, let us part. Like Cæsar's wife, I should not even suffer myself to be suspected."

"You condemn me then remorselessly to wretchedness, Sybil?"

"Do not mistake yourself, Frederic; you will soon overcome a passing disappointment. You were happy before you knew me; you have now only to forget me, and that happiness will be renewed."

"And it is you, Sybil—You, who confess that you have loved,—who tell me this? But true; you have a right to do so—for you, at least have loved, and have forgotten."

"Yes, Mr. Mortimer," was the reply; but the eye of the lady flamed, and her bosom heaved as she listened to the reproach; "I have indeed done this: but shall I tell you how? By proving that I had raised an unworthy object upon the altar of my heart—by finding that the world, the hideous world, with its sordid interests and its vulgar prejudices, had come between me and my idol—by discovering the hands of brass and the feet of clay where I had fondly believed that all was sterling ore. And now blame me if you can, and dare."

"Sybil, you sport with my affection; you wrong my nature; you compel me to play a part unworthy alike of you and of myself. I can no more live without your love henceforth than without the air I breathe, or the earth upon which I tread. Be generous, Sybil, to yourself; and do not sacrifice an affection like mine to a mere overstrained idea of dignity. You have yourself read the character of my mother as though you had known her from your childhood, and thus you cannot feel surprise at her determination. You can have nothing to conceal, nothing to repent; and will you coldly condemn me to pay the penalty of another's error."

"Place yourself for an instant in my position," said Miss Delamere, as the large tears fell slowly upon her cheeks. "What has been my conduct since my arrival in your neighborhood? Have I not borne myself like one conscious of her own character and station? And would you ask me to submit to a degradation fitting only for a person whose antecedents had been suspicious, or at least, suspected? Am I not living under the roof with my own mother? Do we not possess all the habits and attributes of gentlewomen? And is it because a love of retirement has induced us to select a secluded corner of the kingdom as our temporary home, that I am to be insulted by doubts injurious to my honor?"

"Sybil, dear Sybil! believe me——"

"Frederic, I do believe you! Would that I had less easily been won to do so; but regrets are now alike idle and unavailing. I will even confess that our estrangement will cause a pang: but it shall be borne; and, to return nce more to Cæsar for a parallel, I will hide ny head in my mantle, and none shall look up- n the struggle."

Large drops of emotion stood upon the brow f Mortimer as he listened; and when, as if to ender the image more complete, Miss Delamere uried her face amid the cushions of the sofa, nd her quick sobs fell upon his ear, he forgot ll save the syren by whom his very spirit was nthralled; and casting himself at her feet he owed that no earthly power should part them. What was to him home, parent, or the world's mile? She was his home, and his world; and ll beside her image was blotted out and anni- ilated. He covered her hand with burning isses; he besought her to have pity upon his gony; he addressed her by all the endearing ames which love lends to the lips of his vota- ies; he entreated only for one word, one smile; ut for a time Sybil was obdurate. Her pride ad been stung; and she misdoubted the moral ourage of the passionate but unstable suitor hom her beauty had won; nor was it until he agitation of Mortimer had reached its climax hat she again raised her head, and parting the uxuriant hair which clustered about his brow, azed upon him with a sorrowful tenderness hore eloquent than even his own impassioned ords.

There was hope, however, in that look, and rederic sprung from her feet, and clasped her a his arms, exclaiming: "You are mine, Sybil -Deny it not, you are mine! I read it in your yes. You will forget all save my affection. y life shall be one long devotion to your will, he long struggle to secure your happiness. ou know not, you cannot know, how earnestly love you!"

"He too, told me all this," murmured Miss elamere, as she suffered her beautiful head to rop upon the shoulder of her impetuous suitor, and yet he failed me in the hour of trial."

"Because he was a coward and a madman," id Frederic tenderly; "Because he knew not d could not estimate the treasure which he ing from him. Why dwell upon the past, with ch a present and such a future, to engage your oughts?"

"And yet he knew me in my bright girlhood," rsued Miss Delamere in the same subdued ice; "every action of my life; every thought my heart. The wild and perhaps absurd am- tion, of being loved only for my own sake, d not yet entered my mind; I was content to , or at least to seem, as others were, the mere vorite of fortune and of the world; and he et me in its sunniest paths, in the full glow youth and triumph. How then can I trust ain?"

"The more readily, because it was only thus knew you, my sweet Sybil," replied her com- nion earnestly. "Had he seen you, as I have ne, in your home, of which you are at once e blessing and the charm, I should have lost e richest prize that ever fell to the lot of man. ou have now, indeed, explained to me all that is hitherto incomprehensible. Tell me only at you no longer love him; I care not to know o he is; nay, I should shrink from such a knowledge, lest I should, even now, and here sully the pure joy of my spirit by a curse. Only assure me that you no longer love him, and I ask no more."

Lovely was the smile with which Miss Delamere replied; for although her lips moved, no sound escaped them. But Mortimer was satisfied; such a smile could beam only upon the one beloved; and as he gazed upon the beautiful face that was upturned to his own, he would not have exchanged his dream of happiness for the most glowing certainty of "waking bliss."

For a few moments they remained gazing steadfastly at each other; but at length, encouraged by the expression of his mistress's countenance, Frederic ventured to draw her more closely to him, and to touch her cheek with his lips. He was not rebuked, although she instantly withdrew herself from his clasp; and the measure of his joy was full.

"And now, Sybil, my own Sybil," he whispered, "let us talk only of ourselves—think only of ourselves; of the long years of bliss which await us, and of our bright prospects for the future."

"Without one reference to the past?"

"What have we to do with the past?" was the eager rejoinder; "For me it is for ever annihilated."

"And have you no curiosity—none—to solve the mighty mystery which was to be to us what the wall was to Pyramus and Thisbe?"

"None; till you care to make it known."

"It shall be then, the first trial of your truth," laughed Miss Delamere; "only pledging myself that you shall one day learn all that I have to tell, and warning you that it will scarcely repay you for the hearing, so infinitely small will be the amount of the revelation. But I will not wrong your generosity by volunteering an autobiography at this precise moment, lest you should suspect that I doubt your faith. Moreover, I shall love to play the coquette for once; and by piquing your curiosity, to keep up your interest in my unworthy self. How know you but I may be after all, a mere ignis fatuus, a wandering light, an impalpable form; and that, like Ixion, when you seek to embrace your mistress, you may one day clasp a cloud?"

The reply of Frederic convinced her that he was at least satisfied the illusion was not yet dispelled; and more fascinated than ever by the affectionate and endearing gentleness of his beautiful betrothed, he forgot all the difficulties and annoyances by which he was surrounded, to resign himself wholly to the spell of her fascinations. The dressing-bell rang unheeded; sufficiently adorned by the subdued happiness which was betrayed in her every look and gesture, Sybil felt that she required no added charm in the eyes of her lover; and it was only when a second summons in the dining-room reached them through a servant, that she hastily wreathed a few flowers from a jardinière in her luxuriant hair, and offered her hand to Mortimer to lead her from the saloon.

CHAPTER XIV.

The convalescence of Gertrude was slow, but certain. Her youth, and the gentle and uncomplaining patience with which she supported her suffering, proved to be efficient physicians; while their effects were strengthened by the deep and silent delight with which she remarked the affectionate anxiety and sympathy of her cousin.

She was no sooner able to leave her room than Frederic, whose conscience was not altogether at ease as regarded the origin of her indisposition, passed hours each day at her side; reading aloud from her favorite authors, or conversing on topics of general interest, calculated to amuse without exciting her.

Willingly, most willingly, would she thus have worn out her life. It seemed as though the one sweet dream of her childhood were indeed realised; nor would she trust herself to look either backward into the past, or forward into the future. The present was all in all to her; and as she saw her cousin move noiselessly to her sofa, and felt her hand in his, and watched all the little arrangements with which he busied himself for her comfort, tears of blissful gratitude rose to her eyes, and she forgot all her previous trials.

Nor was Mrs. Mortimer less happy than herself. Unconscious of the decisive interview of her son with Sybil, she too, began to hope that older and better feelings were resuming their influence over his heart; and that a mere passing fancy had yielded beneath a sense of her disapprobation and of his own folly. Nor did even his daily absences from home shake this belief; for she was reasonable enough to feel that, after his extreme intimacy at The Grange, he could not, consistently with a proper observance of courtesy and honor, at once withdraw himself from the society of Mrs. Delamere and her daughter; while that he could constantly pass hours in intimate companionship with Gertrude, whose pure and etherial beauty was but the tangible and palpable reflection of her equally pure and beautiful nature, and remain insensible to the charm, appeared to her impossible; and the rather that, in the languor and helplessness of convalescence, the grateful girl had in a great measure laid aside the studied reserve which she had hitherto observed, and suffered her cousin to read the depths of her young and guileless heart.

Little did either of them suspect that there was a moral bandage before the eyes of Frederic, which rendered him blind to the perfections of every object save one; and that the kindly attentions which had been originally the mere impulse of pity and brotherly regard, had increased and continued under the deeply felt, although unconscious, happiness induced by the restored affection of his mother.

It is probable that, had Sybil endeavored to dissuade him from his constant attendance in the sick room he might have been led to contrast her egotism with the unselfish generosity of her rival; but far from indulging in so dangerous a weakness, Miss Delamere encouraged him in his labor of love; while scarcely a day passed in which some offering did not reach the invalid from the ladies at The Grange, accompanied by the kindliest expressions of anxiety and sympathy.

Of these offerings, however, Frederic was never made the medium; sometimes they were conveyed by a servant, while at others the pony-phaeton, driven by its fair mistress, deposited at the door of Mrs. Mortimer the rarest flowers from her conservatory, the newest work from the press, or the choicest fruits of the season.

For a time Gertrude had felt querulous and irritated when these presents were laid before her; she shrank from obligations conferred by Miss Delamere, and would willingly have forgotten her existence; but her attentions were so pertinacious, so gracefully tendered, and so judicious, that she ultimately became reconciled, and looked even with pleasure upon the gorgeous blossoms which made a mimic summer in her shady room; or listened to the brilliant and well selected pages to which the low and earnest tones of her cousin lent an added charm, until she forgot that she owed their enjoyment to the considerate kindness of Sybil.

Mrs. Mortimer was, however, far from doing the same. Unable, without compromising her own dignity, to refuse these diurnal civilities she suffered them in silence, but not the less deprecated the diligence and perseverance with which they were tendered. She would fain have terminated at once, and for ever, all communication with The Grange and its inhabitants; but she felt that she had no means of so doing without exposing her apprehensions, and thus placing herself at the mercy of Sybil's sarcasms.

Could she, for a moment, have suspected that she was already pledged to her son, all her hesitation would have vanished under a sense of bitter displeasure; but Miss Delamere had herself suggested that there would be an indelicacy in making known their engagement during the convalescence of Gertrude; and Frederic, delighted thus to escape, even for a brief interval, the reproaches of his mother and the grief of his cousin—for he could no longer deceive himself as to the nature of her feelings towards him—made no effort to combat her opinion.

Gradually, however, as Gertrude regained strength, his attentions relaxed. His devotion to her comfort became less marked, and his absences from home alike more frequent and more prolonged. It is true, that while beside her he was still kind, and gentle, and affectionate; but it was soon apparent to the poor invalid that she was indebted to the regard of the cousin, and not to the zeal of the lover. Suffering had, however, calmed her mind, and weakened, although by no means conquered her feelings; and as it slowly overcame her malady, a deep and uncomplaining melancholy replaced the girlish buoyancy which had once marked her character.

The abstracted look, the frequent fits of absence, and, above all, the smile of release when Frederic had not tact enough to conceal a departed from her, sufficed to convince her that the imaginary paradise in which she had lived for a few weeks must soon give place to a less glowing reality; and she braced up her strength to upport the change as resolutely as she could. The idea that by her, and through her, discord hould come between the mother and the son, ent her a factitious energy, incomprehensible ven to herself; and often, very often, did she ucceed in meeting her anxious aunt with a mile upon her lips, when her heart was deluged n tears.

Thus were things situated when a contagious ever was introduced into Westrum by a travel- r, which spread rapidly among the poor, and reated universal consternation. The native harity of Mrs. Mortimer was not, however, to e chilled by any personal apprehension; and hus, despite the entreaties of her family, she ontinued with undiminished assiduity her pe- odical visits to her numerous pensioners; and, r a time, their fears continued to appear su- erfluous: when, urged by a desire to render he advantage obtained, as she supposed, by her iece over a dangerous rival more assured, she o sooner saw Gertrude sufficiently restored to nder such a proceeding safe, than, affecting believe that she required to be aroused from he moral lethargy consequent upon a long and hervating indisposition, she resolved to collect out her the friends by whom she was surround- d: and, by making her house more attractive, obtain at once the twofold advantage of nusing her son in his home, and of affording to r niece an opportunity of displaying the per- nal attractions and mental qualifications with hich she was so richly gifted.

Those friends were by no means numerous, it they were well selected; for Mrs. Mortimer referred solitude to that species of social pis ler, which tends to fill the drawing-rooms of s fastidious party-givers; and thus, Dr. Jervis, e vicar, and his estimable wife, the local phy- ian and his two well educated daughters, and e families of the neighborhood, few, but well- ed, constituted the whole of her circle.

One only objection offered itself to this ar- ngement, and that one existed in the impos- ibility of excluding from her hospitality the la- s at The Grange. Well aware of the caque- e of a country town, and fettered, moreover, the unceasing attentions of Sybil to her niece, s. Mortimer at once felt the utter impractica- lity of passing them over; but less far sighted an Gertrude, she had taught herself to believe at the danger which she apprehended was now erpast; and it was consequently with less re- tance than she would formerly have felt, that e despatched a note of invitation, which was mediately and most graciously answered.

Nor was the delusion of the fond mother by y means extraordinary; for superadded to the t that she was familiar with all the estimable alities of her niece, and knew how to appre- te at its just value the whole amount of her rth, it was no less certain that, to the eye of isinterested critic, the beauty of Gertrude far nscended that of Miss Delamere, radiant as it s; although it required more mind to appre- te the one than the other in a more common erver.

The pure and Grecian profile of Gertrude, ultlessly chiselled; her deep and expressive e eyes, with their long lashes at least three shades darker than her hair; her radiant complexion; and the redundant tresses of a golden auburn, which fell in magnificent profusion to her shoulders; all combined to invest her with a soft and ethereal expression which almost amounted to the ideal; and to give an essentially womanly character to her loveliness, which spoke rather to the heart than to the eye; while her slight and fragile figure, pliable as the willow, and as graceful in its undulations, was so well assorted to her face, that it was impossible to look upon her without interest and affection; while the attraction of Miss Delamere existed rather in the rich and voluptuous impression produced by her whole appearance than by the perfection of any particular feature.

Very beautiful, indeed, she was; but the artistic critic would have declared that she charmed rather by her general demeanor than by positive and regular outline or coloring. There was a tinge of fearlessness, a shade of self-appreciation, a degree of boldness, in the ordinary expression of her fine black eyes, which, nevertheless, at particular moments, veiled themselves so deliciously, that those to whom their softened glances were directed appreciated them the more deeply from the contrast—upon the principle that no woman dislikes a coxcomb, who throws off his coxcombry for her alone. Her rich complexion was alone, it might be, a shade too glowing for a fastidious taste, but it diffused so wonderful an animation over her whole countenance, that it was scarcely possible to wish it less brilliant, while the extraordinary beauty of her mouth, and the magnificent teeth revealed at every smile, combined with the peculiar melody of her low rich voice, completed a face of no ordinary attraction. Her form was, moreover, faultless; and, in gracefulness of motion and manner, she did not yield even to her gentler rival; while in that self-possession and ease which can only be acquired by a commerce with refined society, she was greatly the superior of the more retiring Gertrude, who had been reared in comparative seclusion.

Nevertheless, Mrs. Mortimer flattered herself that after a time the quiet graces of her niece would entirely wean the heart of Frederic from the more artificial fascination of Miss Delamere; and that to produce this desirable result, he required only to see her in the society of other females of her own age, and to contrast her with her associates. Herself gentle and domestic, she could not appreciate the attraction which Sybil derived from her superior knowledge of the world, and strong in the hopes of success, she resolutely disregarded her own love of quiet and retirement, and to the surprise of those about her, declared her intention of no longer withdrawing herself from the hospitable advances of her neighbors. In order the more gracefully to effect her purpose, she had consequently, resolved to open her own house, and Gertrude although sensitively shrinking under a feeling of the invidiousness of her own position, meekly prepared to play her part in this new trial.

The dinner passed off somewhat heavily; for the art of dinner-giving is one of sufficient difficulty, especially in a limited neighborhood, where all the parties are intimately known to each other; but even here the perfect tact of Miss Delamere enabled her to infuse a certain portion of animation into those about her. The elderly gentlemen were enchanted with her information, and their wives with her urbanity; while the younger ladies were enraptured by her elegant costume, and their brothers and cousins captivated by her beauty.

Gertrude, meanwhile, in her simple dress of white muslin, subdued in spirit, and oppressed at heart, contributed to the general conversation only by monosyllables; and was effectually thrown into the shade by her more brilliant adversary. The languor of illness lent, indeed, a deeper charm to her beauty, but it was one little calculated to attract the mere pleasure-seekers by whom she was surrounded; while the only eye which she sought to see turned upon her in affection, was rivetted almost incessantly upon the beaming countenance of another.

As the ladies rose from table Mrs. Mortimer felt painfully conscious that her object had failed, and that she had but afforded to Sybil a fresh opportunity of evincing the extent of her social talents; nevertheless, she still hoped against hope; and when, on reaching the drawing-room, she saw her dreaded guest, after having, with almost child-like anxiety, provided for the perfect comfort of her mother, (whose constitutional helplessness continually rendered her dependant upon others even in her most trivial arrangements:) move to the side of her niece, and take her hand with an expression of anxious sympathy, her heart once more swelled, as she decided that nothing could be comparable to the pure beauty of the pale girl who formed so strong a contrast with the matured and (as her prejudice impelled her to add) meretricious woman of the world, who was, even then smiling over the ruin which had been her own work.

But while Mrs. Mortimer so judged, the reason of Gertrude was differently impressed. She felt and acknowledged all the superiority of her enforced companion; nor did the fact that since the first moment of her arrival she had been unable to detect even a glance directed towards Frederic, which implied a sense of conscious triumph or security, jealously as she had watched for such, undeceived her as to the power which she possessed over his mind and feelings.

Moreover, Miss Mortimer had not been blind to the circumstance that her aunt owed to Sybil all the cheerfulness of the somewhat tedious repast which had just terminated; while she was equally willing to admit the amiability by which it had been succeeded; forming, as it did, so startling a reverse to the bearing of many a brilliant female conversationalist, who, on rising from table, suddenly throws aside all her energy; and retiring, while surrounded merely by her own sex, to a solitary fauteuil, or a distant sofa, closes her eyes in languid weariness, and awaits the return of the gentlemen to renew her triumphs.

In Sybil nothing had been overstrained; nothing obtrusive. Her rich voice, and her low melodious laughter, had alike made music in the circle; but she had never appeared to think of herself, while exerting her powers to amuse others; nor did her smiles cease, or efforts to afford pleasure terminate, with the presence of the most interested of her auditors.

Surrounded only by the ladies of the party, her looks were as bright, and her words as bland as ever; and seated beside Gertrude, with the hand which she had secured clasped in her own, no shadow of ennui could be detected, as she murmured out a thousand expressions of sympathy and regard.

"You have, indeed, been a sad sufferer, my dear Miss Mortimer," she said caressingly; "and you make me truly happy by the assurance that I was able, in a degree, however slight, to render your convalescence less dreary. Happily, however, it is now at its close; and you must really take more care of your health in future."

In spite of her efforts to suppress it, the sigh of Gertrude was audible to her listener.

"I fear also," said Sybil in a still lower tone; "that you are unhappy. You have not yet had time, like myself, to acquire the most useful of all philosophy which almost defies fate. Nay, why that blush? Beautiful as it is, it seems to rebuke my indiscretion; but, believe me, I was far from seeking to give you pain, conscious as I am that whatever may be the cause of your present melancholy it is free from self-reproach."

"You do me no more than justice," said Gertrude, raising her eyes meekly to those of her interlocutor. "Sad I may be—Perhaps long illness necessarily induces depression; but my life has been an open volume of which the pages were free to all about me; and as yet I have met blame from no one."

The reply had been simple and guileless, for no thought of repaying by sarcasm the courtesy of her visitor had crossed the mind of Miss Mortimer as it was made; but, nevertheless, it was now Sybil's turn to blush; and the eloquent blood mantled over her brow and bosom, and burnt there for an instant, as she fixed a searching look upon the pale girl beside her. A moment suffiecd, however, to convince her, that no covert meaning had been implied, and she at once regained her self-possession.

"And do you equally attach blame to no one?" asked Miss Delamere, at the close of this scrutiny; "Rest assured, that if any who know you have brought that shadow to your brow, one reproach from your gentle lips will suffice to make them retract their fault."

"I have no reproach to utter," said Gertrude somewhat coldly; "Nothing to resent; nothing to wish."

"Nay, then," laughed her companion; "you resemble the hero of the Eastern tale, whose curse was the power of fulfilling every desire and who died the victim of his own mortal satiety. But do not think to deceive me thus. Look upon me as a friend—a sincere friend. Appearances are against me, I admit; but I do not on that account despair that you will do me justice. Gertrude," she continued, lowering her voice to a still deeper murmur; "I know too well the cause of that pallor, and of those tears which are even now glistening in your eyes; but you wrong me greatly if you regard me as other than their innocent and involuntary cause. Nay, more——"

"Oh, no! enough, enough!" gasped her lis-ner; "I will not affect to misunderstand your ference; and it refers to a subject which never n, and never ought, to be discussed between s. I can well conceive that Frederic—that y cousin—had yielded to the wishes of his other, and consented to sacrifice his inclina-ons to her will; but I cannot condescend to e made the pis aller of a disappointed passion, or to owe a reluctant heart to the suggestive rotection of——"

"Why do you pause, Miss Mortimer?" asked ybil calmly: "Of a rival, you would say; and erhaps in the eye of the world I may appear such; but to yourself such rivalry must em impossible, or at best irrational; for to e it appears a folly too wild to be entertained ven for an instant. The ice is now broken, id you must suffer me to speak. It is true at at the present moment your unstable ousin believes that he loves me. But why? ecause you received his attentions coldly, id repelled all his advances; while his vanity und the consolation that it sought in my iendship; which I yielded the more readily at I looked upon him as a man no longer free offer more in return. Am I now excused?"

"Will you pardon me if I remind you of the ench proverb which says that 'qui s'excuse, ccuse,' Miss Delamere?" asked the tortured rl with sudden energy: "I have never yet mitted an attachment to my cousin—never rmitted myself a remark upon his intimacy The Grange—never uttered your name as at of one by whom I had been injured; id thus——"

"Thus you would reproach me tacitly with e impertinence of my inferences; but, my ar Miss Mortimer, such sophistry is unworthy you, and I will also say of myself," replied bil with dignity. "For the first and last ne I am now forcing upon you a subject most teresting to us both; and indeed you must ar me out, if it be only for your own sake."

Gertrude dropped her eyelids heavily to sup-ess the tears that were struggling to escape; id resigned herself to silent endurance.

"Consider our relative positions," pursued iss Delamere; "and you will at once admit e justice of my arguments, and cease to look on me as an enemy. I believe that I am not ithout vanity—my woman-nature is powerful ough to assert its rights; but I am nevertheless sufficiently rational to understand that y comparison between you and myself must nd to my own disadvantage. You look in-edulous; but while so doing you have for-tten our respective ages;—the bloom and shness of eighteen—that beauté du diable, as a ench wit has termed it—which is the true ory of our sex, its brightest as well as its most anescent charm, is still your own; while for it is now over. Each day adds something your attractions, while it withdraws a shade m mine. To you dress is a mere pastime; to it has become a study,—while, as regards ental and moral qualifications, I know enough life, and above all, of men, to be quite aware at they prefer a scholar to a tutor; and there-re, when looking upon my experience in this light, I am aware that it is purely a defect. Still—and herein at least even you, my dear Miss Mortimer, will, I am sure, give me credit for my frankness—I admit fully and freely that your own coldness has induced your cousin to prefer my society, and even to attach himself to my person. But in this, believe me when I assure you, that I have been in no way to blame. I have told him, not once but many times, that for personal and private reasons I had decided never to marry; and this not lightly and coquettishly, but in sober and honest sincerity and truth. If I have failed to obtain credence for such assertions, it has been through no fault of mine; and I have now compelled myself to intrude this subject upon you simply to redeem myself in your eyes; and to assure you that, even should the illusion last, it will suffice for me to be convinced from your own lips that a renewal of his addresses is necessary to your happiness, for me at once and for ever to discountenance his suit. No personal feeling shall make me indulge my own interests to the destruction of yours; for far sooner would I secure the approbation of my conscience in the conviction that I had done my duty, than succeed in gratifying my wishes at the expense of your peace."

"If I understand you rightly," replied Gertrude with forced composure; "my cousin has assured you of his affection; and you have at least conditionally consented to receive his homage. In such a case neither party is any longer free. From my aunt you must be aware that you will experience great and resolute opposition; but that is a consideration for yourself alone. As regards my own feelings, I beg you to believe that, desiring only the happiness of Frederic, it will be my greatest joy to see it assured in any way. I advance no claim to an affection which has never been mine; nor have I shared the delusion of my kind aunt, who saw only what she desired. And now that we have sufficiently discussed this topic, you must allow me to make an effort to perform the duties of hospitality to our other guests."

As Miss Mortimer ceased speaking, she rose calmly and even proudly from her seat, and approached the music stand, where the daughters of Dr. Collins were examining the new ballads which were profusely scattered on every side.

The remainder of the evening passed off tranquilly and pleasantly. Agreeable conversation, well executed music, and perfect harmony, made the time run swiftly; for none saw lower than the surface; nor could guess that aching hearts were here, as elsewhere, disguised beneath smiling brows. And yet so it was; Mrs. Mortimer had discovered, long ere her party separated, that she had been buoyed up by fallacious hopes; for that her son, in all that pleasant circle, saw and heard only Sybil, whose brilliant talents had constituted its main charm; while she had merely to glance occasionally towards her niece to feel convinced that she was sustaining a struggle but ill calculated to assist her convalescence.

It is true that she smiled as she conversed with those about her, and even acceded without difficulty to the proposal of Sybil, that she ould accompany her in a duet well suited to splay the finished execution of both parties;

d all this apparently without an effort; but e anxious eyes of her fond protectress were t to be deceived. Well aware that the coun-nance of Gertrude was a faithful index of her elings, she readily comprehended the sudden pses into melancholy and depression, against hich the unhappy girl waged so unsuccessful wfare, and from which she started only to fect a gaiety that was foreign to her heart.
Ignorant of the conversation which had taken ace between her niece and Miss Delamere, and ystified by the calm and unpretending carriage the latter, whom no attention of Frederic, wever marked, could betray into the slightest hibition of unwomanly triumph, she felt vexand disheartened; and it was with a feeling intense relief that she heard the carriages her several guests successively announced, d received their parting compliments.
The last to quit the room was Mrs. Delamere d her daughter; the elder lady having disvered an absorbing source of interest in the rangement of a set of Chinese puzzles, then most unknown in England, and which had en a travelling present from Mortimer to his usin. Nor was it until Gertrude had begged r to carry off her new treasure to The Grange, at she at length reluctantly passed her arm rough that of Frederic, and prepared to take r leave.
"We part friends, good friends, do we not,
y dear Miss Mortimer?" murmured Sybil ide, as her mother was engaged, with the astance of her host and hostess, in folding shawl ter shawl about her. "You retain no anger ainst me? No suspicion of my loyalty?"
"Why distress either me or yourself by such a estion?" asked Gertrude evasively, in her turn.
"Because I do not think that you do me jus-
e. My proceeding to-night, for example, has rtled you. Any one save myself would have runk from it; but I spurn all such cowardly d vulgar notions of expediency, and based as ey are upon false principles. Besides, my conience would have reproached me had I not nkly and openly afforded to you an opportuty of disclosing your real feelings and sentients. You have now done so, and I thank u; for there is nothing which I so much ead as the reproaches of my own reason.
nd now good-bye; let me soon see a bloom on that fair face, for it is sadly pale to-night, d makes my heart ache."
Then clasping the small hand which was in urtesy extended to her, Miss Delamere bowed smiling farewell to her wearied hostess, and companied her mother to the carriage.
"To-morrow!" she whispered softly, as Morner assisted her to her seat; and in another oment the gates closed behind her.

CHAPTER XV.

The night was calm and still; the moonlight
y clear and bright upon the lawn, and tipped e trees with silver; and all was peace over both earth and sky, as Gertrude, after dismis ing her attendant, extinguished the lights upon her toilette, and threw back the casement to steep her burning forehead in the fresh breeze that came, laden with perfume, from the blossom-teeming garden.
That evening had been to her one of intense and agonizing struggle; and never had she felt so desolate as now. True, she had before both understood and seen that Frederic was lost to her, but she had at least never before willingly and deliberately resigned him to another; never before given to that other a right to consider him as her own. The womanly pride which had driven her to this alternative was now prostrate; and a thousand reflections, each more bitter than the last, bowed her bruised spirit to the very dust.
That Sybil had been ungenerous, indelicate, and abrupt, she could not conceal from herself;
but had she not, in her turn, also betrayed a weakness and want of self-possession which almost authorized the impertinence to which she had been subjected? Had she not wilfully laid bare her heart to the merciless probing beneath which it had writhed in torture, without one effort to escape the infliction? And had she not in order to spare her pride, armed her adversary with weapons to be turned against herself?
How she despised the hollow gaiety which for hours she had assumed? How she detested the hypocrisy which had taught her to belie her best and holiest feelings! And how she shuddered as she remembered that the die was indeed now cast! In short, Gertrude was miserable; her heart was wrung, and her spirit crushed. Even hopeless as her attachment had long been, she still loved Frederic with an intensity so deep and absorbing, that he was the centre of all her thoughts; and she had dwelt so fondly upon that one image, that the impression had become indelible. It was not passion with which she regarded him; but the pure and gentle affection which, although warm and intense, was yet veiled and subdued by the natural reserve of a modest and well organized mind.
Thus, as she reflected upon her conversation with Miss Delamere, she felt much as the drowning mariner may be supposed to feel, who, after flinging from him the last floating spar which might have assisted to buoy him up, in order to trust to his own unaided strength, suddenly hears the water singing in his ears, and feels it mounting to his lips, as he discovers that he is unable longer to sustain himself.
Far different were the solitary reflections of Sybil; as she, too, at that still hour, breathed the soft air which entered at her open window, and passed in mental review the occurrences of the evening. Her large dark eyes were raised to the calm sky which glittered with its myriad worlds of mysterious light, and her head was pillowed upon her hand; while her long and luxuriant hair from which she had detached its wreath of pomegranate blossom, and the combs by which it had been confined, fell in rich and profuse masses almost to her feet, and undulated in the passing breeze.

The scene would have been a fine subject for the artist. In the very depth of the spacious chamber stood a toilette-table of ebony, surmounted by an immense mirror, mounted in the same costly wood, and lighted by half-a-dozen wax candles in branches of or-mulu.

Scattered over the table, and resting upon the drapery of antique point by which it was covered, lay a profusion of gems, among which the crimson garland had been flung, evidently in careless haste; and just within the reflection of the tapers gleamed out the white and delicate draperies of the bed, whose muslin festoons fell like a vapor over the hangings of pale pink silk, or were looped back by heavy tassels of the same color and material. Just beyond, the light touched, but only partially revealed, an exquisite statue of Silence, which occupied a small recess; and then a portion of the apartment appeared in a species of twilight, which was again invaded by the silvery beams of the moon; which, after falling upon the bending figure of Sybil, cast her shadow far along the floor, relieved by a framework of glittering radiance.

The heavy curtains had been drawn back from the window; and as she leaned there, absorbed in thought, her features, with their varying expression, were distinctly visible in the clear cold light. Her eye was dancing with triumph, and a proud smile sat upon her lip. She had, that evening, accomplished her master-stroke; she had, that evening, succeeded in her most difficult and delicate undertaking; and she was now enabled to declare to Mortimer that not only did his cousin willingly resign his hand, but that she had never indulged a hope of his affection, or a desire to claim it. Thus, then, she should be more than justified in the eyes of Frederic, and might even become less distasteful in those of Mrs. Mortimer herself.

But, suddenly, some unwelcome thought obtruded itself among these pleasant visions; and the brow of the lady darkened, and a shiver passed over her frame, as though the night air had chilled her. The rich lips quivered for an instant, and then became firmly compressed; while the slender fingers that were buried in her hair, by a simultaneous impulse closed convulsively upon each other, as if to clutch some object that was about to escape them. Her breath labored in her throat, and a moisture glittered in her eye; but by a violent effort she flung off the emotion, and a deep flush rose to her cheek, that dried the incipient tear, and seemed to endue her with fresh courage. She raised her head and glanced around her, at first haughtily, and with an expression of defiance; but her slow and lingering survey was scarcely completed, ere again brow and bosom became blenched, and she clasped her hands together so tightly that the blood appeared ready to spring from beneath the nails, as she murmured almost inaudibly—

"It is too late to retreat!—It is my last chance! I have perilled my all upon the die!—I must succeed, or I am lost!"

Then, closing the window impetuously, and drawing before it the damask draperies to exclude the moonlight, she hastened to extinguish the tapers upon her table; and ultimately flung herself upon her bed in the darkness, still folded in her dressing-gown, and enveloped in the masses of her loose hair. It was clear that there was no peace of heart in that sumptuous chamber.

Gertrude, too, wearied at length of her revery; but it terminated far differently from that of Sybil. At first, a feverish irritation had rendered her unjust alike to herself and others; then, a feeling of wretchedness and isolation had wrung from her some of those bitter tears which are known only in youth, and which are never shed by the merely worldly and selfish, or comprehended by individuals of sturdy nerves, and neutral emotions, who exact a tangible cause for every demonstration of feeling, and regard as folly every species of suffering which is merely moral.

Alas! however unimportant in the eyes of others may be the evils by which our miseries are indueed, they are by no means trifling in our own, when we are conscious of their result; nor when the heart is wrung, can it suffer less because the cause appears puerile to the world.

Those tears, nevertheless, calmed the agitation of Gertrude; and, after a time, she began to reflect upon the pledge which she had given to Frederic, to assist his views with her aunt; and to reproach herself for her weakness in thus yielding to her feelings, when every sigh of dejection on her part would increase the displeasure and determination of Mrs. Mortimer, and thus render his position more onerous. Meekly, therefore, she dried her eyes; and, having made her preparations for the night, knelt down beside her bed to pray, without one remnant of bitterness or resentment.

Thus was she still engaged when hasty steps sounded upon the landing, and in another instant some one tapped at the door. She hurriedly rose from her knees, and drew back the bolt, when she was met by the favorite maid of Mrs. Mortimer, who implored her to hasten to the room of her mistress, who had been taken alarmingly ill.

Gertrude flew rather than ran to the chamber of her aunt, whom she found partially supported by pillows and gasping for breath. A deep red spot was burning upon either cheek, and her eyes were veiled by a thick mist, which, at intervals, she endeavored to sweep away with her fevered hand. In an instant, the unhappy girl read the truth. Her affectionate protectress had imbibed the fatal disease which was then ravaging Westrum; and the fever was already at its height.

"Where is Mr. Mortimer?" she gasped out, almost inarticulate with terror; "Where is Dr. Collins?"

"My master is gone himself to fetch the doctor, miss," was the reply; "He left the house as we awoke you."

With a throbbing heart the frightened Gertrude discovered at once that the disease by which her aunt was attacked was one of the most serious nature. Even during the few hours which had intervened since they parted in the drawing-room, the change in her appearance was alarmingly visible. Her eyes were sunken and glazed; her respiration heavy and oppressed; and the surface of her skin dry and heated. Nevertheless, the invalid endeavored, with a forced smile, to soothe and reassure the trembling girl; but it was with difficulty that she could articulate even the few words that she addressed to her, or the confession that she had, throughout the day, been conscious of a coming indisposition.

On the arrival of Dr. Collins he pronounced the presence of fever; aggravated, as he believed, by the recent exertions of his patient; but recommending simply some cooling remedies, and perfect quiet, declined to give a decided opinion upon the precise nature of the attack until his next visit; and then having seen an effervescing draught administered, took his leave for the night.

The cousins were, consequently, left to their anxious watch; and it was with dismay that they traced the rapid progress of the evil. Fearful fainting-fits were succeeded by perfect helplessness and torpor; and to these again supervened delirium.

Towards dawn, however, the consciousness of Mrs. Mortimer appeared to return; her eyes were fixed alternately upon the affectionate watchers beside her, and an expression of intense love passed over her features.

Gertrude was the first to remark the happy change; and springing from her seat, she was in an instant bending over the pillow of the sufferer.

"Aunt! my beloved aunt, speak to me!" she exclaimed, clasping the scorching form of Mrs. Mortimer in her arms; "Can I do nothing to relieve—nothing to ease you?"

A smile of gratified affection struggled upon the lip of the invalid, but she had no longer the power of utterance; and it was with trembling anxiety, and a painful foreboding of misfortune, that Gertrude busied herself about the sick-bed while awaiting the second advent of the physician. On his next appearance, although he spoke cheerfully to the cousins, and bade them rather seek to secure themselves from the possible chance of infection, than fear for his present patient, they were not deluded by his words; for, familiar with the expression of his countenance, they at once read there a greater consciousness of danger than he was willing to admit.

Any personal precaution was, however, far from the thoughts of either; their only care was to forbid all entrance to visitors, and to limit the attendance of the servants to the dressing-room, reserving the actual cares of the sick-chamber to themselves; an arrangement which was, nevertheless, partially invaded by the attached attendant of the sufferer, who, having insisted upon her right to watch over her beloved lady, was reluctantly permitted to share their vigils. This done, Mortimer retired for a brief time to his room; overcome with dread, and it may be, with remorse, as he remembered the unhappiness which he had lately caused to a fond mother, who might now be snatched from him for ever. Hurriedly he seized a pen, and seating himself at his desk, he wrote a few scarcely legible lines to Sybil, to inform her of the misfortune which had occurred, to forbid her approaching the house, and to implore her not to venture into Westrum before they again met.

The letter was instantly dispatched; and exchanging his coat for a dressing-gown, he hastened back to the sick-chamber. As he entered, Gertrude pressed her finger to her lip; and on bending over the bed, he saw that his mother had fallen into an uneasy doze—the first interval of comparative repose which she had experienced since the commencement of the attack.

As he was about to turn away he found his cousin at his side, and obeying the gesture of her hand, he seated himself in a large chair, in which she had already arranged the cushions, evidently in the hope that he might also sleep; but her affectionate solicitude did not avail; his heart and mind were too full for slumber; and as he looked around upon the melancholy scene before him, a thousand thoughts, and doubts, and even regrets, crowded upon him; while every passing moment seemed to concentrate a year of existence.

Nothing is more cheerless, nothing more depressing, than the slow approach of daylight in a sick room. The window of Mrs. Mortimer's chamber had been thrown wide open, in obedience to the direction of Dr. Collins; and as the cold gray drawn began for the second time to glimmer over the distant heights which shut in the coast, the night-lamp sickened into a pale yellowish gleam; and the wind as it swept through the branches of a lofty acacia near the house, moaned amid the leaves like a spirit of desolation. Upon the bed, and covered only by a light coverlet, lay the extended form of the sufferer; her cheek burnt with fever, her eyes dark and sunken, the pulses of her temples visibly throbbing, and her fitful starts proclaiming the unsatisfactory nature of her apparent slumber. Near her stood a small table already laden with phials, filled with divers colored liquids, and the thousand details which reveal the presence of illness; and beside her pillow sat Gertrude, pale it is true, but with a restlessness in her expression and an eagerness in her eye, which betrayed how thoroughly her whole being was absorbed in the duties of her watch.

No thought of self, no sympathy even with Frederic, occupied her at that hour. Her soul hung upon the abstract question of life and death which was so soon to be solved before her: and as a few incoherent words were occasionally uttered by the unconscious sufferer, she sank from the chair to her knees, and listened breathlessly, lest she should lose one sound of that cherished voice which might so soon be hushed for ever.

Nor was Frederic less worthy than his cousin to perform the filial duty to which he had bound himself. Pale and silent, he leaned back in his seat, gazing upon the convulsed features of his mother, and starting painfully at every spasm which shook her tortured limbs, as though by some electrical sympathy it passed over his own frame, or watching with helpless hope every motion of Gertrude, as though he trusted in her power to solace and relieve the poor sufferer, while he felt his own uselessness.

No one thought, no one regret strayed to Sy bil, as he sat there in that melancholy dawning: he saw only, felt only for the mother who had loved him so tenderly, and whom he had recently so ill requited. During his silent watch had he been offered her life in exchange of every other earthly good, he would not have hesitated for an instant to secure it. He had deeply felt the loss of his fond father, but he had not seen him, fading and failing before his eyes; this was his first acquaintanceship with heavy sickness, and he shuddered as he remembered how few of those who had been tainted by the fever which was now rioting in the veins of his mother, had escaped with life.

Strange that neither to the one nor the other of these two devoted watchers came one reflection on the possibility of their own infection! Their sorrow was too sincere for selfishness, there was no stage-effect in that sick-room; no striving at applause, no craving for the empty praise of the idle and uninterested. Even at this early period each felt a foreboding consciousness that there was no hope, and their sole anxiety was to smoothe, in so far as human means and human devotion could do so, her passage to the grave who had so tenderly plucked away the thorns from their own path of life.

CHAPTER XVI.

Days passed over, days so long and so heavy that it seemed as though time had paused in order to prolong the trial: and still Gertrude and Frederic watched unwearicdly beside what they knew to be the bed of death. No tear escaped them during the brief and rare intervals of consciousness which enabled the sufferer to recognise and to acknowledge their devotion; it was only amid the fierce and fevered paroxysms of delirium that they indulged themselves in an outpouring of the anguish by which they were consumed, or suffered themselves to be overcome and prostrated by the melancholy prospect before them.

At the terrible hour in which we trace the sure approach of a cruel and irremediable separation: when a dear and holy bond is about to be rent asunder, and we are called upon to resign the affection and companionship which have been made precious by years of possession and sympathy, the world appears to fade into nothingness, and all the hopes and joys of our health and our prosperity seem to crumble into ashes. What can life offer at such a moment which presents an apparent equivalent for that which we are called upon to resign! What has the empty future to tender, save a vague and undefined hope, which vanishes into vapor before the cherished realities of the past! How many memories assail us, which had previously seemed to be blotted out, only to bring with them the torturing reflection, that at the expiration of a few brief days, perhaps even of a few brief hours, we shall be called upon to resign forever the gaze of those loving eyes, and the clasp of that gentle hand, which had been to us throughout life both happiness and support!

And such were now the wretched reflections of Gertrude and Frederic. Even the hopeful words of their friendly physician had ceased to greet them, during his frequent visits, nor did the anxious cloud upon his brow tend to reassure their sinking spirits. Never absent for an instant from the sick room, save when they singly snatched a scant and hasty meal in the adjoining chamber; driven even into this momentary desertion of their charge by the express injunction of Dr. Collins, who strenuously interdicted the useless and dangerous risk of swallowing food in an infected atmosphere, they became ere long careless and almost unconscious of all beyond the influence of their own sorrow.

Ultimately, however, the increasing paleness and languor of his cousin struck Mortimer with a new terror, and he anxiously implored her to retire to her own apartment, were it merely for an hour, in order to secure a less troubled slumber than that which she had hitherto taken upon her chair, but Gertrude only shook her head with mournful resolution.

"No, no, dear Frederic," she murmured; "I shall not long be called upon to watch, leave me to my vigil. Am I not also her child! And would you deprive me of perhaps the last sorrowful, but still deep happiness that I may ever know in this world!"

And Mortimer, whose wretchedness would have been almost intolerable had he been called upon to endure it alone, could only press her hand with affectionate gratitude, and murmur out his low-voiced but fervent thanks.

And so they sat side by side, for hours, listening to the meaningless words which at times fell upon their ears, full of tenderness and anxiety, and with which their names were constantly associated, or watching for a lucid interval in which they might once more catch a glance of recognition; and whenever, for an instant, the attention of Frederic strayed from his suffering mother to his devoted cousin, he saw her with her eyes eagerly and earnestly fixed upon the convulsed features of her beloved protectress: faint from weakness, but still strong in the courage of her love.

How glorious is the apparent omniscience of woman in a sick-room! With the eye of the heart she seems intuitively to discover every want and with the ready hand of tenderness to anticipate every wish. Her limbs never weary, her eyes never droop, her step is light and noiseless, and her voice low and soft. She has a word of comfort for every murmur, a glance of sympathy for every pang. And the secret of her power lies in the fact, that in the presence of suffering she flings off her own identity, and totally forgetful of self, lives only in the pangs of the helpless being whom she tends.

Thus it is that women of real feeling mourn longer and more deeply for those whom they have loved and lost than men; who, being by nature unfitted to the service of a sick-room, have fewer of those touching memories which grow out of the last sad moments of companionship; for even where they devote all their energies to solace and to soothe the dying, they are devoid of the nice perception which enables a woman to see beyond the surface, and to hear with the ear of the spirit.

And so it was in the present instance. Frederic was ever ready and active when his services were claimed, but he could not, like Gertrude, foresee the necessity of action. He guessed not when the pillow became uneasy to the aching head, nor when the parched lips needed the refreshing moisture. At times, he overlooked, in his own sorrow, the precise moment at which the sustaining draught should be administered, or the position of the sufferer changed, but the watchful perception of Gertrude never slumbered, and he saw the wandering delight and expression of relief which, even amid her pangs, passed over the countenance of Mrs. Mortimer, as the gentle tendance of the watchful girl freed her from some unseen suffering.

All would have been comparatively easy to Gertrude, had she not hour by hour, and day by day, been compelled to feel that her beloved aunt was unconscious of all which took place about her: that she did not recognize her as she hung over her pillow to murmur in her ear the accents of tenderness, and that even the strong clasp of the fevered hand betokened pain instead of affection.

There is something strange and awful in the aspect of intellect alienated by disease—in that moral death which prostrates all the mental powers, and places a gulf, impassable as chaos, between the watcher and the watched. Where, we ask ourselves, as we listen to the meaningless words and the joyless laughter, where is the soul? In what unknown and mysterious world is it now wandering, liberated from all the thrall of earthly affections and anxieties? How can it be that we possess only the form, while the spirit is far away? With what and whom does it hold commune, during its estrangement? And with what viewless and fearful order of beings are we brought into almost immediate contact, through the medium of the estranged intellect before us? The reason totters as we ask ourselves the question, and the heart is pained by the very vagueness of the speculation.

At the termination of a week, the friendly physician, having requested a private interview with Mr. Mortimer, feelingly but definitely assured him, that all hope of saving his patient was at an end, and that he conceived it to be his duty to prepare her son for an event which would in all probability take place in a very few hours.

"I am aware, my dear sir," he concluded, as he wrung the hand of the young man with a sympathy which was evidently sincere; "that your respected parent has no wordly matters to arrange; for with her well regulated mind, she was incapable of deferring the performance of so serious a duty, and it is this conviction which consoles me under the apprehension that she may depart without one lucid interval sufficiently long or complete to enable her to follow up any definite idea. That she may, however, recover the necessary consciousness to recognise those about her, I believe to be highly probable, and to this prospect we must therefore endeavor to confine our hope. But I should reproach myself hereafter were I not at this moment frankly to declare, that in all human probability, her sufferings will soon be at an end, and so thoroughly am I convinced of the fact, that I shall not again leave the house until all is over, but will remain in the breakfast-room with Mr. Nottingham, whom I have requested to be prepared with such restoratives as may be desirable, either for the poor sufferer herself or for Miss Mortimer, who in her present worn and weak state, will not fail to be seriously affected by the shock which awaits her."

For a time Mortimer was silent, overcome by the anguish of his feelings, but at length he rallied sufficiently to inquire if it would not be prudent to induce his cousin to leave the sick-room before the awful moment arrived, and thus spare her the pang of witnessing the last struggle.

"You will undoubtedly do well to make the trial," was the reply, "but I fear that you will not succeed. In the hour of sorrow your admirable cousin appears to have no recollection of herself. I remember her on a former melancholy occasion, and even amid my own regret for one of the most valued friends I ever had, I could not repress my astonishment and respect at her courageous and devoted conduct. Depend upon it that throughout this new trial, therefore, she will not be less true to herself, although I fear that her sufferings will be even more acute, for no child ever loved a parent more affectionately than she has loved her aunt. And now go, my dear young friend, I will not detain you another instant from your post. Should my presence become necessary, you can summon me on the instant, but until it is so I will not intrude upon the sacredness of your sorrow."

Mortimer obeyed but his limbs almost failed as he again ascended the stairs, and approached what was so soon to be the chamber of death. When he entered he saw Gertrude upon her knees by the bedside, with her face concealed in the coverlet, but as she detected his stealthy step, she raised her head, and looked eagerly and inquiringly towards him.

"What had Dr. Collins to communicate?" she asked in a low whisper, as her cousin reached her side.

"His apprehensions for your own health, my dear Gertrude, and his desire that I should induce you to retire for an hour or two to your own room."

"Ha! Is it so? Must it be so soon?" exclaimed the poor girl, wringing her hands in agony. "And he would ask me to leave her! But perhaps it was right that he should do so—a duty which he was called upon to perform—he meant well I know. But you, Frederic, you her son, will not echo such a wish. She will yet recognise me, I feel that she will—and I would not lose that last look, that last smile for all—"

She could add no more, and suffocated by her suppressed sobs, she once more dropped her head upon the bed, while Mortimer as he hung over her, attempted no further argument, convinced that all interference upon such a point must prove ineffectual.

Two more dreary hours went by, twilight was rapidly shedding additional gloom over the sick-chamber, and still Mrs. Mortimer lay in a state of torpor, disturbed only by the violent and unnatural laboring of her breath, and the spasmodic convulsions of her limbs, when suddenly she opened her heavy eyes, and, looking earnestly into the gloom, feebly articulated: "Frederic—Gertrude—where are my children?"

In an instant, they were at her side.

"My own dear ones!" she again gasped out; "come nearer—nearer."

They instinctively sank upon their knees, and each took one of her wasted hands in silence.

"We part—part for ever!" continued the trembling voice, "the world is passing from me—in peace." And then, bringing together the hands which clasped her own, she added with increased difficulty: "Heaven bless you both—both my own ones. My children, I have had a fearful dream—but it was no more than a dream, I see, and I feel its falsehood. Embrace me both of you—both at once—let me die in the blessed conviction that—"

What she would have added, they knew not, for she spoke no more; another earnest gaze, another beaming and happy smile, and the kindly spirit passed into that rest which was never again to be broken upon earth.

CHAPTER XVII.

All was, indeed, over. There was no longer any necessity for exertion, no longer anything to hope or fear. The darkened windows, the noiseless tread, and the deep stillness of the house of death, had succeeded to the tumultuous feelings, the weary vigils, and the agonizing suspense of the previous week, and, for a time, Mortimer experienced that frightful void of heart which appears to the survivor, as though it shut out all human sympathies, and is destined to be eternal. He had no longer a mother, he stood alone, and as he thought of the past, he sickened at the prospect of the future.

But although he sorrowed, and sorrowed deeply, the despair of Gertrude was still more intense. No tears came to her relief, her feelings appeared to be annihilated, and she sat with clasped hands, and eyes fixed on vacancy, unconscious of all that passed about her. In this moral prostration, there was no shade of self, she did not remember that she was now, indeed, an orphan, penniless and homeless, who must, hereafter, battle for every foot of way which she made upon the world's path, or that she possessed no other affection upon earth to replace that which she had lost—her whole being was absorbed in one great grief of her bereavement.

To her, the protectress of her youth, and the friend of her womanhood, had been all in all—and that all was gone for ever.

For hours, each day, she sat beside the pale motionless corpse, herself as pale and almost as motionless; nor was it until the morning of the burial that she was aroused into more demonstrative suffering. Then, indeed, the floodgates of her grief were opened, and, to the great relief of Dr. Collins, she speedily wept and exhausted herself into a succession of fainting fits, which rendered her insensible to the departure of the funeral train, and calmed the apprehensions which he had begun to entertain of the results of her immeasurable and silent agony.

On his return, he found her calmer. She even answered his inquiries, and consented to see her cousin, although her lip trembled as she complied with the suggestion, nor could she, when he approached her bed and took her hand, articulate one word of welcome or condolence. Frederic was deeply affected, and, for a time, even forgot his own sorrow in an attempt to soothe that of the fair and fragile creature before him. Theirs was a common grief, and each read the heart of the other without the help of words; while it was evident that the meeting once over, they felt consolation in the presence of each other, and the worthy doctor satisfied with the judiciousness of his arrangement, forced Mortimer gently into a chair, and, then, quietly retired from the room.

For a time, nothing was heard, save the low sobs of the faithful Roberts; whose services being ended about her beloved mistress, had been silently and zealously transferred to her niece; but, ere long, the affectionate whispers of Mortimer broke upon the stillness, and were rewarded by the grateful tears of his dejected listener, as they wept together over their mutual bereavement.

Throughout the remainder of the day, Mortimer kept his post at the bedside, and each party derived a melancholy consolation from this companionship. They were less desolate in heart, as they remained with clasped hands, and streaming eyes, indulging all the luxury of sorrow, and grieving rather for each other than for themselves.

It was not, however, until in the utter solitude of night, she could brood over her anguish uncontrolled, that Gertrude felt the full force of her loss; and even ventured to glance at a future which to her was fraught with terror.

So long as even the inanimate remains of her aunt had continued in the house, she had been less isolated in spirit; but now all was gone; she could not even cling to the senseless clay: the grave had claimed its tenant, and her work of love was ended.

For several succeeding days, Mortimer devoted his whole time to his cousin; nor did he once quit the house, save when with Gertrude leaning feebly upon his arm, he spent a short time in the grounds; and thus, although the stricken girl would not have admitted even to herself that it could be so, she was almost happy. Never had Frederic been so gentle, so affectionate; and when she occasionally endeavored to speak of her future plans, he silenced her by asking if she were, indeed, weary of her home, that she should seek another.

This state of things was not, however, fated to last. During the illness of Mrs. Mortimer, several letters had been delivered to her son from Sybil; but, with the morbid feeling peculiar to heavy grief, he had shrunk from opening them, and thus renewing his intercourse with a person whom he knew to be distasteful to her, while she was stretched upon a bed of sickness; nor could he even reconcile himself to do so, until the first bitterness of his regret had passed over.

Time, however, soon produced its effect. The elasticity of the human mind is proverbial; and neither joy nor sorrow will endure for ever. Constant communion with, and increasing affection for his cousin, for a while sufficed to engage his thoughts; but ere long, he felt the necessity of a stronger stimulus; the very excess of his grief had worked its own reaction; and he began to reflect both upon the present and the future.

As we have elsewhere remarked, Mortimer could not live without feeling himself beloved; and this craving for an undivided and absorbing devotion naturally turned his thoughts to Sybil; when he began to marvel how he could have suffered her letters to remain unopened. He shrank from admitting, even to himself, that the last words of his mother had born a reference to Miss Delamere by no means favorable to his passion, and that she had eventually expired under a delusion which his future conduct would in all probability negative; but it is not the less certain that those very words had tended in no inconsiderable degree to influence him in leaving the letters so long unread.

That he was once more acting ungenerously towards his cousin he never reflected: for intent only on proving his gratitude for her devotion to his mother, he forgot that she was ignorant of his engagement to Sybil, and might possibly misconstrue the nature of attentions to which she had hitherto been unaccustomed; and, unconsciously even to herself, repay them with feelings which she had no desire to awaken.

Thus it was with no compunction as regarded Gertrude, that, having at length succeeded in silencing, even if he could not entirely subdue, the upbraiding of his own thoughts, he proceeded to examine the letters which had been so long accumulating; and, as he did so, Sybil rose before him in all her beauty and in all her love: while, as she wrote admirably, the spell deepened as he advanced in his task, until he felt his breast bound, and his brow flush with happiness.

The earlier notes were brief and guarded; and contained merely expressions of earnest regret at the serious indisposition of his mother, offers of every luxury at The Grange which might be acceptable to the invalid, and entreaties that he would keep her constantly informed of the progress of the disease. But as the danger of Mrs. Mortimer increased, the letters became longer and more affectionate. She bewailed the continued sufferings of her esteemed friend, but she was even more expansive in her expressions of anxiety about himself. She besought him to adopt every measure for escaping the infection, and even pointed out the preventatives with which she was acquainted; and finally, she reproached him so tenderly for his silence, that it was easy to perceive how impossible it was for her to feel resentment where her heart was interested.

The last, the longest, and the least guarded of all these epistles had been written on the day succeeding Mrs. Mortimer's death. It was a triumph of affectionate eloquence, a masterpiece of delicate and earnest devotion. She had wept tear for tear with him. She had appreciated all the virtues, and all the worth of his departed mother. She was conscious that nothing could compensate to him for such a loss, and yet there were affections, and ties, and sympathies, as pure and as holy, to call him back to that world from which he had now shrank away, with weakened spirits and a doubting heart. And there was no mention of Gertrude. She had forgotten all save him to whom she wrote. It was his tears alone that she would wipe away; his grief that she would soothe; his isolation that she would brighten into companionship and joy.

And joy indeed, once more stole over the spirit of Mortimer. Not even his apparent neglect had been able to chill the warm outpourings of a heart which he felt to be all his own. Like her, he forgot the sufferings of his desolate orphan cousin. Like her, he peopled the world with one all-sufficing object; and like her, he felt that although the cup of bitterness had been lifted to his lips, life could still offer a brighter and a better draught.

All the past, as regarded Sybil, came back fresh and glowing to his memory; and while he refolded the letters, he breathed deeply, like one who had cast off a heavy weight of care; and hastily, but scrupulously, securing his newly-found treasure, he left his room, and proceeded to the summer-parlor, in which he had spent so many hours of happiness in her society. There he felt that he could more fully appreciate the transport of being beloved, for there every spot and every object was replete with memories of her grace, her wit, and her accomplishments. Books in which her name was inscribed lay upon the table. Music to which her touch and her tones had lent and added harmony, was scattered over the instrument. Sketches drawn by her skilful hand, were in the portfolios; and above all, there was the window at which she had stood beside him, the tapestry-frame at which she had wrought; and the mirror in which her faultless figure had been reflected. As the miser gazes, enrapt upon his treasures, so did Mortimer linger over each and all of these—for each and all told of her who had become to him the universe; and he was so thoroughly absorbed in this employment, that he continued unconscious of an arrival, until the door of the apartment opened, and Sybil herself stood before him.

For an instant he remained motionless: for the deep mourning dress of Miss Delamere jarred upon the current of his thoughts, and almost brought with it a sensation of remorse; but the feeling lasted scarcely a moment beneath the soft and sympathizing smile of his visitor, and the tearful accent in which she murmured, as she advanced towards him with extended hand,

"My poor Frederic! And do I indeed see you thus—the mere shadow of your former self! Had you then so utterly forgotten the future in the present? Did no thought of Sybil and of her anxieties induce you to be more careful of your health than I read in your pale cheek and your heavy eyes, that you have been? But I will not reproach you—no! not even for a silence which has wrung my heart, although it has never weakened my trust in your affection. I, too, have sorrowed, Mortimer; but my tears fell because I felt that yours were mingled with them; and the knowledge of your unhappiness suffiecd to make me wretched in my turn; but even in my moments of deepest grief, I remembered the future, and was comforted."

"My own kind Sybil," murmured Mortimer, as he drew her to his heart, and she suffered her head to rest for an instant upon his shoulder: "Talk not to me of the past: you are here; and to me you are all in all: but you know not, you cannot guess, all that I have felt and suffered."

"You deceive yourself," was the reply; "and it is in order to induce you to break through the melancholy associations by which you are now surrounded that I am here. My visit is, as I need scarcely say, ostensibly to your cousin; but you will not require to be told, that this early advent is caused by a deeper and a dearer anxiety. Frederic, you must no longer remain under this roof. The constant sight of objects familiar to you in other times, and under other circumstances will tend to render your melancholy morbid and unnatural. That you should grieve is just and right; but remember that you owe much to yourself—and—may I not add, something also to me?"

"I know and feel the truth of all that you advance, Sybil," said Mortimer mournfully; "and gladly, most gladly, would I act upon your suggestion; but you forget that I am not free—that my poor cousin is still too weak to encounter the fatigue of a removal; and that I cannot abandon her in a sorrow which has been induced by me and mine."

A slight color rose to the cheek of Miss Delamere, and her fine brow contracted for a moment; but it was with even greater gentleness that in the next instant she raised her eyes to those of her companion, and said, slowly and emphatically: "It is you, Frederic, who forgot the ready comments of a censorious world; and although I know that for yourself you could despise them, yet have you no right to disregard their probable effect upon your cousin. You may tell me, in your turn, that I have disregarded them in my own person; and of this I am aware; for not even the presence of Miss Mortimer under your roof may to some appear a sufficient excuse for my thus venturing to visit a house which has no longer a mistress; but there are feelings which place us beyond such considerations, nor do I hesitate to admit that I have been swayed by these. I could not know you to be unhappy, and sacrifice the joy of telling you how deeply I sympathized in your sorrow, by any paltry fear of misconstruction; and I had been for so long a time deprived of the privilege of seeing you, that I cast from m every other thought than that of the delight blending my tears with yours. I felt the nece sity of seeing you myself: of convincing yo that in losing your estimable mother you ha not lost all; and so long as you recognise and a preciate my motives, I am careless of all beside

"How shall I ever repay you for such affe tion?" murmured Mortimer tenderly, as he rai ed her hand to his lips.

"By listening to my advice," replied Mis Delamere; "by looking calmly and dispassion ately upon your position; and by admitting th reason of what I have already hinted. I wi not speak further of yourself, for I believe yo to be sufficiently unselfish to feel little interes upon that point; but once more, remember th invidious position of your cousin. Young, beau tiful, and as one who was very dear to yo never concealed, tenderly attached to you, d you imagine for a moment that she can thu continue alone to share your home, and t absorb your attention, without the greatest risk to her fair fame?"

"Who would dare—?" exclaimed Mortimer with a kindling eye.

"Many," replied his companion steadily "and those even among your most intimate associates: mothers who have daughters to marry; men whose age places them beyond the reach of slander; girls who are ambitious of your notice; and young men who are jealous of your advantages. I feel that I give you pain, my dear Frederic; but the probe of the surgeon is frequently the only cure. You are misled by a false chivalry—"

"Sybil," interposed her listener; "Gertrude has no other friend, save myself, on earth."

"And would you render that one worse than powerless?"

"You may be right; but I love her as a brother. How, then, can I abandon her at such a moment?"

"Simply by remembering the responsibility of your situation. Miss Mortimer is no longer a child; make her the judge between you."

"After what has passed, I feel that I dare not. She has already too much cause of complaint against me."

"And do you believe that by augmenting that cause, you can acquit yourself in her eyes? Need I say, Frederic," and again a shadow passed over the features of Miss Delamere of more than dubious expression; "need I explain to you how gladly I would have offered her a temporary home at The Grange, had I not been conscious that I should only subject myself to the mortification of a refusal? Such, indeed, was my first intention, but I soon felt its fallacy and nothing then remained to me save to exempt her, in so far as I might, from future suffering. Be it as you will, however. It is evident that I have deceived myself with regard to the extent of your interest in your cousin. Since you cannot part from her, my path is plain: I am once more taught to feel how greatly I overrate the affection of another when I test it by my own."

"Sybil! how have I deserved this?"

"Forgive me, Frederic, forgive me," murmured Miss Delamere, burying her face in her hands; "you have made me very wretched, and I have not pride enough to conceal my disappointment."

"My own love!" exclaimed Mortimer, as he clasped her tenderly to his heart; "how little do you understand me! When you entered the room all around me spoke only of yourself. It was to commune with your image that I was here. Yes, although I visited for the first time since the death of my mother the apartment in which she the most delighted, I had forgotten all save you—all save the hours which we had passed together on the same spot. I was to retrace a thousand memories of yourself that I was here. Sybil, you are my world—the very essence of my being: but I lay under a heavy debt of gratitude to my cousin, and I dare not even seem to forget its amount."

"Yet you wilfully risk the destruction of her peace—and mine."

And the tears of Miss Delamere forced a passage through her fingers.

"Be it as you will," said Mortimer, unmanned at the sight of her grief; "henceforward I can have no will but yours. Yet how can I explain an absence which will condemn her to perfect solitude in a house so lately visited by death? Will she not feel my departure as a wanton cruelty, which even her indulgence cannot excuse?"

"Not if you are frank; not if you sincerely place before her your real motive."

"Had she only secured another home," said Mortimer, reluctantly yielding to an influence against which he was unequal to contend; "I should feel less hesitation in informing her of my purpose; but, save myself, poor Gertrude possesses only one or two very distant relatives, to whom she is utterly unknown; and with whom, even should they consent to receive her, she would probably be unhappy."

"What, then, are your future plans regarding her?" asked Sybil, suddenly raising her head and looking steadfastly towards him.

"I confess that, as yet I have not formed any," was the reply.

"Then listen to me," said Miss Delamere, as she affectionately took his hand, and met his eyes with a smile. "We live in no modern Utopia, where men's tongues are dipped in honey, and women dream only of the blossoms amid which they walk; nor is the present all in all. Both Miss Mortimer and yourself have a long future before you, into which each must look steadily and carefully. You owe her much, very much; and it behoves you to act at once with generosity and prudence. She has relatives, you say; arrangements may therefore easily be made for a time, until you have a right, consistently and irreproachably, to offer her a home under your own roof. Acquit me, I beseech you, of a paltry jealousy which I should scorn, and do me justice. When that day comes I shall be the first to blame, should you fail in so high and holy a duty."

"Sybil, forgive me," exclaimed Mortimer passionately; "sorrow has made me weak and supine; and I indeed require your guiding affection. You are right, quite right. I am wilfully subjecting poor Gertrude to misconstruction. All shall be done as you suggest; and I trust that I have long years before me in which I may be able to prove how deeply I feel all that I owe her. But you have forgotten, dearest, that by this arrangement you are also banishing me from your own presence—sending me forth a wanderer without a beacon-light."

The eyes of Miss Delamers flashed, and her bosom heaved; but the smile was bland and the voice steady, in which she replied:

"Talk not of me, Frederic; my faith in your affection will suffice until the departure of Miss Mortimer enables you to return to Westrum; moreover, we have a great resource in a perpetual and daily correspondence. In such a case selfishness must be utterly laid aside. I speak to you only as a sister; be guided on this occasion by my advice, and trust me, you will have no reason to regret it. Moreover, no time should be lost. I repeat that the position of your cousin is invidious, while your own is scarcely less so. And now my ungracious task is ended. My visit was to Miss Mortimer, but I doubt if I can longer await her coming; and I will, therefore, leave alike my greeting and my condolence in your hands."

"And what more leave you, Sybil?"

"My heart, my soul, my being;—trifle not with the trust."

"Dare I believe so much?"

"Mortimer," said Miss Delamere, as she rose to depart; "I have been once deceived, and my life nearly paid the forfeit of my mistake; and yet I never loved him as I love you. Beware, therefore, of yourself, if I am dear to you; you know not, you cannot guess, all that your falsehood would involve."

"I shall never know it," whispered her companion, as he detained her.

"It would be, at best, a fearful knowledge," said Sybil with a slight shudder; "May it be spared to both of us."

And so they parted.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Another day had dawned; and the cold gray light, as it slowly spread over the eastern horizon, fell upon the kneeling figure of Gertrude Mortimer, who, with her face buried among the cushions of an arm-chair which occupied the deep bay of the window of her sleeping chamber, had remained throughout the whole long silent night motionless, tearless, and almost unconscious.

There are feelings so deep that they annihilate the power of thought, and for a time almost seem to arrest vitality. Such were those of the orphan. The cousins had met as usual in the twilight; and, arm-in-arm, as was their wont, they had paced to and fro beneath the tall trees which overhung the water. They had done so every evening since the convalescence of Gertrude had enabled her to encounter such a fatigue; and every evening hitherto she had returned to the house when the heavy dew warned ed her to retire, renovated both in health and heart. But now all was changed. With the image of Sybil still bright before him, Frederic had summoned sufficient resolution to point out to his dismayed and astonished listener the probable results of their present mode of life; and his representations, carefully and even tenderly as they were made, opened before her an abyss of difficulty, which, in her innocence, she had never apprehended.

That any ungenerous comment could be elicited by her residence in the dear old home which had cradled her childhood, and under the roof of a cousin who to her was as a brother, had never entered into her imagination; but now the veil was rent away, and she saw all the wretchedness of her fate. It was true, too true, that she had no longer a right to feel herself the natural and authorized inmate of that home—the legitimate companion of that cousin; and at once the fearful question arose in her mind, Where, then, am I to hide my sorrow? From whom am I to look for sympathy and affection?

Separated at an early age from all the relatives of her mother, by whom her very existence had probably been long forgotten, and to none of whom she could now be an object of interest, she knew not where she could apply even for shelter. The child of tenderness and indulgence, she had yet to learn the bitterness of that bread which is yielded rather than offered—of that protection which is an obligation rather than a blessing; and although, when Mortimer awakened her to the truth, he had been careful to remind her that, by the will of her deceased aunt, she was entitled to a legacy of two thousand pounds, she had scarcely heeded the assurance. As she had heard it when it was first announced to her, so did she hear it now, for she had yet to learn the importance of the fact; and the only impression which remained upon her mind, was one of gratitude for his earnest declaration that, let her dwell where she might, she would ever be to him an object of the dearest interest, whom it would be alike his pride and his delight to shield from every trial.

Poor Gertrude! To her the past and the future were alike a blank; while the present was fraught only with pain and difficulty. For the first time she felt the real influence of that terrific bugbear, the world—that thing of the hydra-head, and the million tongues. She shrank away appalled from its contact, and would fain have hidden herself from its eagle ken, and scorching touch. But where? The grave had swallowed up the bulwark which had been hitherto raised between them. She was alone; alone to wrestle, and alone to weep. She had turned to Frederic for counsel; but, like herself, he knew not upon what to determine.

And thus they had parted for the night, both depressed, both irresolute; but with what different feelings! Pained as he was, alike for his cousin and for himself, Mortimer was still able to relieve his anxiety and to mitigate his regret, by thoughts of Sybil, and visions of future happiness; while the poor and desolate orphan crept to her solitary chamber to brood in silence over this new and unexpected trial.

Tears slow and bitter, coursed each other down her pale cheeks, and hours passed by before she had even power to think; she felt her misery, but she could not analyze it. At length, however, this mute despair exhausted itself, and a clearer perception of her real position forced itself upon her reason. Her wan cheek crimsoned at the idea of slander—slander, connected with herself, however undeserved; and she tacitly acknowledged the propriety of her immediate separation from her cousin.

For awhile that one conviction overpowered her; nor had she ever known until that night how tenderly and exclusively she loved him. She knew it now, however; now when that one idea, the idea of living no longer under the same roof—of enjoying no longer his cherished companionship, annihilated all beside, and made all else appear as dust in the balance.

He loved another but even that was nothing so long as she could remain near him, and listen to his voice, and meet his smile. And now this poor luxury which she was daily purchasing with the wreck of her own peace, was wrested from her. They were to part. The world had already pronounced its fiat, and there was no appeal.

Then came another transition of feeling; less poignant perhaps, but still more frightful. She was to go! But where? She grasped her cold forehead with her burning hands, and tried to think. What a waste spread wide and blank before her! She could not remain at Westrum! all eyes would be upon her there; all would remember the past, and she should wither beneath the lip-deep pity of the idle and the curious: not there—where she must witness the progress of her cousin's suit, and hear the thrilling peal chime out the moment of his marriage. And Westrum had hitherto been her world; and all beyond was strange and new to her.

Mortimer was her last surviving relative on her father's side, and thus she found no resting-place for her weary heart, where she would willingly have sought it. Of her mother's family she knew no more than that two of her relations still existed: the nearest of whom was a brother, who by careful perseverance had realized a handsome fortune, which, by his unsocial and penurious habits, had been yearly increasing; but whose heart had long been closed against all his connexions.

Gertrude gasped for breath as she recalled to her memory all that she had heard of him: his harsh unkindness to her consumptive mother—his insolent neglect of her widowed father—his utter abandonment of herself. To Mr. Sinclair she felt that she could make no appeal; to him she must be simply an object of grudging charity: an intrusive and unwelcome dependent. She could not accept his protection upon such terms as these, even should he be induced to promise it; and that he would do so was more than doubtful. Of Miss Warrington, the maiden aunt of her mother, she knew little, save that she dwelt in a small village in Devonshire, where she contrived with some difficulty to make a very confined income suffice for her limited wants, but she was aware that every year a brief and formal, although kind, letter had arrived at Westrum from the old lady, desiring tidings of her own welfare, until she had attained the age of womanhood, when these periodical enquiries had suddenly ceased: and all intercourse was thus terminated between Mrs. Mortimer and the last relative of her mother who had appeared to feel an interest in her fate.

All this was bleak enough; and the timid and loving heart of Gertrude shrank tremblingly before the bitter trial of re-awakening a long dormant, and in all probability, extinct affection in the bosom of an aged and unknown relation, of whose disposition, habits, and prejudices, she was, moreover, utterly ignorant. Needy as she was, there was much reason to apprehend that she would, from motives of prudence, decline to burden herself with an inmate who could do little towards a decrease of her penury, and might prove an incumbrance rather than a comfort; but cheerless and unpromising as the plan appeared, it was that upon which the unhappy girl decided. She felt that she could better support the privations of poverty and the exactions of old age, even although rendered doubly selfish by a life of solitude, than the insolent intolerance of purse-proud and heartless vanity, meting out its benevolence with a scornful lip and a niggard spirit.

Thus resolved, the orphan rose from her knees; and drawing back the curtains which had hitherto shut out the daylight, seated herself calmly and tearlessly at her desk. She had wept over the past; she shrank from dwelling upon the present; but she nerved herself bravely against the future.

She wrote respectfully and frankly; she explained alike her position and her apprehensions; she boldly declared the limited nature of her resources; and she threw herself upon the generosity of her mother's kinswoman. She made no professions, and volunteered no promises; she knew the purity of her own intentions; and she was too proud to sully them by exhibiting a doubt that they could be suspected.

The task was nevertheless, an arduous one; for she had no clue by which to guess how her communication would be received. She felt that she had no claim upon the kindness of the lonely old lady; and she said so with the same truthfulness which was constantly her habit. It was easy to read that her heart had bled as she wrote, but she did not intrude her sorrow where she was uncertain of sympathy.

Her painful task ended, she closed the letter, once more shut out the light, and throwing herself upon her knees, prayed fervently for strength to meet the result of her application, be it what it might; and then, calmed and comforted, she slept, and for a time forgot in the deep and dreamless slumber of exhaustion, the weight of sorrow by which she was bowed almost to the earth.

In the morning, when the cousins again met, Gertrude summoned sufficient nerve to acquaint Frederic with her decision of the past night; but he, who had found it comparatively easy to paraphrase the reasonings of Sybil, felt his heart sink as he contemplated the actual position of the orphan.

"You are too hasty in your arrangements, my dear Gertrude," he said anxiously; "as although, for your own sake, it is necessary that we should part for a time, it is by no means expedient or proper that you should quit the home of your childhood with a haste which would seem to imply that you were no longer a welcome inmate. I will not dwell upon my own feelings in this emergency—they are too painful; but I must insist that you are just to yourself. You do not know, my dear cousin—and Heaven grant that you never may!—the myriad trials of poverty; the wringing misery of those perpetual and soul-draining expedients to which the well-born poor are subjected. You cannot share the privations of Miss Warrington."

"I care not for poverty," observed Gertrude, forcing a smile.

"Because you do not comprehend it," replied Mortimer gravely; "Nor must you ever do so. I will not insult you by urging my right upon this point; let it suffice that it ought to be, and shall be enforced; but at the same time, it is incumbent upon you not even to appear as though you were willing to add to difficulties, already, no doubt sufficiently oppressive. Be guided, I entreat of you, by me. In the first place, do not as yet, even dream of leaving Westrum. I will absent myself for a time, and this must be all that is necessary to prevent unpleasant remarks."

"Never!" exclaimed Gertrude energetically; "You shall not be driven from your home for my sake."

"Will you not yield to my wishes, Gertrude? Remember, my dear girl, the probable importance of this one step to all your after life. I have already much, very much, with which to reproach myself; do not deepen my self-blame by showing me that you disregard my advice. Are you not the sister of my adoption? Are you not——"

"Enough—enough," gasped out his listener; "Be your will what it may, it shall be obeyed."

"Do not speak so coldly," said Mortimer, with emotion: "Only to know you happy, I would make almost any sacrifice. Let us then, work together to this end, for it must be accomplished. Why do you not claim a home—call it so if you will, though I trust soon to offer you one more genial—why do you not claim a home with Mr. Sinclair? He was the brother of your mother—your own nearest relation; and under his roof you will at least be secure of every luxury to which you have been accustomed."

"I dread the price that must be paid for luxuries which I am contented to forego."

"Do not be misled by what may, after all, prove to be a false apprehension. It is true that Mr. Sinclair was a cold brother, and a lukewarm friend; but he has been throughout life intent only upon accumulating wealth. We have not communicated with him for years; and time, my dear Gertrude, works strange changes. Your uncle is a solitary, childless man; he must have passed many a weary hour, even amid his prosperity; and remember, that if he has remained silent during so many years, we, on our side, have made no attempt to dispel that silence. It may be that he will thankfully receive to his heart the child of his only sister; and should you once meet, the result cannot be doubtful. In any ease you owe it both to yourself and him, to make the first appeal to his affection."

"I will do so."

"I thank you for your compliance, but let it be done cautiously; do not suffer him to imply that you have no other resource—do not permit him to believe that you are dependent upon his acquiescence for a home."

"Upon what pretext can I then address him? asked Gertrude, almost reproachfully. Mortimer buried his eyes in his hands, and remained silent.

"My dear Frederie," resumed his cousin, with a composure which grew out of the very bitterness of her anguish: "whatever I do, and to whomsoever I apply in my extremity, I must act with openness and honor. I have been the child of benevolence almost from my cradle; and although the hand of charity has hitherto been extended to me so tenderly that I have never felt its weight, I must now learn to receive the bitterness with the blessing, and to be grateful for the boon, however offered. I cannot approach my uncle with a vain sophistry upon my lips; I must present myself as I am: I need a home, and it is from him that you have willed for me to ask one. I feel and know that you would spare me every mortification to which it is possible that I may be subjected by telling the whole truth; but believe me, it would only make the suffering greater, were it deferred until it brought with it the rebuke of my own conscience. I will write to Mr. Sinclair since you desire it; but it must be as I have written to Miss Warrington; and I have a firm conviction that our correspondenee will soon terminate."

"The whole affair makes me wretched," murmured Mortimer; "I feel that I am wrong, and yet—"

"Wherefore accuse yourself?" asked Gertrude affectionately; "you have acted towards me with the frank and upright principle which I had a right to expect from you. I am weak, I know; but I will not prove unworthy of you; of those ———"

Tears stopped her utterance; and Mortimer, no longer able to contend with his emotion, seized his hat and hurried from the room.

How often is eowardice blent with the better feelings! Mortimer could escape by flight the spectacle of a sorrow which he deeply felt; but he had not the heroism to sacrifice his own selfish gratification in order to mitigate its extent.

Much had passed during the interview that was soothing to the feelings of Gertrude; but nothing which had lessened the difficulties of her position. She was still helpless and homeless; and the new task which had devolved upon her of addressing Mr. Sinclair, was the most mortifying trial to which she had been yet exposed.

That he would receive her as an inmate she did not for an instant anticipate, and she consequently felt that the suffering was gratuitous; but it was Frederie's desire that she should at least offer him the alternative, and she was content to abide by his directions. The letter was therefore written in deep sorrow, but with perfect resignation; and the days which necessarily intervened before an answer could arrive, were among the most cruel of her life.

It came, however, at length; and cold, brief, and insulting as it was, she experieneed a sensation of relief on finding that he definitely declined her proposal. He was sorry, he said, that those who had reared her as that most useless of all created beings, a fine lady, had ultimately left her a beggar; although such a climax might have been expected; and it could not be rationally anticipated that he, who from motives of prudence had remained a bachelor, would voluntarily eneumber himself with a person about whom he knew nothing, and who could advance no claim upon his notice. He wished her well, and warned her to be prepared for mortifications and trials of all sorts, which it would be impossible for her, situated as she was, to avoid; but he hoped that by humility and industry, supposing that she possessed any talent sufficiently useful to be turned to account, she might ultimately be able to make her way in the world. And this was all. There was no word of sympathy; no sentence of encouragement. The gulf between them yawned wider and blacker than ever; and she had no refuge, save in the compassion of the poor and solitary Miss Warrington.

Mortimer had awaited the reply of Mr. Sinclair before he left Westrum; and it was with a feeling of bitter indignation that he perused it. His first impulse was to hasten to town, in order to seek an interview with the cold-hearted worshipper of Mammon, and to impress upon him the unworthiness of his conduct, and the responsible position in which he stood towards his last surviving relative; but from this measure he was dissuaded by Gertrude herself, who meekly represented that her uncle was fully borne out in his assertion that she had no claim upon him, save that which his own heart might have afforded her, and who declared her willingness rather to suffer any privation than to intrude herself again upon his notice.

Mortimer argued in vain; for once his cousin was resolute. The very extremity of her position had nerved her with a fictitious courage.

"I have still a hope," she said, forcing back the tears which rose to her burning eyelids; "I have still one relative who may feel for my orphan state, and with whom I shall be safe from the comments of the idle and the malevolent. My tastes are simple; for I have never forgotten that I was indebted for all the blessings by which my youth has been surrounded to the goodness of others; and thus I have taught myself to comprehend that I might one day be called upon to resign them. Moreover, my dear cousin, I am rich in the conviction of your regard, a treasure of which the world cannot deprive me, and thanks to the unfailing kindness of her to whom I owe everything, and whose affection endured even beyond the grave,

I am not quite pennyless: while I possess talents which may also be made available. Go then, in peace, my dear cousin; and rest satisfied that, in one way or the other, I shall soon be enabled to send you an assurance that your anxiety upon my account may cease. Do not imagine that I speak lightly or presumptuously: I have thought much and seriously during the last few days; and I am comforted by the conviction that others have successfully combated against circumstances even more unpromising than those by which I am now surrounded."

"Could I but see any means by which your departure from hence might be rendered unnecessary—" broke in Mortimer.

"There are none; and I ought earlier to have foreseen the necessity of my removal; nor can I find any excuse for my want of prudence, save in my ignorance of society, and the extent of my mental suffering. Now, however, all is clear to me; and for my sake and your own, it must no longer be deferred. By to-morrow's post I shall forward my letter to Miss Warrington; and should that fail, I must learn to suffice to myself."

"You do not comprehend the trials of which you talk with so much calmness."

"It may be so," said the poor girl sadly; "but it is a knowledge which will soon be acquired, and must be accepted with philosophy. And now let us rather speak of your departure. Like my letter, you must leave Westrum to-morrow; and I shall be better able in solitude to arrange my plans, and brace myself to whatever necessity may arise."

"You will write to me frequently, daily, Gertrude?"

"I can scarcely promise so much; but directly that I have anything to tell, you shall hear from me. And now, Frederic, let us part at once; you have much to arrange, and your time is short. I too, need rest. To-morrow we shall meet again before your departure; and meanwhile we do but unnerve each other."

"You are perhaps right," said Mortimer irresolutely, "and yet——"

"Not a word more, my own dear cousin, if you would spare me," murmured Gertrude almost inarticulately, and Frederic attempted no further expostulation, but drawing the drooping girl to his bosom, and pressing his lips to her pale brow, he gently replaced her upon her seat, and left the room.

As he disappeared, she swept back her dishevelled hair, fixed a long look of anguish upon her mourning dress, and then bowing her head upon her hands, remained motionless.

He was gone! They had parted, perhaps for ever; for already she had resolved not to expose herself to the trial of the morrow's meeting. He was gone! And where? To forget her and her sorrow in the smiles of Sybil. He, at least, had a haven of happiness in which he could find shelter from the pitiless storms of that world on which she was about to be launched, unknowing upon what bleak shore she might be driven.

She felt like one in a frightful dream; all about her appeared unreal; the floor rocked beneath her feet; and old familiar objects wore a strange aspect that chilled her to the very heart. She almost doubted her identity, and yet, it was all too true; the dimness of her vision passed away; and the truth, the frightful truth, stood cold and bare before her.

Slowly, but steadily, she rose from the sofa, and for a while her hand wandered over the thousand cherished trifles that were strown upon the table before her. Her eyes were tearless, and her lip never quivered. Hers was the very desolation of the spirit to which tears are refused!

CHAPTER XIX.

"My Dear Niece,—

"You have acted prudently, and properly. You cannot, and must not, remain one day longer than is absolutely indispensable under the same roof with your unmarried cousin. A young woman's reputation is like a sheet of white paper, and people are ready enough to scrawl upon it when they can.

"I am glad, for your own sake, that Mrs. Mortimer has behaved so handsomely; for there is no blessing like independence. It has been the comfort of my own life, that I am independent of every body.

"I hope that you are not a beauty—I detest beauties—and that you are not a gad-about; I never go out except to church; and not often even there, owing to my deafness. If you are notable, we shall get on famously together, for I have a great respect for the useful; and where people are not over rich they must be managing.

"I have given orders to have all prepared for you, so you will have no trouble when you arrive, and will have time to look round.

"Drop me a line to say when I may expect you; and keep up your spirits, for I have long learned the folly of fretting for what cannot be mended.

"Travel as cheaply as you can; money spent upon the road leaves nothing to show for it, and is waste at best. When I travelled I always carried a provision-basket, and found it a great saving.

"As we shall so soon meet, I shall reserve all further advice for future occasions; and only add, with my respects to your cousin, that I am,

"Your affectionate aunt,

"Martha Warrington.

"P.S. I opened my letter to bid you wrap up carefully. Sore throats are easily caught at this time of the year."

Gertrude gasped for breath. She had once more a home, and she was thankful. It is true, that a few words of consolation and sympathy would have cheered her shrinking spirit; but there was at least kindness in the quiet and matter-of-course manner in which her unknown relative had at once opened her house, if not her heart. The style of the letter was dry and quaint; but still it gave little clue to the real character of the writer.

The caution of old age, and the prudence of parsimony, were indeed apparent; but beyond these, the orphan could gather nothing upon which to hinge a single idea of the real disposition of her aunt; and these were naturally so have been anticipated under the circumstances. Taken altogether the prospect was not a cheering one; but it nevertheless held out a certainty of protection and security which excited her gratitude, and aroused her from the torpor into which she had fallen since the departure of her cousin.

She felt that no time was to be lost, and she resolved to obey the directions of her new mistress to the letter. Earnestly, therefore, she commenced her simple preparations. Every thing that she possessed she owed to the generosity of her departed aunt; and now, when she was about to quit for ever the home of her lost happiness, she felt as though her ownership in all had ceased.

In vain did the weeping Roberts entreat and expostulate; Gertrude was firm. One by one she rejected the proffered eleganees which she had been accustomed to call her own; replacing each in its proper position, and scrupulously refusing to herself the gratification of retaining the most trifling object not absolutely necessary to her personal comfort.

The pang was at once bitter and complicated, for most of these had been the cherished treasures of long years; but not the less were they all abandoned. Tears swelled in her eyes as she turned away from the instrument which had been a birth-day gift; from the work-frame at which she had so sedulously wrought beside her gentle aunt; the books that she had loved, the flowers that she had tended. She cared little for the costly baubles with which she had so often been adorned, for they reflected only hours of empty gaiety and vain display; but all that spoke to her of a companionship and an affection for ever lost, wrung her heart almost to bursting.

At length all was ready: the modest packages were made; the chaise which was to convey her to the country town, whence the coach in which she was to travel to her destination took its departure, was ordered for the morrow; and then, and only then, she sat down to acquaint Mortimer with her proceedings. To have done so earlier would have been to summon him home only to renew a parting which to her had already been a trial almost beyond her strength; to have, perhaps, subjected herself to receive him as her companion during the journey; and thus to have prolonged her sufferings, and incurred the risk of exciting the displeasure of Miss Warrington, who had evidently been unprepared for such an arrangement.

Had she been less absorbed by grief, it is probable that she might have displayed less firmness; but there is a recklessness in actual anguish which causes all minor considerations to be unheeded; and thus the timid and tenderly nurtured orphan, who had never hitherto moved from her home without the protecting escort of her aunt, now calmly prepared to set forth on a long and weary journey, alone and self-dependent.

For the last time, she wandered in silence and sorrow about the grounds; for the last time, she flung herself upon her knees beside the bed upon which her loved protectress had so lately lain stretched in death; and for the last time, she lingered at the door of her cousin's room, and remembered how proudly and how joyously she had decked it out with flowers, when he returned to his home, and to the hearts of those who had so long awaited him. Alas! for what! Then, came the parting with the old and attached servants, who had known and loved her from her childhood; and she had to part from one and all with a closed hand; but she meekly explained her inability to repay their affection by aught save words and wishes, for which they blessed her as she went; and she at length flung herself into the chaise; and, drawing down the blinds, wept unrestrainedly, as she was borne away from her home—her friends—her memories—and her hopes.

Poor Gertrude! The measure of her misery was full. She had drained the cup of bitterness to its very lees; and still she was like a seared autumnal leaf, driven onward, she knew not where; the very spot of fate.

Nothing can be told of such a journey. What were its petty annoyances, its puerile difficulties, its coarse inconveniences to her! She had a more perfect antidote against all outlay either of anxiety or money than even the basket of the thrifty Miss Warrington, in the heart-sickness which made her careless of all personal indulgences.

And so she travelled on day and night, unconscious of fatigue, and only aroused to the necessity of sustaining nature by the officious suggestions of her fellow-passengers; nor did she shrink away even from the ungenial contact with the voluble and the busy, or from the unaccustomed food which was placed before her; she neither heard the first, nor heeded the second. Her thoughts and her memories were alike her only companions.

At last, her dreary pilgrimage was over, as the coach stopped at a wayside inn, to change horses, where a peasant lad civilly inquired if one Miss Mortimer were a passenger; and, having received an affirmative reply from the coachman, approached the window, and, touching his hat, announced himself as her guide to Bletchley, which lay off the main road.

A short note from her aunt, desiring her to follow the messenger and to leave her luggage at the inn until the evening, when she would send a car to transport it to its destination, left her no alternative; and, alighting from the vehicle, worn and weary as she was, she prepared for this new exertion.

Ere she had walked many minutes, however, she felt thankful that it was necessary, for her way lay through rich fields ripening for the harvest; then, bounded a pleasant copse, where the nuts hung in clusters above her head; and, finally, led her along the margin of a little stream, whose ripple ran cool and bright over a bed of pebbles. The birds were singing merrily in the boughs, the sun was shining cheerily in the heavens, and the soft breeze bathed her fevered forehead in freshness.

What a relief was this from the stifling atmosphere, and the noisy discomfort of the moving prison in which she had been so long immured! Wretched as she was, she felt the bland and blessed influence of nature; and, as her rustic guide trudged on silently beside her, she strove to shake off her depression, and to make an effort to meet her new friend with composure and self-command.

On any other occasion, the fatigue of such a walk would have overcome the slender strength of the orphan; but now it gave her time for reflection; and, as they approached the village, she remarked with delight the modest church, half overgrown with ivy, which stood apart upon the summit of a gentle rise, at whose base the rivulet wound placidly along; while its downward slope was studded with the humble graves of the villagers, and grazed by innumerable sheep. All seemed calm and peaceful; and, save where one straggling street formed an ungraceful line in the centre of the picture, the modest cottages peeped out, each from its nest of leaves, and she already found herself wishing that in one of these she was about to find her home.

It was, consequently, with a feeling akin to disappointment, that she saw her guide make directly for the central street; and, after having traversed it to a third of its length, open the gate of a dingy, grim, brick house, separated from the pathway by a stripe of gravel enclosed within an iron palisade. Her heart swelled, and her spirit once more sank; but this revulsion of feeling was happily interrupted by the apparition of a female figure upon the threshold. It was evident that some one had been watching for her arrival; and the very fact conveyed a welcome.

This conviction lent her new energy; and, when the extended hand and the feeble voice convinced her that she had interpreted its meaning aright, she could only murmur out a few inarticulate words as she suffered herself to be led into the dwelling.

She had just left the balmy fields, the benignant sunshine, and the fresh breeze of heaven, beneath which her heart had expanded, and her sorrows had for a while been hushed; and again she suddenly found herself surrounded by gloom, and that bleak discomfort which strikes upon the sense even before the eye has become cognisant of its cause. But she repressed the sigh which was rising to her lips, as she endeavored to reply to the friendly greeting with which she was received. Miss Warrington had again sunk into her chair, as she entered the apartment; and it was not until she had slowly removed her bonnet, that Gertrude ventured to glance towards her new protectress.

When she did do so, her eye fell upon a tall and meagre form, so rigidly upright that the attitude was almost painful to contemplate, from the impression of restraint which it produced. It seemed impossible that any emotion, however powerful, could relax the rigid sinews of the frame, or the hard muscles of the countenance; while every fold of the tightly-fitting and dingy black dress, and every plait in the snowy neckerchief and cap, appeared to partake of the same precision. The gray hair was banded smoothly over a forehead upon which long years and worldly trials had alike failed to impress a wrinkle; while the dim eyes, the long straight nose, and the tightly-compressed and slender lips, completed a picture little calculated to inspire other feelings than those of timidity and apprehension.

And the frame was worthy of the picture.

The apartment was low and dark; and it was easy to perceive that every article of furniture had occupied its present position from the moment in which it had become the property of its owner; the heavy and unwieldy chairs appeared to have grown to the walls against which they were ranged in straight lines and even distances; the antique table, with its claw feet, had worn a dint into the floor, and its polished surface was guiltless of a stain; the tall bureau loomed dark and rigid in a recess beside the fire: and not one vestige of actual inhabitation, not one trace of the every-day occupation which lend a grace and a gladness to every home, however humble, of which they form a part, was perceptible throughout the room.

Gertrude had nerved herself to encounter poverty and privation; but this utter absence of all the minor elegances which help to throw a veil over the sternest trials of life, struck her to the very heart; and its effect was the greater, because it was an evil for which she had been totally unprepared. An open book, a single flower, would have removed the impression; but neither book nor flower was to be seen in the little parlor of Miss Warrington. All was cold, and bleak, and desolate.

An instant sufficed for this ungenial survey; and then, shivering with a chill which seemed to be coursing through her veins like a stream of ice, the unhappy Gertrude withdrew her eyes from the blank around her to fix them once more upon her companion.

The old lady had, meanwhile, been as busily occupied in examining the person of her niece; and it would have been easy for any one, accustomed to interpret the expression of her almost inflexible countenance, to discover that she was not entirely satisfied with the result. She became, if possible, a line more upright; her thin lips were drawn a degree more tightly together; and her bony fingers were more closely clasped. Even through the dimness of her failing sight, she had already ascertained that her new inmate was a beauty!

The first solecism of poor Gertrude was an attempt to place her bonnet, which she had held for a considerable time in her hand while answering the inquiries of her aunt regarding her journey, upon the uncovered table.

"You will excuse me, my dear Miss Mortimer," said the old lady, as she solemnly waved her back with her hand, "but I do not allow anything to be placed upon that table, until I am assured that it is free from dust, and can do no mischief. As we are to live together, we had better understand each other at once. If your bonnet fatigues you, be good enough to place it upon a chair."

Gertrude obeyed in silence. Her heart was wrung.

"I have no doubt that we shall get on very well before long," pursued Miss Warrington, "that is, as I remarked in my letter, if you are simple and quiet in your habits; as, indeed, under your present circumstances, you will require to be. Method is everything: it is by method that I have lived respectably upon my slender income, as becomes one who is a gentlewoman by birth; and it is by method only that you will learn to do the same. But now, I dare say, you will be glad to go to your own room, and rest yourself after your journey. You will find all prepared. I have, indeed, gone to some slight expense in order to make you comfortable; but you are welcome to all that I can do, and I hope that you will approve of my arrangements."

Gertrude faltered out her thanks; and the old lady having rung a hand-bell which stood within reach, she hastily snatched up her bonnet, and followed the staid middle-aged servant by whom the summons was answered, up a dark and narrow flight of stairs; and, with a feeling of relief impossible to describe, at length found herself alone in the apartment which had been allotted to her.

Her first impulse was to cast herself upon her knees, to implore strength and support in her coming trials; and to offer up the mute thanksgivings of her spirit for the home which had received her, when she might have been a desolate wanderer in the wilderness of the world. This duty performed, she rose and glanced with some interest round the narrow room that was now her own. All was scrupulously clean and orderly; the uncurtained bed was covered with a counterpane of snowy whiteness; the painted table was similarly adorned, the solitary window was draped with festoons of dimity, and overlooked a garden shaded by tall old trees; the mantel was decorated with an oval piece of satin embroidery, representing the parting of Hector and Andromache, in a black frame; and the walls had been newly whitewashed.

Poor and rude as all these arrangements were, Gertrude, nevertheless felt grateful; and endeavored to believe that she should soon cease to regret the absence of the elegance to which she had been accustomed, in the luxury of solitude. It was the daily and hourly demand upon her feelings in the society of her aunt which appalled her; for she had already seen enough to be convinced that they had not a habit or a sentiment in common.

Once shut into the little room which was to be her own, she believed that she should find strength in the very extremity of her isolation; and as she contemplated the luxuriant foliage which made a twilight in the apartment, she remembered Westrum and its embowering trees, and she felt that she yet possessed one source of rational enjoyment.

Long, therefore, ere she was summoned to the tea-table of Miss Warrington she had recovered sufficient calm to meet her, with at least apparent cheerfulness; and she made the effort the more readily, that she was conscious how little her sorrow was likely to be met with sympathy; and how much it might be misconstrued, and perhaps resented.

Old age is apt to attach an undue importance to the brilliant futilities of life, and to suspect others of prizing them at an equal price; and thus the sorrows of the heart, even while they reject or overlook such considerations, are frequently mistaken for the mortifications of vanity, and provoke rather animadversion than pity.

Even inexperienced as she was, Gertrude intuitively felt this truth; and conscious that her new protectress must be well aware of the change which she could not fail to discover between the affluence to which she had been accustomed, and the comparative penury to which she was now condemned, she saw at once that it behoved her to display no disappointment or inconvenience from the transition.

To the meek and unselfish nature of the orphan this was easy; for to personal privation she was indifferent. It was the moral coercion which she foresaw that alarmed her; that bare and whitewashed room would have been to her a paradise, could she only have been assured that there her life could have been spent; but this she knew to be impossible; other duties awaited her, and these must be performed at any cost.

It was, however, with a sensation of pleasure that she found herself introduced into a less formal apartment than that in which she had at first been received; when, after having smoothed her hair and bathed her eyes, she again descended from her chamber. True, all was chilly, formal, and methodical, in this new parlor also, but still it was less appalling than the state-room, which had evidently been opened in honor of her arrival. The gaunt bureau was replaced by a small writing-table; the chairs were capable of transport; and upon the table stood the cheerful tea-equipage, flanked by a pair of candles; while upon a set of swinging shelves suspended from the wall, rested half-a-dozen volumes, of divers degrees of antiquity.

Miss Warrington, in a roomy and upright chair of time-polished mahogany, was already established before the tea-tray, as rigid, as passionless, and as correct as before; but the accent in which she invited her guest to seat herself was kind, and even gracious.

"Your baggage has arrived, my dear niece," she said, as Gertrude ventured to approach a chair, "and by this time to-morrow you will be quite at home. For a while, at least, you will have no leisure to be dull; for this is a busy season at Bletchley. We have preserves to make, and wine; and I have no doubt that you will willingly relieve me of so great a responsibility."

"I almost fear———" commenced Gertrude timidly.

"Fear what?" asked the old lady, somewhat sharply, as her pinched lips became thinner and closer: "Surely you do not mean to say that you are ignorant of so simple an accomplishment?"

"I must, I believe, plead guilty to this ignorance, my dear madam," replied the orphan with a sad smile; "but I shall rejoice to learn all that you may be kind enough to teach me."

The first feeling of Miss Warrington was evidently one of intense surprise and displeasure; but this was soon rebuked by the submissive manner of her young relative.

"Well, well," she said encouragingly, "the fault is perhaps not your own; and if you are indeed willing, as you say, to learn, it may still be repaired. But, bless me, Miss Mortimer, how did you employ your time?"

"In reading, madam, in painting, or with my instrument, or my needle."

"Then you can work? That at least is something, and may be made useful in every family; but reading, painting, and playing, are mere waste of time, and can be turned to no account. I have no reproach of that kind to make to myself in my old age; and you will do well to avoid it for the future."

Gertrude sighed in silence.

"I am glad to see," pursued the old lady after a pause and still in the same monotonous and sententious accent, "that you are at all events free from the silly love of dress; the amount of your packages has already convinced me of that fact."

"I have brought with me, madam, merely my mourning," replied Gertrude, devouring the tears which forced themselves into her eyes, "nor do I apprehend that I shall ever wish to throw it off."

"And you are right, quite right," said Miss Warrington, totally misapprehending the sentiment of the assurance; "With good management nothing is more economical than black. I have worn it for years, and therefore speak from experience. Fortunately, we have no shops at Bletchley—at least, none of those shops that are the Vanity-fair at which young women barter their prudence for finery. We are quiet people at Bletchley, and have nothing to do with the idle nonsense of fashion."

And so passed the evening; wearisome and flat, and almost interminable. Not a sentence was spoken by the lady of the house which did not bear some reference to that gnawing, grinding, ever-present necessity, which is enforced by slender means coupled with the pretension of gentility. Every action, every thought, and every effort, was ruled by the one leading principle; all were to tend to the same object; nothing was to be said, or devised, or undertaken, which did not acknowledge as its aim, the furtherance of some petty economy, or some puerile saving.

Gertrude was bewildered. She felt like one in a new world; and her spirit quailed under the consciousness of her utter inability to comprehend or to assist the views of her enforced associate. Frederic was right. She had indeed talked too lightly of trials which she had never comprehended; of a struggle which she had been unable to foresee. Hers had hitherto been the poetry of life; she was now about to be initiated into its prose.

CHAPTER XX.

The receipt of his cousin's letter at once hastened the return of Mortimer to Westrum, which he reached in the hope that he might anticipate her departure. We have already shown that he failed in his object; nor was his regret lessened by the desolate sensation created by the aspect of a companionless house. Amid all his self-blame—for that he did feel much is certain, however unwilling he might be to admit the fact to himself—his annoyance was, moreover, increased upon perceiving around him every object on which his eyes had been accustomed to rest: and of which he was well aware that Gertrude was the actual owner. There stood her piano—and he knew the value she had attached to it; here were her books—the chosen friends of her retirement—nay, the key placed in his hand by the weeping Roberts, and which opened a small inlaid cabinet, the bequest of his dead father to a niece whom he loved as a child, soon convinced him that, even to the graceful ornaments which all women prize so highly, she had left everything behind.

For a time, Mortimer felt as though there were a tacit reproach in this self-denudation on the part of his absent cousin; but a moment's reflection enabled him to do her better justice; and he was deeply impressed by the intuitive delicacy of her proceeding.

His first care was to give earnest instructions to Mrs. Roberts to cause everything, however trifling which had been the property of her young mistress, to be carefully collected; and, this done, he accompanied the willing waiting-woman through the principal apartments, and bade her point out every object for which she had heard his cousin profess any preference or regard, and add them to the rest. The packages were then made; and the heart of Frederic felt lighter as he saw them driven from the door.

During his ramble through the grounds that evening, he was almost happy in the knowledge that Gertrude would find comfort and consolation in the accustomed objects thus restored to her; and as the deer, wearied of waiting for the kind notice of their gentle mistress, approached him to claim his caress, and appeared to demand, with their mild eyes, tidings of their missing playmate, he almost smiled as he responded to their mute but intelligent inquiry.

Poverty could not now subject his cousin to every species of privation; and the period of her exile must soon terminate; for had not Sybil, his own high-hearted Sybil, reminded him that her proper home would soon be beneath his own roof? Frederic had forgotten that women seldom forgive even a shadow of rivalry.

The letter which he had despatched to Gertrude to announce the departure of her property, was almost buoyant; for, delighted to have thus, in some degree, made compensation for his other short-comings, he forgot in the prospect of her temporary gratulation, the more enduring evils by which she was surrounded; and, after reproaching her for leaving Westrum without affording him the opportunity of accompanying her to her new residence, he reminded her that ere long, he should reclaim her at the hands of her present hostess; and painted the future in colors bright enough to scare her spirit as she contrasted them with the ues of the present; and felt the utter impossibility of their ultimate realization.

It was consequently, in an eviable frame of mind that he started, on the following morning for The Grange. Sybil was not yet apprised of his arrival, of which he had abstained from acquainting her, anxious to enjoy, to the fullest extent, the delight of her surprise; but, before we accompany him to this new meeting with his affianced bride, we must conduct our readers to the luxurious abode of the proud beauty, and introduce them to a new acquaintance.

Among the other characteristics of the pleasure-grounds of The Grange, was a long walk fringed with superb laurels, which traversed an exotic shrubbery at some distance from the house, and formed a delightful retreat during the more sultry portion of the day.

As Mortimer was leaving Westrum, two persons entered the walk, one of whom was Miss Delamere, and the other a stranger, upon whose arm she leaned, as in earnest and engrossing conversation, they moved slowly forward.

There was a singular expression of mingled triumph and apprehension on the brow of Sybil, while the features of her companion wore a restless and anxious look, totally at variance with his apparent character. He was a tall and finely-formed man of about thirty years of age, with large light-blue eyes, fair hair, arranged after a foreign fashion, a marked and somewhat salient nose, and a beard closely cut, and encircling his chin, a mode now designated en collier but which was, at that period, totally unknown in England. A decided air of fashion, and even of pretension, could be detected through the extreme, but evidently studied simplicity of his dress and bearing; and there was an expression of haughty supercilliousness about his mouth, which he found it impossible at intervals to suppress.

"And you are really happy, Sybil?" were the first words he uttered after a pause, during which his eyes had been rivetted upon the fairy-like form of his companion.

"Certainly."

"I dare not believe it possible."

"And wherefore?"

"Because you once loved me. Deny it not: you loved me."

"Is this intended as an insult, Sir Horace?" asked Miss Delamere, as she suddenly paused, and withdrawing her hand from his arm, looked proudly into his face.

"Pshaw!" muttered the stranger through his clenched teeth, at the same time re-possessing himself of the liberated hand, and again leading her forward; "Do you connect the idea of insult with your love? Be more rational, charming Sybil. You are conscious that there is no great pleasure to be derived from dwelling upon the past for either of us; but this slight reference was necessary. You are too clever a tactitian, too accomplished a woman of the world, to imagine for a moment that it is simply curiosity which had led me to intrude upon you on this occasion. You cannot think it, and must be well able to solve the riddle. Tell me then, why am I here?"

"I am no Œdipus," was the cold reply; but the heart of the lady beat tumultuously, and her eye fell as she compelled herself to answer: "You must e'en play the Sphinx yourself."

"You will not help me to a solution?"

"I cannot."

"Nay, then, since you are resolved, I know you well enough to feel all the fruitlessness of persisting further—and yet your woman-heart—"

"Has ceased to control my reason," interposed Miss Delamere. "I have learned the fallacy of imagination, and am now content to abide by realities."

"But are you quite sure that you are really doing this? I confess that to me, your whole existence here appears only a graceful fiction. Sybil, you are no common being; but even you may be too adventurous."

"Would you assume the right to control my actions?"

"By no means; I am not so rash. If I found it impossible to do so when I possessed that right, I should scarcely venture to make the attempt now. But I confess that when I remember the slender amount of the wreck of your father's fortune, and the exact addition which was made to it, I cannot comprehend the splendor by which you are surrounded."

"Miracles may be wrought even in the nineteenth century," said Miss Delamere quietly.

"So I perceive; but will not the bubble burst?"

"Before I answer your question, you are bound to answer mine. What brings you here?"

The gentleman did not immediately reply; but, after the pause of an instant, said resolutely: "A passion which I cannot overcome."

"And yet," faltered Sybil, evidently panting with emotion, "after what has passed—"

"True; after what has passed, you have a right to be astonished at my presence; and yet, Sybil, you must feel at once that where you have been loved, you never can be forgotten."

"You are complimentary."

"I am, at least, sincere. You have seen fit to make yourself the centre of a social pageant; nor shall I attempt to fathom your motives. Only this much I may venture to remark—that be your reasons what they may, the farce which you have put upon the stage must soon be played out. Do not persist, therefore, in what may ultimately prove a ruinous error; but let me drop the curtain, while the audience are still dazzled by the effect of your machinery."

"You speak in enigmas. Is your haughty mother cognizant of this new caprice?"

"Call it what you please," said her companion, as he clasped in his own the small hand that rested on his arm, "I will not cavil with you for words. No, bella è cara, my mother knows not that I am here; knows not, in fact, that I am in England; nor will she even be aware that I have left Florence, if you consent to my wishes, so rapidly will we wing our way back."

A singular expression passed over the eloquent features of his listener, as she asked somewhat bitterly: "And your suspicions—how are they to be laid at rest?"

"I must exert my philosophy," was the reply, but the tone in which it was uttered implied more uneasiness than pleasantry. "A year hence, Sybil, and from what I see around me, I am quite aware that you must be penniless. You will tell me, perhaps, that the lovely face, now so proudly turned towards me, will prevent such a climax; but do not deceive yourself. The fates only know why you have chosen a wilderness like this for so gorgeous a display, or what benefit you expect to derive from it; for here there cannot exist a single being capable of appreciating you; I will not say capable of loving you, for you have placed yourself upon too lofty a pedestal to encourage such advances; and, moreover, I know you to care little for exciting such a feeling."

"And yet I once loved you."

Her companion shook his head. "That you deceived yourself for a time into the belief, I will concede," he said gravely; "but the result proved your mistake. Remember why, and how we parted."

"My necessities compelled me to the concession," murmured Sybil, as the hot blood burnt upon her cheek.

"Why will you wilfully misunderstand me?" he asked impatiently. "You know well that I made no allusion which could wound your pride —mine was a mere question of feeling."

"Be it so," said Miss Delamere; "and now?"

"Now, I would remind you how devotedly, how earnestly I loved you; and with what reluctance I lent myself to the wishes of my family, even after I discovered that it was in vain to hope that I could ever inspire you with an equally absorbing passion. Yes, Sybil, even then, I loved you, although I could no longer shut my eyes to the fact that vanity was with you more powerful than affection; and that—but enough—I am not here to reproach, but to convince you that, in my breast, at least, affection was no feint; and that I am still as much your slave as ever."

"Do not believe it," said Miss Delamere scornfully: "I have no faith in the constancy of your sex. I should as soon endeavor to write on the wave, or ride upon the wind, as to rely upon the permanence of any passion, however violent. No, no, Sir Horace; you, who were scared by a phantom, when I was unscathed by a single breath, cannot now, in sober earnestness, come to claim the hand which you formerly rejected."

"I come to reclaim the heart."

Sybil started. A shiver ran through her veins; her pale lips parted, but she could not articulate a syllable.

"You tremble, Sybil," continued her companion; "and yet, what can you fear? Look dispassionately at our mutual position. I am free and wealthy. My presence here to-day must convince you of the extent of my love. You are madly braving a certain and a swift-coming destruction, from which I would fain save you. It were idle to expose the reasons which render it impossible that I should offer you my name; but my heart, Sybil—that heart which you first taught to feel, is all your own. Will you reject its homage?"

"And this to a woman whom you once sought to make your wife!"

"Even so. Do not let us enact a melodrama, Sybil. To the world be what you please. Make of yourself, if you will, the presiding genius of the Aladdin's garden which you have created about you, and induce those who visit it to believe that every leaf and every blossom is a gem; but to me be honest. Had I heard of you in a remote retirement, shunning the eyes of the world, and anxious to escape not only the influence, but also the temptations of the past, I should have endeavored to forget you; but as, even in my foreign home, I traced you step by step, fondly lingering in the shadow of my blighted affection, and learned alike with wonder and incredulity the inexplicable nature of your proceedings, I began to hope that you would not again meet me unmoved; but that———"

"Why do you pause, Sir Horace? You see that I listen calmly."

"In short, Sybil," faltered her companion, "I taught myself to believe that, recklessly as you might rush upon your own ruin, you would no willingly involve your mother in the same suffering; but that I should be able to induce you to spurn the comments of a world by which you had already been wounded; and to restore both yourself and her to legitimate affluence."

The self-command exhibited by Miss Delamere as she listened, was almost frightful. Her lips were ashy pale, and the veins about the temples swollen almost to bursting; but her step was steady, and her head erect. It would have been impossible from her manner to analyse the feeling by which she was possessed.

"Have I deceived myself, Sybil?" pursued the low passionate voice; "Will not you be mine as I have loved to dream? A life of devotion shall repay the sacrifice; you shall not breathe a wish, you shall not indulge a vision which I will not hasten to gratify. Speak, dearest; do I plead in vain?"

A strange wild smile flickered upon the lip of Miss Delamere; and, encouraged by her silence, and an expression which he misinterpreted, her companion ventured to throw his arm about her waist. He encountered no resistance; but as he drew her towards him, a bitter and hollow laugh broke from her lips as, bending her head, she whispered in his ear—

"Neither ruin nor disgrace await me, Sir Horace Trevor; I am an affianced wife!"

Then, turning upon him a look of haughty defiance, she withdrew herself from his clasp only, however, to perceive, at a distance of a few paces, Mortimer, evidently overpowered by emotion, standing directly in her path.

For an instant she quailed, but only for an instant; in the next she advanced towards him with a radiant smile and an extended hand, exclaiming blandly:

"Ha! you are welcome, truant. I was just beginning to weary of my newly-arrived cousin, who is practising all his pretty fascinations upon me on his way to one whom he loves better. And when did you return? Do not venture to tell me that you have been more than an hour at Westrum, lest I resent so gla

g a proof of indifference towards the friends ho have been long and anxiously awaiting our re-appearance. And now I must make ou known to my relative, Sir Horace Trevor; he admiration of our sex, and the envy of his wn. Horace, this is Mr. Mortimer, of whom e were just speaking."

Frederic had instinctively clasped the hand hich had been extended to him, but he did not tain it; and as they were successively named, he gentlemen exchanged a cold and haughty ow, which augured unfavorably for their future good understanding.

At a single glance Miss Delamere thoroughly ppreciated the inimical feeling with which hey met; and, uncertain of the extent of what lortimer might have seen or heard before she ecame aware of his presence, she hastened o introduce an irrelevant subject of conversaion.

"And thus you are still wedded to Florence, Horace," she said, as if pursuing a former topic; and fully purpose an immediate return there? n truth, I am by no means astonished at your esolution. You know that with me, also, beauiful Italy has always been a favorite dream."

"Then why not return there?"

Sybil stole a glance at Frederic, who was walkng silently by her side, ere she replied with a mile—

"My movements are not always under the ontrol of my wishes; many things may occur o prevent such an expatriation—at least for the resent."

"What woman wills, fate wills," said Sir Horace with emphasis; "and especially when that woman is Sybil Delamere."

"Alas! how well you know to the contrary."

"Certainly not from my experience of the past. You may have thwarted the projects of others; but I believe that you have in general been tolerably successful in accomplishing your own."

"Et tu, Brute!" exclaimed the lady with a light laugh, which, however, failed to disguise altogether a certain feeling of anxiety and restlessness; "but I ought to have remembered that it is dangerous to tilt against you in a war of wits. Talk, therefore, if you please, of any one rather than of myself, for you will mislead Mr. Mortimer into a belief that I am a very dangerous person; an idea which I am very sure has never yet occurred to him."

"I congratulate your friend upon the personal qualifications which have enabled him to remain blind to the fact," replied Trevor sarcastically: "he must be possessed of an ample fund of talent and amiability, to work such a miracle as that of encountering alone and unrestrictedly the fascinations which turned the heads of half London; and even then despised the limited extent of their power. You did not know Miss Delamere in town, Mr. Mortimer; immersed in pleasure, surrounded by adorers, and the very arbitress of fashion; or you would have feared to approach her here, where you were exposed to the whole artillery of her blandishments. Do not be deluded into the belief that she is to be encountered with impunity. I—her cousin—warn you of her error."

Sybil bit her lip; and Mortimer, still too much irritated to trust himself with words, answered only by a slight bend, and Miss Delamere passed her hand through his arm, and leaned upon it, as though she clung to him for support.

"Truly this Grange affair is a strange whim," pursued the incorrigible Trevor; "I leave you in a crowd; yourself the busiest mote quivering in the sunbeam, and I find you here buried in like a delinquent nun, between four walls."

"I was weary of the turmoil to which you allude."

"Weary!" echoed her interlocutor; "Not so, fair lady; if I know anything of human nature, and above all, of woman nature. Your sex only weary of the world when it has wearied of them; and all those who look you in the face will feel the impossibility of such an effect in your case."

"You have faith in nothing," replied Sybil gaily.

"I have heard," was the retort; "that a stricken deer always flies to the covert to die."

"While I,"—interposed Miss Delamere, making a violent effort to control her emotion; "sought the solitude of the country in order really to live; for my previous state of being was mere empty existence. I was like one who had never looked upon a sun-rise; and who knew not the marvellous blessings and the glorious privileges to be obtained by those who really seek them."

"Better and better! You philosophize. I am delighted that I ventured thus to invade your retreat, for I shall leave you a wiser and a happier woman. Thus, then, you have blotted out the past, and now live only in the future?"

"You read me admirably."

"And am I to declare this to poor Captain Fitz—what was his name?—whose head you turned for a whole month, and whose heart was only saved from destruction by the fact of its having already been regularly broken once or twice every season for the last five years."

"You may declare it to a whole military phalanx."

"But not to Prince Gustave, surely, Sybil?"

Despite all her self-command, the hand of the lady trembled upon the arm that supported it, and her eyes flashed with irritation; but the expression of triumph which she read upon the features of Trevor made her rally in a moment; and it was with an affectation of interest which betrayed her inward emotion that she exclaimed.

"Ha! Apropos of the poor young Prince—where is he now parading his listlessness? I have not heard of him since I left town."

"We have been residing together in Florence."

"Together!" echoed Sybil with a start, and evidently for once thrown off her guard.

"E'perche non, la mia bella?" asked Sir Horace; "Did you not encourage our acquaintance? And could you believe me to be formed of so coarse a clay as to be unable to appreciate the delicate porcelain of your exquisite friend?"

Mortimer listened in silence, but Miss Delamere could feel the violent throbbing of his heart as she walked beside him. Fortunately he had not been required to join in a conversation which turned upon persons with whom he was unacquainted; but this exemption had only enabled him the more fully to note every word which had been uttered by either party; and the longer he listened, the more painfully he felt in how false a position he stood as regarded the past life of the woman to whom he was about to unite his fate. Moreover, the manner of Sir Horace towards Sybil displeased him. It is true, he was her cousin; but even that relationship, close as it was, did not appear to Frederic to justify the supercilious and almost accusing tone in which he sometimes addressed her. There was a levity, also, in his allusions, which implied a want of respect for her dignity; if not actually for her feelings. Either she had loved these men who were now so lightly mentioned; or she had trifled with them, and thus given him a licence to couple her name with theirs; and in either case, how was his idol fallen?

He thought of his buried mother, and sighed.

His companions still talked on, but he listened no longer. His whole soul was in the past—that past which was to him a mystery and a blank. Could it be that Sybil, whom he had believed to be above the weaknesses and the errors of her sex, had frittered away her youth in those heartless and puerile affectations of attachment, which merely gratify the vanity without awakening the feelings; but which, nevertheless, wear the bloom of purity from the spirit, and harden it into worldliness, while rendering it for ever afterwards incapable of a deep and honest passion? Or had she, indeed, loved so absorbingly, that her heart had become a waste; and that those who knew best were conscious that they could not pain her by allusions from which others of her sex would instinctively have shrunk? Vainly did he ask himself these questions. They could be answered only by a knowledge of the past.

One thing was evident. Sybil had been one of the gayest votaries of fashion—courted, admired, and adulated; and she had suddenly withdrawn herself from the world, and buried herself in the country, where she was an utter stranger. What could have induced such a resolution? It could not have been any diminution of homage, for she was still young, beautiful, and brilliant; while it was equally apparent that the sacrifice had not been made from prudential motives; as she had, on her arrival at The Grange, at once entered upon a course of almost reckless expenditure, which implied no pecuniary anxieties. Hitherto, Mortimer had never speculated upon the subject. It had been Sybil's pleasure to act thus; and he was grateful for any caprice which had brought them together; but now a doubt of he knew not what crept over him; and the words of his mother rose before him in characters of fire. A thousand confused ideas and vague misgivings floated across his brain. He felt as though his affection had been wronged and trifled with; that Sybil was not what he had believed her to be; and as he moved forward, instinctively obeying the impulse of the beautiful hand which still rested upon his arm, he was conscious of an irritation which he struggled to conceal.

Ere long, however, Miss Delamere was struck by the altered expression of his countenance, and apprehensive that the conversation of her new guest had impressed him to her disadvantage, she hastened with her usual tact, to turn it upon himself, well aware that the mention of his own name could not fail to arouse him from his untimely reverie, and judging by its effect upon his physiognomy, that she must at once adopt a bold measure in order to counteract its influence, and retain her hold upon his honor.

"Yes!" she said, in reply to some observation of her more loquacious companion: "Therein, at least, you are quite right, and Mr. Mortimer himself is a breathing evidence of the truth of your remark."

Frederic started as he heard himself named and once more he listened with attention.

"How so?" asked Sir Horace, listlessly. "Are the gay deceivers of our sex to be found upon every soil? Surely here, at least, you should have escaped."

"And yet I have done the very reverse," said Miss Delamere, in a tone of light gaiety which grated unpleasantly upon the ear of her lover; "I buried myself as you see, in order to live entirely for my own fancies and feelings, but my star had willed it otherwise, and I only rushed upon my fate."

"And am I to imply that Mr. Mortimer is that fate?"

"I must even permit you to do so; but believe me, that fault has not been my own. You would not imagine, Horace, to look at him, calm and placid as he appears, that he has far more strength of character than yourself; and yet so it is. When I arrived at Westrum, I not only made his acquaintance, but that of his betbrothed wife, a cousin, born and educated for the express purpose of rendering him the happiest man on earth. By the way, how is it that you men never will be content to be happy save after your own fashion? You can imagine nothing prettier, or more gentle, or more guileless, than the fair betrothed, and yet he has seen fit to overthrow all the family arrangements, and to lay his heart upon a less worthy altar."

"You are modest, my sweet kinswoman. But how did you accomplish this transition?"

"Have I not already told you that the fault was not my own? In vain did I represent to him the imprudence of thwarting his mother's wishes. In vain did I counsel, argue, and even frown, all was of no avail. He was still rash enough to persist. Were you not, Frederic?" and she turned towards him with a smile for which, only on the previous day, he would have forfeited a year of existence.

Now, however, even that smile could not overcome the feeling produced by the indelicacy of such a communication, made in such a tone. Shocked by her levity, Mortimer could only stammer out a few disjointed words; but, affecting to understand from these that he assented to her assertion, she continued without any change of manner,—

"Thus then, you see that I must stand ac

q tted, although in endeavoring to restore him this reason, I contrived to lose my own: and nv you will probably be better able to understad why I have ceased to regret town and it gaieties. For pleasure I mean to exchange happiness, and to substitute affection for ad-nation."

Mr. Mortimer little suspects how many ene-ns he will have succeeded in making. Like tl brothers who peopled earth by flinging stes behind them, he will soon discover that hhas created a shoal of envious adversaries, wo will never forgive so heinous an act of pi-ry as that of carrying off the brilliant and coved Miss Delamere."

You speak emphatically, Sir Horace," said
Mtimer with a clouded brow.

And I have cause to do so," replied Trevor, cuposedly; "You have disarranged all my on plans also. My errand here was to induce mfair cousin to return with me to Florence, as you have most inauspiciously crossed my
ph. For I should have succeeded, Sybil, shuld I not?"—he asked, with an expression oeye and lip which flooded her brow with crison—"if you had not given Mr. Mortimer a ght to hold you back?"

In any and every case, your failure would hie been signal," said Miss Delamere, with a hightiness which she had not previously dis-pyed towards him; then, as if fearful that she ried too much, she added carelessly: "My mher, as you are aware, detests the water, as is not young enough to make a perpetual primage of her existence. We were about to le Westrum for the continent a short time bk, but my wishes were overruled."

nd again she looked earnestly and affectionaly in the face of Mortimer, as if to recall to hmemory by whom and how they had been cotravened.

till, alike pained, displeased, and disappointed Frederic could only reply by a constrained stle. Willingly would he have found himself ahe, for the pulses of his forehead labored alost to pain, and he felt quite unequal to the eort of taking part in a conversation which jred upon the sensitiveness of his nature;
bt he could not endure the idea of leaving Sil to the society of her cousin, who had alrdy become odious to him. By his officious aearance he had torn away the veil which ner should have been raised, and had revealed to him the woman whom he loved divested of alf the spell by which she had hitherto bn environed. He was conscious, too, that hhad exhibited himself most disadvantage-oly to this supercilious stranger, who not on possessed the privilege of a relationship wch authorized him to become a guest at T Grange, but who was also cognisant of the pt—that past which he now felt must in-fnce all his future life—that past of which he hu until to-day been careless; but which now, pntom-like, scared him as he glanced towards it.

eluctant as he was, however, he felt that the eort must be made. He must return to his dolate home, now doubly desolate, for Gertde was no longer there to welcome him with her meek smile, and her low soft voice, and he must learn to endure the conviction, that while he sat in solitude, brooding over his doubts and apprehensions, his brilliant mistress was bandying sallies and sarcasms with one who had known her from her childhood, and who was evidently in her entire confidence.

Feigning therefore, suddenly to remember an enforced appointment, he drew out his watch, and declaring that he had already exceeded the given time, he hurriedly took his leave; but not before Sybil had tenderly murmured in his ear: "Farewell then, till to-morrow, my own Frederic! Remember how earnestly I shall wait and watch for you."

CHAPTER XXI.

And his home was indeed desolate when he once more entered it. His dinner was served in silence, and removed untouched, and then he was once more alone. Nothing could exceed the feeling of dreariness with which he listened to the sound of his own footsteps, as he paced to and fro in the echoing apartment which had once been glad with fond and cheerful voices, or the loud ticking of the time-piece, which only served to show him how wearily the moments passed along.

Fatigued at length by the monotony of his own movements, he threw himself upon a chair, and abandoned himself to a train of bitter and upbraiding reflections. He could no longer doubt that he had been deceived: that deluded by his vanity, and misled by a headstrong passion, he had become the easy prey of a heartless and manœuvering woman. The pang was a bitter one, and as he remembered the pure and unselfish affection which he had recklessly flung from him, he bowed his head upon his breast, and a tear stole into his eye. For an instant he resolved never to see Sybil again; she was not yet his wife, and he would leave her free to exert her arts upon another victim; but this resolution failed as suddenly as it had been conceived: he might indeed liberate Sybil, but he could not free himself from the spell which she had cast about him. Even now, even at the moment when he mentally acknowledged her probable unworthiness, he was rather inclined to curse the intrusive cousin who had opened his eyes to her demerits, than her in whom they existed. For weal or for woe he felt, indeed, as she herself had expressed it, that Miss Delamere was his fate.

It was too late to contend, his honor was engaged, and she held his happiness in her hands. And then came the soothing memory that she had owned to him a previous affection, so sincere as to have threatened in its failure the very principle of her existence; but still, as she had declared, less deep than that which he had himself inspired. And who would say but that her love for him might obliterate every other passing fancy, and restore her to him, as he had once fondly believed, all his own.

Thus vacillating between his pride and his passion, did Mortimer alternately vow to escape by flight the snare which had been laid for him, and then resolve immediately afterwards to maintain his right over the affections which he had won.

"When once she is really mine," he murmured to himself; "she shall at least renounce all intercourse with this sarcastic cousin, who has suddenly come between us like a blight, and meanwhile, I will watch her narrowly; not a word, not a gesture shall escape me which bears reference to the past. In order to comprehend my position fully, even although by so doing I should but be meeting regret and disappointment on the very threshold of my married live, I will garner up every inference and every illusion: and thus, day by day, and hour by hour, I shall learn something of her past existence—something which may tend to acquit her in my eyes, or which must render me supremely wretched."

In vain did a passing memory bring back his thoughts to Gertrude: her image dwelt with him only as that of a loved sister and a regretted friend, no pulse bounded as he recalled the sweet companionship of past days; Sybil was to him all in all; and even while his reason doubted, and his pride rebelled, the vehemence of his passion continued unabated.

Nevertheless, he resolved on the following day to abstain from visiting The Grange. He had a plausible excuse in the accession of business, which had supervened on the death of his mother; and even amid his anxiety to watch the proceedings of Sybil, he could not overcome his dislike of her cousin.

Accordingly he ordered his horse, and rode leisurely through the green lanes, and over the hills of the neighborhood, suffering the animal to travel at his own pace, and almost to follow his own path; nor was it until upon entering the town on his return that he was aroused from the painful and irritating train of thought, in which he had indulged throughout the ride; but then, indeed, he awoke once more to the realities of the present, as he encountered Miss Delamere and her guest, seated side by side in the little pony phaeton, which the lady was driving with her accustomed ease and skill.

The meeting was constrained on all sides, for the annoyance, even if not the jealousy of Mortimer was at once renewed; while Miss Delamere herself for an instant appeared embarrassed. Nevertheless, with that tact which seldom deserts her sex in any extremity, she was the first to rally, and playfully menacing him with her whip, she exclaimed with a sunny smile, as soon as the necessary greetings were exchanged; "You dare not reproach me, Frederic, for having played the truant, for you must remember that I told you I should expect you at an early hour this morning, and accordingly I waited your appearance until I felt that it was vain to expect you any longer, and therefore I yielded to the entreaties of Sir Horace, who was anxious to see somewhat of the ultima thule to which he had so courageously ventured, and resolved to do the honors of our hills and lanes, not however, without a hope, which is now realized, that we might encounter you upon our way."

"Did I produce the impression of one who intended to intrude a reproach?" asked Mortimer rather coldly.

Sybil looked uneasy.

"You see that my fair cousin is at least prepared to wear her chains meekly, Mr. Mortimer," observed Trevor in his accustomed accent.

"Miss Delamere is too good," was the stiff reply; "but as yet, I have no right to inflict them."

A sob, almost of suffocation, rose to the throat of the lady, of which the bitterness was no diminished as she detected the low but self-gratulatory laugh which escaped her companion.

"And what think you of our Siberia, Sir Horace Trevor?" pursued Mortimer in the same cold tone; "Can you breathe amid these primitive wastes, where the perfumes of fashion have never come? Can you contrive to exist in this wilderness where men dare to vegetate without a previous patent of exclusiveness and ton? Or have you seen enough to induce you to retreat in alarm to a more congenial hemisphere?"

"I like Westrum and its environs vastly," said the baronet with a yawn; "I always had a passion for discoveries, and I begin to hope that I have in reality more rural tastes than I hitherto gave myself credit for possessing. As to living here, I say nothing, but every one condemned to such a fate may at least congratulate himself upon the fact of emulating Truth, which, as some one has somewhere told us, has taken up its residence at the bottom of a well."

"Are you aware that all my property is situated in this country, Sir Horace?" asked Mortimer haughtily.

"Yes, oh yes: so I understand from my cousin. Sybil has no secrets from me, you know."

"I was not aware," retorted Frederic with increasing displeasure, "that Miss Delamere herself was so well informed upon the subject."

"My dear Frederic," said the young lady coughing down a sensation of no pleasant description, as she saw her prudent inquiries thus betrayed; "surely you do not intend to make me understand that you so readily forget your own communications to me? Sir Horace, with the natural anxiety of a relative, asked questions which I answered without reserve, supposing that you wished to make any mystery of so common-place a circumstance."

Mortimer felt embarrassed in his turn; he had no recollection of having made his pecuniary affairs a subject of conversation during his interviews with Sybil, but he was unable to deny that such had been the case, and he consequently remained silent.

"You will dine at The Grange—of course," said Miss Delamere earnestly.

"I fear—I believe—I think that it will be impossible," was the reply. "I have to make arrangements for the payment of Gertrude's legacy, which have already been too long delayed. She is my cousin, as you are aware," he added, with a peculiar emphasis, "and merely personal consideration should induce me to neglect her interests. Her signature to certain papers is indispensable, and in order obtain this, it is necessary that I should see her. I had intended to ride to The Grange this evening to take leave for a few days, but as we have so fortunately met, I will do so now."

"Are you serious, Frederic?" asked Sybil with a throbbing heart.

"Perfectly so; and no moment could be more auspicious than the present (when I know you to be assured of pleasant and congenial society) for the performance of my duty. Make, therefore, I pray you, my excuses to Mrs. Delamere, whom I hope to find in strong health on my return."

"And you really will not dine at The Grange?"

"I cannot. My conscience already reproaches me."

"And when may we look for you again?"

"I can scarcely answer the question. I am about to travel from one ultima thule to another, and I know not what may occur to detain me. I need not, however, on that account detain you." And pressing the hand which Sybil extended to him with a reproachful smile, he slightly touched his hat to the baronet, by whom the salutation was returned with equal coldness and they separated.

"Sybil!" exclaimed Sir Horace with a light laugh; "I fear that the twig is not so well limed as you believed. The young Squire is less plastic than he should be in such able hands as yours."

"You do not understand Mortimer," said his companion, vainly endeavoring to conceal her mortification; "he is annoyed that I should have left home when I promised to wait for him, and he wishes me to perceive his annoyance."

"Is that all?"

"What more can there be?"

"Nay, you know best; but it struck me—It is too absurd, fair cousin, I admit, considering our impromptu relationship, got up too, as it was, for his especial delectation—but it struck me that the gentle Corydon was jealous."

"Nonsense!"

"Do you dare me, Sybil?"

"Trevor, you are absurd."

"Perhaps so; but remember that my absurdity has brought me from Italy, and I owe no forbearance to this tetchy swain of yours. So long as I believed you to be sure of him, I compelled myself to submit, aware as I am that he had certain social conventionalities in his favor, but having within the last half hour seen reason to change my opinion, I warn you that I enter the lists again."

"Do you persist in your insult, Sir Horace?"

"You give my humble suit a harsh name, fair lady! Do you hold it as nothing that I have found it impossible to forget you?—that in order to secure your love I am ready to expatriate myself for months, or even years?—that although my whole family will be estranged from me by such a measure, I am here to implore of you to assert your superiority to vulgar prejudice, and share my fortunes?"

"Do not deceive yourself while you fail to deceive me, Sir Horace," said Miss Delamere with an angry and impatient gesture. "I could in no manner so greatly gratify your suspicions and arrogant relatives as by disgracing myself as you suggest; for those who could not brook Sybil Delamere as your wife would rejoice to exult over her as your mistress. You see that, unlike yourself, I have courage enough to call things by their right names. And now hear me while I declare to you that had another individual on earth dared to insult me by such a proposition, I would have resented it to the latest hour of my life; but with you, Sir Horace Trevor, I am peculiarly situated, and I have felt myself compelled to endure the affront. Let it, however, suffice to assure you, once for all, that nothing less than your hand and name will ever induce me to listen to you for a moment!"

"Again, Sybil?"

"As you please," was the scornful retort; "Remember that it was not I who solicited a renewal of our intercourse."

"But should this worthy country squire fail you?"

"You have heard all that I have to say upon the subject. But of this be convinced, that Mortimer will no more fail me than I shall fail myself. it may please you in your exclusiveness to despise him; but he is a man of honor, and will scorn to falsify his words."

"Honor!" sneered Trevor; "it is a term which admits of such various significations that it becomes difficult to define it accurately. We all pique ourselves upon our honor, even when others conceive it to have been altogether forfeited."

The eyes of Miss Delamere flashed, but she made no rejoinder.

"You will be a coquette to the last, Sybil," pursued the baronet after a pause; "but one can scarcely look you in the face, and not forgive you; although, knowing your power as you do, you might be more merciful in its exercise. But what of this cousin mentioned by your Pyramus? Is it the pretty orphan to whom his mamma had promised him as a husband? If so, gare le loup!"

Miss Delamere curled her lip in scorn. "Yes, the legacy to which he alluded was one bequeathed by his mother to her protégée; but I am perfectly tranquil on the subject. When the eagle has once gazed upon the sun, he is content to close his eyes on the moonlight."

"A pretty metaphor enough; but do not forget that even the eagle cannot gaze for ever without wearying of a splendor so blinding. Poetry has its charms for a while, but the veriest enthusiast must at times descend to prose. Even I am occasionally prosaic."

Sybil endeavored to assume an air of gaiety and unconcern; but she was, nevertheless, not without some misgiving on the subject of Mortimer's visit to his cousin. It was evidently a resolution as suddenly formed as it had been abruptly announced; and she felt that they had parted coldly and unsatisfactorily. That the presence of Sir Horace Trevor, and his unguarded allusions, had tended to render Frederic uneasy and suspicious, she could not conceal even from herself; and, sincere was her secret gratulation, that she had, by boldly avowing their engagement to a third party, made it impossible for him honorably to recede without some defined and tangible cause.

Still she dreaded the power of old associations and habits over the nature of one so impressionable as Mortimer, at a moment when he was writhing under imagined slight; and she had no sooner reached home than she retired to her own room, in order to reflect upon the measures to be pursued to prevent, or at least to delay the threatened departure.

Meanwhile, Sir Horace Trevor strolled to the library, half mortified, and half amused by the dialogue in which he had just been engaged; and, to his surprise, found Mrs. Delamere installed in an easy chair, in an apartment which she generally shunned.

"Do I disturb your studies, my dear madam?" he asked as he entered.

"Oh, no! I was only thinking, and I would rather not think," was the tremulously uttered reply. "But where is Sybil?"

"In her own room, I believe. She complained of being somewhat fatigued."

"And where is Mr. Mortimer? I am always uneasy when I do not see Mr. Mortimer here."

"Mr Mortimer has just taken leave of Miss Delamere. He leaves Westrum to-morrow on a visit to his cousin."

Mrs. Delamere raised her head by a sudden impulse, and fixed her eyes steadfastly upon the speaker.

"Gone to see his cousin!" she murmured as if unconsciously. "Only returned yesterday, and leaves again to-morrow!" Then, as she glanced rapidly around her with a slight shudder, she pursued, more directly addressing her companion: "Is this your work, Sir Horace Trevor?"

"On my soul, no! Why should you suspect it?" was the reply.

"I do not know—I cannot explain," she said languidly, as she once more fell back into a recumbent position; "but I am becoming more bewildered every hour. However, Sybil knows best. Yet why, or for what you are here, Sir Horace, I cannot comprehend. You have now no claim upon Sybil?"

"I do not seek to advance any," replied the Baronet with quiet sarcasm: "I came to The Grange simply to pay my respects both to yourself and her."

"It is very extraordinary," faltered the old lady. "Does Mr. Mortimer approve of your visit?"

"I did not hazard the inquiry," said Trevor, taking up a book at random, and throwing himself into a chair; "but judging from the expression of his countenance, I should feel inclined to doubt it."

"Then, why do you remain? Why does Sybil allow it?"

"She has adopted me as a cousin."

"Sir Horace Trevor," said the agitated mother, "do not jest upon such a subject. You know that I am helpless in all that concerns Sybil; but you cannot, you dare not, seek to renew your addresses to her. You dare not, for you are a man of the world, and you dread its sneer. Why, then, would you ruin her prospects?—Why would you destroy us both?"

"Believe me, my dear madam," exclaimed the Baronet, touched in spite of his egotism by the tears which were falling slowly over her pale cheeks, "that I am far from having any such intention; and surely, when you look upon the luxury by which you are surrounded, you must admit that the idea of ruin comes strangely from your lips."

Mrs. Delamere clasped her hands convulsively together, but after a moment she conquered her emotion sufficiently to reply with a forced composure, which was almost impressive:

"I could have understood the remark from any one but yourself, and have admitted it truth, Sir Horace; but from you it bears strange and painful construction; from you who knows so well—Let it pass, however. You have perhaps, earned the right to wound me—"

"My dear madam, I swear to you—"

"Let it pass, Sir Horace, let it pass; but, one more, why are you here?—why did Sybil consent to receive you? You are not, you cannot be anything to each other; and remember that should your visit excite the displeasure of Mr Mortimer, your revenge will be a cruel one."

The idea which her own words had conjured up, and the unaccustomed energy which she had exhibited, had, by this time, fairly overpowered the unhappy old lady; who, burying her face in her handkerchief, as if to shut even the sight of her companion, sobbed aloud. Trevor rose, and paced unensily up and down the room. He had always been used to see Mrs. Delamere so placid, and so apparently reckless of all that passed about her, that he was totally unprepared for this sudden burst of feeling; nor was it until she had regained some degree of composure, that he ventured to approach and take her hand.

"Speak your wishes, my dear madam," he said, in an accent of deference which seemed strange in such a speaker; "and, be they what they may, I will obey them."

Mrs. Delamere looked up with a smile of gratitude too intense to be mistaken. "I thank you," she murmured between her sobs: "with my whole heart I thank you. Sybil is, I fear, playing a desperate game; and her fate is in your hands. Leave us now, at once, if you would save her—leave us now, and forget us."

"I will order my horses within an hour."

"Horace, how I once loved you," faltered the feeble voice; "Oh, why were you not my son?"

"Farewell, my dear madame, for ever," said Trevor, as he wrung her hand respectfully, "I will but take leave of Miss Delamere, and depart at once."

"Do not even that," implored the old lady as she detained him for an instant. "I will explain it all to Sybil. It is better that you should not meet again."

"Be it so—I came hither because I was a coxcomb, and presumed upon the past. Your tears have rebuked me; and not through my means shall you shed another. Tell her that I sincerely desire her happiness, and bid her at the same time beware. To her, the past should act as a powerful monitor, as it has done to me. Farewell, but never cease to remember that I have expiated my present error by my obedience."

Mrs. Delamere would have replied, but before she had wiped away her tears he was gone.

CHAPTER XXII.

And Mortimer had also proceeded homewards after parting from Sybil, but it was with a heavy heart and depressed energies. His indignation at her levity and carelessness of wounding his feelings, had endued him with a factitious strength during their interview, and urged him to the sudden resolve he had announced; but he was no sooner alone than he repented his precipitancy, for he at once became conscious how entirely his happiness depended upon her, and how utterly he was in her power.

It was, however, too late to retract his words; and now, in order to sustain an appearance of consistency, he felt that he must carry out his project, and thus leave her for days to the undisturbed society of her cousin—of the man whom, of all others he hated, without being enabled to advance a plausible reason for his dislike. The aversion was, nevertheless, as strange as it was intuitive; nor did Mortimer seek to counteract the feeling. It sufficed that Trevor admired Sybil, and that he was in her confidence, to make him obnoxious to his jealous and exciting nature.

Moreover, the sarcastic allusions and biting jests of the baronet had aroused at once the indignation and the suspicions of Frederic; they had cast a baneful cloud over the hitherto bright hemisphere of his passion. Its pure glow was sullied; its fond romance was dispelled; he had seen the cherished idol of his heart treated as a mere woman, and he felt himself aggrieved.

By what right had this presumptuous stranger intruded himself and his memories of the past between him and his betrothed wife? Upon what pretence did he presume to censure and judge one who was plighted to another? And then came the recollection that Sybil had herself justified such interference, by openly and unseasonably communicating to him an engagement in which he could have no concern, and probably felt little interest; and this reminiscence was even more painful than those by which it had been preceded.

Fain would he have acquitted her of every blame, in order that all his irritation might vent itself upon her cousin; but, even blinded as he was by a hitherto uncalculating passion, he could not reconcile the scene in the garden, and her subsequent disclosure, with that nice conception of the delicacy of her sex which he had loved to indulge.

True, Sybil was no common character, and she had warned him of the fact long ere he had told her that she was dear to him; he should therefore have been prepared for any exhibition of moral daring; but his feelings had been involved in the demonstration, and it had startled him unpleasantly. It was not that he shrank from acknowledging their engagement; he would rather have gloried in declaring it before the face of the whole world; but thus lightly and unhesitatingly revealed by herself, it seemed robbed of half its sanctity.

Suddenly a servant entered the apartment, and placed a letter before him. He glanced listlessly at the address, and then, with an eager gesture, tore it open. He had at once recognized the handwriting of Sybil.

"We cannot part thus,"—these were its contents—"I must see you before you go, were it only to hear from your lips what I have already read upon your countenance. I do not seek to upbraid, or to reproach you—you have, perhaps, mistaken both yourself and me; and I desire only to learn the extent of that mistake. I love you too well to murmur; and I forgive you if you can forgive yourself. Sir Horace has gone; in my present state of mind I could not tolerate society. You only leave Westrum to-morrow; there is yet time for you to devote one half-hour to the unhappy "Sybil."

Mortimer sprang to the bell; ordered his horse; and in ten minutes was on his way to The Grange.

Sybil loved him—she was unhappy—and Trevor was gone! All his suspicions were at an end; they had been dispelled like Alpine mists before the morning sun.

And so time passed on; and Frederic, who had vowed to himself that, ere long, he would possess every secret of Sybil's heart, spent hours and days at her side, careless and forgetful of all save the present. Even the memory of Sir Horace Trevor had almost ceased to be distasteful to him, from the cold and indifferent manner in which he was constantly mentioned by Miss Delamere; nay, he began to accuse himself of absolute folly and injustice, to the fascinating creature whose every feeling and anxiety were evidently bound up in himself; and to marvel at the weakness he had betrayed.

Had Sybil loved her cousin, he would have won her, doubtless, years before; for that he or any man, could fail to return her affection, appeared to Mortimer impossible. Yet, nevertheless, and incongruous as the fact may seem, he clung to his present mode of existence without one effort to enhance his happiness by at once making Sybil his wife.

Had the alternative been forced upon him, he would rather have resigned his life than the prospect of obtaining her hand, for without her he would have felt that life to be a blank; but still, as the diver, who, however sure of his skill, hesitates for a while ere he takes his venturous leap, so did Mortimer linger in the midst of present security, as though unwilling to lose the firm footing which he still retained.

Thus weeks and months sped on; and if a shadow occasionally fell upon the bright brow of the lady, it was soon chased by smiles. All her tastes, all her avocations, were made subservient to his wishes. She was at once his friend, his counsellor and his idol.

Their solitude was almost uninvaded; for although the gentry of the neighborhood were ready to admit the fascinations and accomplishments of Miss Delamere, they were not the less jealous of her attractions, and suspicious of the mystery by which she was surrounded; while those among them who had been the familiar friends of Mrs. Mortimer, could not see without regret, and even blame, the effect of her blandishments upon the destined husband of their banished favorite.

The constant visits of Frederic at the Grange, were subject of continual comment; and his consequent estrangement from themselves kept alive a feeling of distaste towards its inhabitants, which sufficed to render their visits brief and unfrequent.

Thus, then, nothing intervened to ruffle the smooth current upon which the lovers glided along the stream of time; and this circumstance was favorable to Sybil, inasmuch as it afforded her ample opportunity to pour out all the stores of her well-cultivated mind and brilliant faney; and each night, as he rode slowly homewards, dazzled, and more enthralled than ever, Frederic marvelled how so bright and gifted a being could be content to pass her days in an obscure retirement; and to lavish upon him alone all the treasures of her intellect, and all the fascinations of her beauty.

What was the world to him with such a companion? Henceforth Westrum would be his world; he should care for no other, and he should live and die beneath the roof of his ancestors, without one hope or one ambition unsatisfied.

Thus had he quitted Sybil on one occasion, after an evening of calm and rational enjoyment; enhanced by the exertions which she had made to "hold his reason prisoner." They had sang together over the same chess-board, more engrossed by each other than by the game; and while Mrs. Delamere slumbered, or seemed to slumber in her chair, they had built up a thousand airy castles, each more soft and sunny than the last.

They had talked of the future fondly and eagerly; and Frederic had bespoken her interest and sympathy for his poorer tenantry, and her assistance in a store of projects, all tending to render the home in which their lives were to be spent more worthy of her presence; and as he did so the eye of Sybil sparkled, and her chest heaved; while at intervals her parted lips, and earnest attitude, bespoke a momentary anticipation of what must follow.

The chain woven by her lover was bright, but the connecting link was, nevertheless, wanting; he said nothing which could convert that future into the more immediate present; and thus she waited and watched in vain; and they parted, even as they had done on every previous occasion, without one word from Frederic which implied a wish to realise his visions by their early union.

Still, it was not until he was really gone, that Miss Delamere could believe in such a result. Never had he been more tender or more expansive. What could it mean? Bound to her, as he now was, by every tie of honor, by every bond of principle, could he be merely trifling with her feelings? She still stood in the centre of the apartment, where his hand had clasped hers, and whence she had met and answered the last long look that he turned upon her as he retired. Her cheek was flushed and her eye glittered; she knew not what to think. The death of Mrs. Mortimer had removed the only avowed obstacle to their marriage; the departure of Gertrude rendered all dread of future rivalry impossible; he was alone, quite alone, in a silent and cheerless home; he made no attempt to disguise the extent of his attachment to herself, while she was conscious that she had left no means untried to rivet the chains which he had voluntarily adopted; and still he appeared to live on as though the present sufficed to satisfy all the exactions of his heart.

And she had borne this strange and almost humiliating uncertainty for months, believing each day that the morrow would terminate her suspense; and that morrow had come and gone, and brought no explanation. What could it mean?

Suddenly the bloom faded from her cheek, and the light from her eye. Could he have learned the history of the past? Her limbs tottered, and she sank upon a seat. With the rapidity of lightning her thoughts glanced back to the visit of Trevor—Had he indeed betrayed her? But no; that was impossible; for never once had she left them alone together; while the feeling of avoidance which each had exhibited towards the other was also a guarantee that such could not have been the case.

Then she remembered that Mortimer had, during the removal of Gertrude, been absent for many days in town—Who had he met there? With whom had he held communication? Could he have encountered any of her former friends, and questioned them as to her past history? And, if so, what was the meaning of his subsequent conduct? Did he dare—did he consider himself authorized to sport with her feelings, with her fate, with her very existence?

The doubt was almost too terrible to bear; and as she sat in silence, with her hands tightly clasped together, the large drops of emotion started on her brow, and her breath labored until it escaped audibly from between her clenched teeth.

The brilliant beauty was crushed and bowed; and in that moment Gertrude was revenged.

Gradually, however, she became more calm the improbability that Mortimer, who was almost a stranger in London, should in so short a space of time have gained admission to a circle which prided itself upon its exclusiveness; and the still greater improbability that he should have attained to a sufficient degree of intimacy with any of its members to enable him to prosecute such an enquiry, forced themselves upon her reason; but still she could find no plausible solution to his mysterious silence; and a thousand harrowing apprehensions haunted her mind. Every day, and every hour of suspense heightened alike her alarm and her difficulty. She reflected with terror that her youth was gone; and that, did she now fail in effecting the object for which she had striven so zealously the failure might be fatal. She could not hope long to retain the bloom which characterized her beauty; and her position was desperate. Mortimer alone could save her; for ruin was approaching with giant strides, and she had no other resource.

"Something must be done," she at length gasped out, unconscious of her own utterance; "I must know all—all that is before me. I cannot endure this gnawing suspense and live. He must speak, and speak clearly. But how compel him to this? He is weak and suspicious, and startles at a shadow—and yet, he must speak out. Either he is in my power, and I am safe; or he has played me false, and all is over. Trevor cannot have betrayed me—he can know nothing—or, should it be otherwise——" her voice died away in a hoarse whisper, and once more all was silence.

Suddenly a thought flashed across her, and a withering smile rose to her lip as she approached a writing-table, and seated herself before it. For a few moments she remained buried in thought; and then, slowly and earnestly, she began to write. It was evident that the task which she had undertaken was no light or easy one, for she progressed in it slowly, and appeared to form, not only every word, but even every letter, with consummate care and study. But at length it was completed; and, after having attentively examined the contents of the paper, she folded it with equal deliberation; and then, having selected a particular seal from a number which lay upon her desk, she closed the letter, and threw the seal that had secured it into the fire, which was still mouldering in the grate.

This done, she remained for a while silently gazing upon the decaying embers, as if jealous lest they should fail in their work of destruction; but she no sooner saw the glittering ore melt and disappear, than she returned to the table, took up the letter, and, having concealed it in her bosom, calmly, and with renewed self-possession, rang for her maid, and retired to her own apartment.

On the following day Sybil was invisible even to Mortimer. Indisposition confined her to her chamber; and, after lingering for a couple of hours about the grounds, and sauntering to and fro beneath her windows, in the vain hope of obtaining at least a glance of her figure as she traversed the apartment, he was compelled to return home ungratified. Nor, even then, could he compel himself to any occupation. A whole day without Sybil overcame his philosophy.

Nothing sufficed either to interest or amuse him. He felt no apprehension as to the result of her illness, for Mrs. Mortimer had treated the matter lightly, declaring that it was only a head-ache; and that Sybil was subject to headaches when she over-exerted herself, which she had done lately, and she had warned her of the consequences. However, Sybil knew best; and in all probability would be quite well again on the morrow. Thus, there was no cause for anxiety; and Mortimer was at liberty to bewail his own dreariness; to feel the wretchedness of his large and echoing rooms, and to comprehend his utter dependence upon another. The sensation was by no means a pleasant one. He had become so habituated to the constant society and companionship of Miss Delamere, that he almost felt injured by its sudden withdrawal. She might, so he argued, surely have received him; but then the reflection crossed his mind that she had declined the visit of her mother and that he could advance no claim to an indulgence which had been denied to her parent. Still he was only half reconciled to his exclusion; time hung heavily upon his hands; and he began to feel a conviction that some definite step must be taken to prevent the recurrence of such a mortification. And what step? There was but one which could invest him with a right to dispute the will, and to monopolize the society of Sybil; and to this he had long looked forward as to a fixed and certain event. Why, then, did he hesitate, and fall into a somewhat gloomy reverie, as the vision of an early marriage with his beautiful betrothed fastened itself upon his mind? Was she not to him all that she had ever been; or changed only by an increase of tenderness? Did he doubt her? No, no, that could not be; and yet, it was nevertheless certain that a cloud still hung over his thoughts. Sybil had indeed given him her heart, her time, and her interest, but he had failed to gain her confidence.

While he had frankly placed before her, not only every action, but almost every feeling of his life, even from his earliest boyhood; and, as the Orientals express it, had "laid his heart in her hand," she had betrayed no answering trust. She had gladdened him by her gaiety, soothed him by her sympathy, and delighted him by her devotion; but beyond this, to him she was still morally unknown; and as he became, in his enforced solitude, conscious of the whole extent of her power over his fate, the words and warnings of his dying mother again sounded in his ears, and would not be silenced.

Angry and irritated at his own weakness Mortimer again and again mentally argued, or at least strove to argue down these intrusive recollections. Why should he suffer them now to oppress him? Was he not pledged to Sybil? Had he not willingly, and even eagerly, sought her hand? And could he now, at the eleventh hour, yield to such visionary misgivings without dishonor? Once her husband, he should know all; and that all, as she had herself assured him, would amount to so very a trifle that he could not fail to smile at his own eurisosity. Yet still the shadow lingered. While constantly in the presence of Sybil he cared for nothing, thought of nothing, save the passing hour; his heart and his fancy were alike satisfied, and he regarded his marriage only as a distant contingency: but once abandoned to his own solitary reflections, and compelled to look into the future as well as upon the present, the jealousy of his nature rose up in arms, and his reason rebelled against his passion.

What, however, availed that reason now? Sybil was his betrothed wife, and the argument was strengthened by the selfishness from which no human being is wholly free; to be happy, he must be happy with her—she had become necessary to his existence. This one blank and weary day had revealed how little he sufficed to himself; and then—by the conviction his reverie took a brighter hue, and he began to shape out in his own fancy such a scheme of life as would have renewed the golden age.

Pity that the materials with which fancy loves to build should be so frail! What mighty fabrics of mortal blessedness should we not create about us if they were more substantial! But as the child erects its castle of cards only to see it crumble and disappear upon the slightest touch, so do men too often rear those goodly schemes in prospect which, like the gold of the fairy-gift, prove mere ashes when in possession.

At an early hour on the morrow Mortimer was at The Grange; and this time he was admitted without difficulty. Miss Delamere had left her chamber, and was already in the southern parlor. He needed no announcement, for with this ceremony he had long dispensed; and opening the door softly, he entered. But his arrival produced no change in the attitude of Sybil; and he was instantly struck by the change in her appearance. She was lying upon a sofa with her face buried among the cushions. Her hair was drawn away from her forehead, and gathered into a large loose knot at the back of her head, evidently without care; a morning dress of white muslin was rather folded about her than adjusted to her figure; and there was an air of negligence about her whole person so foreign to her usual habits, that it at once bespoke the presence of some overwhelming sorrow.

Mortimer detected this at a glance, and in an instant he was by her side.

"Sybil, my own Sybil, what has happened?"

Sybil started, and raised her head, and if Mortimer had been struck by the change in her general appearance, he was still more startled by the alteration of her countenance. A deep crimson flashed upon her cheeks, her swollen eyelids betrayed a night of tears, her lips were pale and quivering, and her hand trembled as he took it in his own.

"Speak my beloved! Tell me, what is the meaning of all this wild grief?"

"Frederic!" she murmured almost inaudibly, "I dare not!"

More and more bewildered, Mortimer gazed upon her like one in a dark dream; but she was unhappy, she was crushed beneath some weight of sorrow, too great even for her to bear, and he forgot at once all save his love: "Nay, you shall speak, Sybil!—Sybil, are you not mine? Have I not a right to share your grief, arise from what cause it may?—Should you have any secret from me?"

But Sybil was still silent, although her sobs became audible.

"Lean on me, dearest!—There, hide those swollen and weary eyes upon my bosom, and tell me all," pursued Mortimer more gently: "You know not what you make me suffer by this suspense. To see you thus, and to be refused your confidence, is more than I can bear. Have mercy on me, Sybil, and tell me what mean these tears!"

Miss Delamere only shook her head despondingly.

"You wound me deeply, Sybil," said her lover; "but I will not urge you further. I shall appeal to your mother."

"Frederic! Frederic!" gasped out his companion, as she flung her arms about him to retain him in his seat: "For pity's sake—for mine—if I have indeed been dear to you,—breathe not a word of this misery to my poor mother,—it would kill her did she know its cause!"

"Torture me not then, my own love!" implored Frederic, as he yielded to the pressure of the beautiful arms which still rested upon his neck, and sank upon his knee beside the couch; "but let me learn from your own lips the cause of this violent emotion. Have you lost a friend? Your fortune? Your gestures deny this. Has any one dared to injure or insult you?" And the eyes of the speaker flashed as he put the question.

A more violent burst of grief was its reply.

"Yes—I have guessed aright!" he exclaimed vehemently, as he sprang to his feet with a flashing eye and a bent brow: "And now, Sybil, I entreat no longer; I insist upon an instant explanation of this mystery. As my future wife, I command, in this at least your obedience. Your honor is in my hands, and none shall dare to sully it by a breath."

In a moment, but only for a moment, Miss Delamere, thus adjured, buried her face in her hands. When she withdrew them, she was pale even to ghastliness, as she took a letter from her bosom, in which it had been concealed, and with averted eyes held it towards her companion, who, scarcely less agitated than herself tore it hastily open.

As he hurriedly devoured its contents, the whole frame of Mortimer shook with suppressed rage; and he gnawed his lip as though he would have wreaked that vengeance upon himself which could not be poured out upon his enemy.

"It is a goodly scrawl!" he at length exclaimed bitterly: "The work of a vile incendiary, who has not dared to affix his foul name to the revolting slander. But it is false, false as hell, Sybil!—No tongue has dared to prate as this assassin states—no thought has ever polluted your fair fame. Again, and again I swear to you that it is false! Have I for one moment concealed my purpose in frequenting your house? Is it not notorious throughout the neighborhood that I have been for months a suitor for your hand? Is not your own mother beneath your roof? Out upon such devilish but puny malice—my very heart heaves against the coward lie!"

"How am I sunk!" sobbed Sybil.

"Sunk! Nay, dearest, rather say how are you exalted in my eyes by this jealous sensibility to all that touches your honor. Never to me have you seemed half so noble, but I beseech you, calm your grief, it cuts me to the soul, for it shows me that it is I who have armed this writer with his unhallowed weapon. Yes, Sybil, it is I, who, spell-bound by the happiness of the present hour, have too long forgotten that I have as yet enforced no right to its continuance. It was too much to hope that a meddling world would leave us to our holy and hallowed affection until we had placed it beyond the reach of comment and suspicion. There is a serpent in every Eden, and the crawling reptile has now invaded ours. But there is a remedy, a holy and blessed remedy for the evil, my beautiful beloved—we will delay it no longer; and the snake will be innoxious when we have robbed it of its venom."

A smile shone through the tears of Miss Delamere, and as again Mortimer resumed his seat beside her, she gradually suffered herself to be consoled by his ardent and affectionate reasoning. Once more the color returned to her cheek and lip, and she hung upon his words with an earnestness that made him doubly eloquent. She said little, but that little sufficed to convince him that he was the happiest of mortals; and as they sat with their hands locked together, and her head pillowed upon his shoulder, he almost blessed the anonymous correspondent who had revealed to him the moral excellence and shrinking delicacy of his beautiful and injured Sybil.

"And now, my own one," he said tenderly as he prepared to depart; "we have each sufficient occupation both for our thoughts, and for our time. You need rest, however, and while you strive to obtain it, I will not lose a moment in seeking out the vile author of this atrocious calumny. Let him not hope to escape. It is not so easy to disguise any handwriting as it may appear to be; there are always some peculiarities, trivial and slight, perhaps, but nevertheless, perfectly susceptible of identification, by which the writer may be traced with proper care and caution; and trust me, your present correspondent shall not escape."

"Frederic," whispered Miss Delamere with an appealing look; "will you consent to make me quite happy?"

"Can you doubt it, Sybil?"

"Then love, restore to me that letter, and let me destroy it."

"Do not ask me what I cannot grant. I will not be cheated of my vengeance."

An expression of intense anxiety passed over the features of Miss Delamere; but she instantly recovered herself, and with her sweetest smile she again extended her hand, as she said emphatically: "This is the first time that I have ventured to claim a favor at your hands, and I will not be so denied. To me your present intention brings a two-fold anxiety; First, Frederic, answer me; how can I feel one moment's peace while I know you to be engaged in a search which must at once irritate and pain you, and by which, if you are successful, you only involve yourself in newer and more dangerous difficulties? while, as regards myself, do you imagine for an instant that I can be happy while such a document is in existence? No, until that bitter and blighting scrawl is destroyed, I must be wretched; for does it not brand me with disgrace?"

"Enough, Sybil, enough!" exclaimed Mortimer, as he folded her in his arms, and pressed his lips upon her forehead; "You have conquered, and I forego my vengeance."

"My own dear Frederic!" murmured one of the sweetest voices in the world, as the torn fragments of the obnoxious letter fell in a shower upon the carpet; "Now indeed, I know that you love me."

Five minutes afterwards Mortimer was gone; and Sybil, having listened to the sounds of his horse's feet until they were lost in the distance, slowly rose from the sofa, and carefully gathering up the shreds of paper, threw them one by one into the fire which was blazing in the grate; and then having satisfied herself that they were all destroyed, cast one long triumphant look round the apartment, and threw herself again upon her seat.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Several months had, as we have already stated elapsed since the death of Mrs. Mortimer, and Time the great physician of the mind, assisted by one of the most amiable and unselfish dispositions in the world, had restored Gertrude to comparative happiness. Grateful for the protection which had been so frankly afforded to her at a period when it was sorely needed, she had studied to accommodate herself to the exigencies and peculiarities of her aged relative with a good faith which insured her ultimate success. And already the effects of her gentle influence were palpable; not only in the general appearance of the gloomy little house, but also in the manner of its rigid mistress.

The arrival of all the orphan's domestic treasures had at first grievously annoyed and disturbed Miss Warrington; who, as she saw package after package unladen from the heavy road-wagon which nearly blocked up the narrow street, clasped her hands tightly together; compressed her lips until they became almost invisible, and sat bolt upright and speechless; until she comprehended, from the exclamations of her matronly attendant, and the expostulations of the two sturdy porters who were engaged in carrying the things into the house, that not only was the entrance-passage entirely choked up, but that the kitchen stairs, and even the kitchen itself, had likewise been invaded. Then indeed, she recovered in some degree from her consternation; although it was only to express her dissatisfaction in a cold, dry, sarcastic tone, which to poor Gertrude was more painful than the most violent exhibition of temper.

"Really, Miss Mortimer," she said, and not even the tension of her lips relaxed, as she looked her full in the face; "I feel that I have been very inconsiderate. You must have found yourself terribly inconvenienced in my house before your furniture arrived, and I greatly fear that you will even now be at a loss to dispose of it consistently. My passage is scarcely wide enough for a piano; nor do I think that an inlaid bookcase will accord particularly well with the general style of my property. But perhaps you have an idea of moving to a larger residence."

"My dear madam!" exclaimed the orphan, as she sprang forward and seized the reluctant hand of the querulous old lady; "I do not know what to say to you—how to apologise. I was not aware———"

And poor Gertrude, who was already overcome by the munificence of her cousin, and the affectionate letter which had accompanied his gifts, burst into an irrepressible flood of tears.

"Nay, nay, niece, this is foolish," said Miss Warrington less harshly; "I dare say that you did not expect such an unloading of the Tower of Babel as this," (the good lady's verbal illustrations were usually somewhat confused,) "so don't cry, for that will not clear the passage, and it will be necessary that we should get up stairs to bed. We had better, therefore be thinking of what had best be done. Two cases of books!" she ejaculated after an instant, as if unconsciously; "Who on earth is to read them; and where are they to be put?"

"Please ma'am," said Hannah, intruding just within the door of the room a face heated by exertion, and a stout arm bared above the elbow; "the men can't bring in any more of the things, for there ain't room, unless we take some of them up stairs into miss's sleeping chamber; are we to carry them up?"

"Inquire Miss Mortimer's pleasure," was the unsatisfactory reply, and the discomposed old lady looked stiffer and harder than ever.

"Oh! yes, yes," eagerly exclaimed Gertrude; "anywhere—anything—good Hannah; I will soon unpack the cases, and send them out of the house. Indeed, my dear madam," she added appealingly, as the maid disappeared; "it is those unwieldly wooden boxes which create all this confusion, and when once we are rid of them, you will be surprised to find how little they contain."

"I have long ceased to be surprised at anything, niece," said the still unappeased mistress of the house; "and it is at least fortunate that your huge chests will supply us with firewood for the winter."

At length, when the room of Gertrude had been converted in appearance into a well-packed warehouse, through the civil exertions of the porters, ingress and egress were once more rendered possible, and Miss Warrington unclasped her fingers.

The orphan hailed with delight this symptom of returning composure, and found courage to allude to the future arrangement of her recovered treasures; but vainly did she suggest how admirably the piano would stand between the windows, and how charmingly the book-case would fit into the recess beside the fire-place. Miss Warrington was resolved to consider the introduction of these elegant superfluities as a grievance, and declared, that as she detested music, and never read anything save her Bible, her rooms should not be lumbered by any such useless incumbrances.

Gertrude was silenced. She had intuitively felt from the first, the utter futility of reasoning with her protectress, and the impropriety of thwarting her wishes, and accordingly, she began to consider how she might the most conveniently accommodate those two bulky luxuries in her own small apartment, resolving, at the same time that she would conscientiously refrain from reading in her aunt's presence, or disturbing her by the sound of the instrument.

The sacrifice was a severe one, but the orphan was beginning to be schooled in self-abnegation and restraint, and thus the determination, untasteful though it was, failed to bring a cloud to her young brow.

Such had been the reception of Mortimer's offering; and for some weeks, Gertrude carefully abstained from intruding any of her little possessions upon the notice of her aunt. Through the agency of Hannah, who soon conceived an affection for her young mistress, as she persisted in calling her, the obnoxious packing-cases were broken up, and duly stowed away for winter fuel, and as, with the exception of the piano and the book-case, all the other articles were small, she experienced less inconvenience than she had anticipated, in arranging them in a manner calculated to satisfy her aunt.

The effect of their possession upon herself was most salutary. She no longer felt alone; no longer deserted. Every object by which she was now surrounded spoke directly to her heart, and drew her back again into the past. Her whitewashed walls were gladdened to her eyes by the sketches of the dear old house at Westrum, which had so often fondly occupied her leisure; her toilette sparkled once more with cut glass and porcelain, and as the sunbeams penetrated the branches of the venerable trees before her window, and threw their chequered light upon the table, there were moments in which she almost deluded herself into the belief that she was once more at home. And then her books!—there, indeed, her store of happiness was inexhaustible; and they were the more endeared to her by the fact that the fly-leaf of each, bore some affectionate record, and that they thus spoke to her from beyond the grave.

The honest-hearted old woman, who formed in herself the whole establishment of Miss Warrington, was astounded by the magnificence which rendered the apartment of Gertrude so dissimilar to the remainder of the house, and was never weary of examining the elegant futilities with which it was crowded; but, shrewd enough to comprehend that half the annoyance of her mistress on their arrival had arisen from a jealous feeling of the contrast which they would offer to her own faded and bygone treasures, which she had for years been accustomed to regard with reverence, she carefully abstained from all mention of her admiring wonder in her presence.

Thus for a time it would have appeared as though the stately old lady had altogether forgotten the incursion which had been made upon her premises, but it was not so. Her first apprehension had been that Gertrude might pride herself on this acquisition of luxury, by which she was rendered, in a great degree, independent of those about her, and however much she gloried in her own personal independence, she could not brook that the orphan whom she had befriended should thus be enabled to dispense with her good offices,

It was, perhaps a pardonable weakness, and it was, at all events, a very common one. She did not relent, therefore, until she had become perfectly satisfied that, far from presuming on her unexpected good fortune, her mild and gentle inmate had become more attentive, kind, and thoughtful; as though she felt that a tacit apology were needful for the annoyance to which she had innocently subjected her hostess.

Miss Warrington had, however, by indulging the suspicion unwittingly, created a great difficulty for herself; for when strong in her convletion of Gertrude's inmate amiability, she resolved to recant her objections to the due enjoyment of these newly-acquired luxuries, she was at a loss how to make the concession without a compromise of her dignity.

She was revolving the subject in her mind, as she had already done several times before, on a bright summer evening, when, shut into the dingy little parlor, while all was fair and sunshiny without, Gertrude was busily engaged with her needle in the service of her aunt, and during a pause in their monotonous dialogue, a wandering Italian boy took his stand before the house with a barrel organ, and began to play the Barcarole in Masaniello.

As the first bars of the melody met her ear, the hands of Gertrude fell powerless upon her lap, and she panted with emotion. In another moment she sprang from her chair, and rushed to the window, where she stood trembling, smiling, and weeping, in a breath.

"Well, well," said the old lady with a grim smile, which was the most engaging expression of which her countenanee was susceptible; "There is no great harm done if he does see you, for one of those people does not come to Bletchley for twelve months together, so that we may afford to give him a few pence."

But Gertrude did not hear a word. She heard nothing, felt nothing, was conscious of nothing but the sound of music, and this was the first to which she had listened since she had become indeed an orphan. Every pulse in her heart was stirred; the "old familiar strain" had carried her away—away—through time and spaee, and she was quivering with a sense of happiness to which she had been long a stranger, and which she had often failed to feel even when an auditor of the most finished performance.

The sound ceased; the musician was remunerated and the spell was broken. The dingy parlor appeared more dull than ever, and the monotonous needlework more wearisome, but, meanwhile, the grim smile still rested on the features of the old lady.

"You seem uncommonly fond of music, Gertrude," she commenced, delighted at the opening afforded by the appearanee of the Savoyard; "and yet I have never onee heard you touch your piano since it eame into the house."

Gertrude looked up cheerfully, although the tears were still glistening in her eyes, as she replied: "I feared to disturb you, my dear madam."

"Nonsense, nonsense, child," said her companion; "you see even that hurdy-gurdy, or whatever it was, did not disturb me; but, perhaps, you have not room to play in your own chamber. Send for Jones, and let your instrument be brought down stairs. It strikes me that it would stand very well between the windows."

"Oh, how kind you are!" exclaimed the delighted girl earnestly.

"And while he is here," pursued the old lady, inwardly moved by this unstudied emotion, "he may as well disencumber you of your book-case: your room is too small to accommodate so large a piece of furniture."

"Oh, how happy you make me!" again ejaculated the excited listener; "and my work-frame, my dear aunt, and my painting-table—will you admit them all?"

"As you will—as you will," was the reply, "but charge Jones to be careful of the walls as he comes down stairs. Nothing tears a house to pieces like moving furniture, and I cannot afford to new paper the passage for the next five years."

Two months after this conversation, it would have been difficult for any one to have recognised Miss Warrington's hitherto dingy little parlor. By impereeptible degrees, a seore of elegant trifles were successively introduced; even a vase of flowers was permitted to stand upon the polished table without comment; for the quick eye of the old lady immediately detected that the careful Gertrude had placed it upon a minute mat of her own working. Ere long, the dull-looking walls were relieved by some admirably-executed water-colored drawings from a well-stored portfolio; and the village carpenter, after a few hints from the fair artist, succeeded in producing some creditably-made frames, which were neatly covered with morocco paper by the same skilful fingers; the dark curtains which fell in gloomy masses like the folds of a pall, were next discarded, and gossamer draperies of spotless muslin supplied their place.

An air of elegance and ease had succeeded to the squalor and desolation which had formerly been the characteristics of the house; and all had been done so quietly, so simply, and so unostentatiously, that even the rigid and indepen dent Miss Warrington almost forgot that she was indebted to another for the increase of comfort about her.

Gradually also, Gertrude emancipated herself from the excessive thraldom which had confined her entirely to the premises of her aunt; and, in her plain mourning-dress, and closely veiled, ventured to ramble about the immediate neighborhood of the village.

Her demeanor was so undeniably correct, that even Miss Warrington herself could advance no valid objection to her enjoyment of this necessary exercise; and, thus, the orphan found herself once more enabled to commune occasionally in solitude with her own thoughts.

That they were generally very sad ones, can scarcely be a subject of surprise; but there were, nevertheless, moments in which the natural beauties by which she was surrounded drew her on from the past to the present; and taught her to feel that life still possessed much of which she had reason to be grateful.

We have already deseribed the approach to Bletchley; but, cheerful and picturesque as it was, Gertrude soon discovered that the village possessed still greater beauties than those with which she had already made acquaintanee; when, turning her back in the direction of the high road by which she had travelled, she wound round the base of the grassy height crowned by the modest church, and found herself surrounded by the original hamlet, upon whose skirt the dull and straggling street, of which she was now an inhabitant, had grown up as its population had increased.

The whole landscape was essentially English in its character. It did not boast one grand or striking feature; there was neither rock nor torrent, dense forests nor foaming cataract, to be seen on any side; but all was calm, rich, and almost holy, in its beautiful tranquillity. In the distance a chain of undulating hills, clothed with beeches, shut in the prospect; and as she stood and gazed, with all the joy of a liberated captive, and all the enthusiasm of an artist, upon the scene before her, the declining sun poured a flood of glory upon the quivering leaves which glittered like jewels in the light.

The evening wind, as it sighed along the branches, brought with it the odor of the clover and the cinquefoil, which had been mown during the heat of the past day; and the tinkling sound of the sheep-bell on the hill-side. The luxurious lowing of the cattle from a warm, snug-looking, and substantial farm, nestled under the southern slope of the range, was heard at intervals, as, after having resigned their milky hoard, they wound their way to an accustomed pasture, while the song of the nightingale occasionally broke forth, as if in welcome of the coming twilight.

In the bottom of the valley lay a hedge-bordered road, over which the picturesque hay-wagons moved lazily along, to the music of the green and waving corn, which rose and fell with a deep murmur, like the waves of some summer sea, as the breeze passed over it—amid the perfume of the wild-rose and the woodbine, the white clematis and the elder; and crushed with their heavy wheels the transparent and classical cup of the bindweed, which, not content with girding the hawthorn boughs with its fairy garlands, as if to replace the departed glories of their own spring-loving blossoms, trailed its graceful wreaths far across the path; while the spotted fox-glove started up beside the little cress-covered stream that glided noiselessly along, and the bluebell rang its tiny chime like an elfin choir.

From the road which we have just described commenced a slight, smooth ascent, known as Bletchley Green, the little common of the hamlet, whereon the horse of the curate, and the donkey of the cottager, met upon equal grounds. On the verge of the road stood the modest, and once the solitary inn of the hamlet; a plain, unpretending cottage, the extreme ruddiness of whose brick-built front was subdued by a casing of pale-colored cement; the ancient and approved sign of the Red Lion was lettered, not illustrated, on the swinging sign; and a rude bench extended its length along the house for the accommodation of the weary traveller, while a deep trough constantly supplied with water, offered refreshment in its turn, to the jaded steed.

From that point commenced the chief charm of Bletchley Green. The modest cottages of dark gray stone, peeping out from their leafy screens like bird's nests occasionally overgrown by the honeysuckle and the creeping-rose; their carefully-tended little gardens, spreading to the right and left, gay with marigolds, and stocks, and gilly-flowers, among which the bees made constant music as they flew to and fro, sating themselves with sweets, or clustered about the neatly-thatched hives which were ranged in goodly order along the grassy path.

There is something gladdening in the aspect of a cottage-garden, rich in all the usual vegetable produce which helps the poor man's meal; and cherishing all those familiar and old-fashioned blossoms which horticultural societies and scientific florists are rapidly sweeping from the surface of the earth. Certain it is, too, that flowers nowhere prosper so well as under the eyes of the cottagers. Their geraniums, their fuchsias, their hydrangias, even to their pansies and their anemones, are frequently finer than can be found elsewhere. Horticulturists may tell us that the cups of the tulips are "muddy," and that their dahlias are botanically imperfect; I, for one, care not if it be so, for it is not the less a fact that they grow lovingly and sturdily in the cottage-garden, while they often look, in a more richly-prepared soil, and under more scientific tending, as though they had been forced into unnatural uniformity; just as the glad gracefulness of childhood is palpably coerced by the discipline of the dumb-bells and the black-board.

To conclude the digression, however, and to return to the village—Advancing and receding irregularly, now flung back by the rustic builder, in order not to interfere with the growth of a fine old patriarchial ash or elm, and now standing closer to the public path, that the little willow shaded pond within its enclosure might not encroach too much on the convenience of the inmates of the dwelling, the quiet and modest cottages extended along one side of the Green, almost to the crest of the nearest hill; while, on the other, they gave place to grass fields, and patches of wheat or barley; or, still more grateful to the eye during the sultry noons of summer, stretches of mangel-wurtzel, with its large, heavy, dark-green leaves.

But the charm of Bletchley Green was the "Great House," a vast and imposing mansion which looked down upon the hamlet from a slight acclivity. A splendid specimen of the solid architectural taste of the times of the eighth Henry, it spread its lordly terraces, and extended its hanging woods across the whole brow of the ascent, until they were parted only by a low and ancient wall from the grave-yard attached to the little church already named.

The whole scene was calm and beautiful; and as Gertrude at length reluctantly turned away in order to return to her unpicturesque home, she heaved an unconscious sigh; for the time-touched and stately mansion, with its venerable woods, had brought back to her a thousand memories of Westrum, and the other dear old house which had cradled her youth. It struck her, too, as strange, that in that dearth of subjects on which to converse together, Miss Warrington should never have mentioned the near neighborhood of such a residence as this; and the rather, as the whole appearance of the place evidenced its inhabitation. Gentlewoman as she was by birth, even although crippled in fortune, she was decidedly eligible as an acquaintance at the Manor-house; and Gertrude, in her moral solitude, could not forbear a wish that this resource had been open to her.

Again and again her thoughts reverted to that noble mansion and its embowering woods; and the modest tea equipage was no sooner removed in the evening, than, as she resumed her work, she resolved to question her aunt as to its inhabitants.

"Oh, they are rich people, very rich people," replied the old lady quietly; "and far too grand to visit any one in Bletchley. The crimson-curtained pew, which you must have noticed opposite the pulpit, belongs to them."

"Then, they are absent," remarked Gertrude; "for it has remained empty every Sunday since I arrived here. Several times I have determined to inquire the name of its owners, but it has always escaped my memory."

"Their name is Armstrong; and Hannah tells me that they returned home two days ago, after an absence of three months. Here or there, however, it signifies little, for they are seen only at church."

"Are they, then, so very haughty?"

"Yes—no—I really cannot tell how to answer the question. They are free enough with the poor, and let no one want in the village if they know it; but their house is always full of company, and they are for ever driving or riding about the country; but, as they prefer the upper road when they go to the post-town, they never pass this way."

Gertrude sighed. She could not but feel that it was mortifying to know that there was refined society within her reach even here, and yet that she was shut out from all hope of participating in its enjoyment. A moment's reflection, however, sufficed to restore her to a more healthy frame of mind; she remembered that her circumstances were changed, and that she could no longer associate with the rich and the happy upon equal terms; and a flush rose to her cheek as she felt how little fitted she was, either by habit or association, to endure the mortification of any other species of companionship.

The subject was, consequently, dropped; for it was one in which the old lady evidently took not the slightest interest, and upon which Gertrude had as little inclination to dwell.

And so three days more passed on, in the same yearisome routine as usual; and it was with delight that the orphan, on the morning of the fourth, hailed the return of the Sabbath. Sunday was to her, indeed, a day of rest and happiness; the holy services in the rustic church, the calm and impressive manner and the simple eloquence of the venerable pastor, the only guest who ever passed the threshold of her aunt, and for whom she had already learnt to feel a reverence and regard, which he repaid in fatherly and affectionate kindness; the respectful and quiet demeanor of the simple congratulation; and that holy calm which ever prevades the country on a sabbath-day—all conspired to make it a festival to the heart of the orphan-girl. Her plain and mourning toilette was soon made; the solitary bell of the low church rang out over hill and valley; and, with her aunt leaning upon her arm, she once more advanced to the narrow pew of which she was a constant occupant.

The infirmities of age rendered Miss Warrington a slow walker, and the services had just commenced when they entered. For a considerable time Gertrude did not raise her head, for she had at once sank upon her knees as she took her place; and when she at length did so she threw back her veil, and remained looking earnestly towards the clergyman, totally absorbed by the pious offices in which she was engaged. It was not until the sermon was nearly concluded that she chanced to glance in the direction of the curtained pew of the Armstrongs; and she almost started as she perceived that she was an object of observation to more than one of its occupants. She instantly withdrew her eyes, but even in that momentary glance she had remarked that it was tenanted by four individuals; an elderly gentleman, elaborately powdered; a portly dame of about the same age, and two younger ladies, apparently their daughters. She perceived, moreover, that with the exception of those of the matron, who was evidently absorbed by the rector's discourse, the eyes of all its occupants were, in their turn directed towards herself.

The fact was, however, a very simple one; as she was in all probability, the sole stranger at that moment in the sacred edifice, and sufficiently distinguished by the simple but striking elegance of her appearance from the rest of the congregation to excite observation; and the only effect produced upon her by the conviction that she had been an object of remark, was her care to avoid all further glances in the direction of the Squire's pew.

Ere long the service drew to a close; and, once more supporting her aged relative, Gertrude left the church, just in time to see the inhabitants of the Manor-House enter their plain but well-appointed chariot, and disappear.

"There go the Armstrongs," said the old lady, as she drew her large cloak more closely round her, and leaned heavily upon the arm of her young companion, while they threaded their way among the graves; "All the petty gentry of Bletchley will now be once more busy with the doings at the Great House; and all the poor secure of help for the next three months. Our good rector always looks cheerful when they are in their places, for they lighten his duties by their kindness to the sick; and so do the schoolchildren, for they are sure of not being overlooked in some way or another."

"Could they have a better or a holier welcome home?" exclaimed Gertrude, as a tear swelled in her gentle eye.

"I don't know," was the matter-of-fact reply; "they must do something, and I suppose their pride suffers less from charity than sociability. At all events, you now know, and have seen all that you ever will know or see of the Armstrongs."

CHAPTER XXIV.

The Armstrongs were a good old family, and the Manor-house was worthy of its owners;

although the estate was somewhat shorn of its pristine splendor. Once the lordly domain of Sir Courtenaye Armstrong, to whom belonged alike, mansion, village, wood and hill, it had in process of time passed to the grandson of his niece; who, in order to render himself legally eligible to hold the property, had, by royal patent, assumed the name and arms of the Armstrongs; although the spurs of the brave old knight were not fated to be buckled on by his descendants, who had successively shown themselves rather addicted to the sports of the field than to its perils; while the extent of the property had gradually contracted under the pressure of debts and difficulties.

Enough, however, still remained to render the manor of Bletchley one of the finest estates in the county; and if the present owners were a shade less popular than they might have been among their immediate neighbors, that circumstance might safely be attributed to the fact, that neither by station, education, or habits, were those neighbors eligible to the acquaintanceship to which some among them so eagerly aspired.

But while the petty gentry and wealthy farmers looked with some asperity and indignation upon what they considered as the undue haughtiness of the Armstrongs, the prayers of the needy were secured to them by their unremitting attention to their wants; the schools and the poorhouse were rich with their gifts; and the cottages of the laborer and the peasant gladdened by their benevolence.

The head of the family was an honest, hearty, single-minded, and somewhat eccentric man, who was in perfect good-humor both with himself and all his possessions; and quite satisfied to live and be merry as long as he could, in this best of all possible worlds; and who, as he saw prouder and nobler neighbors gradually rise up around him, and occupy with their more modern mansions, and grace by their more high-sounding titles, portions of the land which had once acknowledged only an Armstrong as its lord, remained perfectly careless as to the exact position assigned to him by county etiquette, on those occasions when the said neighbors, who had obliged him by assisting in the consumption of his venison and claret, in their turn invited him to their tables; satisfied that Lord John, or Sir Harry, were only parvenus in the county after all; and that they would have given, and gladly given, no small portion of their broad acres to have felt themselves, as he did, even stronger in the past than in the present, as he sat among the monuments of his ancestors, and remembered that they had been lords of the same soil for centuries.

A good landlord, an indulgent master, and a liberal patron of all the local charities, Mr. Armstrong was permitted to doze away the five-and-thirty minutes generally occupied by the weekly sermon of the rector, in his comfortable and well-cushioned pew, without much comment; while the demeanor of his better half was so perfectly irreproachable, as she sat in the most scrupulously perpendicular position, immediately facing the minister, from whose countenance she never once permitted herself to withdraw her eyes, that she made ample amends for the solecisms of her husband.

Mrs. Armstrong was a portly and comely personage, still possessing some remains of beauty; or rather some trace of the prettiness which had, ere she had scarcely attained her sixteenth year, won the heart of her husband. Fine-tempered and affectionate, it was impossible not to love her; although equally impossible, at the same time, to repress an occasional smile at the little absurdities into which she was continually betrayed by an education barely ébauchée, and a remnant of romance which offered a strange contrast with her portly person and faded face.

The girls were well-bred, well-mannered, and well-looking; a century in advance of their parents as regarded knowledge of the world and social etiquette; but gentle, dutiful, and exemplary in all the relations of domestic life; while their only brother, the hope of his father and the idol of his mother, possessed not only a fine person, but one of those upright and noble natures which tend to exalt humanity.

Yielding and indulgent upon all minor points, Ernest Armstrong was firmness itself in all matters of principle and right feeling: incapable of bartering one worthy impulse against personal interest or self-aggrandizement, or of committing one disloyal action for the gratification of a selfish caprice. And yet even he was not without his faults. Who is so? He was aware of both his personal and acquired advantages; and, perhaps, prided himself a shade too much on each. He was ambitious too; and was ever yearning after some vague, shapeless, and untangible vision, to which he was unable to give either a local habitation or a name; but which filled him with vain aspirations after he knew not what, and rendered him less satisfied than he should have been with the actual advantages of his position.

The sun was sinking, and just as its last and ruddiest beam flooded the beach-woods with which the hills were clothed, the wide and lofty iron gates that opened upon the entrance court of Bletchley House were flung back, and Ernest Armstrong galloped up to the foot of the broad flight of steps, flanked with couchant lions, which led to the door of the mansion, and sprang hurriedly from his horse. The accustomed word of comment or direction was unsaid to his smart groom as he strode into the hall; and there was a cloud upon his brow which told that whatever had been his errand it had sped ill.

The last dinner-bell was ringing as he crossed the green, and he at once proceeded to his dressing-room, and made a hasty toilette, ere he joined the family party, which had already proceeded to the dining-room. On his entrance every eye was turned upon him; but the eager inquiry which had risen to the lips of his fond sister remained unuttered, as they caught a glimpse of his overshadowed countenance, and felt that, until the disappearance of the servants, they must abstain from all questioning.

Mrs. Armstrong was in her place at the head of the table, where she sat smiling at the silver tureen which glittered before her, as she was accustomed to smile on every person or thing which was familiar to her; while "the Squire," as he loved to be called, was as jovial as his wont; and the momentary disturbance occasioned by the tardy entrance of his son once over, he resumed his soup and his subject, without seeming to remark that anything had occurred to darken a brow which was generally as clear and as bright as sunshine.

"They are welcome to all their old castles, say I;" it was thus that he gathered up again the thread of his foregone discourse; "Give me a good, honest, substantial dwelling-house, with well-fitted doors and windows, and only as many galleries and staircases as may be necessary to lead to the rooms. As for your vaults and your dungeons, they may do very well for the dead and the dismal; but again I say, give me a range of cool cellarage, well stocked with generous old wine. I have no taste for such gimcracks, and I hope, girls, that you will never be bitten by this absurd mania for old clothes and old moveables, which seems to be making such progress among us. Nothing but wine and pictures improve by being—what do you call it? Aye, rococo—that's the word, and a queer one it is, but nothing that sounded like common-sense would have served to express the tomfoolery of the fancy. Pass the hock, Ernest, after you have helped yourself. Rococo chairs, forsooth! weighing half a ton, as bolt upright as a promising militia-man at drill, or carved all over, arms, back, and legs, as if to give you a hint of the tortures of the Inquisition by bruising every bone in your skin. I trust never to see any such worm-eaten enormities in my drawing-room."

"But all those old-world things are so picturesque, papa," said Eleanor.

"Very!" laughed the matter-of-fact old gentleman: "and so is a rock, but it won't grow cabbages; and the moonlight, but it won't force grapes or pine-apples. Believe me, my dear, that the most sensible and rational taste is that which leads people to appreciate all the improvements that are making from year to year, and to encourage the talent and industry that are required to bring them to bear. If people are to indulge in whims of rococo and their great-great-grandfathers, everything may as well stagnate."

"And yet, sir," said Ernest, as though the remark jarred upon the current of his own silent thoughts; "there is surely some respect due to the memory of the past—some consideration owing to a long line of ancestry?"

"To be sure there is! We should be the first to admit that fact, my boy. I am only quarrelling with the abuse of the virtue."

"Then the principle at least is worthy, even in your eyes, papa," smiled Mary; "and you are candid enough, I know, to concede that this taste for antiquity is at all events a refined one even in its absurdity."

"A refined fiddlestick!" exclaimed Mr. Armstrong good-humoredly; "I am not going to allow you to distort the real meaning of my admission; I venerate the abstract principle, but I detest the finicking demonstrations. I love and reverence tastes that encourage progression, and improve and advance commercial interests, feed the poor and support the artizan. Who ever thought, fifty years ago, of raking refinement out of a garret, and clothing elegance in the faded rags of a dead generation?"

"Still you must admit that there was something fine and chivalrous in the feudal dwellings of the old barons," persisted Eleanor.

"I don't quite understand the meaning of the word, my dear. I am a plain man, and should prefer comfortable to chivalrous, as I read the term, when applied to the building in which I was to live. Stone floors, easements sunk five feet into the walls, and oubliettes, may be very romantic appurtenances to a residence, but I am quite unsophisticated enough to be as well pleased with Brussels carpets, plate-glass windows, and conservatories."

"Some castles are very pretty, nevertheless, Mr. Armstrong," softly purred his helpmate; "Only remember the Tower of London! I'm sure when I was a child I used to long to live there."

"Your mother has settled the question now I think, girls," laughed her husband good-humoredly. "Why, my dear, there is scarcely a stone in the whole building that has not the curse of blood upon it! But now that the fruit is upon the table, and the servants out of earshot—Give this fine ripe peach to your mother, Eleanor—tell us, Ernest my boy, what has gone wrong with you?"

"Everything, my dear sir," was the moody reply.

"Why! you don't mean to say that the newcomers who have invaded the neighborhood are likely to interfere with the interests of a family which have been seated in the county for centuries?"

"And yet such is the case, sir. Of our own tenants we are, of course, sure enough; and were the poor voters, my mother and sisters would have secured them; but it seems that, with the yeomen and petty gentry, we are by no means so popular. You do not give sporting-dinners like Lord John, nor attend vestry-meetings like Mr. Hellingham, nor do fifty other things which would bring you into familiar contact with these worthies; and thus they have decided that neither yourself nor your son are 'fit and proper persons to represent them in Parliament.' Half-a-dozen electors, to whom I made known our intention of canvassing the borough, thanked me somewhat supereiliously for the honor which we desired to confer upon them, politely reminding me that, although the name and estate of the owners of Bletchley House were well known to all the county, its inhabitants were strangers in their own land, and gave me civilly to understand that they would have nothing to do with us."

"W-h-e-w!" whistled the old gentleman; "they are inclined to dictate to us our duties, are they? To draw comparisons between us and a brainless young prodigal like Lord John, who so long as he fills his house with noisy parasites, cares little for the kind of society which he ought properly to frequent; and a mumbling old meddler like Hellingham, who contrives to keep the parish in hot water, about paltry matters which one dip into his own purse would settle amicably at once? Give it up then, my boy; give it up at once, I say. What can it signify to either of us that we earn the privilege of adding two capitals to our name upon the back of a letter, and of being abused in the newspapers for holding our tongues when they think we ought to have spoken, or for having given our opinion when they consider that we should have remained silent."

"Yet to be so thoroughly shelved in one's own county is anything rather than pleasant, sir."

"Why, hang their impudence! so it is, Ernest, and I don't see that we are called upon to put up with it, if you feel any inclination for us to try our strength. We have no reason to shrink before the free eloquence of the hustings; we may not be popular, as you say, but we can have no dirt flung into our faces which we cannot readily wipe off. Do I owe any man a penny? Am I ashamed to look any man in the face throughout the county? Can I not answer boldly to my name in any place, and at any time? What do they mean by my being unpopular? We'll try it, Ernest, we'll try it."

"I trust you will, sir, for there can be no doubt, that you are the only legitimate representative of this borough."

"Or you, my boy."

"No sir, not I. It will suffice my ambition to follow in your footsteps."

The old gentleman smiled affectionately upon his son, as he replied,

"But the idea was your own, Ernest; as for me, I should have lived my life out without caring one straw who won the seat, always provided he were a staunch Tory, likely to do honor to his party."

"You should, however, remember that you owe a duty to the county, sir; all your wealthy neighbors are mere parvenus on the soil, while you have only to point to the vaults of Bletchley church to establish your claim, and to justify your position."

"It shall be done, Ernest; it shall be done."

"Then we have no time to lose, my dear sir, for I understand that two candidates are already in the field."

"So much the better," said Mr. Armstrong heartily; "there is no honor in walking over the course, so, early to-morrow we'll commence our canvass. You, girls, must drive into town, mount your smartest bonnets, and lay in a stock of flounces and furbelows, without inquiring too narrowly as to the price; while your dear mother has only to follow up her usual benevolent avocations to serve the good cause more perhaps than we now suspect. There's Jones too, my attorney, as good and as honest a fellow as ever breathed, will help us, heart and hand, I well know, for half a dozen years ago, he talked to me just as you are doing to-day, Ernest; but you were then at college, and I had no inducement to trouble myself upon the subject. Now, however, the case is altered, and I feel that I have no right to shrink from smoothing your path for the future. But who are the declared candidates?"

"Lord John Somers starts in the Whig interest, of course."

"Naturally. You seldom know a duke's son, emancipated from paternal rule, who does not show his independence by opposing his father's political principles, and establishing himself as a man of the people."

"And then—And this is the opponent who is likely to give us the most trouble: there is Sir Harry Vane, Tory to the back-bone."

"Aye, Sir Harry is staunch; it almost irks me to oppose him."

"He has, however, already shown that he, on his side, has no such scruples."

"All the better, my boy, all the better; there is the less occasion for delicacy. And if he only doses his voters with new wine, as he did his friends the last time we dined at The Chase, he will not fail to set their teeth on edge, and deliver them over, sad and squeamish, into our hands."

"Yet there are persons, my dear sir, who prefer thin port and muddy sherry to no wine at all."

"Which means—? Come, speak out, boy, you know that I hate all reservations in a family. Let me understand the drift of your remark."

"Englishmen seldom vote freely on an empty stomach, and prefer a shake of the hand to a touch of the hat."

"The last I will freely give them, but I shall hardly brook to feast the Smiths, Browns, Joneses, and Robinsons, under the roof of my ancestors. If I can compromise the matter by feeding them at the Red Lion—"

"Such an arrangement must not even be contemplated," exclaimed young Armstrong eagerly: "It would swamp us at once. No people are more exacting than voters on the eve of an election, and I, moreover, confess that I was quite unprepared for such fastidiousness on your part, my dear sir, when I remembered how little you have appeared to insist upon your privileges, and to stand by your order, ever since I have been old enough to remark, and to comment upon your mode of life."

"What! Because I am so thoroughly conscious of my true position in the county that I am careless of enforcing its rights, you imagine that I should readily play the host to a mob of semi-genteel, presuming and underbred men, about whom I neither know, nor ought to know, anything?"

"You cannot do without them; and moreover, the election once past, you need no longer annoy yourself or your family by continuing their acquaintance."

"Nay,—hang it!" expostulated the honest-hearted old Squire; "that were indeed a version of 'the orange sucked, we throw the peel away.' Recollect, young gentleman, that the appeal which I am about to make, since you declare that it must and ought to be made, will be addressed, not to strangers, but to my neighbors; men whose forefathers remember mine, and who would justly consider themselves aggrieved, should I carry the matter off in so cool a manner as you advise. It strikes me, Ernest, that such blind and selfish policy would leave the Armstrong interest at a discount, and somewhat interfere with your own views in the event of my death."

"Well, sir, perhaps you are right, and even in that case you will be no worse off than some of the proudest and noblest of our neighbors."

"Aye, confound it!" conceded Mr. Armstrong, "when a duke's son turns liberal he plays his card with a vengeance. I verily believe that there is not one owner of a brass-plated door in the whole borough who has not, on some occasion or other, found his legs under my Lord John's mahogany. Still, I say, that I dislike the system; not from personal pride as you well know, but because I do think, and always shall think, that a line should be drawn, and never overpassed upon any pretext, confining each class of society to its proper limits."

"I hope that you do not intend to sport that sentiment upon the hustings," said his son with a smile.

"Confound the hustings!" retorted the Squire, as he filled his fourth glass of port, and held it up admiringly to the light. "Have your own way, however, my boy, and arrange every thing as you think best. I suppose in these reforming days all my old-world prejudices must be laid aside; only thus much I will not concede. You and I may make shift to be hand and glove with the male portion of the population, and no great harm can ensue, but I will have no intrusion on my wife and daughters; no Mrs. Tomkins or Miss Simkins introduced into my drawing-rooms. Neither Mrs. Armstrong nor the girls are ambitious of a seat in Parliament."

"Had Ernest included us in his universal-visiting scheme," said Eleanor laughingly, "I should like to have commenced my social crusade by making the acquaintance of a sweet-looking girl in deep-mourning, who sat in the next pew to the rector's last Sunday; I do not think that I ever saw a more lovely face."

"Or a more ladylike deportment," followed up Mary; "Who can she be? I never remarked her at Bletchley church before."

"Saunders tells me," murmured the oily voice of Mrs. Armstrong, as she looked up from her plate, where she had been playing with a piece of preserved ginger, and listening with secret dismay to the discussion between her husband and her son; "Saunders tells me that she has been here for some weeks, and that she is the niece of an old maiden lady, a sort of decayed gentlewoman, who receives no one but Dr. Simmonds, and although in straightened circumstances, owns the house she lives in, and is as proud as she is poor."

"What a pity!" exclaimed young Armstrong suddenly looking up; "had she only been an uncle instead of an aunt, she would have had a vote."

"Now, fie upon you for a reereant, Ernest!" said Mary playfully; "here we are talking of one of the sweetest-looking creatures upon earth, and you are coldly speculating upon her maiden aunt."

"You forget that I have never seen this Bletchley beauty, and that we are on the eve of a general election. I promise, however, to favor you with my opinion as to her personal merits before you are eight and forty hours older. Will that satisfy you?"

"Not altogether; as I shrewdly suspect that your decision will be considerably affected by the old lady's politics. If you secure her interest, you will expatiate on the Venus; but should the ancient gentlewoman read you a Whig lecture, you will see everything 'through a glass darkly,' and turn traitor to your own taste."

"In which case I will bear witness against him," said Mr. Armstrong: "for a prettier little sylph never sported bombazine and crape. Poor thing! poor thing! 'tis but a sad dress for one so young, and apparently so helpless. An orphan, I have no doubt."

"If I thought so—" commenced Mrs. Armstrong, and paused.

"Well, my dear, if you thought so, what would be the consequence?" inquired the old gentleman.

"Oh, nothing wrong, you may be sure, my love," replied Mrs. Armstrong, nervously twitching the strings of her cap; "only it struck me that if she really is a gentlewoman, you might not object, although she is poor, to my showing her some civility. I have daughters of my own, and they will be orphans some day, Mr. Armstrong."

"Not yet, my dear; not yet, I hope," said the squire; "but you are quite right. If she should really prove to be a gentlewoman—"

"And if her aunt really has any political interest," broke in his son.

The sisters laughed, and even their father joined in the merriment, as he resumed waggishly:—

"Why, I see no reason to object to your showing her a little attention, if such a prospect does not alarm the girls."

"Nonsense, papa!"

"Very well; the peril be on your own heads. But we must, first, make some inquiries about the young lady."

"Our good rector, mamma says, is acquainted with her aunt. He will be excellent authority," said Eleanor.

"Undeniable. So, you had better question him upon the subject."

"Poor thing," murmured Mrs. Armstrong; "an orphan! I shall be sure to like her, for I am an orphan myself."

"Of some years' standing, my dear," said her husband with a smile; "and probably better reconciled to your fate than this mourning beauty. However, all I have to require is, that you will take no steps in the business until you have consulted Dr. Simmonds. Her appearance is certainly much in her favor."

And the subject dropped. The two girls were anxious to possess a new friend, their mother to do a kind action, and her son to further his electioneering interests.

CHAPTER XXV.

On the following day, all Bletchley was in commotion. The two Armstrong carriages had traversed the village de bout en bout, a circumstance which had not occurred within the memory of "the oldest inhabitant;" but even this marvel ceased to be matter of astonishment, or rather, was absorbed in a wonder still more wonderful, when the barouche, which contained the three ladies of the family, was seen to stop at the door of Miss Warrington, and, after a brief parley between the portly footman of the Squire and the mature attendant of the maiden lady, Mrs. Armstrong and her daughters actually descended from their equipage, and entered the house.

What could it mean? Never before had such an occurrence taken place at Bletchley; and, although the "professional men" of the adjoining town, who had "boxes" in and about the hamlet, had long considered themselves aggrieved, yet they had always declared themselves delighted, that the Armstrong family had never made the slightest advances towards an acquaintanceship, which, alike as neighbors and as "professional man," they considered to be justly their right.

And now—when at length the inmates of the Great House had apparently resolved to alter their tactics—How had they commenced? Not by rendering honor where honor might be said to be due, but by making their first visit to an old, impoverished, and uninfluential gentlewoman, who had herself lent a decided aggravation to the case by the fact that, although an inhabitant, and even a householder in the village for many years, she had never swerved from her original determination—not to admit a single neighbor under her roof, save the elderly and widowed rector, to whom she was furnished with a letter of introduction, and whom she consequently considered at once as her friend and her pastor, and Mr. Pilbeam, the apothecary, on the occasion of any indisposition.

Not even the kind attention and sympathy which Mrs. Armstrong had constantly and liberally evinced towards the two invalid daughters of a former curate of Bletchley, elderly maiden ladies, the one deaf, and the other paralytic, and which had been demonstrated in a manner at once costly and delicate, although, in deference to the wishes of her husband, she had never made their acquaintance; had any effect in lessening their indignation, when, as they sat behind the rusty Venetian blind of their solitary window, amusing themselves, as was their wont, by watching every thing that passed in the dullest of all dull village streets, and informing themselves, in so far as their obtuse faculties permitted them so to do, of all the affairs of their neighbors; they detected the arrival of the lady of the Manor with her two blooming daughters, and their actual entrance beneath the roof of the poor and proud Miss Warrington; who, despite all their own advances, still continued as great a stranger to them as when she first took possession of the dingy old house bequeathed to her by her godmother, and became a denizen of the hamlet.

"What's in the wind now?" exclaimed Miss Margery, as with a shaking head, she forced aside one of the laths of the blind in order to obtain a better view of the proceedings across the way; "What's in the wind now?" she repeated, raising her voice to the exact and well-studied pitch which rendered it tolerably audible to her sister; "Is the sky about to rain larks? And are the grandees of the Great House about to favor the gentry of Bletchley with their notice at last?"

"Better late than never," replied Priscilla shrewishly; "though it strikes me that it would have been more becoming had they paid their first visit to the daughters of a former pastor. However," she added, stroking into more approved order the neckerchief of snowy muslin which was primitively crossed over her bosom, and sweeping into a capacious basket a pile of sundries representing needlework; "we must not resent the slight, or we shall get no more game and old wine; though our thoughts are our own, and our feelings upon the subject cannot be altered."

"If you really think they are coming here—" began Miss Margery in her shrill tone.

"If I think!" interposed her more captious sister; "There can be no doubt upon the subject to any person of sense, and their having gone first to Miss Warrington's is in all probability a mistake. You really have no proper pride, Margery, or you must at once see the utter impossibility of their visiting any one in the village, and passing us over."

"Well, very likely you are right," conceded the tottering woman so vehemently addressed; "I am sure I do not wish to contradict you, and I was only about to suggest that we had better defer our dinner until after their departure.

"There is some sense in that, at all events," said the conciliated Priscilla, "and as the parlor is tolerably tidy, we have nothing to do but to watch for them."

"Ah! Thompson, how are you?" exclaimed the fussy little apothecary, as he extended his hand to shake that of a portly ex-stockbroker, who, having been nearly "cleared out" on 'Change, had retired to Bletchley with his wife and daughter, to exist as they best might upon the dregs of what was once a snug little fortune; "Gay doings this morning in the village, eh? The Armstrong carriage, I see, at the door of my patient Miss Warrington—Something new, eh? What can be the meaning of it?"

"Her house is her own," growled Mr. Thompson.

"Why, so is yours, and so is mine, but that fact will not answer my question."

"Your house is not your own, Pilbeam, you only rent it, and I am in the same case, or the barouche would have stopped at our doors instead of hers."

"What can they care about that, eh? They are not likely to wish to hire the house."

"Pshaw!" muttered the ex-stockbroker, shrugging his broad shoulders, "The ladies are canvassing, that's all."

"Oh! they are, eh? To be sure they are! How dull I was not to understand the manœuvre. But I must just slip back, and warn Mrs. Pilbeam that she will soon have company, for I have a vote for the borough."

"Oh! you have, have you:" was the surly reply; "Then I won't detain you, or Mrs. Pilbeam may not have time to change her cap before the enemy are upon her, and you can't do less than vote for old Armstrong, you know, when the ladies become personal friends. You must pocket your principles, Pilbeam, or you may chance to damage your practice;" and with this parting courtesy Mr. Thompson moved on.

"Surly old brute!" muttered the dapper little apotheeary as he hastily retrod his steps towards home; "And a constitution like a horse; the man's an eyesore to me."

"What can have taken the Armstrongs to old Misss Warrington's?" said the comely widow of a dissenting minister, who had fixed her residence at Bletchley, in order that her gawky son might profit by the advantage of a Wesleyan school established in the village; "I never was so surprised in my life!"

"I'm not," was the concise reply of the young hopeful.

"And why are you not surprised?" asked his mother in amazement.

"Because I ain't."

"Well, so you say; but surely you can give a reason!"

"The pretty girl's my reason," grinned Master Abinadab; "her son's made her do it. It's quite natural."

"Abinadab!" ejaculated the pious relict of the departed preacher, "What can you mean?"

"Just what I say. And I only wish that I could go to church every Sunday, to sit and look at her at my ease; for she's the prettiest girl that ever I laid my eyes on."

"Go to church!" almost screamed the matron; "go to church, did you say? This must be looked to. How will the discreet and holy Mr. Longwind mourn over you when he hears that your father's son is on the high road to perdition!"

"You needn't tell him," was the dogged reply; "and if he even mourned in sack eloth and ashes, he couldn't prevent my saying that Miss Warrington's niece is the prettiest girl in Bletchley."

The widow sank back upon her chair aghast. She had never hitherto suspected that the education of her hopeful son was so far advanced.

Little did goodnatured Mrs. Armstrong, or her daughters, suspect the commotion which their advent had created in Bletchley; little did they imagine that their visit to the orphan had deferred a dinner, prompted an impertinence, and alarmed the sectarian jealousy of a Wesleyan mother. And yet so it was; and had I, Asmodeus-like, introduced my readers into the secrets of every family in the village, I could have convinced them that the "sensation," as the French designate an excitement of this description, was universal.

Happily ignorant of the fact, however, the three ladies entered the neat and cheerful little parlor in which Gertrude and her aunt were seated, with a single-hearted desire alike to please and to be pleased; nor did they, in that humble habitation, encounter anything which jarred upon their refinement, or prompted them to regret the kindly feeling by which they had been led to visit it.

Miss Warrington, unaccustomed as she had been for years to receive guests beneath her roof, had, nevertheless, never forgotten she was entitled by her birth to find herself in the most unexceptionable society, and to hold her place even among the most fastidious on the question of family and breeding; nor was the quiet and somewhat stern dignity of her deportment lessened by a slight shade of displeasure at the fact that the ladies of the Manor-house had thus forced themselves upon her acquaintance, despite her declaration that she would hold communication with no one in the parish, save the rector; and that the politeness now tendered had, moreover, been tardy in its demonstration. Indeed, had the visit been made (as we are, however, aware that it never would have been) before Gertrude became her inmate, and had clothed in comfort and elegance the previous nakedness of the land, she felt that her wounded pride would have been too powerful for her courtesy; for nothing is more easily mortified than the self-esteem of genteel poverty; but now, as she glanced round her modest room, she saw little to irritate or to excite an uncomfortable sensation.

Erect, stately, and unbending, there was no shadow of obsequiousness in the welcome which she uttered to her unexpected guests. Had they been the acquaintance of years she could not have exhibited greater ease or self-possession; and while the whole frame of Gertrude quivered with pleasure her aunt remained as perfectly unmoved as though she rather permitted than exulted in the compliment which was now paid to her.

The unassuming manner of Mrs. Armstrong, and the honesty of her nature, were well calculated to remove even the slight feeling of annoyance which the maiden lady had originally been disposed to indulge; and thus, as she listened to the kindly-intentioned but not very profound discourse of her visitor, the fingers of Miss Warrington gradually relaxed their convulsive grasp, her mouth resumed its natural proportions, and even her figure began to lose somewhat of its rectangular rigidity; and meanwhile the three younger ladies were already engaged in cheerful and unembarrassed conversation upon the thousand and one subjects which young ladies love.

The piano, the drawing-stand, and the work-frame, all afforded admirable texts; and before they parted, the happy orphan, who felt her heart once more expand beneath the influence of congenial society, had already initiated Miss Armstrong into the mysteries of a new tapestry-stitch, and promised to assist Mary in a difficult point of perspective.

"I assure you, my dear Miss Warrington," prattled on the good-natured lady of the Manor; "that I am delighted to have a neighbor at last. It has not been my fault that I have been so long without one; but Mr. Armstrong is not fond of country neighbors, and it is my duty, you know, to consult his pleasure in everything."

"In that case, however, madam—" began her listener, with a sudden resumption of dignity, and clasping of the fingers.

"Oh, I know what you are going to say," laughed the light-hearted matron; "that in such a case I had better not have come here now; but I assure you, that as regarded yourself, Mr. Armstrong had no objection; none in the world; quite the contrary. I am so glad to know you, and he will be so glad to know you; and the girls will be so glad to know each other; that it is only a pity we did not make our acquaintance before."

"Let us understand each other, my dear madam," said Miss Warrington, as soon as the volubility of her companion enabled her to profit by a pause; "I am naturally much flattered by the offer of a friendship totally unexpected and unsought on my part; and I beg you to believe that whenever you feel it pleasant to exchange the luxury of your own home for the modest obscurity of mine, I shall always be honored by your presence, but I never leave my own house; I have not done so for years; never, indeed, since I was left an orphan, and my own mistress."

"How very singular!" said Mrs. Armstrong, with a smile which revealed her still beautiful teeth; "we are only five in number at this moment, and three of us are orphans; for Miss Mortimer, I apprehend," she added, sinking her voice to a whisper, "is also motherless."

"And fatherless," followed up her interlocutor, in an accent of deep feeling which could scarcely have been expected from one so rigid, and apparently so passionless; "Nay, I may almost add, friendless; for my poor Gertrude has no other protector than myself, and at my age, I cannot long expect to be spared to her."

"You are quite wrong, my dear lady, quite wrong," eagerly replied the kind-hearted Mrs. Armstrong; "she has a warm and a sincere friend in Dr. Simmonds. He speaks of her in raptures. And I am certain that when we know more of each other, we shall all be her friends. Only see how Mary and Eleanor are getting on! Now, who would believe that they had never spoken to each other an hour ago! But to be sure, our good rector had already made them acquainted with your charming niece; so I dare say they felt themselves at home with her at once."

Still a shadow darkened the faded brow of Miss Warrington. It would have been easy for a spectator to decide that, in her opinion, the young ladies were "getting on" too fast. They had turned over all Gertrude's portfolios, had ransacked all her loose music, had unfolded her tapestry, and at last appeared inclined to try the tone of her instrument.

Nor was this closing suspicion an erroneous one; for in an another moment Miss Armstrong was seated at the piano, and enabling even the modest orphan to feel that, brilliant and showy as was the execution to which she listened, she could fear no rivalry in that particular accomplishment; in which, thanks to the finished science of Sybil, she was so thorough a proficient, that she had even occasionally glanced at the possibility that, should she ever be reduced to the necessity of eking out her slender income by her own exertions, she might safely depend upon her knowledge of music for a livelihood.

"I have already spoken of myself, Mrs. Armstrong," said the proud maiden-lady at length after an evident struggle with her feelings, and under cover of the noise produced by the nimble fingers of the young musician. "And I am now anxious to speak to you of my niece. I am quite sure that you mean nothing but kindness to both of us; but that kindness may work a vast deal of evil to Gertrude. She is a good girl, a very good girl; she has made me happier than I ever expected again to be in this life; but I know that she is herself unhappy; I know that she must be so under my roof. She has been reared in luxury, and she is poor. I had hoped, and I still hope to reconcile her by degrees to the great change which has taken place. She has good sense, and good feeling, and she will gradually reconcile herself to her fate, if she is left to struggle against it in obscurity; but I cannot answer for the effect which may be produced upon her mind by constant association with companions so differently circumstanced as your daughters. I fear that she will begin to repine, to fret, to grieve once more over all that she has lost; in short, I tell you frankly, that I see nothing but danger and sorrow in the prospect of a friendship with your family."

"Then you do not like us?" asked her visitor, with another sunny smile, which showed how easily and trustfully she anticipated the reply of her companion.

"My only fear," said Miss Warrington, laying her thin hand upon that of her visitor; "is that we, and above all, that she, may like you too much."

"Thank you! Thank you!" laughed Mrs. Armstrong; "all is then as it should be. Have no care for the future. As to your pretty niece, she reminds me of the pretty lady in the song,—

> "Friends in all the aged she'll meet,
> And lovers in the young!"

and, moreover, I do not despair of making you yourself less unsociable than you threaten to be."

"I can exercise no control over my niece in such a case," persisted Miss Warrington, as if unconscious of the closing phrase of her companion; yet, if I can induce her to listen to me, I honestly confess that I shall endeavor to warn her against the perils of an unequal friendship. Gertrude has at once much to learn, and much to unlearn; and as her future life must be passed in obscurity, the sooner she masters her lesson the happier for herself."

"My dear lady!" exclaimed the eager matron, how prosily you talk! Just as if it were possible to foretell the fate of a pretty girl. Who knows but she may make a conquest under our roof. All the world are not seeking for money; and where could any man find a sweeter creature? Why, as I look round your snug little parlor, I see a thousand proofs of care and elegance, such as are frequently wanting in a larger establishment; and you talk of her having a great deal to learn.

"However, we are told you know, that 'no man is a prophet in his own country,' so I suppose I must forgive you. But we have really been unreasonable in our visit; we have stayed here an age, and you will be quite tired of us. Mary! Eleanor! Come, my dears; it is time for you to take leave of your new friend, or Miss Warrington will have reason to suspect that we have an idea of claiming possession of her for the day."

The two girls sprang from their seats, and each possessed herself of the hand of Gertrude.

"Good bye, then, my dear Miss Mortimer, for the present; but we shall hope to see you very soon and very often."

The orphan smiled amid her happy tears.

"And I want to show you to Mr. Armstrong, my dear," followed up the mother; "so you must not disappoint us. What say you to dining with us to-morrow? Now, don't tell me that you are engaged, for I will not believe a word of it."

"Indeed, Madam," replied my heroine—for radient as Sybil may appear to many, Gertrude is my heroine—"I had no intention of volunteering so wild a fable. An engagement, since my arrival at Bletchley, has hitherto appeared to me as unattainable as a meteor; but I am dependent upon the will of my aunt, and must first obtain her sanction, before I gratefully accept so delightful a proposition."

For a moment, Miss Warrington resumed her most rigid perpendicular, and looked the very condensation of a thousand refusals. She was human; and it was impossible quite to forget that she had been an inhabitant of the village for more than twenty years, and that this was the first occasion upon which she had been honored by the countenance of the owners of the Great House—a favor for which she was, moreover, shrewd enough to perceive that she was even now indebted to their admiration of her young relative. But in the next instant her pride came to her aid, and resolved not to allow them to perceive and to despise her egotism, she again unbent, and deferred the question to her niece, declaring that she had not the slightest desire to control her wishes.

"Then all is arranged, my dear Miss Mortimer," said the good-natured Mrs. Armstrong, giving a hearty shake to the hand which she had already taken in the full confidence of success; "And as you may find it pleasant to become better acquainted with your new friends before you are introduced to the rest of the family, the carriage shall be here for you at five o'clock. Nay, not a word of objection, my dear Miss Warrington, you know that our little village, pretty and snug as it is, does not boast even a fly, and therefore you must let me have my way."

Resolved to victimize her own feelings even to the end, and disarmed by the cordiality of her visitor, the maiden-lady forbore all further utterance of her objections; and after a few more parting compliments, the Armstrong barouche drove from the door.

"Why, it can't be possible!" exclaimed the shrill voice of Miss Margery Bayliss, as the long-tortured lath of the Venetian-blind sprang back to its place, "They are not coming here, after all!"

"They may please themselves," was the angry retort of Priscilla; "We want no patronage; we are gentlewomen born, and need not condescend to any body. I dare say the mutton is boiled to rags."

"Really, Mr. Pilbeam, you are a great deal too bad!" said his pretty but peevish helpmate; "There go the Armstrongs; actually past the very door, and it is quite clear that they never meant to come here at all; and now I may go and undress again; and put away your best coat, that you have been rubbing to pieces against the back of your chair for the last two hours. You are always trying to give me as much trouble as you can; thinking, I suppose, that with five children, and helping you to make up your medicines, I have not enough to do."

"It is not my fault, my dear. You know as well as I do that I have a vote."

But he argued in vain; for the irate beauty had already left the room in high displeasure.

"Aye, they may look about them as they drive along," said the precocious Master Abinadab, as he watched the departure of the ladies of the Manor; but it's no use, for, with all their flowers and furbelows, they'll never be able to hold a candle to Miss Warrington's pretty niece."

And there was also another who followed them with her eyes, as the carriage rapidly disappeared; and that other was Gertrude. Stationed behind the muslin drapery of the window, with a beating heart, and a glowing cheek, when she could no longer hear "the wheels of their chariot," she sighed, as though they bore her new-found happiness away with them. Again the past had come back upon her; again she felt that even for her there might yet be some sympathy in store: and then she slowly turned away from the casement, and her eye fell upon the upright figure of her aunt.

"When you are quite at leisure, Gertrude," were the first words which fell upon her ear; "be good enough to gather together all those ends of worsted. If Hannah attempts to sweep them up, I shall have my carpet scraped threadbare."

She was obeyed. The heart-chilled orphan quietly dropped upon her knee, and picked up, one by one, the bits of German wool which Miss Armstrong, in her zeal to learn the "stitch," had scattered upon the floor. Tears rose unbidden to her eyes; the illusion had vanished; and the cold, bare, shivering reality was once more before her. The unexpected deportment of her aunt during the visit of their unlooked for guests had surprised and delighted her by its quiet dignity, and she had, for a time, forgotten that it was not the ordinary mood and manner of her aged relative; but merely a reflection of former years and of former habits, which she would inevitably lay aside, (as the barrister lays aside his wig, and the dramatic queen her diadem,) so soon as its assumption became needless. Still, it had unconsciously, even to herself, increased her respect and veneration for the withered and desolate woman to whom she was indebted for a home, and when she had risen from her knee, and carefully deposited the offending shreds in the litter-basket which stood beside her work-table, she approached her affectionately, and said in a subdued voice—

"You are not displeased, I trust, my dear madam, that I have accepted the invitation of Mrs. Armstrong?"

The old lady coughed slightly, and clasped her hands tightly together, ere she replied, "Displeased! Oh, no; I have no right, no wish, to feel displeased; but I would much rather that it had not been given. Visiting is expensive amusement, Gertrude; very expensive amusement; and you cannot afford to visit. However, you know best. But I confess that I should not, under such circumstances, like to squander upon an evening's pleasure as much as would support me for a week at home."

"Nor would I do so, my dear aunt," was the meek reply, "for my conscience would upbraid me, bitterly upbraid me, were I guilty of so great a folly."

"And are you ready to suffer the mortification of exhibiting your rusty mourning among the gay dresses of your new friends? Are you brave enough to be pointed at as the poor orphan that Mrs. Armstrong and her daughters have taken under their protection?"

"No, madam," said Gertrude, proudly; "I can boast of no such courage; nor am I, as I trust, called upon to make so great a sacrifice of right and honest feeling. Had I ever dared to confide to you the amount of generosity exhibited towards me by my too liberal cousin, you would be aware how little I have to shrink from any contact, even with the elegant and wealthy family with which I shall so soon be brought in collision; while the second, and far more bitter mortification to which you allude, can never overtake me while I am the inmate of your house, and the daughter of your adoption."

Even Miss Warrington was moved, and her thin lips quivered for an instant; nor was it until she had recovered from this unwonted emotion that she resumed:—

"My house and my adoption are, however, very small matters in the eyes of the wealthy, Gertrude, but that signifies little; I only fear lest they should soon become so in your own."

As she ceased speaking, the orphan was on her knees before her, her mild eyes swimming in tears, and her lips fastened upon the withered hands which were clasped upon the old lady's knee.

"My only protectress, and with one far-off exception, my only friend," she murmured, "have you, indeed, so poor an opinion of the heart, so little confidence in the gratitude of the forsaken and abandoned being to whom, unknown as she was, you so frankly and cordially offered alike a home and a refuge from the world which had cast her off?"

"No, no, Gertrude, you mistake me," replied Miss Warrington, as at length, fairly overcome, she bent down, and pressed her lips upon the pale brow of the earnest girl. "It is not because I doubt, but because I have learned to love you, and am jealous of your affection, that I spoke thus. Dry your tears, and forget what has passed. I believe I now know you thoroughly."

"And for ever," said Gertrude solemnly; "and in order to prove to you that you do me no more than justice, I will at once renounce this new acquaintance, which has excited your apprehensions. Half-a-dozen lines to Mrs. Armstrong will suffice, and I will write them now—this moment."

"I no longer apprehend anything, my dear, and I strictly forbid the sacrifice," replied the old lady. "You say that you can visit these people without expense, and without becoming weary of my poverty, and, therefore, so let it be, Gertrude. You are young, and heaven knows that the life which you have hitherto led at Bletchley has been dull enough; this is your only prospect of a little change, and you shall not throw the chance from you. Bless me!" she continued, looking at her watch; "it is close upon four o'clock, and we have not yet dined! Wipe your eyes, my dear, and ring the bell for Hannah."

CHAPTER XXVI.

It would be difficult to describe the feeling of triumph and exultation experienced by Miss Delamere when she became fully assured of the success of her unworthy and unwomanly act of duplicity. After so long a period of suspense; after so unwearied an exertion of all her powers of fascination and address, she was at length, at the very moment in which she had began to despair of ever accomplishing her object, about to see all her hopes realized, and all her aspirations fulfilled. She had no time, or even inclination, to congratulate herself upon the fact that she owed her triumph to the fine sense of honor, and upright principle of the man who was to become her husband. She felt only that she had not striven in vain; that she had not suffered any obstacle to deter, or to impede her in her pursuit; that now, at least, she had sown the seed of policy in good ground, and that her resolute perseverance had overcome all impediments, and would produce a rich harvest in the future.

But, amid her exultation, there was, nevertheless, one harrowing recollection, which, like the skeleton of the Egyptian banquets, constantly obtruded itself on her most sunny visions. Sybil still remembered that she was not yet the wife of Mortimer; that she was not yet safe; that, until their hands had met at the altar, a thousand unforeseen and inexplicable chances might, despite all her precaution, overthrow the brilliant edifice of her hopes, and that even the delicate and fastidious sense of honor to which her lover had sacrificed all his doubts, all his misgivings, all the entreaties of his mother, and all the quasi-claims of his cousin, might, should it once more be called prematurely into action, prove the most dangerous and insuperable bar to their union.

"'If 'twere well done, 'twere well it were done quickly,'" murmured Sybil to herself. To be wrecked in sight of shore, were to render ruin en fold more bitter of endurance. There must e no more idle vacillation of manner on my art. I have awaited sufficiently long already crisis which I was, after all, eventually com-elled to create. His last words have given me right to act freely and energetically, and I ust exert that right. He loves me, thus much, t least, is certain; loves me, and wilfully blinds imself to the fact that he is about to place in ly hands, not only the happiness of his life, but ven his freedom of action, and liberty of will. Ie sees in me only a beautiful and gifted wo-an; and this is as it should be. He believes, oo, that he has probed my heart to the very ottom, and has found there no other image han his own," and a scornful smile rose to her p. "And what see I in him? That, at least, e has not divined. A superb edifice of human-ty, it is true, but built up upon a most fragile oundation: a superstructure of pride, and ego-ism, and vanity, decked out by the prestige of a andsome person, and hedged in by what the vorld calls honor—sensitive, and nice, and jea-ous honor. The world loves phrase-making, nd is satisfied by seizing generalities; but did t search the human spirit to the core, how vould it marvel when it discovered out of what oor and pitiful materials some of its most vaunt-d qualities are compounded! How I loathe hose soulless and nerveless beings who are con-ent, in the struggle of their kind for precedence, o sink down tamely to the very bottom of the vell of mediocrity, and to abide there without a murmur, content to see from their dreary pit he half-dozen stars, or the one struggling sun-beam, which, more in scorn than kindness, pe-etrates at times the depths of their voluntary larkness, until the rope of chance drags them hence to exhibit their weakness to the daylight. And what is Mortimer, but one of these—an un-table trembler, whose nature has been smooth-ed into symmetry and polish by prosperity, as the pebble is rounded and varnished by the tide that laves it, a man whose will can be governed by the first comer, as the vane is governed by the wind? Even now I cannot trust him, but look back upon the past, and tremble. Has not his heart yielded before his self-love? Have I not won his affections by pandering to his va-nity? And to-day, even to-day, at the eleventh hour, though I hold his plighted faith, might not one whisper suffice to overturn all my efforts? Let but that whisper reach him, and not even the spells by which I have made him captive would be strong enough to bind him to me—my reproach would be silenced by allusions to his wounded honor. It is not of me that he would think in such an emergency, but of himself. I see and feel all this, and I have no longer time to hesitate; either his fate is in my hands, or mine in his. We are both gamblers, who have placed our all upon a throw, but he handles the dice like a froward child, and it were degrading to be foiled by so poor an adversary."

Who that looked upon that beautiful and radiant woman, as she sat with her cheek pil-lowed upon her small white hand, and her large eyes bent down, and veiled by their long dark lashes, to all appearance absorbed in a tranquil and tender reverie—who could have suspected the deep and concentrated passion which even, at that very instant, was laboring in her bosom? But as the grove and the garden flourish in rich luxuriance, and garland with their perfumed greenery the base of Etna, while the lava-flood boils and burns within its crater, so did the gorgeous loveliness of Sybil Delamere veil the deformity of her moral nature.

And yet it had not always been thus. Only a few short years before, and she had been beautiful in mind as well as in form; but now the hot iron of the world and the world's vices had seared her heart, and had made her what she was.

Poets and romancers delight to paint the love of a woman's spirit in rainbow tints. The rhythms run more glibly, and dance along in softer cadences, when they embody joy, and grace, and harmony: It is more pleasant to describe Arcadia, than to borrow images even from the Pandemonium of Dante himself. But no true woman's love ever yet ran through all its course in sunshine: many and many a dark shadow falls upon the stream-clouds, sometimes weeping themselves away in innoxious tears to be forgotten when shed, but often—how often!—big with storm, and lurid with the lightning-flash.

Some escape the tempest, and learn to look back with a smile upon its perils: others fail beneath the trial, and are overwhelmed; while the bolder and the more desperate ride upon the wreck, and, like the syrens of old, lure others to the same ruin.

Some such reflection as this floated across the mind of Sybil as she at length looked up, and her proud lip wore an expression of bitter self-reliance which betrayed the working of her secret spirit. She had forgotten, she knew not for how great a length of time, that she was not alone; and now, as she glanced towards the fauteuil of her mother, she saw Mrs. Delamere with the usual novel in her hand, but with her eyes fixed upon the ceiling, and evidently as completely absorbed in thought as she herself had lately been.

"You must wear a gayer aspect than you now display at my approaching marriage, my dear madam," she said, startling her companion by the suddenness of her address.

"I thought that all was at an end," was the faint reply; "I confess that I had lost all hope. However, you know best, Sybil."

"All would, indeed, have been at an end, had your conjecture been a correct one," said Miss Delamere, forcing a laugh; "but surely you should have had more faith in my—what shall I call it? my fate, my star, or—if the plain term will not shock you—my management."

Mrs. Delamere sighed.

"'One swallow,' say the proverb mongers," pursued the younger lady, "'does not make a summer,' nor, believe me, does one failure make a defeat. I was yet young enough to strive, and I have striven; I vowed to succeed, and I have succeeded. I am loved, mother, loved as I have never before been."

"And you, Sybil; what of yourself?"

"Of me!" echoed her daughter, with a second ringing laugh, which sounded hollow and unnatural; "I made no vow to feel, as well as act. I had much to revenge; much to repair; I shall soon have done both; but I have played only with my head; my heart was no party to the game."

"Can you always silence it? If not——"

"If not, I can stifle its rebellion; the task will be no new one."

"And have you told him all?"

Miss Delamere started in her turn.

"Do you ask me if I am mad? If I have poisoned my own draught, and fired my own roof-tree? Do you not know that we are almost penniless, and that Mortimer is our last hope?"

Tears, large and silent coursed each other down the pale cheeks of her listener.

"No," pursued Miss Delamere, in an accent so resolute that it was almost harsh; "I have not told him all, or a few months hence we should have been beggars, and, moreover, he has no suspicion that our apparent wealth will, when he seeks to grasp it, be converted, like the fairy gift of the nursery fable, into leaves and ashes. Nay, do not look so scared; I have overcome more serious difficulties than this, and I have no inclination to shrink before my last trial. He is too sensitive, too tenacious of the world's opinion to be trusted with a secret like mine, which he shall never know or learn, until the knowledge must be borne."

"And Sybil——"

"I am aware of all that you would urge," pursued Miss Delamere with undisguised impatience, "but, in my case, such scruples could only be misplaced. I have read Mortimer to his heart's core, and I have not now to learn where he would fail. Fear nothing for the future; once his wife, I shall be able to mould him to my will—he is insufficient to himself—but this is a fact which no man will concede, even to his own reason, and in the solitude of his own thoughts, like the wind-harp, he does but give out the sounds awakened by an extraneous influence."

"Surely," murmured Mrs. Delamere, with a slight shudder; "these are dangerous sentiments for one about to become a wife!"

Sybil smiled bitterly.

"Is it dangerous for the traveller to perceive the gulf which he has to pass, or the precipice he is about to skirt? Should I be safer were I to close my eyes to the probabilities of the future? I have not now to learn that when a man really loves, he does not content himself by casting before his mistress, as Raleigh did, the mantle from his shoulders, but prostrates at her feet, alike his tastes, his prejudices, and his will. You will tell me, perhaps, that Mortimer has done all this, and you will be right; but beyond even this there is yet a step. Touch, though never so lightly, the sense of honor upon which he prides himself, and, at whatever cost, he will immolate all other considerations to that one phantom. And now, answer me, am I in a position to volunteer the revelation you seem to consider fitting?"

Mrs. Delamere was silent.

"Let me but retain my secret," continued Sybil, evidently rather communing with herself than addressing her companion; "and Frederic Mortimer shall not long remain the inert and vacillating being he has hitherto shown himself. There are some natures—and such is his—which cannot exist without extraneous support; and although, like the vegetable parasites, they may blossom while entwined about the sustaining props of a hardier plant, and assume at least a semblance of vigor, yet, when left to their own poor resources, they either grovel along the earth, and become sullied by the dust with which they blend; or, in endeavoring to elevate themselves for a season, only exhibit their intrinsic weakness, and become the sport of every breeze that passes over them. This has so far been his career; his aspirations are noble, but they evaporate in words; his strength exists only in his egotism; he is like one of those incongruous pictures which we sometimes look upon without well knowing whether to sigh or to sneer; a grand outline marred by the minor touches. Had he not been a weak man he might have been a great one."

For a few moments she was silent; and it was with a smile of haughty bitterness that she at length rose from her seat and resumed:

"I have now proved to you that my study in his case has been a profound one; that I shall do nothing rashly; but that I have even formed projects for the future which are at least partially unselfish. Now, however, when the moment for action has arrived, I must think only of myself. I have already suffered enough, more than enough; I will be no willing victim a second time. Yes," she added, with flashing eyes and clenched hands, as she paced the apartment passionately; "I have lived to listen to words which told me but too plainly the height from which I had fallen—to find myself considered merely as a coveted toy, where I had once been an idol—to see myself compelled to repay insult only by a smile—and shall I not be revenged for this? shall I tamely brook the degradation from which I may free myself by my own efforts? Little do they understand the nature of Sybil Delamere who believe it possible. As the wife of Frederic Mortimer I may defy even him; and I will defy him, aye, to the very death!"

"Sybil—my dear Sybil—what mean you?"

"You would know my meaning? Listen, then. Recall the past; live over again for an instant the last few years; remember how he loved me—how he pursued me—how he flung everything at my feet, and asked me only to stoop and gather up the offering.—You cannot have forgotten all this, for not only every memory, but every fact of our present existence is linked with those days—and now learn that it was to renew his suit that he was lately here——"

Mrs. Delamere leaned forward in her seat with eager eyes and parted lips.

"Yes," continued Sybil in a hoarse whisper, as she paused before her mother; "Yes—he sought me once again; but not as formerly—not with sighs, and protestations, and entreaties; but boldly, lightly, and unblushingly; with the eye of a conqueror, and the lip of a libertine——"

What more she might have added is uncertain, for as the last words escaped her quivering lips, Mrs. Delamere fell back insensible upon her cushions.

For a few moments Sybil remained looking upon her unhappy mother, without making one effort to restore her to consciousness; although the flush faded from her cheek and her clenched fingers relaxed. The storm of passion which had shook her spirits to the very centre, had, for a time, crushed even her powerful energies, and rendered her reckless of everything around her. Ere long, however, she recovered her composure, and without summoning other assistance, at length succeeded in restoring the scattered senses of the wretched Mrs Delamere; which she had no sooner effected than she asked bitterly—

"And now, Madam, have I not silenced all your scruples, and satisfied all your objections? Would you still ask me to trifle with my last prospect of social redemption? Have I not sufficiently expiated the past to have some claim upon the future? And shall I not more honorably fulfil my destiny as the wife of Mortimer, than as the mistress of Sir Horace Trevor?"

Mrs. Delamere swept her trembling hand across her eyes; they were hot and tearless; she had previously suffered deeply for years, but the iron which had hitherto only seared her spirit, had now entered her soul. She made no reply to the harsh questionings of Sybil, nor did there need any; for, regardless of their reception, Miss Delamere had no sooner given them utterance than she turned and left the room.

CHAPTER XXVII.

"Now do listen for five minutes, Ernest, while I tell you all about Miss Mortimer," said Mary Armstrong, as with one arm about the neck of her brother, she bent over him while he ran his eye along a list of names, spread on a table before him.

"I know all that you have to say," he replied with an impatient smile; "she is very pretty, and very bashful, and blushes beautifully; and is quite delighted by the condescension of the ladies from the Great House."

Mary laughed. "You have made a wretched guess. Pretty you knew she was, for you had seen her at church; but as for the rest—"

"Richards," murmured the young man, still intent upon his task; "We are sure of him, I think; he is a tenant of our own. Richards, twenty-six."

"She is not a whit less at her ease with strangers than Eleanor or myself."

"Indeed! all the worse, perhaps, both for her and her friends. Thompson—oh, aye, Thompson of River farm—doubtful, I fear; for I know that he is as obstinate as a mule, and as wrong-headed as—"

"Ernest, you are too bad. I have a great mind not to say another word."

"You could not oblige me more, for you see that I am fully occupied already. But, by the bye, what about the old woman's interest?"

"You must canvass her yourself, for we were by far too well engaged even to think of this horrid election."

"How very provoking!" exclaimed young Armstrong; "But you women are always useless in matters of importance. Why did you not take me with you? While you were turning the head of the niece I should have managed the aunt. Collins?—was it not Collins, Mary, who had an execution in his house last winter?"

"To be sure it was. Do you not remember that papa became security for the debt, and how grateful he has been ever since?"

"I thought so; then I may fairly calculate upon him. Collins, twenty-seven."

"Well," said Mary desperately; "as I see that you are determined not to listen, I shall tell you no more about Miss Mortimer, but leave you to form your own opinions to-morrow."

"And why to-morrow?"

"Because she dines here."

"Dines here? Impossible."

"Impossible as you may think it, she does dine here; and, moreover, the carriage is to be sent for her."

"Then we are sure of her interest."

"I was not aware that she had any."

"But her aunt must, as a householder, and the dinner to-morrow secures it."

"Well, upon my honor, Ernest," said Miss Armstrong; "you are a perfect recreant. Why, even papa himself would be more gallant. But I warn you not to calculate without your host, for Miss Warrington appears to me to be a very impracticable old lady."

"Oh, never fear; I'll exert myself, and flirt with the niece."

"I am not quite sure that you will find that task so easy as you appear to imagine."

"Very likely; but in a good cause I am prepared to go great lengths; and as she is really very pretty, I'll sacrifice myself without a murmur."

"Papa will be infinitely indebted to you."

"Of course he will," replied the young man, extending his arms in a long yawn, which he terminated by drawing his sister close to him, and pressing his lips upon her cheeks; "and to tell you the truth, Moggy, I shall not be altogether sorry to compensate myself by a little fun for this weary work; for, after all, it is weary work; and were it not that I expect Somerville down in a day or two to back me, I should almost feel inclined to give it up in disgust; but Somerville is a famous fellow, and an old hand at canvassing."

Mary made no reply, but a vivid blush stole over her cheek and brow.

"Well, and now, as it appears that I must hear all you have to say about the little cottage-maiden," he pursued after an instant's silence; "pray favor me with it at once. You found her very pretty, very gentle, and very captivating, it seems."

"We found her what we certainly did not venture to anticipate," replied Mary, rallying from her momentary confusion, "a finished gentlewoman."

"A Bletchley gentlewoman, of course?"

"You are too provoking, Ernest, and I shall leave you to make your own discoveries."

"Thank you; but just now I have not time to venture upon any; so shall content myself should the fair Sylvia prove as lovely across a dinner table as she does at a distance, with cautioning Somerville, who has a strong dash of sentiment in his composition, not to fall in love with her. He is fond of 'Love in a cottage,' and 'Love among the roses,' and all that sort of thing; and should he become thralled by her bright eyes, he will reserve all the smiles and flatteries which he has promised to diffuse liberally among the electors' wives and daughters, for her especial benefit, an arrangement, Miss Moggy, which would materially affect the success of our canvass."

"And you expect him in a day or two, did you not say?" Mary ventured to inquire, as she turned aside, and affected to be busily engaged in removing some withered leaves from a plant which occupied a jardinière near her.

"In a day or two," acquiesced her brother, with another formidable yawn; "and I heartily wish that he were here now. Do you know, Moggy, I had no idea that the Armstrongs were so unpopular about Bletchley."

"I am sure they ought not to be so," replied Mary, somewhat indignantly; "both papa and mamma are a sort of Providence to the poor; there is no distress which they do not seek to alleviate; no sorrow which they not soothe. If I were papa, I would not even seek to stand for their stupid borough."

"Come, come; we must have no treason in the camp," laughed Ernest; "remember that you ladies are our light troops, and that we expect good service from you all; aye, even Miss—— what did you call your new wonder?—even she must be made useful."

"What nonsense you talk, Ernest; one would imagine that we had picked up some poor little peasant, toward whom no ceremony need be observed."

"Ceremony! why surely you do not mean to imply that much of that frigid commodity will be required in the future acquaintanceship with which your newfangled fancy has provided the family!" said young Armstrong with a somewhat contemptuous smile, which so irritated Mary, that she turned on her heel and left him, declaring, as she reached the door, that she would no longer encourage such ill-timed and misplaced impertinence.

"Why, you cannot surely be angry in earnest, my pretty Moggy?" he expostulated.

"Not angry, but sincerely pained," she said steadily. "Is it because Miss Mortimer is poor, Ernest, that you should thus persist in a tone unsuited to the occasion? However, I have already wasted more time with you than I can well spare, and I will now leave you to your more congenial employment."

"Not with a frown at all events. Give me at least a kiss before you go."

Mary was not inexorable; she lingered for an instant, and as her brother whispered in her ear, "To oblige you I will even promise to fall in love with your protegée;" she could no longer retain her displeasure, but shaking her finger at him, said laughingly, "Always in extremes as usual; I have an equal horror of Scylla and Charybdis, so if you seek to please me, you will steer a middle course.

And with these words she disappeared; while young Armstrong, returning to his seat, soon lost all memory of the discussion over the important list of voters which he had been previously studying.

"Well, well, we must make the best of it now," said Mr. Armstrong, when informed by his wife of the invitation which she had given to Miss Mortimer; "but you have exceeded your commission, Charlotte. You know how carefully I have eschewed the petty gentry of the neighborhood, and now you have saddled me with a woman from Bletchley."

"She is so pretty," expostulated his good natured helpmate.

"So much the worse; these pretty underbred young women play the deuce in a family, especially where there is a grown-up son. Besides, a month hence we shall have the house full of company, and if you are to be consistent, you will be compelled to introduce this girl to people who will be as little pleased with her as she will be at her ease with them; by which means you will succeed in annoying all parties."

"But the girls like her so much—"

"Of course they do; young folks are always delighted with a fresh face, and have no objection to a foil," said the squire; "but I detest the principle. It is at once unfair and unhandsome."

"I'm sure, if I had thought that you would be angry—"

"I am not angry, Charlotte, but I like every thing in its proper place, and this poor girl will be out of place here."

"Somehow or other," said Mrs. Armstrong, who was not fastidious in her familiar phraseology, "Somehow or other, my dear, I think you'll change your mind when you see her."

"I hope I may," was the abrupt retort.

And he did so.

On the morrow, when Gertrude entered her aunt's little parlor, simply attired in a plain close dress of black crape, with a single white camelia half hidden among her luxuriant hair, even the obtuse Miss Warrington could not help thinking that she had seldom seen anything more beautiful than the gentle orphan; who, with eyes sparkling with anticipated happiness, and cheeks slightly flushed, appeared only anxious to conceal from her protectress the extent of her new-found joy.

"Why, you look like an angel, Gertrude!" she exclaimed involuntarily.

"May I always so look in your eyes," was the meek reply; but at that moment no thought of vanity mingled with the heartfelt and innocent delight of the fair girl. It was not that she had forgotten the past; it was not that she had ceased to mourn in secret over her buried hopes; for alas! the memory of suffering is like the poisoned bale, which when opened and examined, spreads pestilence over all with which it comes into contact; but she was young, and she had been living for months in an ungenial and chilling atmosphere.

Grateful, deeply grateful, as she felt to the aged relative who had received and cherished her, they had scarcely a thought or an impulse in common; differently educated and differently constituted, they had neither a taste nor a habit which could assimilate; and the unhappy girl was hourly pained by the conviction that neither time nor circumstances could enforce a greater congeniality between them.

Naturally open-hearted and confiding, Gertrude was compelled to exercise a constant restraint over herself: for she had once discovered that her nature could never elicit any sympathy from that of her aunt. Even her advantages of education and refinement, instead of proving a source of consolation, were, in her peculiar position an aggravation of suffering, and a cause of trial. Like all persons who have outlived their particular epoch, and who are unable to comprehend the progress which has taken place about them, Miss Warrington looked with suspicion and distrust upon all that she was unable to bring down to the level of her own understanding, and became irritated by every appearance of superiority; while destitute, save in rare moments of excitement, of both tact and sensibility, she frequently wounded where she believed herself to be simply uttering the merest common-places; and withered the young and sensitive nature of her niece by an antiquated display of worldly wisdom, as mistaken in its expression as it was repugnant in its principle.

No wonder, then, that Gertrude looked forward with her first feeling of recovered happiness to any congenial companionship. Had she been less nobly endowed by nature, or less pure and lofty in mind, she might have recurred to the chilling inference of her aunt, that she was about to be looked upon as "the poor orphan whom Mrs. Armstrong and her daughters had taken under their protection," but no such suspicion darkened the spirit of the orphan. She had been accustomed from her girlhood to meet the world upon equal terms; and she was unconscious that it could ever be otherwise, or that her altered fortunes might affect the feelings of others towards her. Had she, indeed, learned this bitter lesson, it might have dimmed her eye and paled her cheek, to reflect that she was about to brave such an ordeal; but strong in her honest single-heatedness, no misgiving came to mingle with her delight; and as she alighted at the door of the Manor-house, she thought only of the kindly words and smiles with which she had been bidden there.

When she reached the stately drawing-room, into which she was ushered by a venerable, gray-headed servant, she found it tenanted only by Mrs. Armstrong; whose greeting, smiling and courteous as it was, was still somewhat constrained. She was trembling, poor woman! lest her lord should not like Miss Mortimer so well as she herself did, and was consequently afraid of making too much progress in their acquaintance.

But, although the conversation languished, Gertrude found ample amusement in admiring the fine oak-pannelling of the spacious apartment, with its delicate carvings and grim old family portraits. To her such a room was fifty-fold more attractive than any modern saloon, tricked out with the myriad costly baubles which tell no tale of the past; and her bright eye wandered hither and thither, from the steel-clad cavalier to the wigged and frowning judge; and from the prim and powdered dowager to the bland and graceful maiden, undisguised even by the mass of hair and plenitude of petticoat which half concealed her age; unconscious that her hostess was ill-at-ease, and anxious only to find herself once more in the society of the two amiable girls who had penetrated like sunbeams into her dreary home.

She was standing, wrapped in admiration of a fine full-length, by Reynolds, of the late proprietor of the estate, upon which the last ruddy tints of the setting sun were lingering in a blaze of glory, when the door suddenly opened; and, as she turned with a throbbing heart to receive, as she believed, the greeting of her young friends, she found herself confronted by a slight and handsome man, whose extreme likeness to the portrait by which she had been attracted, caused her inadvertently to start; nor was she singular in her emotion, for the surprise exhibited by the intruder as his eye met hers, was equally apparent.

In the next moment, however, he advanced; and his bow was at once respectful and courteous, as Mrs. Armstrong exclaimed in a tone of undisguised relief, "Oh, I am so very glad that you are come, Ernest, for the girls are sadly late to-day! Miss Mortimer, my dear, Mr. Ernest Armstrong, my son."

Gertrude curtseyed, and resumed her seat while the young man, who had promised to sacrifice himself by flirting with the cottage-maiden in order to secure her aunt's interest for his father, was evidently at some loss how to commence his undertaking. He had, indeed, previously seen her more than once, but never as he saw her then; her graceful and delicate figure revealed in all its symmetry by the soft drapery of her transparent dress; her fair brow crowned with a diadem of sunny hair; and her whole appearance indicating the elegance and refinement which are attainable only by the well-born and the well-bred.

There is a description of beauty which speaks only to the senses; and which, pleasant as it may be to look upon, creates no diffidence in the spectator; and such was the beauty which Ernest Armstrong had prepared himself to meet, from the few and imperfect glimpses which he had occasionally obtained of Miss Mortimer. He had anticipated, also, the blush and flutter of an inexperienced girl suddenly launched into a sphere of society unsuited to her habits; and he was comparatively amazed to find himself in the presence of a beautiful and high-bred woman, at once modest and self-possessed.

One glance sufficed to show him all this; while every word she uttered only increased his admiration. The sunniness of her smile, the softened brilliancy of her speaking eyes, the varied expression of her lovely and animated countenance, and the rare and beaming charm of intellect which diffused a new beauty over what was already beautiful, together with those transient shades of melancholy which her early trials had rendered a portion of her nature; all combined to bewilder his imagination and to fascinate his feelings. His mother had, indeed, found a diamond in the desert.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Armstrong, encouraged by the evident pleasure of her son, resumed her usual composure. Where Ernest, with all his fastidiousness about women, took little pains to conceal his admiration, she could no longer doubt that his father would be equally satisfied that her discrimination for once had not been at fault. Perhaps she might have been less satisfied with her own generalship could she have known, that already, although half-an-hour had not elapsed since the introduction, her son was secretly lamenting the unlucky chance which brought Henry Somerville, the most popular man in London, to the Manor-house, before he had secured the claim of previous acquaintanceship with the beautiful young stranger. And never would Ernest Armstrong himself have so heartily rejoiced to learn that Henry Somerville was already engrossed with a passion for his sister Mary, as he would have done could it have been whispered into his ear at that moment.

Unconscious of the affect she had produced, and wholly absorbed by the happiness of once more finding herself in congenial society, the heart of Gertrude beat calmly, and a bland smile played about her lip. The sisters, on their entrance, welcomed her with a warmth which even satisfied Ernest; and although the old gentleman at first met her with a cold bow, and a grave courtesy which was almost chilling, his brow soon relaxed; and as he led her to the dining-room, his eye rested upon her beaming face a moment longer than it need have done.

"Have you yet commenced your flirtation with the pretty villager?" asked Mary maliciously, as she followed in the wake of her mother, who had taken the arm of Mr. Somerville, leaving her daughters to the escort of their brother.

She was answered only by an impatient "Pshaw!"

"Remember that her aunt must have some interest in the borough," followed up Eleanor gaily; but Ernest made no retort.

"Do you really not admire her?" asked Mary anxiously.

"Do we admire the angels!" demanded her brother in reply; "I can scarcely believe her to be human."

"My dear Ernest!" expostulated both the girls somewhat alarmed, "what can you mean?"

"To 'fool you to the top of your bent,' what else?" said the young man, making a violent effort to restrain himself. "Do you not know that both my head and heart are now too fully occupied by votes and voters, to have much attention to spare, even to so pretty a girl as your village divinity?"

Reassured by this reply, the sisters seated themselves at table; Mary, in quiet gladness, beside the brilliant Somerville, and Eleanor near her new friend. The meal passed in unusual cheerfulness, for Mrs. Armstrong was silently congratulating herself upon the evident satisfaction of her husband; while the Squire himself, startled out of his ordinary exclusiveness by the beauty and elegance of his fair guest, and gratified by the arrival of his son's friend to share the fatigue of the approaching canvass, was full of jest and merriment.

The spirits of Gertrude rose under the influence of so genial an atmosphere; and the winning sweetness of her manner, combined with the cultivation of her mind, won upon all around her, although by no means in an equal degree; for, long before the evening came to a close, Ernest Armstrong was what is commonly called "over head and ears in love" with the beautiful orphan.

Although accustomed from his boyhood to frequent the society of his sister's friends, among whom were many richly endowed alike by nature and by fortune, Ernest had never, hitherto, evinced so decided a preference for any one of the fair girls with whom he was brought into contact, as to justify his father in the fondly-indulged hope that he would contract an early marriage; nor had even the raillery of the old gentleman upon a coldness which he declared to imply a degeneracy unpardonable in an Armstrong, produced the slightest effect.

Happy in his family, and devotedly attached to his sisters, Ernest enjoyed the passing hour without attaching any importance to the smiles which were lavished upon him on all sides; returning to the domestic circle, after every temporary absence, with all the cheerfulness and buoyancy that he had quitted it.

Under these circumstances, however he might regret the apparent insensibility of his son, Mr. Armstrong, nevertheless, consoled himself by the belief that the natural ambition of Ernest would effectually protect him from all danger of forming an unequal, or what he would have designated, an unworthy marriage; and was fain to be satisfied to see year after year go by without any change in the young man's pursuits or wishes. Assuredly the idea was not likely to cross his mind that the village of Bletchley was destined to produce the fair one who was fated to teach the hitherto insensible heart of his heir that, like those of other men, it was formed of "penetrable stuff," and he consequently saw no danger in the bright eyes and ruby lips which had, nevertheless, so soon succeeded in thawing the aristocratic ice of his own nature; for, with all his home-joviality, Squire Armstrong was deeply imbued with that ancestorial vanity so common among our old English families; and looked upon his genealogical tree as the noblest possession of his race.

And yet, whether it were the novel manner of Gertrude's introduction to his domestic circle, or that she, in truth, possessed all the personal and moral attributes which were calculated to thrall his fancy, it is certain that she almost instantly effected an extraordinary revolution in the sentiments of Ernest Armstrong. For the first time in his life, he became aware that even his affection for his family, and that yearning after some as yet unexplained good for which he d panted from his boyhood up, did not suffice t satisfy all the cravings of his heart, in which eper and softer feelings were nestled, which d never, hitherto, been awakened from their rt. Unconsciously, even to himself, he had obably formed a beau idéal of female perfection hich all his previous experience had failed to alize, and which was now suddenly placed fore him; for it is certain that every mind entes its own fabric of brightness; every imagination combines its own vision of beauty; and ery taste establishes its own rule of harmony. he world is full of loveliness, but that loveliness ects different persons in a different degree; a cumstance whence must be deduced the fact, at scant justice is frequently rendered to the ractions of some very handsome women, while se of others excite the greatest enthusiasm in e same individuals.

Thus it chanced that in Gertrude Mortimer re combined all the peculiar excellences hich were essential to the taste of Ernest Armong; who, affectionate rather than impassionc could see no cham in a beauty devoid of ttleness and repose, and who was a stranger that exaggeration of sentiment, and impetuosit of feeling, which are as brief as they are demonstrative. His temperament partook rather the genial warmth of the sunshine which lgers were it glows, than of the fiery lava hich consumes all over which it passes, only to lurate into stone as it flows onward. His ttes, save such as led him to covet advancent and the world's plaudits, were simple and rined, and there was a depth in all his feelings hich, although difficult to fathom, rendered m equally beyond the power of common ents to ruffle or disturb.

To love, with such a man, was to love earnestland well, and the fact that he had attained l four-and-twentieth year without even adtting to himself a preference, far less a passion, as a sufficient proof that he was not to be misl merely by an excited fancy. Accustomed to alyze and to reflect, he readily detected the se-seeming of the designing, and the artificial; vile he was keenly alive to all that was sincere, l great, and beautiful. Mature in mind, beuse alike self-governed and persevering, he uld appreciate the mental and moral qualities others, at the same time that he possessed in uself every necessary attribute to grace and dden domestic life.

Such was the heart which Gertrude was destted, unconsciously, to win,—poor Gertrude, o had been slighted and abandoned for a recious and worldly coquette by one who ould have known and prized her better; but l human beings always pursue the fitting path, ts world would become a paradise, and we ould be apt to forget that there is a brighter d beyond.

Little dreaming that the happy evening which e had spent in the midst of smiles, and flowers, l music, was to form an era in the existence c one at least of the party, she consequently ok leave of her friends at the Hall with a ddened and a grateful heart, over which no gle shadow reflected to mar its joy, and on her r neward drive poured out her spirit in thankfulness to Him who had raised for her so bright an oasis in the desert of her blighted existence, and looked with renewed cheerfulness upon a future from which she had hitherto shrunk with a feeling of desolation and anxiety.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

The time, meanwhile, was passing very differently with Sybil. Like Gertrude, she had been cradled in luxury, and, like her, she had experienced a reverse; but there ended the parallel. The trials of the orphan had been totally independent of her own actions, while the brilliant Miss Delamere had recklessly rushed upon her fate. Born in the midst of affluence, she had been the child of care and affection, and happiness appeared to be her birthright. The passionate caresses of a weak and indulgent mother, and the ill-judged admiration of a short-sighted father, proud of her beauty, and lavish of his praises, had early taught her the secret of her childish importance, while the uncalculating expenditure by which she was surrounded, imbued her with a selfishness that, even in her girlhood, became the mainspring of all her actions.

To desire was, in her case, to possess, and to possess was ere long scarcely to enjoy. Unconscious, or, still worse, careless of the wants of others, poverty was to her an empty sound; and human suffering the invention of romance, or the heirloom of a race distinct from that to which she appertained, and consequently, beyond the pale of her sympathy. Her eyes were never pained by the dismal spectacle of penury, nor her ears importuned by the wailings of the unfortunate. Her sky was all sunshine, and she never paused to ask herself over whose devoted head the clouds had lowered which were swept from her own horizon. If she ever wept, the tears were those of a susceptible vanity, so easily wounded as to be seldom beyond the reach of the most puny weapon; for she had no other sorrows, and as her whole existence was concentrated in self, so she had no grief to give to the woes of those less richly dowered.

In one respect, however, this self-adulation proved her friend; for anxious to shine in that world which was the worshipped idol in her luxurious home, she devoted herself with the pertinacious earnestness which formed a strong feature in her character, to the various studies which were rather suggested than urged upon her. In every showy accomplishment she soon excelled; and, overwhelmed by the delighted encomiums of her exulting parents, she learned to appreciate the increase of attraction which she thus secured, and turned eagerly to newer and more difficult attainments.

These she mastered in their turn, to a degree which rendered her what she had always panted to become—the envy of her own sex, and the admiration of the other; and the petted, overdressed, and jewel-laden plaything of the drawing room; the wilful, capricious, and haughty idol of the nursery; and the pains-taking and persevering tenant of the schoolroom, found herself at eighteen "the observed of all observers." Something was, however, still wanting, and for the first time in her life she found that something beyond her reach, and discovered that she was not all-powerful. Surrounded by the costly appearances of wealth, the reputed heiress of thousands, and the belle of every ball-room; gifted alike by nature and by fortune, Sybil Delamere aspired to exalted rank, and deemed no station too lofty for her merits. In vain did suitors present themselves, to whom even her anxious and doting father could advance no plausible objection; their addresses were repulsed with scorn; and the haughty beauty at the age of five-and-twenty found herself still Miss Delamere.

It is true that she had nobles in her train, but among these some demurred to her pedigree; others to her undisguised coquetry; and others again, (the weakest of the tribe,) to her somewhat ostentatiously displayed acquirements. She was a delightful companion in a ball-room, a charming acquaintance in a crowd, but none among them wooed her as a wife. They enshrined their idol with the most delicate flattery, but they left her upon her self-erected pedestal.

Nevertheless she untiringly pursued her object. Wealth could not win her, for she was unconscious of its value, never having felt its want; of superior talent she was jealous; for in her inborn selfishness she loved it only as a means, not as an end; while to the gentler and purer charm of genuine affection she was altogether insensible—she sufficed to herself. Every action, every word was measured, and adopted to the one engrossing aim of her life—a marriage of vanity, and nothing appeared impossible to her imperious and ambitious spirit.

Handsome, witty, and self-possessed; as she disgusted one set of admirers by her insolent assumption, she saw new lovers ever ready to chain themselves to the wheels of her chariot, and at length, among the crowd of her admirers she numbered Sir Horace Trevor, a baronet of ancient family and large estate, who, captivated by her beauty, and the admiration of which she was everywhere the object, laid himself and his fortunes at her feet after the brief acquaintance of a month.

Assuredly such a marriage was far from realising the long-indulged visions of the spoiled beauty; but as he whispered his hopes into her ear during the pause of a quadrille, she suddenly remembered that her youth was ebbing from her, and that she had attained the sober age of twenty-five.

What marvel, then, that she answered by a smile?

A few months subsequent to this engagement, Sybil lost her father; nor was it until upon his death-bed he revealed the fact, that she became aware of the hollowness of her position. She had, indeed, long been standing upon a sand-heap, which was rapidly crumbling away beneath her.

The principal of a mercantile house which had for several generations ranked as one of the most wealthy in the country, Mr. Delamere had sacrificed to ostentation and self-indulgence so large a portion of his capital, that he found it necessary to enter into extensive and hazardous speculations in order to retrieve his falle fortunes; but, naturally sanguine, reckless, an indolent, he had by such means only increase his difficulties, and now, in his last hour when he should have put from him all though of the world, and the world's vanities, h found himself compelled to humble his proud spirit before the wife whom he had ruine and the daughter whom he had deceived; an to confess that he had for years existed upo the credit so long and so laboriously create by his predecessors, while he was, in fact, a most a beggar.

He told his tale, and died.

With what feelings it was heard by his ap palled and helpless wife, it were idle to attemp even for an instant, to describe; while upo Sybil it produced no more powerful effect tha surprise. To her the idea of approachin poverty could only convey a mass of vague an undefined images; she attached no tangibl meaning to the word. Her father had de clared, while the large tears fell slow and col upon his wasted cheeks, that thenceforwar there remained nothing to his family save th strictest necessaries of existence; and Syb with a smile, had bidden him cease to griev for this at least, as they should be rich enoug with these.

And if the dying man, even amid his blin and doting adoration of his brilliant child marvelled despite himself, for a moment at th cheerful self-abnegation of one who had neve hitherto displayed so holy and beautiful forgetfulness of her own interests, the mistake was happy one, and served to smooth his downward passage to the tomb; for even he, in such a hour, ceased to remember that his prized an pampered Sybil numbered among the necessaries of every-day life equipages, and jewels and piled carpets, and silken draperies, an all the gaud and glitter of fashionable existence.

But even had Miss Delamere been enabled t form a more correct estimate of the essential of life, she would still have regarded with per fect philosophy the change which had s suddenly come over her fortunes; for she re membered her engagement, and consequentl felt herself free from all apprehensions for th future. Sir Horace Trevor was sufficiently wealthy to render such a circumstance unim portant, and she never reflected for an instan that the ruin of her father could affect her ow prospects.

Nor was her trust in her lover ill-founded The baronet, of course, learned, with the res of the world, that the apparently gigantic wealth of Mr. Delamere had been a mer splendid fallacy; but he was too thoroughly subjugated by the fascinations of his affianced bride to see in such a circumstance any reason for liberating himself from his engagement and thus, although when the affairs of th deceased merchant were wound up, amid which the personal debts of Sybil herself furnished no inconsiderable item, and that it was ascertained how very limited a sum remained fo the maintenance of the widow and her daughter rither the vain and weak mother, or her child, onsidered it necessary to make the retrench- nts which their altered means suggested; rely satisfying themselves with such as were forced upon them by their mourning state, d retiring to one of the country residences Mr. Delamere, which, by the zeal and self- votion of some of his tried friends, had len saved from the wreck of his property, d there surrounding themselves with the luries and comforts to which they had been ustomed.

Under these circumstances it is scarcely neces- ry to explain that the capital, which, pru- ntly administered, might at least have insured the survivors a modest existence, became pidly diminished in amount; but still no at- mpt was made by either to defer the impend- g ruin.

Mrs. Delamere, who had throughout her ole life, been accustomed to depend on others, andoned the care of her future career en- rely to Sybil; who, strong in her prospect of on becoming Lady Trevor, scorned to admit e possibility of any change in their mode of e.

Had not their equipages been reduced from ree to one?—their establishment from half- dozen lounging and powdered footmen, to a itary male attendant? Had they not with- awn from the gay world into an almost total itude?

To the supine and sorrowing mother, such guments were unanswerable, and with a total norance of business she rapidly satisfied rself that it was impossible to accomplish re; and as she glanced from her crape and mbazine to the glowing countenance of Tre- r, and the evident composure of Sybil, who d voluntarily assumed all the responsibility their position, she ceased to trouble herself on the subject.

Thus the year of mourning passed by; and th it passed away also an important portion the means upon which they had now to de- nd for their subsistence; but this considera- n appeared in no degree to influence the oceedings or feelings of Miss Delamere. As e period arrived at which the widow could ce more appear with propriety in the world, e took active measures to dispose of the etty villa, which was their last home of rly days, and having succeeded in securing eligible purchaser, completed the sale under r mother's sanction; and forthwith busied rself in appropriating the proceeds to the rangement of a hired house in an unexcep- nable part of town, whence her marriage ight take place without derogation, either to r own consequence, or to that of her bride- oom.

Wearied of the monotony of the country, d glad of any change which promised amuse- ent, Mrs. Delamere looked on in silence; and hen she once more found herself in the midst accustomed scenes and familiar faces, she lt no inclination to question the prudence by hich her individual comfort was thus en- nced, while Sybil herself, delighted to be ce more restored to congenial habits of dissi- pation, and to become anew an object of adula- tion and envy, closed her ears alike against the warnings of friends and the sneers of enemies, and plunged recklessly into the torrent of fashion, which received her upon its surface, as it is ever willing to do every brilliant bubble, so long as it is able to support itself by its own buoyancy, content to take its revenge upon its hollow mockery when it bursts.

Sir Horace Trevor was assiduous in his hom- age; somewhat weak, and undisguisedly vain, the lounger of fashion, who was about to sacri- fice what the roués of society call their freedom to the charms and fascinations of Miss Delamere, was too proud of the admiration elicited by his affianced wife to find any time, or to feel any inclination to censure the wanton improvidence which was necessiated by its indulgence. Per- haps he might have desired to see the accom- plishments and attractions of the beautiful co- quette more immediately exerted for his own gratifications; but be this as it might, it is at least certain that none could have discovered such a feeling in his manner; and that, although the name of the brilliant Miss Delamere was oc- casionally coupled at the clubs, or on the mall, with those of more than one of his most familiar friends, (and that not always with the degree of respect and caution due to a betrothed wife,) he was still to be seen at her side, alike in pub- lic, and in the luxurious semi-solitude of her home, as attentive, as devoted, and as absorbed as ever.

The season was nearly at an end. London began to yawn from its suburbs to its very cen- tre. That minute portion of its denizens who insolently call themselves "the world," were hurrying either to their estates in the country, or to display their wearied glories in foreign courts; the matches which had been arranged during the turmoil of the last three months, were publicly heralded in the "Post," for the edifica- tion of the vulgar, and were already engrossing the inventive faculties of milliners, and employ- ing the technical talents of the law. It had been, as was generally allowed by the privileged, an "unusually good spring;" tradesmen were calculating their gains, and mothers smiling over their triumphs. There had been no important deaths "to plunge half a dozen noble families into mourning," and people had nothing left to do but to rush abroad and become voluntary exiles for the remainder of the year, or to stay at home and "dullify."

Sybil, like the rest, was somewhat worn and somewhat withered by the ceaseless race of dis- sipation; but this was not all. Among the "fashionable departures for the continent" figured the name of Sir Horace Trevor—Trevor, the ob- sequious suitor, and the affianced bridegroom— Trevor, the bewailed of the clubs, and the mourned of the dandies—Trevor, the quasi-ben- edict! What could this mean?

Suffice it that he was gone, and that there was joy and gratulation at the hearth of his venerable father. It was evident that, be the cause what it might,—and the secret had been, for a wonder, marvellously kept—his marriage was at an end.

In another month, Mrs. Delamere and her daughter left town, and in three more they were domesticated at The Grange.

CHAPTER XXIX.

The little French clock in the morning-room of Miss Delamere had chimed twelve, and was still ringing out the simple and pretty air of Charmante Gabrielle, in that clear and almost unearthly harmony which seems as if created by the movements of a fairy dancing over a peal of silver bells; but its music had evidently no charm for the ear of its brillant mistress. Attired with a care and coquetry which betrayed her determination to enhance to the utmost the value of her personal attractions, there was, nevertheless, a cloud upon the brow of Sybil which accorded ill with the festal character of her dress. And well might it linger there, for she felt that the next few hours must decide her fate.

As yet Mortimer had not disappointed even the slightest of her anticipations. She had played her game skilfully and boldly, and the stake was almost won. But there was still a difficulty to overcome; and even she, self-sufficing as she was, shrank before it. She had yet to tell him that she was a beggar! True, she had smiled when her mother alluded to this necessity, and declared the matter unimportant; but when she compelled herself to look closely, and to remember the circumstances under which they had originally met, and the false seeming by which she had maintained her brilliant position, her heart almost failed. Had she not already found it necessary to urge forward her marriage by an expedient which even she herself blushed to recall, although she would not have hesitated to repeat it had there existed need for such a measure? And had she not ventured upon this expedient from a knowledge of the susceptibility of her suitor in all that regarded his honor? Here at least she had possessed a strong conviction to work upon; but in her present extremity she was less assured. Of the fervent and almost blind affection of Mortimer she could not entertain a doubt; but she was nevertheless aware that he had wooed and won her under the impression that she was as wealthy as himself; and she could not foresee the effect likely to be produced upon his mind by the discovery of so vital an error.

For the first time in her life she felt that she had overacted her part, and voluntarily plunged into a sea of difficulties. It was, however, too late for repentance, for she could no longer conceal the real circumstances of her position.—Mortimer had already spoken of the necessity of summoning a professional friend for the purpose of preparing the marriage-settlements; and she was well aware that a lawyer was not to be blinded like a lover. Moreover, her pecuniary resources were almost exhausted; she had no longer an instant to lose: all the splendor and indulgence by which she had surrounded herself were about to vanish like a dream; and she bitterly felt that youth and hope would alike pass away with them. All further attempt to disguise her actual situation was impracticable and even fertile as she had proved herself hithe to in expedients, she was compelled to admit th fact. Nothing was left, therefore, save to avo her utter want of fortune to Mr. Mortimer, an to trust to fate and her own fascinations to a complish a new triumph.

Upon one point alone she was decided—sh must not—she dared not—tell him the truth she knew too well that his rigid sense of righ would revolt against the persevering falsehoo and dishonesty of her past conduct; some fabl must be invented to amuse him, and to interes his sympathies in her behalf; he must not b suffered to suspect that he had been duped.

Such were the reflections of the female Ma chiavel, who sat surrounded with luxury, an herself the brightest object in that sunny sum mer-room, awaiting the advent of her suitor and well had she calculated her influence ove his mind. "Every thing by turns, and nothin long," the very "Cynthia of the minute," sh was aware that her strong hold on Mortime was her infinite variety, which amused hi imagination while it bewildered his judgment Tears had served her well upon a former occa sion, but then it was the fond and sensitiv woman shrinking from the first faint breath o blame, and tears were the natural and fittin concomitant of such a grief. Now, it was he pride, not her delicacy, which was in arms She must show him that she would rather resig even his love than her own self-respect. Il must find her with a dry eye and an apparentl settled purpose, however that purpose wa actually destined to be shaken by his expostu lations. But, confident as she was in he powers of dissumulation, she was yet terrified lest, by so utter a change in her worldly cir cumstances, those expostulations should be with held; and now, in her solitude, there was n acting in the terrible emotion which bathe her brow with chilling damps, and made he pulses throb.

A rapid step in the hall, and the hurrie opening of the door of her apartment, ere lon startled her into the renewed energy of purpose and as Mortimer approached her with joy beam ing in his eyes, she extended her hand, an struggled to smile a welcome.

The quick glance of affection was not, how ever, to be cheated by the compelled wreathin of that pale and trembling lip; and it was wit great alarm that Mortimer inquired into th cause of so violent an emotion.

"Alas, Frederic," replied Miss Delamere, s she averted her face, and breathed a sigh whic appeared to heave a weight of woe from he oppressed bosom; "No wonder that I ar wretched, when I am called upon to commun eate to you that which will, in all probability separate us for ever."

"What can you mean, Sybil?" was the anxiou retort of the bewildered Mortimer; "surel your anonymous persecutor has not dared agai to invade your peace? Speak, I entreat of you and leave me now at least, free to unmask th cowardly assassin, who is amusing his foul leis ure by undermining our happiness."

Sybil shook her head, and remained silent.

"If the law can reach him,"—pursued Mortimer indignantly.

"Fate, not malice, is our present enemy," said Miss Delamere with a second sigh. "There is no foe to combat, no adversary to overcome. I believed that all my trials were at last over; that all my visions were about to be realized; but I deceived myself. Strong in your affection, I had forgotten that chance and change are the governing principles of this life, and I have been suddenly awakened from my delusion. While I was dreaming in fancied security of a future of peace and love, insured by your affection, destiny was at work to falsify all my provisions. Perhaps I was not worthy of so much happiness; in any case the illusion is dispelled, like many by which it was preceded. I appear, and have long appeared, to live in a world of shadows. No sooner seek to grasp them than they elude my touch. You know not,—may you never know!—the trials which I have passed, gaily as I may seem to defy fate; but for this blow I confess that I was totally unprepared!"

"Sybil, you torture me!"

"For your sake and for my own, I will at once speak plainly," said Miss Delamere, while her fingers wandered, as if unconsciously, among the luxuriant hair of her listener, and parted the wavy curls from his hot and throbbing forehead. "Our contemplated union is at an end. We may, we must be, still dear to each other, Frederic; but we can be no more than friends. The property of my father was placed in the hands of trustees, one of whom has absconded, carrying with him all the funds upon which my father and myself were dependent for our support. The other was a mere cypher, from whom nothing can be recovered, nothing hoped. Like myself, he entrusted all to his colleague; and like ourselves, he is also a very heavy loser; but he has other resources—we have none. Utterly in his power, through the confidence of my misguided father, and the faith reposed in him by his co-trustee, his evasion is our utter ruin; and all this—the blight of two lives, and the wreck of one fabric of happiness such as the world has seldom ever dreamed of, has been conveyed to me on a single page—in a few formal lines of condolence and information. Of myself I dare not speak. It is only in my own heart that I am conscious of the amount of suffering which I am called upon singly to endure." And as she ceased speaking, the head of Sybil sank upon the shoulder of her lover, and he felt the shudder which passed over her whole frame.

"And is this all?" asked Mortimer, as he clasped her to his heart. "Is this the mighty and insurmountable obstacle which is to sever us? Surely Sybil, you wrong me by such a doubt, and you have never understood the nature of my love. Did you for a moment suspect that I valued you for your power of adding to my wealth, or for anything save your own dear self? How little do you yet understand a passion like mine! Learn to know me better; and to feel that I rather rejoice at this sudden reverse of fortune which makes you more entirely my own. Are you mourning over your loss of influence? Have I not enough for both of us? What have you lost? Will not our home be that of your mother, and am I not rich enough to maintain you in comfort and opulence to which you have been accustomed? Fie upon you, Sybil; you have never yet understood me. Now, indeed, we shall be everything to each other, you will be all my own; all your happiness will be in my keeping and believe me, I will prove worthy of the trust. Our mutual affection will never be endangered by a diversity of interests; but doubly united by affection and by marriage, we shall have but one heart and one soul. Oh, my beloved Sybil!" he added passionately; "this calamity alone was needed to show you all the extent of my attachment; and far from deprecating its occurrence, I welcome it as the blessed means of proving to you the sincerity of an affection which can end only with my life. Henceforward I shall remember that I won you when you were wealthy and independent, and when I could offer you no equivalent for the position which you occupied save a devoted heart. There will be no drawback to my happiness in the suspicion that you loved me for the paltry possessions which I inherited from my ancestors; while I shall feel with honest pride that I am the source of all your future enjoyments; and you cannot guess the luxury of such a conviction, while you, on your side, will now be equally assured that I loved you only for yourself, undazzled by the fictitious splendor in which you have hitherto moved, as in an atmosphere peculiarly your own. Say, dearest, is it not well worth while to lose something of the world's wealth to secure so proud a feeling?"

"But I am literally a beggar, Frederic; these empty gauds by which I am now surrounded, constitute my whole fortune, and my mother's."

"And we could have dispensed even with these, dear Sybil," replied Mortimer, as he strained her to his heart; "Such love as ours is independent of the vanities of society. Now, indeed, I feel that I have a worthy stake in the world; that I am no longer a mere unit in the countless crowd of my fellow-men, but a responsible and important member of society, with others dependent upon me for support and happiness.—You shall see how this conviction will operate upon my hitherto listless character; you shall learn how deeply I feel the holiness of my earthly mission; and you shall do me justice."

Was the renewed shudder which passed through the veins of Miss Delamere one of compunction, as she listened to this impassioned reply? Who shall say! She had prepared herself to exert all her powers of fascination, all her arts of coquetry; but the fervent honesty of purpose by which she had been met negatived all her plans. The victim was self-bound to the horns of the altar.

"Frederic," she at length murmured fondly; "I scarcely know how to thank you. You, indeed, then love me for myself. You are above the vicissitudes of fortune; and it is at last my happy fate to be really valued for my own sake. Oh, did you know, could you guess, how thoroughly you have, by this noble self-abnegation, redeemed all human nature in my eyes, I think that you would not regret the sacrifice which you are making, great as it is. You know not what I have suffered since the arrival of that fatal letter. My reflections were horrible! Warned by the past, I did not dare to hope that even your affection—and believe me, when I declare that I nevertheless did justice to its sincerity—I did not dare to hope that it would withstand such an ordeal. You had sought me when I was surrounded by all the comforts, and by many of the luxuries of life; and I have been taught bitterly to feel how much a mere common character is influenced by such accessories. Existing in a paradise of hope, cradled in the most delightful visions, living only in the prospect of a future fraught with love and happiness, the terrible intelligence of ruin seemed at once to sever me from every thing which I had learned to prize, and doom me to life-long wretchedness. O, I have indeed felt within the last few hours how short a step it may be from joy to despair; and how, while we possess the one, we should prepare ourselves against the tortures of the other."

"My poor Sybil!"

"Yes, pity me, Frederic. pity me; for I have lived a year of torture since yesterday. But I will dwell upon this miserable subject no longer. You love me; and I have now nothing to regret, nothing to apprehend. You are my world; and although I shall give myself to you far otherwise than I hoped, I have no fear that your affection will be diminished by my misfortunes. Nay, I could almost forget the humiliation of my own pride to thank destiny for a blow which has elevated me in my own eyes, since it has failed to lessen me in yours."

"It is not in the power of fate to do so," replied Mortimer earnestly; "I have enough for both of us, and therefore let not the hateful consideration of money occupy your thoughts for an instant. It can be no obstacle to our happiness. I can restore to you the opulence which you have lost, and maintain you in the station to which you have beeen accustomed. You shall have nothing to regret. In your mother I shall find a new parent, and in yourself possess all that I can covet in this life. Do not, therefore, wrong my affection by grieving over an inevitable misfortune, but rather tell me when you will give me a legal right to repair it."

A thick and stifling sob rose to the throat of Miss Delamere. Even she, callous and selfish as she was, was nevertheless overcome for an instant, and felt abashed before the dupe whom she had made. But the pang of compunction passed as rapidly as it had risen; the game was now indeed, in her hands, and the recompense of all her efforts within her very grasp. Her tears fell warm and fast upon the hands which clasped her own; but as their impulse remained unsuspected, this womanly gushing out of sensibility only endeared her the more to the infatuated Mortimer.

"All shall be as you will," she whispered, as she passed her hand across her eyes, and then swept back the clustering curls which had half veiled her countenance; "All—for henceforth I can have no will, no hope but yours."

"And you will promise to weep no more, my best beloved?"

Sybil shook her head with a faint smile.

"Let this be your first act of wilful obedience," said Mortimer fondly; "for it is impossible to talk of the future while I see you steeped in tears. And now let us be more just to ourselves than we have hitherto been, since the world seems inclined to treat us roughly, and leave us to be the architects of our own happiness. I give you a fortnight, Sybil, a whole fortnight, to prepare for the awful event which we have deferred too long already. Nay, no disclaimers! I feel inclined to be arbitrary, and I will not concede another day, not another hour. You see therefore, that you have no regrets."

"But I have much to arrange; much to retrench."

"We will do all in good time; but for the present, we must have no retrenchment, no alteration. Your mother will need to be surrounded by familiar objects, and to indulge her usual habits, during your absence. In losing you she will already have lost too much. Leave The Grange, therefore, without one change which may imply that you abandon it for ever. Would that we could also leave Mrs. Delamere in happy ignorance of what has occurred, but that is I fear, impossible!"

"As yet," faltered Sybil, "she knows nothing; for I confess that I did not dare to acquaint her with the truth, while there existed probability that I should yet have more and darker news to tell; nor indeed, even had I wished to do so, could I have commanded sufficient self-possession to render such a tale intelligible."

And herein, at least, Sybil was partially sincere, for Mrs. Delamere was ignorant of the new expedient contemplated by her daughter, and could not consequently have comprehended the condolence of Mortimer had he deemed it fitting to offer them; but as such was far from his intention, Sybil gladly saw herself freed from this last peril, and acquiesced in the suggestion that no suspicion of her heavy trial should be engendered in the mind of the unhappy lady, promising, with one of her most eloquent and winning smiles, that all her discourse with her mother should turn upon her approaching marriage, and the bridal arrangements necessary to its speedy completion; while so gentle did she show herself, and so impassioned in her expressions of gratitude and affection, that the deluded Mortimer at length parted from The Grange convinced that hitherto his had been a barren and a vain existence, and that now only he was about indeed to live.

How thoroughly do human beings allow themselves to be cheated by false-seeming! As the floating corse, borne onward by the current, although it still wears the semblance of mortality and possesses a fictitious motion due to the action of the waves upon which it rides, is not the less a corse, sustained upon the surface by its own innate corruption, and incapable of voluntary movement; so is the vice which drapes itself in graceful sophistries equally foul, although it craftily retains the likeness of society convention. The figure is perhaps a strong one but not the less appropriate; for the decay ha been gradual and certain in both cases, and the mockery, both physical and moral, alike hollow and false.

Alas, for Sybil Delamere! The child of love and prayer, how she had fallen from her high eminence! By how many slow and almost imperceptible steps had she been advancing on her downward path! How little do women, while venturing upon their first act of levity, anticipate the remorse and wretchedness to which they are about to subject their after-life, and in what a tissue of duplicity and untruth they are about to involve their future actions; striving in vain, moreover, to believe that a trifling dereliction from duty and high principle cannot condemn them even while they are compelled to feel that it indeed does so, in the very mystery by which it is necessary to shroud it; and above all, in the consciousness that they have become less pure in their own eyes!

And then—after that first step—what an unloiling of the silver cord of purity and peace is essential to guide them through the labyrinth of their faults and follies, until at length, the bright and precious help exhausted, they have to toil alone and unaided even to the close of their dark, and false, and unloved career!

Far, very far, had Sybil progressed in this bad pilgrimage. Cunning as the serpent, she was also as beautiful; but if, like the reptile, she had been compelled to cast the glittering skin which veiled her moral deformity, how would those who loved her now have shrunk from her fatal fascination!

But the glory of loveliness still beamed about her, and Mortimer was destined to be its victim.

CHAPTER XXX.

In the society of the family at the Manor-house, Gertrude had found a resource and a comparative happiness, for which she was deeply grateful. Contrary to her anticipations also, Miss Warrington, while declining the somewhat languid overtures of Mrs. Armstrong on her own account, and remaining firm in her determination not to cross any threshold in the character of a guest, offered no opposition to a friendship which she could not conceal from herself might ultimately become of essential service to her almost friendless niece; and thus, as the virtues and accomplishments of the orphan developed themselves to her new acquaintance, the intercourse between the families became more intimate; the passion of the young heir continuing unguessed at alike by its object, and those around them.

To Gertrude herself, the future presented no vision of affection. She believed her heart to have been exhausted in the past; and even when her thoughts rested on Mary Armstrong, and he who soon afterwards became her declared suitor, she wove no web of fancy for herself, in which she too was to be loved and won.

The ceaseless attentions of Ernest Armstrong, the more welcome perhaps that they were unobtrusive, and only to be estimated by their perseverance, solaced her pride and soothed her feelings; but she attached to them no importance whatever, considering them as the mere kindly demonstrations of an amiable nature, intended to beguile her into a temporary forgetfulness of her desolate position. And in this spirit alone did she receive and respond to his anxious and earnest devotion; grateful that she was no longer able to say in her solitude, as she had once said, that she had ceased to be an object of interest to any, and was destined to tread the path of life without one kindly hand to thrust aside the briars with which it was overgrown.

But beyond this point the thoughts or feelings of Gertrude never wandered; the image of her cousin was still enshrined in her heart of hearts. To her he was faultless as in those early years when, with her head pillowed upon the knees of her loving aunt, she listened to a thousand oft-told, but never unwelcome, legends of his infancy and boyhood; and there were yet moments when a weight of bitter regret settled upon her spirit, beneath which she felt shrunk and prostrate. It is true that she strove against a weakness which revolted her own reason; but these dark periods of memory affected alike her health and her temperament, and brought many a cloud across the horizon of her existence. Sometimes, in order to emancipate herself from a moral thrall at once painful and unavailing, she endeavored to recall all the sufferings to which the vacillation of Mortimer had exposed her; all the circumstances of which she had been made the victim, all the incidents wherein her pride had been wounded, or her hopes slighted. But the heart has a logic of its own, and the culprit was arraigned at the bar of her partial judgment only to be acquitted.

Yet still she struggled against a weakness which would ere long, should Mortimer indeed become the husband of Miss Delamere, degenerate into sin. But would he do so? was the ever-recurring interrogatory which, as this thought arose, she addressed to her eager and swelling heart. Had not her dying aunt linked the hand of Frederic with her own?—Had she not expired in the belief that her last prayer was to be accomplished? Did she not know how devotedly he had once loved the gentle mother whose every thought was for him? And could it be that a stranger, the love of a stranger———

At that phase of the silent argument, however, Gertrude paused to weep. She remembered the fascinations of that stranger, and the enthusiastic character of her cousin. No, no, there was no hope. Sybil was the star of Frederic: the "bright, particular star," fated to rule his destiny. She had come, none new whence or why, to accomplish her mysterious mission; she had come, and conquered, and her own duty was simply to submit.

Such was the state of Gertrude's mind, when, as she was one morning busily engaged in giving the last touches to a masterly sketch which she had made of Bletchley church for Eleanor Armstrong, while Miss Warrington was occupied with the daily paper, the solitary luxury in which she indulged, she was startled by an exclamation from the old lady, which was immediately followed by her reading aloud the paragraph by which it had been called forth.

"Listen, Gertrude," she said, in that accent of quiet complacency in which elderly persons are wont to indulge while promulgating any species of news; 'On Tuesday morning, at the parish church of Westrum, by the Rev. James Ingatesby, Frederic Mortimer, Esq., of Westrum House, to Sybil, only daughter of the late William Delamere, Esq.' So your cousin is married, you see, and married without having the civility to apprise you of it beforehand."

But Gertrude made no reply. The pencil dropped from her hand, and it was only by a fearful effort that she preserved herself from fainting. All was then indeed over. The prayers of her dying aunt, the hopes of long years, her silent but deep affection—all had alike failed. As she saw herself definitively and forever separated from her cousin, the love which she had done so much to overcome welled up afresh, and she felt as though she had just listened to her death-warrant.

It was in vain that she sought to disguise her emotion. Pale, panting, and bewildered, she gazed hopelessly around her, but every object appeared to swim before her eyes; she tried to think, but a mist was over her spirit, and she could not combine the images which were floating across her brain.

Her aunt again addressed her, in all probability upon the same subject, but although she heard the voice she could not connect any meaning with the sound, and, at length, conscious that she could not much longer support the constraint under which she was then suffering, she murmured a few disjointed and almost inaudible words, and tottered from the apartment.

When the dinner was announced, Gertrude was still in her room, where she was found by the servant who went to summon her, stretched lifeless upon the bed.

Painful, very painful, were the solitary hours which she spent in that narrow and cheerless chamber; only the less wretched, however, that they were solitary. There she had leisure to contemplate all the circumstances of her position, to weep over the memories of the past, and to shudder at the dreariness of the future. How had she deceived herself, in believing that she had almost succeeded in overcoming her affection. How bitterly was she taught to feel that there is a depth in the human heart which, once stirred, is long, very long, ere its waters again subside!

Encouraged for years by her fond but incautious aunt to believe that she was the destined wife of her cousin, she had cherished the illusion until even reason had failed to convince her that it was dispersed, and it had required no less than its present final conformation to enable her to comprehend the truth. Vainly had she imagined that she was prepared to hear of his marriage, and to reconcile herself to think of him, henceforward, only as the husband of another.

Gertrude was merely tasting the bitter experience of a fact which all of us have, at some time in our lives, been fated to acknowledge; that, however we may deem ourselves prepared for an impending evil, and however we may have argued ourselves beforehand into befitting resignation, its advent usually finds us as powerless and as prostrate as though it had been utterly unforeseen.

Poor girl! the strongest link in her existence had been rudely and abruptly rent asunder. It was Frederic who was the one bond between her and the past, and now she must remember him, and love him only as the husband of Sybil; of that Sybil who had come between her and happiness, and rendered her an outcast from the home of her youth. To her, Frederic could be nothing now, nothing save a sad memory. All his thoughts, all his cares, all his tenderness, must, henceforth, be devoted to the woman whom he had taken to his heart. She only had now the right to watch over him in sickness, to weep with him in sorrow, and to soothe him in disappointment. And how would she fulfil her holy mission?

"Oh, well, well!" murmured Gertrude to herself, as the question rose in her pure heart, "she must do so, for Frederic loves her!"

And, then, her own hot tears rained down to feel that another had usurped the blessed duties which she would have performed so zealously. She thought not of sharing the brilliant fortune of her cousin, of indulging in the luxuries which it would command, or of claiming her share in the sunny hour of his existence; she dwelt only upon home, upon the chances and changes which might come even to him, and on those moments when the tenderness of a wife transcends all other consolations.

Vainly, however, did she dwell upon these thoughts: the conviction soon followed, that for her no such hallowed duty was destined, but that Frederic was lost to her forever; nor could she now, without guilt, even encourage a wish that it were otherwise. Had she been told a week, only a week beforehand, that his marriage was irrevocably decided, she believed that she could have schooled both her heart and her reason into submission. Had he written her a few lines of kindness and affection, she believed that she could have reconciled herself to what he would then have once more assured her was to him an earnest of happiness: but to learn that all was over through the cold medium of a public print, to feel that she had been forgotten while her whole heart was full of his image; this it was, as she fancied, which made the blow so heavy to be borne; and so she tried to cheat herself into the belief that she loved him less, even while she felt that she could not deceive herself.

No, struggle as she might with her own weakness, she could not be so deceived. She, indeed, prayed for his happiness, but still not for his happiness with another. The desire of possessing the affections of the being whom we love is one of the strongest feelings implanted in the bosom of humanity.

Even with the most pure and perfect attachment, there mingles more selfishness than we are willing to acknowledge: we love its objects not only for their sakes but for our own; the most heroic devotion fails to divest us of this egotism; in serving, soothing, and saving those we love, we are also protecting our own interests, which, by an exclusive affection, we have bound up so intimately with theirs, that we can no longer separate them: cleave the trunk, and the branches wither.

To this it may be answered, that there have been instances in which a total self-abnegation has been exhibited, and where, in order to secure the happiness of one party, the other has resigned all claim to an affection which had once been the day-spring of existence. But who has read the heart which so foreswore itself? Who has witnessed the struggle of a declining passion, paling under the conviction that this sacrifice was,—mutely, perhaps, and reluctantly, but still that this sacrifice was,—covertly desired of them? Who has seen the blood-drops start from the brow, and the damps of death bed upon the clammy palms grasped together in despair? Who has watched the slow breaking of the wounded heart which resigned its treasure, not in obedience to its own impulses, but beneath the influence of a bitter pride, which, when it had given ALL, would not suffer that all to be tolerated where it should have been prized? And who, we ask finally, has followed that blighted and withered victim to its closing hour, without feeling convinced that "the silver cord was loosened, and the golden bowl was broken," which had knit and filled the two natures thus unnaturally severed, before the act of self-abnegation was accomplished. The wounded heart flies to the thicket to die: the outraged and disappointed spirit plucks out its own spear.

Let the world read matters as it will—and "he who runs may read"—there is yet a volume which it cannot unclose in its reckless haste and egotism, without pausing longer than it is prone to do, ere it can hope to comprehend its pages—the weary but glorious volume of the human heart; weary, because it holds so much of woe—glorious, because it contains so much of hope.

CHAPTER XXXI.

OH, the first withering of the young and devoted heart, how utter, how irremediable it appears! Every link of hope and memory alike snapped at once; the past a blight, the present a pang, and the future a blank! Life has indeed deeper and deadlier miseries in store, but none so keen—none so overwhelming, none so bitter,—the waters of Marah sear the soul over which they flow, and the trace of their passage is never blotted out! Time and change are alike powerless to renew the freshness which they have marred.

The heart may, after a while, take another impression; it does, it must; for the wear of the world hardens the spent fire to lava, and new idols will be wrought out of the wreck of the first destruction, but it is no longer the same worship. The chrine has been desecrated, the veil of the sanctuary rent, and where all was once uncalculating trust and tenderness, have grown up doubt and dread—those noisome weeds which stagnate upon the pool of egotism, and foul the waters beneath. Self struggles to the surface; self, which had hitherto remained dormant, and folded in the angel coil of peace and joy, and no sooner claims its place than it mingles palpably in the after-devotion over which it originally poured forth all its energies upon its object without one ungenerous reservation.

Life! what is the luxury of thy banquet when this one cup has been drained and thrown aside? Ambition waves aloft its golden vessels, wealth tips its goblets with jewels, pleasure rears its tankard with roses, and sensuality crushes into its capacious bowl the juice of the purple grape until it overflows; but the vase which was garlanded with hope, lighted by sunshine, and hallowed by the heart's best and holiest affections, can be fitly replaced by none of these; only one such draught can be ever drained; and when that one has been dashed with the bitterness of disappointment, the tide of existence may indeed moisten the lip, but it can never again warm the heart. The bland outgushing of the spirit's spring has hopelessly wasted its pure current on the desert-sands.

Too proud, nevertheless, to yield to the influence of a neglected passion, Gertrude struggled resolutely against the wretchedness which swelled her young and desolate heart almost to bursting. She forgave Sybil. How could she do otherwise when she remembered that she was now the wife of Frederic? But she could not bless the arrow by which she had been stricken. Again and again she read the solitary letter with which her forgetful cousin had cheered her exile, and she could not mistake the implied proposal that she should again seek home beneath his roof. But when? Alas, she understood it now! When Sybil should be installed in the place of the beloved aunt who had made that home a paradise—when Sybil should head the board, and fill the chair which had once been hers—when another voice should command, and another will control, where she had swayed so gentle a rule that obedience seemed but a dearer privilege. No, no: it could not be. Gertrude looked round her modest chamber, and breathed out a low and fervent thanksgiving that she had another and a calmer place of refuge.

Perhaps it was well for her that she had to strive also against the suspicions of her anxious hostess, whose blunted sensibilities, although they were unequal to sympathise with what she regarded as the mere nervous absurdities of fanciful and pampered young people, were not, however, sufficiently obtuse to deaden the curiosity which led her to seek an immediate cause for their development; and thus Gertrude soon discovered the necessity of controlling her feelings in the presence of her aunt, and of checking the tears which, at intervals, rose to her burning eye-balls. And the task was a hard and a bitter one; for like many other well-meaning, but ill-judging persons, Miss Warrington no sooner heard the apothecary who had been called in, declare that his patient was simply suffering from moral depression and debility, and required only amusement unattended with exercion to restore her to health, than she installed herself daily for hours in the sick-room, where, in default of other subjects of conversation, she descanted perpetually on the very themes which the poor girl would fain have avoided, and that which a voluble pertinacity which rendered their exhaustion hopeless.

"It is fortunate, however, Mr. Pilbeam, very fortunate," she said upon one occasion, as the apothecary seated himself by the bed-side, and strove to rally the spirits of Gertrude by an assurance that, in a short time, she would be enabled to leave her room; "very fortunate, indeed, that there is really no danger, for I should scarcely have known how to act, had you given me cause to apprehend the contrary. A month, or I may say only a week ago, I could have written to apprise her cousin, who is her nearest relation—for I am but her great-aunt, and should, consequently, have declined all responsibility in such a case; but, at this moment, I don't know where to find him, as he is just married, and is probably on his wedding-tour. In my time, people were satisfied to remain at home on such occasions, to feast their tenantry, and keep open house, but now they consider it correct to run away from their friends, as though they had done something that they were ashamed of."

"Tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis, eh?" interposed the apothecary sententiously, with a condescending smile.

Miss Warrington was silenced for a moment, and at once bewildered and displeased, but she soon recovered herself, and resumed:—

"Such being the case, we do not know where to address him. However, as Gertrude is better, we can afford to wait until he is again at Westrum. As for myself, I confess that I felt little or no alarm at her illness, for on the day of her arrival here, I remarked to Hannah that I did not believe she had an ounce of blood in her veins, and even now she looks better than when she first came to Bletchley."

"You may be quite easy upon the subject, my dear madam; in a few days we shall have Miss Mortimer in the drawing-room. But we must be careful to protect her from all unnecessary excitement, as her nerves are evidently very susceptible."

"You would rather, perhaps, that she should not yet see the Miss Armstrongs, who have called every day, and are half offended that I have not allowed them to come up stairs?"

"On the contrary, my dear lady, on the contrary," briskly exclaimed Mr. Pilbeam, who would rather have risked a relapse in his patient than the chance of displeasing the family at the Manor-house; "their visits can only be beneficial to Miss Mortimer, as I understand that they have already become very intimate. A great privilege that for the young lady, my dear madam; a very great privilege, and not extended beyond herself as regards this immediate neighborhood. You gave your interest to 'Armstrong and independence,' of course, Miss Warrington?"

"I gave it to no one," was the tart reply, as the clenched fingers of his interlocutor became blenched by the violence with which they were interlaced.

"No—eh? Well, you surprise me!" was the composed rejoinder. "All Bletchley took it for granted that you had supported him. However, it seems that he has succeeded without you, for he is in, I hear. Some rumor to be sure, of bribery and that kind of thing, but it is of course all local gossip, and as I often say to Mrs. Pilbeam, when she occasionally reports these small matters over our tea-table, tempus omnia revelat—at all events, I never give an opinion; no professional man should, eh?"

There was no reply.

"And now, my dear madam, I will take my leave," said the dapper little apothecary, resuming his hat and cane; "and I trust that, by the termination of the honey-moon, my fair patient will be in a fit condition to pay her bridal visit. Nothing like change of scene and cheerful society in such a case; eh, my dear Miss Mortimer? What say you to my prescription?"

Gertrude said nothing. Her mightiest effort at endurance and self-control would only enable her to torture her faded lips into a ghastly smile, as she took the hand which he extended on his departure, ere she turned her weary and aching head upon her pillow, and strove to escape at once from the light of day and the sound of human voices.

But no such escape was to be hers. Miss Warrington, excited by her own unusual activity and deeply offended by what she considered as an undue presumption on the part of Mr. Pilbeam, whom she detested both for his babble and his bill, no sooner heard the street door close behind him than she continued to vent her hoarded ill-humor upon Mortimer; and poor Gertrude was compelled to endure all the outpouring of her wrath.

"The accidental allusion to your cousin's marriage, my dear," she resumed, as she installed her perpendicular person, according to her own idea of comfort, in the large arm-chair just vacated by the diligent apothecary; "reminds me—I say nothing of myself; I am an old woman, and the days are past when it was considered necessary to show any regard to the feelings of such useless individuals as old women, when they chance to be poor—but it reminds me, as I was about to say, that Mr. Mortimer has treated you with great disrespect, in not writing to inform you of his intended marriage. He might be very much engaged; I dare say he was; people generally are, I believe, at such times, but still half-an-hour might always be spared for such a purpose. I confess that I feel very indignant at so singular and marked a slight; for it is a slight, Gertrude, look at it as you will; you may be poor, but you are as well-born and as well-bred as himself, and he has no right to look down upon you."

"Indeed, my dear aunt, you mistake him," faltered the poor girl, tortured to the very soul, "Frederic is incapable of such a feeling."

"I am glad to hear it," replied the old lady, in that provoking tone which implies a resolute opposition of sentiment; "very glad, for it would degrade him, not you. But be this as it may, his conduct has been very extraordinary. He should have remembered that his parents had no right to educate and rear you like a duchess only to leave you to starve at last."

"Spare me, I entreat of you," exclaimed Gertrude piteously: "Did you understand the nature of Frederic, you would feel how impossible it was for him to act otherwise than he has done!"

"Well, my dear child, do not agitate yourself," replied the old lady, somewhat alarmed by the violence of her emotion: "we will say no more upon the subject. I understand it all now—the lady was jealous of your pretty face, and perhaps she was right. But keep up your spirits, and that pretty face may stand your friend yet."

Oh, are these not the trifles which make life difficult to bear,—these puny, pigmy miseries, which, like the knife of a surgeon, rend open again and again the wound which might have healed before its appointed time? To the first evil they are as nothing in proportion; and yet how many who struggle manfully against the crushing fall of the mighty mass, and strive, languidly perhaps and wearily, but still resolutely, to save some fragment from the wreck, are disheartened and bruised anew by the perpetual droppings of the loosened pebbles! How justly has it been said that—and yet, upon those trifles is hinged the whole peace of our existence.

"'Tis trifles make the sum of human things!"

Day after day, almost hour after hour, did these corroding conversations occur, until Gertrude, who would fain have herself forgotten all beyond the narrow circle of her present home, more than once found herself upon the very point of confiding to Miss Warrington the bitter but still cherished secret of the past, in order to silence her for ever More than once did the confession tremble on her tongue, but as she raised her eyes to the rigid and passionless countenance, and then dropped them upon the compressed and bony fingers before her, the blood rushed back upon her heart, and she continued to endure in silence.

Not even the persevering affection of the amiable inmates of the Manor-house could counteract the evil effect of this constant demand upon her fortitude. She gradually withered, until even Mr. Pilbeam himself began to apprehend that the disease which he had at first treated so lightly, was in fact too deep-seated to be overcome; and thus impressed, he ventured to suggest to Miss Warrington the necessity of an immediate change of scene. Better, as he shrewdly and philosophically decided in his own mind, if she must die,—and die he had by this time become convinced she would—that it should be anywhere rather than under his hands.

It was easy to suggest such an arrangement; and in former years, it would have been equally easy for the orphan to have acquiesced in it at once; but now she instantly negatived the proposition; for she had begun to comprehend the nature of that poverty which so pertinaciously intrudes its gaunt hand, close-clenched, before the moral vision of the needy, and compels them to feel their helplessness.

Happily, however, Providence had watched over the gentle and uncomplaining victim of misfortune,—that blessed Providence which is by the thoughtless miscalled chance, or fate, or accident, but which still beautifully and harmoniously pursues its holy way, thwarting the provisions of the evil minded, and smoothing the rugged path of the stricken and the feeble.

It was but on the morrow after the medical fiat had gone forth, that Mary and Eleanor Armstrong once more arrived at the modest dwelling of Miss Warrington, laden, as was their custom, with fruit and flowers; but also, on this occasion, radiant with delight. Mr. Pilbeam had just left the Manor-house, where, in answer to the earnest inquiries of the Squire for his fair favorite, he had reiterated his opinion of the necessity of an immediate change of air and scene, and they had come as ambassadresses from their mother to claim the society of Gertrude for a few weeks.

The cheeks and brow of the sick girl flushed with happiness for a moment, but in the next instant the glow faded, and her heart sank. She felt that she would rather be left free to indulge her sorrow, than compelled to make a renewed effort for existence. She was perishing then, she knew, slowly but surely; and could she only have escaped the unintentional persecutions of her aunt, she would have rejoiced to linger out her remaining days in peace and solitude, and gradually to emancipate herself from every earthly affection.

It is certain that there is a strange fascination in the idea of death to the young who are subdued by a lingering sorrow. The stronger and sterner interests which link man to the world in riper age are still unknown to them. That second life, if so it may be termed, which, like Minerva, springs in all its power from the brain, and teaches its due, or at least enforced, subordination to the heart, has not yet commenced. The chain of roses alone has withered, and it is sweet and soothing to hope to perish with them; while, by a strange contradiction, it is only when the links of iron have been forged, and their weight is felt, that the shackled captive revolts against release, and clings to his rusted fetters.

Under this impression of hopelessness, Gertrude urged the utter impossibility of contending in her present state of weakness, against the stir and bustle of an establishment like that of the Manor-house at a period so exciting as the close of a successful-contested election; but her objection was instantly met by the assurance that all the local duties of hospitality contingent upon that success had been already fulfilled, and that early on the morrow both Mr. Armstrong and his son would depart for town.

"Thus, you see, my dear frightened Gertrude," said Eleanor persuasively; "that you will be as quiet with us as in your own tranquil home, for our party will consist only of my mother and ourselves, and Mr. Somerville, who, for some reason which Mary can perhaps explain, appears at the present moment to have a decided disinclination to visit London. As for Ernest, he too from some unaccountable cause, seemed this morning to share the sentiment of his friend: but he could not, of course, be excused, so go he must, and will; but he bade me not forget to say that it was he who gathered the grapes, and selected the flowers which we have brought, in order that you might be assured how truly he sympathizes with the rest of his family in their anxiety for your recovery. So now we have only to obtain the consent of our kind Miss Warrington to this little arrangement, and to carry you off to-morrow so soon as we have taken leave of papa."

It was impossible to resist the earnest kindness of such an invitation; and accordingly, on the following evening Gertrude found herself established under the hospitable roof of the Armstrongs, and surrounded by the most affectionate attentions. The effect of so genial a change alike upon her health and spirits was great and rapid; and if her heart was occasionally wrung by the spectacle of Mary's radiant happiness, as she contrasted it with her own forlorn condition, she found support and comfort in the knowledge, that her struggles were unguessed at by those about her; and exerted herself to secure her secret so successfully that there were even moments in which she ceased to feel its weight.

Thus three weeks passed over, and Mr. Pilbeam himself began to feel that his visits were becoming supererogatory, as he saw an occasional bloom once more suffuse the pale cheek of his beautiful patient, and a light dance in her eye; but like Mrs. Armstrong, he stringently objected to her return home until her health should be more unequivocally restored; and Gertrude, although she still endeavored to discover a thousand reasons for terminating her visit, was in reality happy to find that they were all overruled in turn. To Eleanor she had become almost essential; for the whole time and attention of Mary were engrossed by Somerville, who had proved so efficient an auxiliary during the election, that he had won the heart of the Squire as well as that of his daughter; and thus the two younger girls were seldom separated, and all the various attainments of the orphan were in time discovered and estimated by her amiable but less gifted friend. Arm in arm they wandered through the richly-wooded grounds of the Manor-house, or loitered upon the border of the graceful little stream which laved their boundaries; and Eleanor learned to love and appreciate a host of natural beauties upon which she had previously looked almost with indifference.

There is always a world of poetry lying dormant in the breast of a young pure girl, which it requires some extraneous circumstances to develop; and so was it with the friend of Gertrude, who soon began to marvel that she could so long have remained careless, if not insensible to the loveliness of all about her.

"Why is it, Gertrude," she asked, "that I never felt thus before?—That I never, until I knew you, could appreciate these marvellous mysteries of nature? I loved the country, but only for my own sake; only because I breathed a purer air, and enjoyed more liberty than in town; that I delighted to pluck the flowers, and to bask in the sunshine, and to indulge in the merely material pleasures, which are impossible to a London life. It now seems inexplicable to me that I should have been so blind."

"And yet it is not so," replied the orphan with a sad smile; "it is only those who have suffered, or who have looked upon suffering, who can make companionship with nature; who can hear voices in the woods, and reap hope in the glorious spectacle of a sun-lighted sky. Look you, Eleanor," she added with emotion, as they entered a small garden-pavilion overhung with trailing plants, and seated themselves upon its rustic bench: "Look only here. Do you mark how these lovely but frail Banksian roses wreathe themselves fondly about the lattice-work which they almost conceal; so is the world garlanded with hopes as bright and as unenduring; and yet we would not rend away those scented blossoms, because we know that in a few hours they must fade; neither would we forego those hopes, although we know that they may end in disappointment. Nay more, we do not uproot the tree, when its bloom is scattered, for we await the season which shall renew its blossoming—while, with the human heart, Eleanor, with the human heart, there is no second harvest, although it still beats on, as if in disdain of the blighted past."

"Gertrude, you are wrong to dwell upon such thoughts. You see that I can weep with you, but you are still to blame. You have, indeed, lost the friends of your childhood, but you will, you must, make many, many more."

"Forgive me," said the orphan with a slight shudder: "at least it is not to you, to whom I owe so much of happiness, that I should talk thus. But you know not, Eleanor,—and may you never know!—how hard it is to lose all—all; and to begin your life anew, without one tie of kindred or of kindness."

"Our conversation has taken a sad turn," interposed Eleanor, hastily wiping her eyes: "and you are not so wise a monitress as usual. Lesson me no more lessons to-day, fair Mistress Gertrude, but rather let me twine this lovely branch of roses in your pale hair. There, is it not glorious? Five sister-blooms in one rich cluster! And now, to read you another and more cheerful homily than your own, I will tell you that they look like the blossoms of a newer and a fresher hope, flowering about the cold memories of other joys."

And as she concluded her graceful task, she once more drew the arm of her friend within her own, and they quitted the pavilion.

An unusual stir, as they approached the house, prepared them for some arrival; and they had scarcely entered the hall, when Eleanor was in her brother's arms; but he held her there only for an instant ere he turned to greet her companion. Beautiful as she looked, however, as she stood before him with extended hand and smiling lip, her simple white dress displaying to advantage all the symmetry of her frail but graceful figure, her bonnet in her hand, and her luxuriant hair still garlanded with the flowers which Eleanor had twined about it, the young man could not suppress a start as his eye fell upon her. The expression of her face was so languid, the outline of her always delicate features so much sharpened, and her whole appearance so strongly indicative of suffering, that he felt a pang at his heart, and a vague terror, which he dared not to trust himself to define.

For the first time, a suspicion that Gertrude was the prey of some secret sorrow, against which she had struggled until her strength had failed beneath the conflict, pressed upon his spirits; and as the idea grew in strength, despite all his efforts to suppress it, he began to comprehend the extent of his feeling towards her. What would he not have given at that moment to have possessed the power of reading her heart, and of soothing her sorrows, be they what they might; but this he knew to be impossible; and thus he spoke to her only of her sickness, of her recovery, and of his gladness on finding her a guest in his father's house; while Gertrude, unsuspicious of the emotion which rendered the expression of even these commonplace greetings difficult to him, simply thanked him with her sad sweet smile; and hastened to her apartment, in order not to restrain, by her presence, the mutual communications of the family.

CHAPTER XXXII.

After the return of Ernest Armstrong, the house gradually became filled with company, and it required all the resolution which Gertrude could command to enable her to endure this constant demand upon her energies, without falling back into her original depression; and yet, strange to say, she no longer felt an inclination to return to her desolate home. Too sadly aware that Miss Warrington was more than reconciled to her absence by the reflection that it decreased the expenses of her narrow household; and once more habituated to the voice of sympathy and kindness, she shuddered as she remembered that the day must soon come in which she should once more be deprived of all this luxury of affection, and when her restored health would no longer afford her a pretext for extending her already lengthy visit.

The bustle and movement consequent upon the influx of visitors wearied and saddened her; but she found an equivalent in the perpetual and brotherly kindness of Ernest, who, pleading the necessity of Eleanor's more general attention to their other guests, was constantly occupied in securing the comfort and amusement of the orphan. Nor was he diverted from his work of sympathy even by the smiles of the high-born beauties which now graced his mother's drawing-room, or the example of his own sporting companions; who, on their return from shooting, fishing, or boating, divided their remaining time between billiards and flirtation.

And all these attentions were so carefully as well as so zealously proffered, that they excited no remark even among the idlest and the most sarcastic of her associates. The beautiful invalid, with her pale brow and her dovelike eyes, was known to be an orphan, and a portionless one; while Ernest Armstrong was one of the best matches in the country; and consequently not one of his friends could for a moment believe him to be mad enough to dream of marrying her. The idols of the world must have hands of gold, even if they have brows of brass, and feet of clay; and the divinity of every other shrine is looked upon as an object of false worship. No, no; young Armstrong might waste his time in dangling about a pretty girl who was going to her grave, and thus show the Lady Janes, and the Honorable Miss Lucys, that he was not a marrying man—which, by the way, was rather clever on his part—but beyond this, of course there was nothing to be said; and so the "capital match" was left in peace to follow the dictates of his own heart and his own reason.

Mrs. Armstrong, meanwhile, was so perpetually occupied in doing the honors of her house, and in taking her share in every conversation that was going on about her, however unintelligible it might actually be to her limited capacity, that she had not a moment to waste in conjectural speculations; while Mary, happy in herself and in all around her, became egotistical in the very joy of her heart, and limited all her interest to her own narrow circle. Perhaps there were moments in which Eleanor felt startled; but she, too, believed it to be impossible that her fastidious and ambitious brother could scarcely love the niece of old stingy Miss Warrington; and she had, moreover, become so sincerely attached to Gertrude, that she would not be convinced.

And Gertrude herself, even while she was grateful, deeply grateful, for the unwearied and gentle kindness of which she was the object, never for an instant conjectured that it had another source than the generous pity of one who was alike blessing and blessed, to a suffering fellow-creature. She only felt that she was no longer alone in the world; that there were now two beings to whom her sufferings were not indifferent, and who would mourn over her were they to terminate as she had once hoped. She even looked upon the smiling face of Mary, and the beaming countenance of her destined husband, without remembering her own blighted hopes; and although a dark cloud at times settled upon her spirit, it seldom lingered. A resigned and placid melancholy had succeeded to the irritation of feeling to which she had previously yielded; and she had almost taught herself to believe that "it was well for her that she had been afflicted." She knew not that a great moral change was taking place within her, by which the image of Mortimer was fading more rapidly from her heart than time could have effaced it.

It chanced that on a sweet autumnal morning Gertrude found herself alone in the music-room, where she had been engaged in tuning Eleanor's harp; and having completed her task, she stood for a time at one of her low windows opening to the lawn, until at length, feeling invigorated by the soft balmy wind which was wakening the leaves to that low, luxurious, and mystic whisper, which seems to speak to us in the language of another and a more harmonious world, she stepped out upon the velvet sward, and bared her brow to its influence.

The sound of distant voices and ringing laughter reached her from the open windows of the house, and jarred with the soft serenity of the scene on which she looked; and in order to secure a more perfect sense of solitude, she strolled onward under the flickering shadows of the shrubbery, and followed with a languid step, the windings of a flower-bordered path, which led to an eminence commanding a view of the village of Bletchley, and the surrounding country.

Light, fleecy clouds were flitting across a sky of intense blue, tempered, however, by that slight purple mist peculiar to autumnal atmosphere; the little stream at the bottom of the valley was sparkling and shimmering along its narrow channels; the fields were alive with reapers; the low, gray church, half buried in ivy, had just caught the full radiance of the midday sun, and looked as though it were wreathed with emeralds; the leaves of the sallows, which at intervals skirted the water, danced merrily on their flexile stems to the music of the current over which they hung; children called to each other as they sported among the husbandmen; the lowing of the cattle rose from the luxuriant meadows; the birds were loud among the branches, and the butter-flies fluttered from flower to flower; in short, it was one of those days so beautiful and so rare in our capricious climate, when Nature seemed to have donned her richest garb, and the whole earth to revel in a sense of its own beauty.

For a while Gertrude stood entranced, tears filled her eyes, but they were tears of gratitude and praise. Soon, however, she became conscious that she had overtaxed her strength, and slowly descending the height, she diverged towards the garden pavilion, in order to rest for a time before she returned to the house. The creeping roses, honeysuckles, and clematis, by which it was overgrown, had been suffered to run wild, and nearly obscured the entrance; but putting them aside, Gertrude stepped lightly across the threshold, and started with mingled surprise and annoyance, to find herself intruding upon the privacy of Ernest Armstrong. A bright flush rose to the cheek of the young man as he bounded from the bench upon which he had been seated, and suffered his book to fall from his hand in his eagerness to welcome her.

"Gertrude—Miss Mortimer—" he exclaimed, as he sprang forward to lead her to the seat which he had just abandoned; for, in her embarrassment, she had continued standing upon the same spot, without making an effort to advance: "Miss Mortimer here,—and alone! By what happy chance—"

"Forgive me, Mr. Armstrong," faltered Gertrude, as she sank exhausted alike by fatigue and distress upon the bench; "I did not mean to invade your privacy. I thought you were with your friends."

"I dare not flatter myself that you sought my society," he said, looking anxiously upon her; "but, surely, Gertrude, you are ill, or unhappy! What has happened?"

"Nothing, believe me, nothing; but I have been imprudent. I have ascended the mound, forgetting that my strength is not equal to the exertion; and I came here to rest awhile. Pray, forgive me."

"Surely, you jest," was the impetuous reply. "Oh, Gertrude, if you could only guess how I have sighed for this moment—this moment of happiness—when I may assure you of all my respect—all my regard."

"I have long felt, long acknowledged it," murmured the fair girl, as she looked up gratefully and confidingly.

"Would that the conviction had served me better!" said Ernest, still retaining her hand; "would that it had induced you to confide more fully in a friendship in which you admit that you have faith. Gertrude, you are not happy. You have a hidden sorrow. I have long been convinced of this. Your painful illness has been an effect, not a cause. Seek not to deceive me. To common observers, you may, indeed, be only an invalid crushed by mere physical ailment; but to me, you are the prey of a deeper suffering."

The orphan answered only with her tears.

"Gertrude," persisted the young man, as he seated himself beside her; "you have given me a right to consider myself your friend; give me likewise cause to feel that I, indeed, am so. Remember that you have become the adopted child of our house; that we have all learned to love you. Have I, then, no claim to ask for some answering trust? Perhaps I may be indiscreet; but did you know how cold every tear that you shed falls upon my own heart, you would forgive me."

A sudden faintness came over the orphan. She began to understand him—to understand herself, and she trembled at the revelation. She strove to withdraw her hand; she strove to rise and escape, but her agitation was too powerful.

"Gertrude!" exclaimed her companion reproachfully; "you do not do me justice."

"Oh, recal that accusation for pity's sake," faltered the stricken girl; "I know and feel that you are, indeed, my friend."

"And is that all, Gertrude? Is that all which you have felt and known? Have I, indeed, made myself so little understood? Or is it that you are indifferent to an affection which has now become to me a principle of existence?"

The orphan buried her face in her hands, and the hot tears streamed through her fingers.

"It must be as you will, Gertrude," said Ernest, as he started from her side, and paced hurriedly across the narrow floor; "but you know not how devoted a heart you would reject—you know not the depth of the affection which you would throw from you—you cannot guess the treasure of love which I have hoarded up only to cast it at your feet; you may be loved again, but never, never again as now."

Gertrude looked up in alarm; her heart beat violently, and the tears were arrested in her eyes.

"No, no," she exclaimed passionately; "You mistake yourself, Mr. Armstrong, and imagine that the generous sympathy which you have felt for me has grown into affection. But this cannot, must not be. As yet we are almost strangers; you are the only son of wealthy and powerful parents, while I am poor and friendless. You are full of life, and hope, and happiness, while I am already faded and crushed by trial and misfortune. How would your proud father brook such a marriage? Forget that you have ever conceived so wild a thought. Be just to yourself, and leave me, at least, the consolation of feeling that I have not lost a friend."

"You reason, Gertrude," said the young man reproachfully, "you reason coldly, where you should only feel. You disdain the heart which you have made your own."

"Do not mistake me," sobbed the orphan; "I am already sufficiently unhappy. But remember only my position and your own. Remember the friendship and affection which have been lavished upon me by your family, and then ask yourself if I could indeed listen to you without ingratitude? Deeply, very deeply, do I feel my obligation for such a proof of your regard; but I beseech you, if you would not expose me to the most bitter self-reproach, to bestow the warmer feelings of your heart upon another."

"Enough, Miss Mortimer," said her companion haughtily; "I will endeavor to obey you. I have, in truth been worse than blind not to comprehend that your affection has been already bestowed elsewhere. I have now only to apologise for my presumption, and to wish you a happier fate than that which I would have secured to you."

As he ceased speaking, he seized his hat, and rushed from the pavilion.

As he disappeared Gertrude made a movement as though she would have detained him, for at that moment she felt as though she was once more about to become an alien from her kind. She was at last conscious that even while she believed herself to be living upon the memory of the past, she was in fact learning to love Ernest Armstrong, a lesson in which she had progressed but too well, and now she saw herself again thrust back upon the desolation of her own heart. The impulse was, however, only momentary, her better principle retained her in her seat: she might be wretched, but she would still continue blameless; she would not repay the trusting friendship of a whole family by bligthing their proudest hopes; and thus, her extended hands were withdrawn, her laboring sobs were suffered to have way, and finally, her head sank upon the rustic table before her, and she wept as those only can weep who see all the hopes of their existence shivered about them.

Forgetting alike where she was and the time which had elapsed since she left the house, she remained for more than an hour sunk in a torpor of grief which scarcely allowed her to retain the faculty of thought. She only knew that she was wretched, very wretched; she only felt that her last luxury lay in the hot tears which were coursing each other down her pallid cheeks, when she was suddenly startled by the sound of a deep sigh immediately behind her.

She turned in alarm, and saw Ernest Armstrong standing a few paces from the bench upon which she was seated.

"Gertrude," he said with deep emotion; "tell me the truth. I left you angry and miserable but my anger could not last, nor can I longer endure my misery. As you hope for happiness in this life, be frank with me. Have I a share in those tears?"

"Mr. Armstrong," faltered the orphan, as she extended to him her trembling hand; "should I be worthy of all the friendship which you have shown to me for so many months if I could have witnessed unmoved the displeasure with which you lately quitted me? Oh, surely surely you at least should know me better?"

"And what more, Gertrude?" asked Ernest, again seating himself beside her: "Have I returned only to receive so formal an assurance as this? Do you believe me to be so weak, so frivolous, so unworthy, as to have sought your love without long and earnest reflection? Only tell me that it is not given to another, and even although it should not yet be mine I will await your will; I will trust to time, and to my own devoted affection, for ultimate success. I will struggle to deserve your preference, and to secure your happiness. I will be everything that you shall seek to make me."

"I dare not listen to such words from your lips, Mr. Armstrong," murmured Gertrude, as she endeavored to rise from her seat.

"You shall not leave the pavillion, Gertrude, until my question is answered," said her companion resolutely; "This day, this very hour, I must know my fate—and then, Gertrude, then, you will have made the happiest man on earth, or—we meet no more."

"Meet no more!" gasped the orphan, unconsciously echoing his words in an accent of such heart-struck anguish as rendered all further explanation superfluous.

"You are mine—deny it not, Gertrude, you are mine," murmured the delighted young man, as he suddenly clasped her to his bosom; "Nay chide me not—I will—I will release you—but no disclaimers—reason as you will now, and I will listen; I have not loved you in vain, and all else I can support. Why do you turn away in displeasure, Gertrude? Are you offended by my joy? Nay, do not leave your seat; I will abandon mine, if you condemn me to so great a sacrifice, but do not drive me from you. See, I have even released your hand. What would you more?"

"Listen to me," said the weeping girl, struggling against the emotion which had dyed her cheeks and brow with a crimson blush; "Weak and unworthy as I feel such an avowal to be, I will no longer deny that—that——In short, Mr. Armstrong—"

"Call me Ernest."

"In short," pursued the orphan, heedless of the interruption; "unconsciously, oh, believe me, most unconsciously, I have treacherously repaid the kindness of your family, by suffering myself to feel—to feel as I should not have done towards one for whom they have higher and prouder hopes."

"They all love you, Gertrude."

"But will they continue to do so when they learn how ill I have requited their friendship?"

"Will they not be indebted to you for my happiness, which is their first care?"

Gertrude shook her head despondingly. She had already learned a bitter lesson in the world's lore, and she remembered that she was poor and powerless.

"Sceptic!" smiled her more sanguine companion, "have you not faith in my influence over the family which you appear so much to dread? I am aware that my good father will look grave, and talk of expedieney, and prudence, and all those matters of which elderly gentlemen are accustomed to make bugbears to the young; but I shall appeal from his head to his heart, and I have never yet made such an appeal in vain. He already loves you as a child; so, away with these puerile fears. Is it your fault if you are dearer to me than all else on earth? Are you to blame if you are lovelier and more estimable than others of your sex? Trust me, the day is not far distant when all under our roof will bless you for having rendered it both holier and happier."

"I will endeavor to believe so," murmured Gertrude with a faint smile; "but until I am welcomed by Mr. Armstrong himself, this subject must never be renewed between us. To-day, I must remain at the Hall, for I feel that I have not strength to encounter the fatigue of a removal, but to-morrow I shall return to the humble home which I ought never to have quitted; and then—" she concluded with a burst of tears, which she strove in vain to suppress; "then it will depend upon your father if I ever again become his guest."

Ernest was about to expostulate, but as he looked into the eyes of his companion, he read there a determination against which he felt that it were vain to contend; and, accordingly, he raised her hand respectfully to his lips in silence.

"And now, leave me," said Gertrude imploringly; "if, indeed, you love me, leave me alone to think. I have need of thought; alas! I fear, too much, but, at least, spare me all further self-reproach."

"Do you regret my happiness?"

Once more she smiled through her tears, and he felt that he was answered.

"And you will wear this rose for my sake, Gertrude, will you not?" whispered the young man tenderly, as he broke away a branch of the flowering parasite which trailed across the entrance of the pavilion.

"I will, if you obey, and leave me now."

"I am gone," was the murmured reply, and still he lingered.

Five minutes more wore away, and then the blooming branches were hurriedly thrust aside, and he sprang lightly into the sunshine, looked back for a second into the depths of the rustic apartment, and disappeared among the tall shrubs near its entrance.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Ernest had no sooner departed than Gertrude sank upon her knees. Divided between happiness and self-reproach, she had no longer power to trust to her own strength. What had she done?—and what was she about to do? She felt bewildered and alarmed. How little had she understood the nature of her own feelings; how little had she been prepared for the ordeal through which she had just passed! That she should have permitted herself to love Ernest Armstrong, appeared to her at one moment as monstrous; she who knew the ambitious views of his family, and the lofty aspirings of his own nature. And she had been doing this while she believed herself to be still weeping over the smouldering embers of a scorned and now sinful attachment. The new phœnix had risen from the ashes which she had deemed extinguished forever.

She passed her hand over her throbbing eyeballs, as though she sought to awaken from a wild dream, but all was still vivid in its truth. The branch of roses lay on the table beside her; the book, upon which Ernest had been engaged when she entered, remained where it had fallen from his hand; strive as she would, there was no room for doubt.

Ere long her thoughts wandered to Mr. Armstrong, and she trembled as she reflected upon his probable indignation: while, solitary as she was, and although no eye was upon her, a blush of mingled pride and shame rose to her brow as she pictured to herself the reproaches which he would fasten upon the penniless orphan, who had accepted his hospitality only to blight the prospects of his son; and she bowed her head, self-convicted, and would at that moment have gladly forgone all her newly-born hopes of happiness to escape his just rebuke.

Gradually, however, her reflections became less gloomy, and she raised her drooping head, and pillowed it upon her arm, as she wiped away the intrusive tears which were still coursing each other down her cheeks, and fastened her thoughts upon Ernest, and the affections which he had vowed to her.

Was she, indeed, so very much to blame for having failed to remain insensible to such a passion? Had he not devoted himself to her in misfortune and in suffering? Had he not extended to her the hand of friendship, when that of the world was closed against her? Was he not all that the heart of woman could covet in him she loved? And all these questions were answered with a throbbing pulse, until she became almost acquitted in her own eyes.

But Gertrude had still another doubt, another pang to combat. The more perfect she taught herself to believe Ernest, the more a sense of her own unworthiness fastened upon her. While he had bestowed on her all the fervor of a first attachment, she had requited it only by the gift of a worn and heavy heart. In every phase of the transfer it was unequal. On his side were worldly independence, social station, and an entire and devoted passion; on hers poverty, obscurity, and blighted hopes.

As this conviction grew upon her she wept over herself, for she felt that she was indeed a bankrupt in all that makes life brilliant, and a thousand times did she upbraid herself for the selfishness which had led her to listen to the addresses of such a suitor.

Repentance, however, came too late, and ap-rehensive that, should she longer delay her eturn to the house, her absence might create ome alarm as to her safety in the mind of Eleaor, Gertrude, rousing herself from her abstracon, smoothed the tangled hair upon her brow, athed her swollen eyes, and carefully lifting ie cherished rose branch, which had been the rst gift of love from the table, folded her hawl about her, and turned slowly in the diection of the hall.

What a change had taken place in her whole estiny during the last few hours!—what a hange in all her feelings! She scarcely knew whether to rejoice or to mourn on finding that ie had voluntarily flung from her all the old ssociations of years, and was almost ready to sk herself if, indeed a new scheme of happiess could grow out of the ashes of the past. loreover Gertrude, meek as she was, possessed, evertheless, a proud spirit; and when she reiected upon the time in which her hand would ave been eagerly sought, while now it could arcely be that her alliance would be more han coldly welcomed by the family of Mr. rmstrong, while it might be even scornfully ejected, tears of wounded feeling rose to her yes, and she felt tempted to recant her concesion, limited as it had been.

But where is the young heart which does not eawaken to the touch of hope? Where is the rave so deep that no flower will spring upon s surface? Gertrude remembered her last ome, her blighted visions, her crushed affecions: she recalled to her mind's eye the dreary oof, and the ungenial society of her aunt; and nce more she smiled as the attachment of Erest Armstrong rose before her; an attachment hich had scorned to yield before difficulty and elf-sacrifice; and again she resolved to leave er fate in his hands.

All these internal combats nevertheless weakned both her mental and physical strength, nd she became convinced that, even had not a ense of propriety dictated the measure, an imediate removal from the exhausting gaieties of he Hall was necessary to the preservation of er convalescence, while her absence would end to test the consistency of her suitor; and t was accordingly with a firm resolution to arry out her project of departure, that she at ength reached the house, pale and languid, nly to be tenderly chidden for her imprudence n wandering out alone in her then state of veakness.

The announcement of her intended return ome on the morrow, elicited still more remontrance. Eleanor could not spare her; Mr. Armtrong, on his arrival, would be annoyed to find hat she had left them before her health was horoughly re-established; Mary revealed the ecret of a projected fishing-party, where she ffectionately assured her that she would be inlispensable, a declaration in which she was warmly seconded by Somerville; and the old ady insisted upon several points, so strangely nvolved, that it was difficult to comprehend heir bearing upon the case. One individual nly remained totally silent throughout the whole discussion, and that one was Ernest: he eard even the guests of his mother join in the general entreaty, and saw tears of gratification stand in the soft eyes of the fair girl as she replied to each appeal; and still he sat by, apparently engaged with a newspaper, and without uttering a sentence.

At length Eleanor, distressed, and almost annoyed, to find all her endeavors fail in changing the resolution of her friend, suddenly turned towards her brother for assistance, exclaiming eagerly—

"Am I not right, Ernest? Do you not consider Gertrude very imprudent to leave us yet?"

"If you really desire my opinion," was the reply, and to every eye, save one, it was calmly and almost indifferently uttered; "I consider that if Miss Mortimer conceives it to be necessary and right to return to Bletchley, she should be left free to follow the dictates of her own judgment; but should she happily see cause in an hour or two to alter her opinion, she knows how much she has it in her power to oblige us all."

"And yet you persist, Gertrude," said Eleanor reproachfully.

And Gertrude did persist; and the following day saw her once more an inmate of the humble dwelling of Miss Warrington; enduring, as best she might, the condolences of her companion upon her pale cheeks and nerveless step; her inferences as to their cause, and her regret that she did not possess more self-command.

Gertrude blushed as she listened; for, naturally ingenuous, she felt that she was guilty of tacit deceit in thus indulging her aunt in her erroneous lamentations. Yet what had she to tell? That Ernest Armstrong loved her? Of what avail were such a confidence, when out of that passion there might grow nothing save mortification and disappointment to herself? Better, far better, that the worthy old gentlewoman should cling to her first illusion, than that she should be enabled to break up new ground, and imagine fresh subjects of grievance. Even in the solitude of her chamber, moreover, the orphan no longer found peace. In weeping over her sorrows she had experienced that strange sad luxury which, by some occult dispensation, those who mourn deeply ever feel when alone with their affliction; but now that most bitter of all sufferings, suspense, was her daily and hourly companion; a suspense rendered doubly difficult to bear, as it involved at once her happiness and her self-esteem.

During the last eventful evening at the Hall, she had found an opportunity to forbid the visits of Ernest; and with a right-minded delicacy, had also interdicted all correspondence until the decision of his father should have been made. In vain did the young man expostulate upon what he termed the overstrained and unnecessary cruelty of this arrangement: Gertrude was firm.

"Should Mr. Armstrong consent," she said meekly; "the privation will ultimately have been unimportant; should it prove otherwise, we have already met too often, and I owe it both to you and myself to terminate our intercourse at once."

Strong in her sense of right, to this resolution

she adhered; and, finding that it was in vain to oppose her will, Ernest could only declare a determination in his turn to proceed at once to town in order to have an immediate interview with his father, and by these means shorten the period of their separation.

Thus the orphan found herself once more almost alone; for although she had become more dear than ever to the friends whom she had left, they were less able than before to devote a portion of their time to her. The duties which the presence of their numerous guests imposed upon them, and which was rendered still more imperative by the sudden and incomprehensible desertion of Ernest, confined them strictly to their immediate circle; and, had it not been for the kindly messages, and affectionate notes which constantly reached her, Gertrude might have found some trouble in reconciling herself to the conviction that the old Hall and its warm-hearted inhabitants still remained in the neighborhood.

Moreover, long and weary days went by, and there were no news of Ernest. He had failed, then, and he left her to divine that failure in his silence. Once more she was scorned—once more her heart was widowed; and she, who had believed for many many months of heaviness that she could never love again, had suffered herself once more to hope only to be once more deceived. Such was at last her firm conviction; and although she wept over the loss of such a heart as that which she had won, she did not yield, as on a former occasion, to this new weight of woe. Her woman-pride nerved her to support the trial with dignity, and there were moments in which she found herself mentally consoling Ernest under a disappointment which she considered as inevitable. And then she glanced at her own future existence, when all should be indeed over between them; but the anticipation chilled her, and she closed her eyes as if to shut out the vision. Enough that it was hers to live and suffer; he, at least, might soon again be joyous and happy as she had first known him. A thousand cares, and avocations, and hopes, would wean her from his memory; and he would be restored to his family and to himself, when she was—forgotten!

Such a consolation fell cold upon her heart, as the night-dew upon grave-flowers; the blossoms might revive beneath its influence, but the dark tomb felt it not; and so time wore on, until three weary weeks had expired, and the faint hectic which had almost disappeared from the cheek of the orphan began once more to tinge the delicate skin; a low cough was occasionally heard to escape from her pallid lips; and the cold moisture which bathed her brow at intervals rendered the long and flexile tresses by which it was shaded languid and dull.

To Miss Warrington these changes were imperceptible; but Mr. Pilbeam was more clear-sighted, and he ere long began to insist with extreme pertinacity upon her instant return to the Hall. Gertrude was, however, inflexible; attributing her weakness to the extreme sultriness of the season, and the difficulty which it induced in her breathing; while, to her infinite relief, she found herself supported by her aunt, who, having become sufficiently attached to her society to find her renewed solitude irksome, strongly opposed her removal.

Baffled at the cottage, the little apothecary seriously alarmed for his patient, and not altogether indifferent to the eclat of a visit to the Hall, when it was known throughout the neighborhood that Miss Mortimer was no longer its inhabitant, hastened to tell his tale of fear, and hint his wishes to Mrs. Armstrong; but once more he was destined to disappointment. The good old lady shed a shower of tears as she learned the relapse of her favorite; Eleanor turned pale, and clung to a chair for support while Mary loudly and earnestly expressed her grief; but beyond these demonstrations of interest and affection, none of them progressed. In vain did he declare the necessity for an immediate change of air and habits; in vain did he remark how wonderfully beneficial her residence at the Hall had proved upon a previous occasion; in vain did he imply the expediency of her instant return; he was listened to with consideration and anxiety, but all his strategy proved fruitless; and at length, feeling that he had no right, and should, moreover, be very impolitic to endeavor to force upon the mistress of the house a guest who had, from some cause or other, evidently ceased to be welcome beneath her roof, he reluctantly rose, and took his leave, although not until he had promised to give Mrs. Armstrong constant intelligence of his patient.

Mr. Pilbeam ruminated as he descended the hill on his return homeward, upon the probable cause of so marked and unfavorable a change. It was true that all the ladies of the family had deeply felt his communication, but they had studiously confined their comments upon Miss Mortimer to the subject of her illness; and they had evidently avoided with the greatest care all reply to his inferred proposition. What could it mean? Mrs. Pilbeam, called to the council in his surgery, while he prepared sundry mysterious medicaments of divers colors, dropped or poured from tall, capacious looking glass bottles with ground stoppers and gilded etiquettes, into little slim phials of two or three inches in length with long labels, neatly inscribed and folded suspended from their necks; and, then, having corked them carefully, passed tham across the counter to his anxiously listening helpmate, who concluded the operation by crowning them with head-pieces of bright scarlet paper, which she trimmed rapidly and neatly round the edge with a huge pair of scissors—Mrs. Pilbeam, however elucidated the mystery at once.

It was, she declared, precisely what might have been expected. What could the Hall people want with poor Miss Warrington's niece, but to make use of her? And what use could she be of now, when they had a housefull of friends to amuse them? She couldn't help saying, however, that she was very glad of it; for when people set themselves up to be better than other people, it did them good to have their pride pulled down; though she must confess that she was very sorry the poor girl fretted so much, although, if there was no sickness among the gentry, Mr. Pilbeam would be reduced to practise upon his parish poor, which was neither pleasant nor profitable; so, that everything was for the best after all.

The busy apothecary listened, nodded, mixed and labelled assiduously, until his daily duties were completed; occasionally venturing upon an inference, or uttering a regret that his own popularity might be, perchance, diminished at the Great House by this untoward event; and, finally, satisfied that his quick-witted wife had solved the enigma, protested with an anxious sigh, that he trusted he should be able to support the system of his patient until the departure of the Hall-guests made her return there desirable to the family.

"You know, my dear," he concluded; "that before the visit of Miss Mortimer, I had never been called in by the Armstrongs, except to attend the domestics; and I made a great advance when I exchanged the servant's hall for the drawing room, eh? and that it is which makes this business doubly vexatious, and really very detrimental to me. Who can tell what good fortune might have occurred, if the poor thing had been allowed to remain where she was, eh? An accident, or an attack of fever, might have induced them, when I was on the spot, to employ me, instead of sending off an express to the town, as they have always done. But I do believe that I was born to be unlucky."

Be this as it might, and certainly the worthy apothecary's position was sufficiently obscure to prove that he was at least no inordinate favorite of the blind goddess, it is certain that before noon the next day, all the magnates of Bletchley were aware that the proud Miss Mortimer had been made to understand that there was not room at the Hall for her, while the grandees from London were there; and great was the gratulation of the maiden sisters, and the minister's widow, when the secret was confided to them.

As to the Misses Bayliss, they declared their conviction, that poor Miss Warrington's still poorer relation might make up her mind that she had seen the last of the Hall; as, indeed, it would seem that she had done, by her fretting herself ill again; for, of course, the Armstrongs could hardly be so barefaced as to have her up there again directly their house was empty; and then in the spring they would be off to town; and by the time they returned, they would have forgotten all about her.

Nothing could be more feasible or more rational; nor did Getrude herself venture for a moment to entertain a different opinion. They would soon forget her. They would leave Bletchley early in the spring; for she had been present when the arrangement was made, and had even been urged to join their party. They would abstain from seeking her society before their departure. And thus, from very different premises, and with very different feelings, the same conclusion was attained.

Gertrude was wretched, for she was hopeless; but even this hopelessness served to sustain her. As she had nothing now to anticipate, so also she had nothing to fear. Her fate was accomplished. And yet, she felt that one parting explanation might have been vouchsafed to her; and her pride was wrung, that although the letters of Eleanor, after having reached her at long intervals, and then ceased altogether, had seemed to announce a cessation of all friendship, the daily present of game, or fruit, or flowers had never failed. It was as though they had withdrawn their regard, and now conceded only their compassion.

The sensitive delicacy of the orphan was deeply wounded; and while her aunt constantly expatiated upon the persevering attentions of her new friends, the unhappy orphan turned sickening from the dainties for which she was indebted to them, and suffered the most rare and beautiful flowers to wither for want of attendance, or banished them from her room upon the plea that they affected her breathing. There was, however, one faded rose-branch which she cherished, although color and scent had long since departed from it; her heart was not yet so full as to shut out that cherished memory.

Become too feeble to walk unattended, Gertrude was soon compelled to content herself with the air which she could procure through an open window; and there she remained seated for hours, with a book or a needle in her hand listening abstractedly to the economical dissertations of her rigid aunt, and lost in a maze of painful thought.

She was so sitting upon one occasion, on a sweet evening, when the glow of the setting sun shed a golden glory over her pale features, and glistened amid her long languid curls, looking rather like a seraph than a mortal, and thinking, as was her habit, of the quiet grave which would so soon bury alike her and her griefs, in all the luxury of solitude; Miss Warrington having left the room upon some household duty; when she suddenly became conscious of a thick and hurried breathing, which betrayed that some stranger had paused beside her. Easily alarmed, she was about to retire, when a light form bounded through the gate of the little fence and in the next instant, before her tottering limbs had power to second her will, Ernest Armstrong stood before her, his eager hands grasping the window-sill, and his fine countenanee glowing with joy and animation.

"Gertrude, my own Gertrude," he exclaimed passionately; "We have conquered! At last you are mine. My father has sent me before him to prepare you for his visit. He comes to embrace his new daughter."

The orphan gazed fixedly at him for an instant, and then fell back upon her seat speechless and powerless. She had struggled against her despair, but she had not strength to support this sudden revulsion of feeling. With the quick glance of affection, Earnest at once discovered the error of which he had been guilty in the happiness of his own heart, and, in another moment, he had sprung into the apartment, and was at her feet.

"What have I done, Gertrude?" he whispered tenderly; "Speak to me, dearest, and assure me that the past is forgiven; that the silence which you enforeed upon me, has not led to a doubt of my affeetion; that I am welcome, even although I may have been long in coming. One word, Gertrude, only one, if you still love me."

Gertrude strove to utter the assurance that he asked, but her pale lips trembled without regaining the force of utterance; and then it was that, surprised at her prolonged silence, the agitated young man looked more earnestly upon her, and recognised the ravages which the last few weeks had made in her whole person.

The shudder which passed over his frame alone betrayed his wretchedness, but it was eloquent—for a moment, he feared that he had returned too late—and he eagerly fastened his eyes upon her wasted features and sunken form, as if to ask himself whether, indeed, there were yet hope.

After a time, however, his anxious and affectionate devotion appeared to call back the fleeting senses of the orphan, and a convulsive sob announced her return to consciousness. A deep blush rose to her faded cheek as she found herself in the arms of Ernest, and her first impulse was to liberate herself; but the clasp of affection was not to be so readily flung off, and it was with increased tenderness that Ernest appealed to her feelings, to her fidelity, and to her justice.

"You have doubted me, Gertrude," he murmured reproachfully; "you have doubted me, or I should not find you thus. I can read hours of misgiving and of reproach upon the pale brow that rests so languidly upon my shoulder. When I approached the window, I saw you as radiant as ever, and little did I suspect that it was the mere cheat of a mocking light. Why have you been thus ungenerous towards me? Did you not know that when, for the first time in my life, I pleaded with my father, I was pleading for the happiness of my whole life—nay, for that very life itself?—And did you, indeed, judge so poorly of me as to believe that I would be worsted in such a cause?"

A faint and timid smile rose to the lip of the orphan.

"Time has passed, I know it but too well," pursued Ernest, "since the cruel moment in which you banished me from your presence until I could return with my father's sanction to our marriage; and you are also quite aware that my father loves you, but, nevertheless, his ambition—his vanity—call it what you will—had led him to form other projects for his son, and you must, therefore, forgive him, even though he should have exhibited such pertinacious reluctance in yielding to my prayer. Believe me also, dearest, when I assure you that your dignity has never been compromised, even for an instant; it could not be, for that dignity was also mine. As regarded your birth, there were, of course, no scruples, for therein we were equals. You see that I am frank with you, Gertrude; for we love each other, and I feel that I have no right, as certainly I have no wish, to mislead you. The difficulty was at once less in importance, and more powerful in effect. You are as well aware as myself that the Armstrongs were, some generations ago, the most wealthy family in the country, and my father had encouraged strange visions that I was destined to restore their ancient affluence by what the world calls a fortunate marriage; but I knew too well that this was a popular misnomer, as it is commonly understood, and that my happiness must have a more solid and tangible foundation. In short, we discussed the matter until he became convinced that I had reason on my side, and now, I transgress no duty in telling you that I am all your own."

"And shall you, indeed, never regret so great a sacrifice, Ernest? Shall you never weary of your poor penniless bride?" asked his listener tenderly.

"Do we weary of the air we breathe, Gertrude? Are you not the one thought, the one interest of my existence? In losing you, I should have lost all that rendered life endurable. But this fear is past, and now I have only to entreat of you to take more care of my happiness than it is evident you have done of late; for, truly, dearest, you are sadly changed."

"I know it," said the pale girl, as she swept her languid hand across her brow; "I am, indeed, as you remark, sadly changed, but joy is a skilful physician. You are here, and all will soon once more be well with me."

For the first time the enraptured lover ventured to touch with his lips the forehead which reposed upon his shoulder; and he did so unchidden, for the strength of the orphan was ebbing rapidly beneath the conflicting emotion of the last half hour, and the heart of the young man heaved as he watched the color rise and fade, in rapid alternation upon her cheek.

It was consequently, almost with a feeling of relief, that he heard the sound of approaching footsteps, and while Gertrude instinctively withdrew herself from his hold, he hastily rose from his seat, and stood beside her. In the next instant, Miss Warrington entered the room, and an exclamation of surprise escaped her lips as she remarked the presence of the intruder.

"I owe you a thousand apologies, my dear madam," said Ernest in reply, as he advanced towards her with extended hand; "I feel that I have been guilty of a most unceremonious entrance beneath your roof, but I trust that you will pardon the indiscretion when I tell you that I came here to claim my bride."

"Your bride, Mr. Armstrong!" echoed the bewildered old lady, as she sank almost as breathless as the orphan herself, into her accustomed arm-chair: "Beware, young gentleman, how you jest with a Mortimer. I am old, and powerless, it is true, but Gertrude is not altogether friendless, and she must not be made the sport of idle vanity."

And as she spoke, her tall figure grew yet taller; while the fingers generally so tightly clasped, were extended and outstretched as if in warning.

"You wrong me, Miss Warrington," was the proud reply; "I come as a suppliant, not as a jester, and I am even now momentarily awaiting the arrival of my father to second my suit. I love, and have long loved your niece, and she has condescended to return my affection; family affairs, with which I will not weary you, have detained me some time in town, and I regret to perceive, that during my absence the health of Gertrude has not progressed as I had hoped. She has, however, promised me that she will exert all her energies to recover strength, and we must trust that care and zeal will aid her successfully in the effort. And now, my dear madam, do you still refuse your hand to your new nephew?"

The astonishment of the stately old lady, far from diminishing, only increased with every word to which she listened; but as she saw the meek and appealing eyes of Gertrude fixed upon her, she almost unconsciously placed her hand in that of the young man who stood respectfully before her, and drew a long breath as though she would have heaved a heavy weight from her breast.

"You have told me nothing of this, Miss Mortimer," she at length said in her most sententious tones; "and you have been wrong. I am your natural guardian, and could not have objected to this marriage, provided it be, as I trust it is, welcome to Mr. Armstrong's family; for otherwise I at once refuse my sanction, and eannot countenanee the visits of this gentleman."

There was no opportunity for either Gertrude or her lover to reply to this solemn announeement, for the words were still upon the lips of Miss Warrington, when a carriage stopped at the door, and the Squire was announced. Vainly did the poor girl endeavor to rise from her chair to receive him; the throbbing of her heart was so violent, that she could only clasp her hands together and gasp for breath; but she soon overcame this undue emotion, and pride lent her strength, as Mr. Armstrong turned from the ceremonious greeting of the maiden aunt, to welcome him, if not with complete composure, at least with perfect self-possession.

There was a slight, a very slight shade of constraint upon the brow of the Squire, which did not escape the anxious eyes of Gertrude; and perhaps it was fortunate that she remarked it, for it gave her nerve, conscious, as she was, that she had used no unworthy means to secure the affection of his son. He, however, seated himself beside her, after having given a nod of intelligence to Ernest, who was eagerly watching his movements, and kindly taking her hand, expressed the regret which he felt at her altered appearanee.

"We have all been in error, my dear Miss Mortimer," he pursued, although with visible effort; "and that mad boy yonder not the least. What business had he to agitate and harass you with his foolish fancies when you had no strength to spare? And what business had you to listen, when you should have been thinking of your health, and endeavoring to take care of yourself? Oh! my pretty Gertrude," he whispered more affeetionately, as he saw the large tears swelling in her eyes; "what business had I, old fool as I was, to suppose that I knew better what was good for him than he did himself? However, as we have all been wrong, we must all endeavor to be wiser in future. You will not find Ernest half so troublesome, now that he is sure of having his own way, while your little heart will be at ease, and that will prove the best medicine in your own ease. As for me, Gertrude, you must forget that I did not do justice to your merits at once, as perhaps I should have done; for I have had to contend against a host of old hopes, and of old memories, by which I have been haunted since his boyhood. How say you, madam?" he added, addressing the old lady; "As we have each made some sacrifice should we not each also make some eoneession?"

"My dear Sir," broke in the happy Gertrude; "how can I reply to such unhoped for indulgence? But, indeed, indeed, I am not unworthy of it. I have long despaired in silence, without one feeling save that of gratitude towards yourself. I did not dare to hope, but I at least avoided all self-reproach."

"I know it, my dear young lady, I know it," was the cordial rejoinder; "Had it been otherwise you would not have been the little Gertrude who robbed us of all our hearts. And the more I look at you, the more I feel disposed to admit that Ernest is right, and that you will, after all, bring him the best dowry."

"I am acquitted, then, in your eyes at least, Sir," said the young man with a triumphant smile.

"Fully—honorably acquitted, and I receive with joy to my heart and home the daughter you have selected for me."

And as he spoke, the kind old Squire folded the agitated orphan in his arms, and kissed her with paternal tenderness.

"To-morrow," he pursued, after the pause of a moment, during which no one made an effort to break the silence; "to-morrow Mrs. Armstrong and the girls will be with you early; nay, they wanted to invade the carriage tonight, when they learned my errand; but they had grumbled so much for the last few weeks at what they were pleased to call my unkindness, in debarring them from the society of their favorite, that I resolved to punish them for their want of obedience, and so, in spite of all their reproaches and entreaties, I set forth alone, as the young gentleman opposite had done before me, although I suggested that we should travel in company. So you see, my pretty Gertrude, that you must put on all your best looks to receive them, or incur the risk of undergoing a course of Mrs. Armstrong's dietiug, and nursing, and warning, when you may pass your time more pleasantly."

"And Eleanor, and Mary? Do they really still love me?" asked the orphan with emotion.

"For Eleanor I can answer at once," smiled Mr. Armstrong; "as for Mary, her love appears to be monopolised by Somerville, but I dare say that you will nevertheless be able to come to an understanding. And now I must take my leave, and so, moreover, must this young gentleman, who has agitated you more than enough already, and against whom I shall request Miss Warrington to close her doors if he does not conduct himself with becoming prudence; for as he has insisted upon giving me a daughter, so in my turn, I shall insist that she be taken proper care of."

Ernest would fain have expostulated, and turned an imploring look from his father to his hostess, but he met with no encouragement from either. Mr. Armstrong, vanquished alike by his affection for his son and his regard for Gertrude, had succeeded in overcoming all distaste to their marriage, and had consequently not seen without alarm the fearful state of weakness to which she was reduced, while he instantly felt the necessity of protecting her from all undue excitement; and thus it was evident that he anticipated no opposition to his will, as he avoided the eye of the young man like one who would admit no further discussion upon the subject; while Miss Warrington, half bewildered, and half alarmed at what was passing about her, felt like a person under the influence of an agitating dream, and was looking anxiously for the departure of her self-constituted guests.

There was accordingly no appeal, and with a parting word which lasted throughout a somewhat lengthy and explanatory leave-taking between the sententious old lady and the simple-maunered Squire, Ernest was compelled at last to relinquish the hand which had been confidingly abandoned to him, and to follow his father to the carriage with as much philosophy as he could command; nor was it until the sound of their retreating wheels convinced her that they were indeed gone, that Miss Warrington turned towards her niece with wonder and reproach alike upon her lips; but her words fell powerless on the closed ear of her companion. The reaction of feeling had consumed her small remaining amount of strength, and the orphan lay back insensible in her chair.

With eager but mistaken zeal, Miss Warrington and her handmaiden hastened to arouse the exhausted girl from the perfect repose of mind and body induced by the syncope into which she had fallen, and to convey her to her chamber, where, at her earnest request, they left her to reflect upon all the unhoped-for events of the last few hours. And very strange, almost too strange for sober self-gratulation, appeared the total change which had supervened in all her feelings. Again and again she asked herself if it indeed were true; if it were not merely a cheat of her wandering reason? But again and again she was enabled to recall every word and almost every look; she seemed still to feel the pressure of the old man's lips upon her cheek, and the warm clasp of the hand which had so long been closed over her own, and she smiled the heart's smile as every succeeding moment strengthened her consciousness of the truth. She who had been so long an outcast, was then, indeed, at last to know the blessings of domestic affection; to be called by the endearing names of daughter—sister—wife! to see herself the object of care and tenderness, and love, when she had taught herself to believe that from all these holy privileges she was inexorably shut out. Her sense of happiness became almost painful. She had learned to support suffering, but she was feeble as an infant under this new sensation. The very silence appeared vocal to her, and the air laden with gentle voices, and the evening twilight bright with kindly smiles. Her narrow room was peopled with joyous visions, and her solitude made cheerful by their presence.

One dark shadow, and one only, gloomed amid the brightness of her thoughts: she had forgotten that she was poor, and that her poverty had for a time closed the heart of him to whom she was soon to pay the duty of a child she forgot that this same poverty would compel her to go a portionless bride to the arms of her destined husband; she had ceased to remember all her past struggles, and to weep over her faded beauty; but there was still one painful memory which would not be silenced. She had become an alien from the affection of her nearest relative, the playmate of her childhood, and the friend of her youth. Yes, from the period of his marriage it was evident that he had ceased to interest himself in her fate, perhaps even to recal her existence; and the affectionate heart of Gertrude swelled even amid her new sense of happiness, and the tears of disappointed feeling fell from her eyes, as this intrusive recollection forced itself upon her.

Although all her early dreams of hope had long melted away, like those ice-palaces which are constructed upon the Neva, only to melt beneath the next change of temperature; she yet clung to the son of that more than mother who had watched over her girlish years with a tenderness of which she had never hoped to be again the object; still she thought of him as of a loved and cherished brother; and the heart cannot easily forego so blessed a bond.

Thus there was yet one drop of gall in the overflowing cup of her meek delight, and for a while that drop appeared to taint the whole draught; but gradually she became awakened to the weakness of yielding to such depressing memories, and although the painful impression still remained, she compelled herself to turn to other and brighter thoughts; she finally sank to sleep, to dream of Ernest Armstrong, and to be happy.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Sybil and Mortimer were man and wife; and they were travelling over that glorious Italy which they both loved so well, and were so well able to appreciate. More beautiful than ever in the eyes of her enraptured bridegroom, Mrs. Mortimer was radiant with smiles, bright with genius, and affectionate even beyond his hope. Surrounded by all the appliances of luxury, she had scarcely time to form a wish ere it was eagerly fulfilled; her days were all sunshine, and her heart all triumph. Now, indeed, she could defy fate; now, indeed, she was revenged upon that world which had dared to scorn her; and if she did not love her husband as he deserved to be loved, she could at least so thoroughly feign the tenderness for which he sought as to blind him to the fact.

At length they reached Rome; and here they had decided to spend a long and delicious month among the old and glorious memories of the past. No prospect could be more enchanting to Frederic, possessed of his long-coveted bride, and existing in the land of his predilection, he had not a desire unfulfilled; but Sybil soon became less enthusiastic than himself, and there was an evident restlessness in her manner each morning as they set forth to visit the memorable monuments of the Imperial City.

One of her constant cares since leaving England had been to examine the visitors' book of every hotel at which they took up their temporary abode; and although Frederic found an equal amusement in the heterogeneous assemblage of authographs thus placed under his eyes; yet, as he sat with his arm folded about the slight figure of his wife,—his glance following the direction of her finger—and laughed with her at the pompous announcement attached to the plebeian names of Tompkins, Jenkins, Smith, e tutti quanti, it was nevertheless evident that Sybil attached a serious interest to the survey, in which he was far from participating. A sigh of relief escaped her as she closed the dingy volume upon each occasion until that upon which we shall rejoin her.

Rome was crowded with foreigners; and it was not without considerable difficulty that Mortimer succeeded in securing for Sybil such accommodation as he considered worthy of her. The streets were loud with those trivial sounds of mere common-place every-day life, which form so paltry and puerile a contrast with the grand and stately relics of buried centuries; bright bonnets and idle laughter desecrated the mysteries of the Coliseum; dingy droschys and dusty berlins crowded the hotel yards; vociferous oaths in English, German, and Italian, were growled, screamed, or muttered on every side; the churches and the coffee-houses were alike full; and everything promised what the degenerate Romans of the present day, in their greed of gain and carelessness of the faded glories of the past, denominate a magnificent season.

The hotel-book was full of names, on which the ink had as yet had scarcely time to dry. Highnesses, duchesses, peers, and chevaliers of every order under the sun, were intermingled in sublime confusion with the city-knights, touring-traders, and chevaliers d'industrie. It was evident that not a hope of even partial seclusion remained for the married lovers. The fingers of Sybil had already indicated her acquaintance with at least a dozen of the new arrivals, while Frederic himself had discovered more than one name that was full of old associations. As yet, however, neither had been sufficiently discouraged to utter more than an impatient "Pshaw!" at each encounter, until the somewhat cramped and hyper-flourished signature of the Prince de Saviatti caused an involuntary start on the part of the lady, which brought a bright flush into her cheek.

"You know il illustricimo Principe, Sybil?" said Mortimer, who had observed her emotion.

"Yes," was the somewhat embarrassed reply; "in so far as such an individual really can be known. I met him frequently during a season in town, when, as he expressed it, he was 'doing his England,' and I confess that I am surprised to find him here, when I believed that he was in Egypt, or China, or at the antipodes, pour pro mener sa paresse; for he is full of Sicilian prejudices, and always laughed at my enthusiasm for Rome and its treasures."

"He is evidently no favorite of yours," remarked her husband, who had detected an unusual tinge of bitterness in her tone.

Sybil attempted a contemptuous laugh. "I have had few favorites," she said, as she passed her small and jewelled hand through the clustering curls of her companion: a liberty which he resented by drawing her to his bosom, and thus afforded her the opportunity she sought of recovering her self-possession; "and poor Saviatti is sufficiently well satisfied with himself to be able to dispense with all extraneous adoration; but I confess that for a time he amused me. You know, Frederic, that all depends upon the mood of the moment, and that the antics of the monkey sometimes interest as much as the stateliness of the lion; and thus Saviatti, a prince though he be, or at least calls himself, was my monkey during three months, after which I totally lost sight of him."

Mortimer was silent. It was not that one suspicion of Sybil's truth rushed across his mind, but as yet that past, into which he so ardently desired to penetrate, remained a mystery to him. On the eve of her marriage, he had not ventured to hazard a question, lest she might be pained by such an implied want of confidence; and since she had been his wife he had thought of her, only of her, and flung from him every anxiety save that of contributing to her happiness.

Now, however, he for the first time remembered that he had made no progress in her confidence, and that he was indebted to chance for every revelation connected with her early life. Nor had he felt altogether convinced by the explanation which he had extorted; for he could not conceal from himself that it was overstrained, and that its flippancy but ill disguised its hollowness.

It was, therefore, under the influence of a sensation as painful as it was novel to him, that he replied somewhat sarcastically: "In that case the meeting is a fortunate one; for the monkey-prince will afford a diverting relief after our solemn musings among mouldering ruins and crumbling monuments. We shall doubtlessly, soon meet, as we are domesticated under the same roof; and thus an acquaintance so gaily commenced may be as cheerfully continued."

"I care little ever to meet him again," said Sybil, dropping her beautiful head upon the shoulder of her husband, and looking up at him with one of those beaming smiles which always captivated his reason: "Every folly has its day, and becomes stale by repetition. Saviatti is too frivolous to leave one regret behind him."

"Did he visit England alone?" asked Frederic, already half appeased, as he bent down and kissed the fair forehead which was pillowed upon his bosom: "Was the monkey unaccompanied by his attendant bear?"

"Oh no! there was a tall, lean, sour-visaged abbate, who was in his train when he arrived in town; but I believe that the Prince wearied of the espionage to which he was condemned by the companionship of this saturnine individual, who had been attached to his person by his father, and so gave him his dismissal; for it is certain that he returned to Palermo only a few weeks after the advent of his principal."

"Saviatti is, then, a Palermitan?"

"So I understand. But you appear singularly interested about this frivolous foreigner, Frederic!"-

"Do you wonder that it should be so, Sybil? Did he not know you, and apparently know you intimately, long before we had even met?"

Mrs. Mortimer changed her position; her cheek burnt, and she did not care to expose it to the observation of her husband.

"And do you believe that he, and such as he, could ever know me?" she asked with a pretty affectation of scorn. "Do both yourself and me better justice, my dear Frederic. Saviatti knows me as he knows Rome; he appreciates me as he appreciates the glories of the Parthenon and the sublimity of St. Peter's. And, apropos of this, what shall we do this evening? Surely we came to the Imperial City for a better purpose than that of 'chronicling small beer!'"

"Shall we visit the Coliseum?"

"Il Colisco? Oh no! Have you forgotten that the moon is at its full, and that it will swarm with fools? Let us go there when it can be, if not entirely, at least comparatively our own. I loathe to witness the tricks of the travelled mountebank, upon the very spot where once gushed forth the proud blood from the panting arteries of the stricken gladiator, or the holy life-tide of the Christian captive. Do not even let us attempt the Villa Medici; we shall be elbowed by foreign Excellencies and crimson-stockined Eminences; nor will that, in all probability, be the worst. Remember the list of names over which we have been pondering; and dread the encounter of this flight of northern locusts as you would the malaria of the Campagna."

"Whither can we go, then, to avoid them?" asked Frederic, once more appeased by the belief that all society had become importunate to Sybil which deprived her of his own. "Like the ravenous insects to which you have compared them, they will swarm in every direction."

"Have you ever visited the gardens of the Negroni?"

"Never."

"Will you devote your evening to me alone, without regret and without ennui?"

"Not my evening only, but my whole existence!" replied Frederic tenderly.

Sybil laughingly placed her hand upon his lips.

"Wait until we are wandering in the delicious solitudes to which I am about to introduce you," she said; "before you forget the husband in the lover. There, indeed, you will, or I greatly mistake you, be compelled to yield to the soft influence of the spot; about which we shall, in all probability, be permitted to ramble alone, as it has few attractions for the mere tourist, who seeks to see rather than to feel."

"What a delicious prospect! And when shall we set forth?"

"Now, if you will. The sun is near its decline, and the hour is most propitious."

And as Sybil spoke she passed to an inner apartment, whence she emerged a few moments afterwards, shawled and bonneted; and moreover, for the first time since her marriage, closely veiled. There was little fear that a man of pleasure like Saviatti would be found in the solitary recesses of the Negroni gardens; but even the risk, slight as it was, must be provided against; and congratulating herself upon her expedient for rendering "assurance doubly sure," Mrs. Mortimer, as she hung gracefully upon the arm of her husband, and heard him thank her again and again for so delightful a suggestion, smiled half in triumph and half in scorn. The evening would now pass away without any encounter with the prince; and she must trust to her tact to urge their early departure by every means in her power. She had ere this read her weak but devoted husband even to the heart's core; and she well knew that his vanity was the lever by which she could at all times move him at her will.

Long before they reached the silent and shadowy gardens, and even while she listened, apparently rapt in interested attention, to some old travelling memory with which Mortimer was endeavoring to beguile the way, her whole plan was arranged, and she felt secure of its success.

To her it would be no sacrifice to abandon Rome if she also escaped Saviatti. She had been warned in time of his presence; and she resolved to profit by the knowledge.

"We must leave Rome, and that speedily," she murmured to herself, as, with an exclamation of delight from Mortimer, they plunged into the thickest shades of the perfumed solitude, which to him promised an evening of intense and quiet happiness, and to her a few hours of insipidity and safety!

CHAPTER XXXV.

Fair and gracious reader, have you ever visited the Negroni Gardens at Rome? If not, be careful to bend your steps thitherward when you again find yourself a denizen of the lordly city, if you be one who loves that fantastic blending of the natural and the artistic, the present and the past, which speaks to the heart as well as to the senses; and affords a calm and soothing relief from the perpetual stir and excitement of the busy world by which you are surrounded.

The stamp of centuries was never more visibly impressed upon the mouldering remains of tower or battlement than it is upon the hoary trees and antique monuments of those far-reaching solitudes; above one of whose walls the Baths of Diocletian may be seen, apparently coeval with the long lines of untrimmed cypresses, whose trailing branches scarcely admit the passage of an intruder among their mysterious depths; and the wild patches of bay, scenting the air with their luxurious perfume, as if in emulation of the tangled masses of jasmine, starred with ten thousand blossoms; while, scattered on every side, at times half-buried amid the dense and vagrant vegetation, and at others rising in cold calm majesty upon some partially uninvaded spot, the wanderer encounters fragments of ancient architecture, of which the date, the purpose, and even the name of him who wrought them, are alike unknown; vases of quaint device and graceful chisseling: altars erected to the Manes, in those deep and silent nooks so appropriate to their worship; and sarcophagi, which teach, as we look upon them, the sublime majesty with which past ages invested the idea of man's apotheosis.

It is rare that even the cry of a passing bird disturbs the silence of these dreary retreats; but there is a constant and mysterious voice among the leaves, as they heave or quiver to the passing wind; and a perpetual murmur of falling waters, trickling from the porphry basins which they overflow, and stealing away beneath a network of rank grass and aquatic weeds by which their onward course is totally concealed. When the eye wanders upwards, and penetrates between the sturdy boughs of the ancient wood, it sees, shadowed upon the dense purple sky of evening, the massive domes, and tall singularly shaped tower of Santa Maria Maggiore; the worship of art is without those hoary walls; the worship of nature is within; for how much is there of holiness in such a scene—how much to exalt the soul, and to rebuke the pride!

For a while Sybil and Mortimer walked forward in silence. Both were too full of their own sensations to break the stillness by a word. To Frederic the whole wilderness was one of enchantment; his heart throbbed, and he pressed more closely to his side the hand which rested on his arm, without even remarking that the mute caress was not returned. The spirit of the spot was within him, and about him. Keenly alive to the grand and solemn in nature, he was absorbed by that rare and beautiful feeling of universal love which comes like a holy dream upon the heart only at those infrequent moments when every hope appears to be realized, and when it makes of its happiness one common crucible in which to blend and to purify every thing around it.

It is true that many individuals pass through life without either the opportunity or the necessary faculty for experiencing this enviable, and, alas! too transitory state of feeling. Hume has said that "some people are subject to a certain delicacy of passion;" and Mortimer was precisely such a person. Jealous of the affection of others, he was equally lavish of his own; pure in taste, upright in principle, and tenacious of all which affected his honor, he was, nevertheless, supine in the ordinary interests of life; he had neither ambition, nor a desire of wealth; he lived rather in a self-created world of sensation than in that outward and material circle by which he was environed; and he was, consequently, more readily influenced by purely personal circumstances than one who had diffused his hopes and his anxieties over a broader sphere of impulse and action.

Thus, then, at the moment described, his heart and his aspirations were alike satisfied. He had won the woman whom he loved; and, despite those passing shadows of misgiving which are the ordinary concomitants of strong and exacting passion, he nevertheless, did not entertain a doubt that, on his part, he was equally beloved. Sybil was at his side, they trod together a path of silence and enchantment, and Mortimer was supremely happy.

And where had the thoughts of Sybil wandered? Were they with the husband upon whose arm she leaned? Were they with the mother from whom she was for the first time separated? —or did they linger upon that home of which she was so soon to become the presiding genius, and on those duties which would, hereafter, devolve upon her? In sooth, they were occupied by none of these. As they turned from one avenue into another, a hasty glance first assured her that their solitude still continued uninvaded, and then, her reflections fell back to the point at which they had momentarily paused.

For months, Rome had been the object of all her wishes, as well as those of Mortimer; but from Rome she now felt that it was expedient they should depart at once, and the pretext for this apparent caprice was readily found. Yet, to return to Westrum—to bury herself in an obscure English county, of whose monotony she had already had dreary experience, now that her point was carried, and that the world was once more before her—revolted alike her vanity and her patience. And for whom was she required to do this? For a man whose supineness she despised, whose intellect she scorned, and of whose feelings she was careless. Sybil at once convinced herself that such a sacrifice was impossible. She was not formed for home, either by nature or by education; nor was she responsible for the mistake which her husband had wilfully committed, in supposing that the mere fact of becoming his wife would change alike her principles and her tastes.

That this mistake is of daily occurrence in the world, and perpetrated even by men of shrewd sense and habitual prudence upon other points, is certain; and that it will continue to be so is equally sure, so long as vanity and sensual gratification are suffered to silence the dictates of reason; but so trite a truth could offer no mitigation to the disappointment of a particular individual, and was assuredly not calculated to assuage that of a man of Mortimer's peculiar temperament.

From the very period of her enforced retirement from a world by which she had once been worshipped, Sybil had felt the most invincible desire to return to it, so soon as she should have secured a position which would enable her to revenge what she had never ceased to consider as its injustice. Accustomed to regard herself as one constituted to shine in whatever circle she might embellish by her presence, and caring little for the happiness of domestic life, and still less for the charm of domestic duties, she felt at home only in the midst of a crowd, and as the centre of admiration. The excitement which fatigues and exhausts a less ambitious nature, was to hers the very aliment on which it existed; and she looked forward to the prospect of re-appearing in the world, in the character of a wealthy married woman, with delight, as it would afford the opportunity of a social vengeance, well calculated to soothe her pride and to satisfy her ambition.

It was, consequently, upon speculations such as these that the thoughts of Sybil were engaged, amid the solemn shades threaded by Mortimer with tender veneration; nor was her reverie disturbed by a single word until they reached a spot so striking and picturesque, as to rouse even her companion from his trance of delight. They had traversed one of the cypress avenues from end to end; and then, striking into a lateral walk, fragrant with untended lemon-trees and vagrant honeysuckle, sheltered on its northern side by a thick belt of bay, and rendered fresh and verdant upon its other lip by one of those hidden rivulets of water already described, they suddenly came upon a small open space, in the centre of which stood an altar, moss-grown and hoary, where an eternal requiem was supplied by the overflowing of a capacious basin which was half veiled by the surrounding underwood, and the flexible leaves which trembled, as if in adoration to the touch of the passing breeze.

"Beautiful!" exclaimed Frederic, as he suddenly paused, and claimed the attention of his musing bride. "Where can we find a better halting place? Here, Sybil, the world, and the world's follies are, indeed, as nothing; and we may, for a few instants, be all in all to each other. With what exquisite judgment did our forefathers select the spots which they dedicated to the past affections and the past ties by which they had been linked to the loved and lost! How must the Manes, could they be conscious of the present, cherish a scene like this! Let us rest here a while. See how luxurious a couch is spread for you beneath this thicket of bay, overarched by tall and stately cypress-trees!—the mossy turf yields to the foot more softly than the velvet carpets of a palace; the gurgling water and the awakened leaves are redolent of harmony; and we may here indulge in the full consciousness of a happiness which has nothing more to ask of destiny, save its continuance."

"It is, indeed, a lovely retreat," said Sybil, as she suffered herself to be established beside the brimming basin, whence the crystal waters escaped with a low murmur which lent a mystic voice to the solitude; "To be happy here, the spirit need only be at peace."

"Let us, then, be happy," retorted the still enamored husband, as he flung himself beside her, and supporting her slight figure with his encircling arm; "For are we, at least, not at peace? Are we not well able to appreciate all its charm? I love you in the world, Sybil; in the crowd where my protection and my support are necessary to your more delicate nature; but in such a scene as this how doubly dear do you appear to me, where you are all my own, and we are alone with the sublime works of nature!"

"Would that we could ever be thus, my best friend!" replied Sybil, with one of her most radiant smiles; "but, alas! that is impossible. We owe ourselves to the world, which is a stern task-mistress, and will enforce their duties upon all her children. Even now, since we entered these gardens, I feel overwhelmed by a sense of my own individual responsibility; I have become convinced that the path before me must not be perpetually strewn with roses. And when I think of you, Frederic; of you, with all your glorious faculties, and manifold opportunities of good, I become almost sad with anxiety. You know how I love you; for have I not given myself to you, despite the resolution of years, and the dictates which I had so long accustomed myself to regard as those of a calm and matured reason? And yet, I confess that I would also feel myself compelled to regard you with pride as well as affection; I would see you just to yourself; not shunning the world as an object either of scorn or alarm, but boldly taking your place among the foremost of those by whom its destinies are controlled."

"Sybil, you astonish me! What can I need more than I possess?—what can the world of which you speak add to my present happiness? Have I not wealth sufficient to ensure to you—and that alone can now be my consideration—all the luxuries of life? Is not my social station unexceptionable? Are not you my own? What have I now to do with ambition? My race of hope is run."

"Are you then content to die and be forgotten?"

"Not by those who love me. Not by such as you, Sybil; but I care little for the memory of the world. Look around you. We are here almost on holy ground. This silent, and yet most eloquent monument, perpetuates the recollection of some departed one, but it identifies that recollection only for those who reared it. Thus would I have it myself. Rear for me an imperishable altar in your own heart, and I shall ask no worship which would entail a more conspicuous shrine."

"Let us, then, talk of life rather than death," said Sybil, with a sigh for which Mortimer felt grateful to her. "You are still too young to immure yourself in a country house, limiting your duties to receiving rents and entertaining provincial persons. Neither your tastes nor your acquirements fit you for occupations like these, and I confess that I cannot see you reconcile yourself thus to fritter away your years and your faculties, without remorse and regret; remorse that my society may induce you to bear with such a fate, and regret that you should not have chosen a nobler destiny."

"And how can I dispel such bitter feelings?" asked her bridegroom playfully; "Shall I volunteer myself as prime minister, or try my fortune as commander-in-chief? Nevertheless," he added more gravely, "you surprise me greatly, Sybil; for we have so frequently and so fondly talked together of the delights of a tranquil home, and the happiness of making that home the centre of benevolence and love, that I was unprepared for this change of sentiment in one by whom I believed that my thoughtful and somewhat indolent nature was thoroughly understood."

"Nor must you now misconceive me, Frederic," replied Sybil somewhat anxiously; "Before I became your wife I thought only, I dreamed only of securing your affection, of having you constantly beside me, and of engrossing all the faculties of your soul; but now that I know you better and prize your more; now that egotism has become less prominent, and that I live in you rather than in myself, I have learned to be jealous of your future destiny. I desire that others should understand and appreciate you as I do—that they should be compelled to acknowledge that what you will to do, you can accomplish; in short, that you were never born to live and die a mere country gentleman, vegetating with your crops, and confining alike your ambition and your patriotism to the due payment of your taxes, and an annual speech at the county dinner."

"What a malicious picture, Sybil!"

"Is it not correct in every feature? And, meanwhile, who are you permitting to outstrip you in the race of life? I will not speak of the great master-spirits of the age; let them wear with honor the laurels that they have so nobly won; but look at the herd of mere empty imitators, who make a reputation by the simple mimicry of their great models, as certain blocks of stone owe a voice to the sounds they do but echo; and who, while only the shadows of a substance which they follow, conscious that they have no other means of moral existence, are nevertheless, included in the public eye as part and parcel of the being of the very leaders whom they imitate, even while they are unable to appreciate their powers. Are these, and such as these, crippled alike in means, in station, and in acquirements, to bear away the palm of the world's praise, while you look on supinely? Believe me, Frederic, you are destined to higher fortunes than those bequeathed to you by your ancestors."

"You are an enthusiast, Sybil, and because you love me, you imagine that I am equal to any emergency; but you forget that the very nature of my education has altogether unfitted me for the strife and struggle of the world. Home-usefulness has been the only aim and end of my ambition. I have tenantry and dependants to whom I owe all the exertion of which I am capable."

"Say rather, which you are disposed to make," replied his fair wife somewhat impatiently; "But you should rouse yourself, Frederic, from so unseemly a state of moral lethargy. Your local duties are sacred only to a certain point, nor can they entail the necessity of self-sacrifice. You have a handsome property, it is true, but in this respect you only resemble hundreds of others, and consequently that simple fact will afford you none of that personal distinction which is necessary to make a figure in the world. Moreover, you owe your present position to the energy and prudence of your ancestors; the contingency is purely adventitious, and, as yet, you have done nothing for yourself."

"What would you have me to do? My habits are formed; I am no longer young enough to brook control, nor am I so necessitous as to render it endurable."

Sybil laughed. "One would imagine," she did playfully, for by the inflexion of her husband's voice she was at once aware that he was displeased by her pertinacity; "One would really imagine, my dear Frederic, that I proposed to induce you to enter into a merchant's office, or to purchase an ensign's commission. Is there not such a career as diplomacy, for instance, where at once you might avail yourself of your natural talents, and of your knowledge of continental habits and policy?—a career of which, possessed of such advantages as yours, it is impossible to prophecy the termination."

"And our home, Sybil?"

"Our home will be rendered prouder and happier by the distinction of its owner."

"But I have no influence with the Government, even were I to permit myself to indulge in such a vision."

"You have money, and a golden key unlocks every door in our dear treasure-worshipping England."

Frederic sighed as he glanced around him. How little had he anticipated such a discussion in that delicious solitude! For months had he talked with Sybil of the tranquil happiness of that ancestral home which she now so strenuously urged him to abandon. He was well aware that, once involved in public life, he should have little leisure for those calm and heart-satisfying pleasures which are never to be secured elsewhere; and he remembered, almost with a pang, that none of her previous arguments had prepared him for such an effort at self-abnegation. And yet, he was rather pained than angry. If she did indeed wish him to make so vast a sacrifice, was it not her love for him, her pride in him, which led her to forget that she was also, should she succeed in inspiring him with her views, sacrificing herself?

It was consequently with a sad smile that he pursued the subject, by reminding her that such an undertaking was beset with difficulties; that their comfort, their affection, and their peace of mind, would be perilled for an uncertain result, while, even should all end favorably, they could never again be all in all to each other.

Sybil, however, had counter-arguments to advance, which, even if they were not conclusive, were at least flattering and plausible; but still Mortimer hesitated to pledge himself to a line of conduct so repugnant to his tastes.

"Enough of this for to-day, dearest," he said, as he pressed to his lips the small hand which had remained clasped in his own throughout their dialogue; "Let us not further darken the present by anxiety for the future. Are we not in Rome, Sybil? And is it not profanation thus to wander away in thought from the glories by which we are surrounded?"

"You will think me very capricious, my own Frederic," said his wife tenderly, "when I tell you that I already weary to return to England. I know by your start that you are surprised, but you must forgive me when I confess that not even your affection can make me forget a thousand anxieties—my mother, alone for the first time—the unsettled state of my unfortunately involved affairs. Do you know that I absolutely shudder when I reflect upon all the trouble and annoyance which await you on my account, and shall have no real peace until all is arranged?"

"Leave Rome!" exclaimed Frederic, painfully impressed he knew not wherefore, by this sudden whim.

"I knew that you would be astonished, dear love," said Sybil with well-acted humility; 'but you must recollect, that however you may have exalted me in your own affectionate imagination, I am only a woman, after all; and then, remember that we can return whenever we wish to do so; and that, with a heart at ease, I shall be so much better able to give myself up to all the delights of such a sojourn. In short, you know not, Frederic," she added in a low whisper, as she buried her face upon his shoulder, "how many, and what earnest reasons I have for wishing to return at once to England."

"Is it in order to congratulate me upon my forthcoming embassy?" asked Mortimer, forcing a smile; but before she could reply they were suddenly and unexpectedly interrupted.

"I am sure that I cannot be mistaken," exclaimed a voice which appeared to rise from the ground immediately beside them, as a figure emerged from behind a tangled mass of bay-trees, and advanced rapidly towards the spot where they were seated: "I am quite sure that I see, or that at least I hear Miss Delamere."

The words were English, but the accent in which they were uttered was decidedly foreign, and the change of position necessitated by so abrupt an apparition, enabled Sybil to conceal from her husband the emotion which they had elicited, as, extending her hand, she answered with wonderful self-command, "Your ear has not deceived you, Prince, and we are, indeed, fated to meet again at Rome."

"No matter where," was the reply, as the speaker clasped the offered hand, and then threw himself upon the grass beside her; "No matter where, so that, as you say, we meet again. Are you long from England?"

"About two months: and you?"

"Oh, I? I really scarcely know—I hardly recollect—I remember nothing since we parted; since you—"

"Prince," interposed Mrs. Mortimer hastily: "allow me to present to you—my husband."

"Corpo di Bacco!" ejaculated the intruder as if unconsciously; but in the next instant he recovered himself, and with considerable dignity, replied with a low bow; "I am honored. Sir, I congratulate you; I understand all now; and, perhaps I should apologize—but two months—two whole months—that will be my excuse, and you will forgive my indiscretion."

Mortimer bowed in his turn.

"The Prince Saviatti, my dear Frederic, of whom I have spoken to you," said Sybil with one of her sweetest smiles.

"Ha! Madam has spoken of me," pursued the foreigner; "I am, it is impossible to be more, flattered. We are then, old acquaintance. Do you stay long in Rome, Sir?"

"We are as yet undecided," replied the young husband, irritated he knew not wherefore by the cool and self-satisfied manner of the intruder.

"Oh, then, I shall have the honor to decide you," was the rejoinder. "Madame and I are such old and good friends, and we have so much to talk over, and we shall be so glad to come together again in this charming manner. I know this old Rome of ours now, de bout en blanc, and I shall have the happiness to be your cicerone, and to be always beside you."

Mortimer involuntarily shrank back; the easy hyper-courtesy of his new acquaintance revolted his English reserve.

"We have here many of your old acquaintance, Mademoiselle—c'est-à-dire, Madame"—resumed the Prince; "And ha!—it is a sad pity, but you have just come one little day too late to see Trevor. He went yesterday—he would go yesterday; I could not stop him. He is like you; he forgets old times, and he goes home to your foggy England to fetch his wife."

"His wife!"

"Yes, yes, he is determined at last to play the pastor fido. Poor Trevor! he makes a grand mistake—don't you see it as I do? But he had so little choice. He was pretty near what you call in London 'cleared out,' couldn't get on, you know, and so—married. Perhaps he was right, and I consoled him with this; 'Bad enough,' I said, 'but better than worse; a rich wife is always better than an empty purse.'"

"Will you never reform?" asked Sybil with affected playfulness.

"I must," was the prompt reply; "since you and Trevor have presented me with so charming an example—so encouraging a model. Perhaps I may even marry a rich wife myself—when there is no other hope left for me."

"You are ungallant, Prince," said Mrs. Mortimer, resolutely concealing her annoyance.

"Not at all; for I cannot hope to find a second Miss Delamere. See now—I find you here alone with Monsieur———" he paused for an instant, but as Sybil did not pronounce the name of her husband, which he had evidentally awaited, he pursued in the same tone; "absolutely alone in this solitude, while other married pairs are congregated in the Coliseo, or the Parthenon, or St. Peter's—Is it not enough to make me despair? I always suspect the couples who are so anxious to afficher leur bonheur; while you disarm me by your evident desire to escape the crowd. Monsieur is too happy—Who will not envy him his triumph?"

Mortimer writhed beneath a familiarity which he felt to be almost insolent. It was not thus that he had approached Sybil: that he had won her. He could not brook that she should be subjected to what he considered as an affront to her dignity, and he was about to make some caustic remark, when he was interrupted by the Prince, who, as he reclined upon the ground almost at the feet of his fair friend, languidly striking a costly cane mounted with gems against his polished boot, asked carelessly—

"And how long do you remain in Rome, Madame? I am here for the next three months, and—always with the permission of Monsieur—I shall ask you to do the same. You will be well amused. We shall have plenty to occupy us in the present, and we have so much to talk over, and—who knows?—to remedy in the past."

"We leave the day after to-morrow," said Sybil resolutely.

"Tyrant!" laughed the Prince: "You want to be persuaded—entreated."

"I do not always yield either to persuasion or entreaty," and the tone of Mrs. Mortimer grew still more cold and repelling.

"True—not always," conceded M. Saviatti with undiminished composure ; "but sometimes —you will not deny that sometimes you are not inexorable. See—I am at your feet—and I pray you to retract your threat."

"Our plans are decided."

"Bah!" ejaculated the Prince sarcastically; "Monsieur, married since two or three months, must be accustomed to see you change your mind. I have not, unhappily, the right to ask that you should once more do so at my request, but the tastes of your sex are so variable that I may at least hope. Why should you, Madame," and there was a shade of mockery in his tone as he proceeded; "why should you desire to stand alone, and to declare your will immutable? Do you hope that, knowing all your other perfections, any one will consent to believe so enormous a solecism? No, no; when I have the honor to meet you to-morrow, you will say to me frankly: 'Prince, I have repented my idle resolution, and am for three months in Rome.'"

"We shall see."

Mortimer had with difficulty restrained his indignation, but the evident displeasure of Sybil had so far moderated his momentarily-increasing annoyance as to enable him to control his feelings.

The last impertinent rejoinder of Saviatti was, however, more than he could support, and, suddenly springing up, he extended his hand to his wife, as he said with affected calmness,—

"Sybil, the air is becoming damp. I cannot allow you to remain longer exposed to its influence. Prince, I have the honor to wish you a good evening."

"Not at all, Monsieur; not at all," said the pertinacious foreigner; "Madame and I are old friends; I will accompany you"—and, rising in his turn, he prepared to put his purpose into execution.

"You will excuse me," said Mortimer, suddenly stopping short, and forcing his words through his clenched teeth; "I am this lady's husband: for my sake she has been good enough to forget, or at least to resign, all past friendships, and, as you and I are total strangers, you will do me a favor by permitting us to return alone."

"Oh, Monsieur, by all means—by all means in the world," replied the Prince, with an affectation of ceremonious courtesy which became a sarcasm from its excess. "I owe you ten thousand apologies, and I know so well the value of Madame's society, that I am conscious, very conscious of my error. I have the honor to salute you both, and to make you my sincere compliment on your marriage." And so saying, Saviatti raised his hat, bowed profoundly, and moved forward with a brisk step; humming as he went one of the popular airs of the day.

"Sybil," demanded Mortimer sternly, when they were once more alone; "what is the meaning of what has just passed?"

"The meaning," replied his wife with an impatient shrug of the shoulders; "the meaning simply is that you have been 'spirited by a fool; spirited and angered worse,' and, that by your want of self-command, you have made us the proverb of Rome."

"Be it so," said Mortimer; "a few hours will suffice for us to leave the ridicule behind. We will abide by your decision, and return at once to England."

"You are strangely discomposed, Frederic."

"I do not wish to conceal it. Oh, Sybil!" he continued vehemently; "did you know, could you imagine, the proud confidence with which I have always looked upon you—Were you able to estimate the resolute scorn with which I have flung from me every suspicion of that past which you so pertinaciously conceal—the absorbing affection which I have poured out at your feet—you would comprehend what I have suffered during the last hour."

"Am I to understand that you are weak enough to be jealous, Frederic?"

"Perhaps so—but this is not all. I tremble to perceive that my faith in you is shaken; that I am under the influence of some inexplicable misgiving—that, in short, I shall never again feel safe in your affection, until you lay the whole past before me, frankly and confidently."

"Frederic—Mr. Mortimer," exclaimed Sybil indignantly, as she turned her flashing eyes full upon him: "Am I to be made the sacrifice, because an idle babbler sees fit to vent his inanities upon me? Had I not already told you that I knew this man? That he was an empty coxcomb, living only for himself, and making his rank an excuse for his absurdities? Would it have been more delicate, more honorable in me to have betrayed his secret, as you now compel me to do—and to have met your questioning with the reply that he had loved me? Let it suffice that you are now in possession of this mighty secret, and that the rejected suitor will not fail to amuse all Rome before noon to-morrow, at the expense of the jealous husband."

CHAPTER XXXVI.

The reader must now follow us to a vast and magnificent apartment, of such extent that the dark walls—whereon a series of ancient family portraits pannelled into the wood-work, and encircled by a faded gold moulding, too much time-worn to reflect the light—were left in the deep shadow; although, in the centre of the marble floor, a somewhat capacious table bore a cluster of wax tapers, which shed their brilliancy over a number of crystal goblets, tall-necked bottles, and a small tray containing dishes of olives, prepared caviare, salted sardines, and other provocatives of thirst. On either side of the table were ranged rows of chairs; against one of which rested a long slender Turkish chibouque of jasmin-wood, with a superb mouth-piece of amber, encircled by large turquoise; and the boudaka, or bowl of gilded clay, carefully placed in a small round dish of highly-polished brass. Near another stood a magnificent oriental narghile; its ample vase of elaborately cut glass already filled with the scented waters through which the coarser aroma of the Virginian weed was destined to pass before it reached the lips of the smoker; and its long pliable tube of leather, bound with crimson and silver threads, coiled like a glittering snake upon the table above. A couple of boxes of cedar-wood, inscribed with certain letters and figures, which doubtlessly certified as to the genuineness of their contents, were still hermetically closed; but, from their form and fashion, it was easy to discover that they also were filled with tobacco in that more symmetrical and minute shape which has lately obtained so much in European taste; while scattered here and there, among the sparkling wines and goblets of Venice glass, were cards, and dice, and other necessary appliances of the gambler's craft.

In short, all around announced the necessary preparation for one of those midnight orgies in which the idle and the desœuvre are accustomed to cheat their ennui, to waste their health, and to consume their substance. And it was strange and even sad to glance round that stately room, with its angles gradually disappearing in the darkness, its grim warriors and frowning senators looking down as if in cold and silent scorn from their gloomy eminence, and the huge mirror resting upon the high wide mantel of particolored marble, and dimly reflecting in the distance the deep glow of the clustered lights; and to see it profaned by such occupation. It seemed like a bitter satire silently pronounced by past splendor upon modern folly.

The silence was, however, of short duration; for, as though they had only awaited the completion of these preliminary arrangements, groups of young and fashionably-dressed men ere long began to arrive, until every seat save one was filled; that which was marked by the position of the narghile; and servants in rich but varied liveries began to busy themselves in opening the cedar boxes, and pouring out the rich wines, which were dispersed over the table.

Every European nation seemed to have supplied its representative to that nocturnal revel. On one side the deep flashing eyes, and raven hair, and bistre complexion of the Spaniard, were contrasted with the pale cheek and sandy locks of the Norwegian; on another, the once fresh, but now somewhat faded complexion and calm hazel eyes of the Englishman, formed a marked and characteristic contrast to the dull skin and restless physiognomy of the Frenchman; the Greek, with his finely-articulated features and mobile expression, was thrown into violent contact with the impassible and moody gravity of the Turk; and the volatile and gesticulating Italian had taken his place beside the polished but wary Russian. It was, in sooth, a gathering together of the nations, thus individually assembled for one common worship—for one simultaneous bowing down before the Baal of dissipation and excess. For a time nothing was heard save the questions and rejoinders necessitated by the nature of the meeting; but ere long, everything being arranged to the satisfaction of the revelers, the domestics gradually withdrew, and the business of the evening commenced.

In one direction a couple of gamesters, too indolent, or too impatient, to trust their fortunes to the slower process of the cards, were hazarding large sums upon a single throw of the dice; in another, a party were collected round a roulette-table, established in an angle of the apartment, which had just been lighted up; at the principal table, sundry of the guests had paired off at ecarte, while others stood by, and made heavy bets upon the game. In short, all were occupied save two—one, a splendid-looking man of some four or five and thirty, evidently a native Italian—and the other a youth whose fresh and ruddy complexion, well-opened gray eye, and auburn hair, at once demonstrated his English origin.

"It is strange, however, Duke," said the latter, as he knocked the ashes from his cigar upon the table; "that he should be the only loiterer, when, only a few hours ago, he announced his intention to join us early. Did I not know that he loves the dice-box better than any dama in Rome, I should say that the poor prince had met with an adventure."

His companion only shrugged his shoulders, and smoked on in silence.

"And he promised to give me my revenge too," pursued the hopeful youth; "and that cannot be done in half an hour. However, I will-not believe that Saviatti would take advantage of my ill-luck."

"You are censorious, il mio arco," said the Duca, as he suffered a huge volume of smoke to escape from his closed lips, and smiled sarcastically: "You take your revenge out of fortune when you should look nearer home. The fact is, that you cannot play."

"Not play ecarte!" exclaimed the young man, wounded in his most sensitive point: "A pretty joke, indeed! Why, I have done little else for the last few years."

"Perhaps so," was the unmoved reply.

"Every fool can play ecarte;" persisted the stripling, still more incensed by the sang-froid of his companion.

"Not every fool, Milord," said the Italian: "I will explain to you——"

"I want no explanation," retorted the youth haughtily; "I have played at Baden, Berlin, and Vienna; I know every chance of the game, and I repeat that Saviatti owed all his success to my ill-luck. Did I not win 12,000 francs at Paris in one week?"

"Perhaps so," again repeated the Italian; "and you are very likely to lose the same sum in one night at Rome."

"You are an ill prophet, Duke."

"Perche? Because I tell you the truth? Look you, Milord Squanderleigh, I could myself, in a fortnight, send you home to the good Earl, your father, with nothing in your pocket but your genealogy, and your bonbonniere——but I am a man of honor, and I have a conscience. I shall not play."

"You fancy that you are more than a match for me?"

"Devvero."

"Let us try."

"No, no; let us smoke. These Havanas are good and cheap."

"Pshaw! Nonsense! You treat me like a child."

The Duke smiled.

"Upon my soul," said the lordling, while a sudden flush crimsoned his handsome countenance, "if you believe that I feel indebted to you for what you are pleased to consider as a proof of your forbearance, you are strangely mistaken; and, therefore, if you do not wish me to look upon what you have said as an affront, let us play."

"Bene! since I can retain your valuable friendship upon no other terms, let us play." And, so saying, the Italian calmly swept out of his way the glasses, cigar-tray, and bottle of Cyprus wine which were ranged before him; and, taking up a couple of packs of the cards which were profusely scattered over the table, began to throw aside the low numbers with a languid gesture, as though he depreciated the exertion thus pertinaciously thrust upon him.

While he was thus engaged, three or four of the spectators, who had been overlooking another game, gathered round the two new actors, and "I bet upon il Signor Duco," was the simultaneous exclamation.

"We want no bets," said the excited young nobleman; "I hate to play like a puppet, at the bidding of my backer. Duke, we play soberly for a stake—What shall it be?"

"What you please."

"You see, you cannot frighten me, for, if there be anything which I thoroughly understand, it is écarté."

"Now, you are endeavoring to alarm me in your turn," said the Italian noble with perfect gravity; "but I also have good nerves. I love your country—'Old England,' as you are proud to call her—so, name your own stakes, but let them be in English money."

"Ten, twenty, thirty guineas the game; take your choice."

"I am a moderate man, corpo di Bacco!" said the Duke, as he coolly lighted a fresh cigar; "I will make my choice au juste milieu: twenty is enough—quite enough."

"Ha! you begin to wince."

"Not yet, not yet. By-and-by I shall tell you how I feel."

"We have never yet played together."

"Never. I seldom play: now and then, but only to oblige, as I do now."

"I will give you a lesson," laughed the reckless young lordling.

"Servitore; I am always happy to learn."

Meanwhile, high play was progressing throughout the apartment, and among the most eager of the gamblers were the Russian prince, the German baron, and the Hungarian count, who had established themselves at the roulette-table. Piles of gold were heaped up and swept away as if by enchantment; and long before day-dawn the German had flung his watch and signet-ring upon the fatal baize, the Russian his diamond star in pledge for a hundred roubles, and the Hungarian the jewelled clasps of his sable-lined pelisse. Less excitable at games of chance than their foreign visitors, the Romans were masters of the field.

And at intervals, even amid the high-born and high-bred assemblage, bitter oaths were vented, and peals of hideous laughter—the laughter of mingled mortification and rage—awakened the dull echoes of the spacious room; deep draughts were drained, and snatches of licentious song added ribaldry to vice.

Yet still the play went on. Why should it pause? When its votaries had exhausted their gold, they had still their honor to trade upon; and so small strips of paper, ready prepared upon a consol of black marble, supported by gilded Cupids linked together by garlands of roses, were passed from hand to hand; and the cards were cut, and the dice were thrown, as eagerly, if not quite as gaily, as when the solid metal had been showered down in streams.

From time to time, the vapor of brandy rose upon the heated atmosphere, and the unsteady hand by which it was poured betrayed the evil fortunes of the reveller, for whom the more generous and less enervating wine had lost its spell, and throughout all this turmoil, all this toil, and all this excitement, the placid duke and the reckless lordling still played on, almost in silence.

Meanwhile, however, Saviatti had arrived: but the engrossing occupation of those around him had only enabled them to greet his entrance by a gesture or a glance; while, apparently satisfied with this somewhat equivocal welcome, the Palermitan quietly took possession of his chair, ignited his narghilè, carefully placed a minute and gilded pill of opium upon the surface of the tobacco, and smoked on in silence, absorbed in his own thoughts.

Another hour went by, and a bright streak of light introduced itself between the damask draperies which veiled one of the high casements, announcing that another day had dawned. Symptoms of weariness began to betray themselves in some of the losing gamesters, and gradually a group collected round the principal table, and began to revenge themselves by excess of another description upon the evil freaks of fortune.

"Testa di Vénus!" exclaimed a bright-eyed Roman; "Ecco Saviatti. Prince, I pledge you in a goblet of Salernian. I did not see you enter. You must have arrived just as—"

"You were about to make your fortune on the red, when the black was turned," said the Palermitan quietly; "you are a perfect victim this year, amico mio."

"At cards, perhaps," was the self-satisfied retort; "in other respects, I have no right to complain."

"No, no; we all know that the fates favor you elsewhere. But how prospers your pursuit of the Altessa?"

The Roman smiled conceitedly; swept away his clustering black curls from a forehead which might have become a hero, and threw himself back negligently in his chair.

"Bah, bah! Colonna is affecting discretion," said a French count, who was at his elbow, with a sneer. "Nothing is more mauvais ton, mon cher; nothing is more gentil berger. Either you have failed—in which case you are right to keep your own secret—or you must travel a year or two longer, and learn to estimate the reputation of a femme galante at its proper price."

"Talking of women," broke in Saviatti with a half yawn, as he withdrew the ivory mouth-piece of his narghilè from his lips, and slowly swayed the flexile tube to and fro between his fingers; "women and discretion, be it rightly understood—I had a most amusing encounter this evening, and but for two untoward circumstances, I might have been as happy as Colonna implies to be."

"And what were they?" asked half-a-dozen voices.

"In the first place," said the Palermitan, in the same semi-tragic accent in which he had made his announcement; "in the first place, my dear friends, a jealous husband—"

"Eh, que disgracia!"

"In the next, a sudden determination to leave Rome; or rather, to leave me."

"To leave you! Impossible!"

"Impossible, perhaps, but nevertheless a fact. And in order to show you that I am too generous to follow a bad example—Colonna, pass me the champaigne—I will drink the lady's health, and tell you her history."

"Brava! brava!" was the general chorus.

Saviatti filled his glass with the sparkling fluid, and drank it off; then, glancing round the table upon his listeners, he said quietly: "You all remember the English Trevor?"

"All, all!"

"Well, then, you are also aware that I first arrived in Rome in Trevor's company; but you are one and all ignorant of the fact that before quitting England, he was an engaged man. The lady was beautiful; is beautiful—your Altessa, il mio caro Colonna, is a Swiss beside her; and your Duchessa, mon cher De Tremblay, a grisette. Trevor, in the pride of his heart, presented me to his fiancée, and I, as I need scarcely tell you, was civil to her for his sake. Never did I see a man of his indolent and languid temperament more inconveniently in love with his future wife.

"After a career of recklessness, the father of la bella died insolvent, but that fact did not affect the passion of Trevor: he was really fatiguing in his assiduities, and I almost began to forgive the lady when I imagined that she thought so as well as myself; for I must do her the justice to acknowledge that she occasionally emancipated herself very skilfully from the thrall, and took a liberal revenge by coquetting right and left whenever she could secure a safe opportunity, until, at length, I heard her name bandied rather freely at the clubs, and coupled in no very mysterious manner with those of two or three of Trevor's constant associates.

"As for myself, I knew from the first that she was the betrothed wife of my friend; and, moreover, beautiful as she was, I had seen another whom I thought fairer; consequently, I felt quite at liberty to enact the Damon to my Pythias, and took upon me to hint to il fanatico per l'amore that he was duped. Perhaps you fancy that he was grateful to me for this modern act of chivalry? You deceive yourselves. What was the friendship of half-a-dozen Palermitan princes, compared to the love of Sybil? He was furious, mei amici, furious. He believed what I told him, as a matter of course, for I had pledged my honor to every statement that I made, but he spurned at the idea that they had any foundation save in the censorious imaginations of those who had propagated the scandal; and so, despite all that I could urge, he still loved on, while these same slanders gained ground, and I could no longer doubt that, by persisting in his suit, he was making his own misery. I felt that something desperate must be done, for his malady was beyond a common cure; and, accordingly—with no slight desire, also, I confess, of preventing a step which would deprive me of a favorite companion—I resolved, despite his indignation, to recur to the forbidden subject, and even to offer him an opportunity of testing the lady's truth in so unequivocal a manner that he should no longer retain a doubt as to his true position.

"After a thousand scruples, he, at length, consented to undergo the ordeal, and as I had more than once suspected that the beautiful Miss Delamere was far from appreciating at its just value the very ceremonious courtesy with which I had studiously treated her, and had ambition enough to feel flattered by the prospect of becoming la signora principessa—for you all know the foible of ladies of her nation for the prestige of a high-sounding name—I resolved to see whether I could not, in my own person, prove to the misguided lover that he was fooled."

"Bravissimo, Saviatti!" shouted his now more than half intoxicated listeners.

"I began, then, to pay my court to the flattered beauty assiduously, but cautiously. I became silent and depressed, and she soon discovered that she alone had power to arouse me from my moral lethargy; but she was as wary as myself; nor was it until I had, as if unconsciously, suffered myself to be betrayed into more than one demonstration of an interest more potent than I was authorised to feel for the promised wife of my friend, that she, at length, ventured to inquire into the cause of my evident unhappiness. You may imagine how I replied. How reluctantly, but resolutely, the secret was wrung from me; how I besought her to pardon my temerity; and, gradually, became still less reserved, until I brought her to confess that she had already suspected the truth, and even to admit that she forgave the involuntary error. The remainder of my task was easy, but it required time; nor was she loth to afford it. In vain did Trevor complain of the postponement of their marriage from one period to another; for convinced of the immaculacy of his idol, he never, for an instant, doubted the ultimate failure of my intrigue; she always found some plausible pretext to delay it, and, meanwhile, I had every encouragement to prosecute my suit which I could desire. Still her caution was admirable, and I sincerely believe that, as the mere individual, she greatly preferred my friend; and that, had I been simple Signor Saviatti, the son of a Palermitan banker, or of a Catanian apothecary, she would never have hesitated between us. As it was, however, I held the winning card, and the 'dear prince,' had but to utter one conclusive word to leave the 'poor baronet' leagues behind in the race. How I ever betrayed her into writing such dangerous truths as this, I cannot even now comprehend; although I have more than once had occasion to remark that there are certain class of women, who, when they once take a pen into their hands, suffer it to run away with their reason.

"Certain it is that it was so in this instance. I wish that Trevor had not, in his rage, burnt, before his faithless mistress, the last letter with which she honored me, and then you would have acknowledged the truth of my late remark. However, suffice it that the letter in question did most effectually open his eyes, and prove to him that his fair inamorata was ready to fly with me from an union to which she looked forward with dismay, and to trust to my honor never to give her cause to repent the hazardous step that she had taken.

"So far, so well; but alas! chi la fatto il male, faccia la penitenza, says the proverb, and so it was with Trevor. The English laws are frequently both unreasonable and inconvenient. He had formerly promised marriage to Miss Delamere, and he was bound by one of those laws to perform his promise, or to incur the risk, not only of a heavy fine—for that he was too wealthy to care—but also of a public exposure, with which she did not hesitate to threaten him.

"Perhaps you expect, idlers as you are, that I am about to entertain you with the scene which ensued, when the lady discovered that she had been duped in her turn, and that she had lost, by one unlucky throw, both the foreign noble and the English baronet; and, corpo di Bacco! it deserves narration, but I have just now neither time nor taste for such a tale, though in truth, her very rage was magnificent, and her indignation as genuine as though she had been no party to this war of wits. Well, to shorten a long story, she retorted every reproach of Trevor, by upbraiding him with his own treachery, and that of his Fidus Achates; and, when he swore that he would leave her for ever, she threatened him with a court of justice, and silenced him, as that threat seldom fails to silence an Englishman.

"What was to be done? Trevor had no nerve for such an exposure. To be exhibited to the world not only as a dupe, but moreover, as the dupe of a woman who had forfeited all claim to consideration from the levity of her own conduct, was more than his pride could brook. He remembered too, that her pecuniary resources must be nearly exhausted, and that the prospect of becoming his wife had induced her to persist in a style of living to which they had long been inadequate; and thus, what from fear from himself on the one hand, and a lingering weakness for the false fair one on the other, they at length came to a compromise. Not, however, that this desirable arrangement was made without considerable difficulty; for the lady, at once baffled and bitter, was exorbitant in her demands, and poor Trevor was obliged, not only to have recourse to the Jews, but also to expatriate himself for a time, in order to satisfy her claim.

"Ebbene! The victim accompanied me to Berlin, and la bella abandonnata left London, as he supposed, to bury her regrets in the country, and for a time he heard no more of her; while, per me, I almost forgot her existence. Judge, therefore, of my amazement this evening, when, in a solitary stroll through the Negroni gardens—a strange caprice you will say, and one for which, in point of fact, I can scarcely account—my ear was suddenly attracted by the inflections of an harmonious and familiar voice. I listened for several instants in order to be satisfied that I did not deceive myself, and then, convinced of the accuracy of my memory, I suddenly turned the angle of the path, and saw before me Miss Delamere in person, negligently reclining upon the grass beside one of the fountains, with her head resting upon the shoulder of a very handsome cavalier, who also held one of her hands clasped in his.

"Nothing daunted, however, by the style of this grouping—for, as you are aware, I felt my strength, and was not altogether sorry to have an opportunity of making my peace, or free from the desire to see it ratified somewhat after the same fashion—I accosted her at once, and that in a tone of old acquaintanceship which forbade any denial on her part; but a change had come over her whole manner. It was neither affectedly cold, nor inferentially resentful; it was more discouraging than either; calm, self-possessed, and—could I have forgotten the past—I should say dignified. The problem, moreover, was soon solved; I began to allude to former times, and I was silenced at once by a presentation to—her husband."

"Il povero Saviatti!"

"You mistake, gentlemen, you mistake," pursued the Prince contemptuously; "you should say il povero marito; for trust me he will ere long the most deserve your pity, though at present he appears to be 'in love with ruin.' She informed me, and you will be able to estimate the feeling with which she made the communication, that she had been travelling for the last two months in Italy; ergo, her bridehood is rapidly waning into commonplace wedded life."

"And who is the sacrifice? Is he one who has been kidnapped from our own set, or a mere matrimonial facility?"

"Therein lies the point of the epigram," said the Palermitan with a light laugh; "I was presented to the hero of the domestic drama, as I have already told you. But how? Why simply thus: 'Prince, allow me to present to you my husband—My dear Frederic, the Prince Saviatti, of whom I have spoken to you;" and thus, you see, although it appeared that the 'great unknown' was enabled at once to identify me as one of his lady's quondam friends, I was left totally in the dark as regarded his own individuality. However certain it is, in whatever spirit I had been made known to him, he had no suspicion of the truth, and I almost began to imagine, from the manner in which he tolerated for a time a series of impertinences on my part, that he was simply what Rowscoffsky has just politely designated as a 'matrimonial facility;' but I was mistaken. He appeared suddenly to perceive that I was transgressing the bounds of even Italian good-breeding, for he started from his seat like a roused lion, and carried off la donna, without even permitting me to walk back to the city in her company."

"C'est impayable!" shouted the Frenchman; "ce pauvre Saviatti est déchu."

"Then are there two fallen angels in the same drama," replied the Prince quietly; "and I am ready to wager the hundred ducats which I won last evening of Squanderleigh, that the piece is not yet played out."

"Pshaw! you have already had your congé."

"Perhaps so; moreover, the happy couple leave Rome to-morrow; another point against me, and nevertheless I am ready to renew my bet, with this reservation, that if I am not myself the hero of the second act, it will be Trevor. Who accepts the challenge?"

"Not I," said Colonna; "I know too well the nature of the sex. The investment is a bad one."

A general laugh followed his remark, but the attention of the party was suddenly called to Lord Squanderleigh, who with a vehement oath hurled his cards across the saloon, and filling a goblet with brandy, drank it off to the confusion of all modest personages, who only played to oblige their friends.

"Milord, you are uneivil," calmly observed his opponent, as he swept into his open palm the pile of bright English gold which he had gradually heaped up, and deposited it in the breast-pocket of his coat. "I appeal to Colonna, to De Tremblay, to Saviatti, if I ever play save when I am urged to it, and cannot decline without discourtesy."

"I care for no such appeals," was the furious retort. "Did not Saviatti only yesterday win my money in all probability in the same way, and on the same principle? And do not both Colonna and De Tremblay hold bills of mine similarly gained? Do you take me for a boy to believe that, knowing my own skill at the game as I do, I should be idiot enough to suppose that I am indebted to ill-luck for my perpetual losses?"

All the group started indignantly to their feet, but a gesture from the Duke silenced them for a moment, as he asked with composure; "And to what then, Milord, am I to understand that you attribute them?"

"To what!" echoed the stripling, as he turned an undismayed look upon the threatening countenances around him. "Have I not spoken sufficiently plain already for you, one and all, to understand that I attribute them to your superior———science!"

"You must answer to me for this," said the Duca, with an unshaken calmness which formed a ghastly contrast with the trembling passion of his adversary.

"And to me," said Colonna.

"And me," followed up Saviatti.

The stripling listened with a bitter and hollow laugh, and simply replying, "I am ready," swallowed another goblet of the liquid fire, turned a fierce gaze of defiance upon his opponents, and strode from the room.

By mid-day on the morrow, all Rome rang with the news that a fatal duel had taken place two hours after dawn, beyond the Porto del Popolo; in which the gallant Lord Squanderleigh, the only son and heir of the Earl of Wastinville, the hope of an ancient house, and the idol of an adoring mother, had fallen mortally wounded beneath the bullet of an unknown adversary. The authorities were all astir; the sbirri in commotion, and the whole system of exclusive society shaken for four-and-twenty hours. And then came the relatives from England to claim the corpse, and to convey it to the family-vault, in order that it might repose beside those of its ancestors—and then, Lord Squanderleigh was forgotten.

Such was the circle in which the name of the woman who had become the wife of the proud and sensitive Mortimer was branded with indignity—amid the curses of unsuccessful gamesters, the fumes of wine, and the ribaldries of licentiousness. Such were the revellers, who, not content with branding her with past disgrace and present duplicity, even presaged for her a future still more dishonorable than either. Sybil was indeed fallen!—fallen from the brightness and the purity which compel respect from the dissolute. She had striven and had triumphed. She was the wife of a man of honor; but her very triumph was contaminated by the fact, that he must henceforward be a mark for the world's scorn through her means; and that world not one of upright and soberly judging individuals, who would temper their justice with mercy, and be silent where otherwise they must condemn; but a world of reckless roués and bitter satirists, to whom her shame would be matter of loose mirth and ribald speculation; and who would, from their own intimate knowledge of the vices of humanity, be enabled to analyse and to lay bare every working of her heart—her woman-heart,—that pure and holy mystery which, like the statue of Vesta, should ever wear a veil for all save he to whom it is yielded up.

Sybil was indeed fallen!

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Meanwhile all was deep and quiet happiness at Bletchley. The ladies of the manor-house had paid their promised visit; the girls had welcomed Gertrude with a warmth of delighted affection which was balm to her meek and gentle heart; and even Mrs. Armstrong, forgetting all the brilliant projects which she had formed for her son, and satisfied that, as her husband no longer withheld his consent to the marriage, it was her duty to think as he did, and perhaps feeling, moreover, that she should in all probability be a person of much more consequence in the eyes of her unportioned daughter-in-law than she could have hoped to be in those of the high born or richly-dowered damsel upon whom she had formerly speculated, was no less inclined than themselves to believe that Ernest had, after all, been less to blame than she at first supposed; while the worthy old squire, having once determined to withdraw his objections, did so with an open-heartedness and generosity of feeling which removed the last shadow from the spirit of the orphan.

Only a few days elapsed ere Gertrude again found herself an inhabitant of the hall, and once more all the little world of Bletchley was in commotion. It was really too bad and too barefaced, as Miss Bayliss remarked with considerable asperity; too bad on the side of Miss Mortimer, and too barefaced on that of the Armstrongs, that their company had no sooner dispersed than they thought proper to remember their poor neighbor. However, if the girl had no more spirit, it served her right, and she would see what would come of it before long; but it was disgraceful that, because they happened to be the great people of the neighborhood, any one should be mean enough to encourage them in their impertinence; and Miss Mortimer, as Mr. Pilbeam declared, was so blind to the degrading part that she was acting, as actually to be recovering from day to day, even although he had long considered her case to be utterly hopeless: but there she was, as likely to live as his own wife, and as calm and contented as though she had been treated with the greatest respect.

However, she begged that she might not be quoted as having repeated the remarks of Mr. Pilbeam, which he had made to her quite in confidence, as it might injure him in his business; but it really made her blood boil to think that Miss Warrington and her niece had not shown more regard for the respectability of the village. Had she, or her sister, or Mrs. Pilbeam, or even the dissenting minister's widow, ever demeaned themselves in such a way? Not they. As to accepting little presents from the manor-house, there was nothing in that; for if they were sent, they could not decently be refused; but she must say that, for people who pretend to hold their heads higher than their neighbors, the Warringtons were about as mean-spirited a set as she ever heard of.

These murmurs from the village, however, never reached the hall. There all was peace and joy. The happiness of Ernest was complete. To sit beside Gertrude, and to watch from day to day the progress of her convalescence; to see the faint flush again steal to her cheek, and the smile of recovered confidence rest upon her lip, was to him a never-ceasing labor of love. While Somerville and Mary, more gladsome in their joy, were continually on horseback, or engaged in schemes of pleasure, the tranquil delight of Ernest and Gertrude was no less engrossing. To them the whispered confidences, the assured prospects of the future, and the present calm, were full of enjoyment. They had so much to say, so much to ask, so much to hope.

It was during one of these constantly-recurring conversations, when the twilight had stolen upon them almost unheeded, and that the pencil of Gertrude, and the volume from which her lover had been occasionally reading, or rather murmuring, to her a few snatches from Alfieri, had alike been laid aside, that a sudden silence occurred, as eloquent to their feelings as the most profuse and impassioned words. It was at length broken by a sigh from the orphan, which fell painfully upon the ear of Ernest.

"You sigh, dearest," he said anxiously; "and wherefore?"

"Simply," replied Gertrude; "because I have left a duty unperformed for which I am self-rebuked; and that, even now, I have scarcely courage to repair my error."

"Incorrigible culprit!"

"Nay, do not jest, Ernest; for, indeed, my heart is too full for smiles. I feel that I have not acted generously or frankly towards you; and that I am, consequently, unworthy of the unhesitating confidence which you have placed in me. You may remember that, during our memorable interview in the pavilion, you hinted your belief that I was the prey of some secret sorrow; and you were right. That, however, was not a fitting moment for such a revelation as I had to make; and since that day I have suffered my happiness to absorb me so entirely, as to forget that the confession of the past was due to you. It will require an effort on my part to recall that past; but the effort must be made; for I cannot consent to become your wife until you are placed in possession of every circumstance of my early life; and are prepared to assure me that what I have to tell has not lowered me in your esteem."

"Gertrude, why do you torture both yourself and me? I foretell all that you have to say—You have loved another."

"I have, Ernest," was the low, but resolute reply; "and that, too, with all the ardor of a young and trusting heart. Nor was this affection the mere transitory feeling of a few months, but the one great and absorbing sentiment of my life. If I know myself, I am compelled to confess, even to you, that had my love been returned, I believe that neither time nor misfortune would have sufficed to overcome it; but it was not so. I loved where my love was slighted and undervalued; and my whole waste of affection was repaid only by the attachment of a brother. But hear me out before you condemn me. My error was that of inexperience, not of levity. I was misled alike by my own hopes, and by the tenderness of one who was indeed to me more than a mother. And now, Ernest, dear Ernest, will you listen to my story of the past?"

"Say on, Gertrude," answered the young man, who had involuntarily relinquished her hand, and buried his face in his spread palms; "say on—I will endeavor to bear it manfully; but you know not how deeply you have wrung me."

The tears of the orphan fell slow and cold, as she withdrew her eyes from the averted figure of her lover, but she heeded them not. Strong in her conviction of right, she commenced her simple confession.

She told him of the premature death of her mother; of the heart-broken father, who so soon followed her to the grave. She painted to him in rapid, but graphic words, the stately old house at Westrnm which had been the cradle of her childhood, and the home of her youth; and she dwelt with all the eloquence of deep and strong feeling, upon the virtues of the gentle and high-hearted Mrs. Mortimer.

Nor did her low voice falter when she came to speak of Frederic. There was no suspicious haste, no coquettish reservation, in the manner in which she related all their early and childish affection; she did justice to his amiable qualities, and to the high principle of his nature. She told how, from girlhood up, she had been taught to consider him as her future husband; and how, in order to render herself worthy of his love, she had striven to acquire the habits, feelings, and accomplishments which he approved. And after she had described the long hours of retirement, in which she had listened to all the confident projects of her aunt, while the subject of their discourse was yet absent, she did not even disguise from her agitated listener the eager anxiety with which she had awaited his return; and the bitter disappointment she had experienced on finding that her attachment was not returned, when Frederic, happy and heart-free, ere many months elapsed, bestowed the affection which she had always been taught to consider as her own, upon a stranger.

"And what said your aunt, who had so cruelly misled you?" asked Ernest, suddenly looking up.

"All that the purest and most perfect affection could dictate. She wept over the blight of my visions, and her own hopes; and vowed never to receive another daughter."

"And then Gertrude, all these visions were renewed?"

The orphan smiled a sad smile.

"No, Ernest," she said meekly; "from the hour in which I learned that the heart of Frederic was estranged from me, and that his happiness depended upon another, the path of duty and of self-esteem lay plain before me, and I had only to follow it to the end. Frederic, moreover, was generous enough to trust to me, and to place his cause in my hands; and believe me when I assure you that he had no cold advocate with his mother. I loved him, and to me his happiness was all in all. It sufficed that my affection was not essential to him, for me to understand at once the indelicacy of sustaining what was, at best, only an imaginary claim. My poor aunt died; and with her, as you are aware, the one great tie which bound me to my father's family. In my desolation I sought a home with a distant relative, to whom I was a stranger; Miss Warrington received me, and cheerfully consented to impose another burden upon her already limited resources. I came to Bletchley, unknown, unloved, and hopeless. You know the rest."

There was a momentary silence, and the heart of Gertrude sank within her.

"And your cousin?" asked Armstrong at length, with apparent effort.

"My cousin a few months ago was united to Miss Delamere."

"And you still loved him, Gertrude, when we first met? When I, at once, and unreservedly, made you the arbitress of my future fate; when I placed my whole being in your hands, without a doubt, without a misgiving, you still loved this man?"

"I believed that I did so," was the low and timid reply: "and, in all probability, Ernest, had you not, by your generous affection, taught me the fallacy of my own feelings, I should have sunk into an early grave with that conviction. Remember that my affection for Frederic was one alike of habit and of hope; that I had been taught from my earliest girlhood to look upon him as the partner of my future life; that, although reared in a comfort bordering upon luxury, my seclusion had been almost unbroken; and that, in short, my whole world was comprised within the walls of Westrum House. It is not, however, for me to excuse the past. I have simply obeyed the dictates of my nature, and fulfilled my sense of right, by removing every mystery between us, and by showing myself to you as I am. It is for you to decide if a heart which has hoped and mourned like mine, is worthy of the love that it has won."

"Only answer me one question, Gertrude, and that with the same truthfulness which I have always seen in you. Did you love this man as you love me?" and he again seized her hand.

"I could not. I am now conscious that, in the ignorance of my spirit, I mistook myself. I loved rather the creation of my own fancy, the cherished son of my more than mother, the one fixed idea of my existence. I loved Frederic not only for himself, but because with him I lost all. In short," concluded the poor girl, with a passionate burst of tears, "I despise myself for an illusion which was dissipated from the moment in which I discovered that I had long unconsciously suffered a deeper and a more vital attachment to obliterate the past. And oh! Ernest, were you aware for how long a period your image was in my heart, while I believed that it was absorbed by another, you would understand all that I would say, all that I feel."

"I do! I do! Gertrude, and I thank you," exclaimed her lover with renewed tenderness; "We will never again look back upon the past. What was the love of the girl beside the affection of the woman? I have been irritable and unjust, dearest; when I should rather have been proud of the trust which you reposed in me, and of your faith in my right feeling. You have acted nobly, Gertrude, and once more I thank you. And now, did you not assure me, that no other secret exists between us, and that this tale of girlish romance was the sole mystery of your past life?"

"I did, and truly, Ernest. You have now read my heart, which has not a thought that it would hesitate to confide to you—not a feeling or a hope of which you are not the object."

And still the twilight deepened about them, and the glowing fire-light alone flickered through the silent apartment, and revealed each to the other in that luxurious partial obscurity so dear to those whose thoughts are full of quiet happiness. For a moment the pride of Ernest Armstrong had been wounded. He could not brook that Gertrude, his own Gertrude, the only woman he had ever loved, should have felt for another what he had felt only for her; but he was too right-minded to persist in so weak an egotism; and he soon forgot his own disappointment in admiration of the delicacy which had taught the timid girl beside him to consider as a crime the reservation of a fact which so nearly concerned his happiness; and to compel herself to an avowal so painful to her feelings, in order to convince him that she was worthy of a love in which she thus ventured to confide.

Henceforward, he could have no misgivings. The past stood revealed before him. The pure and guileless heart had poured forth all its treasures of memory, and was indeed his own. One short half-hour of suffering had secured to him a life of trust and peace; and the more he reflected upon the voluntary and unembarrassed confidence of Gertrude, the more he became conscious of the whole beauty and holiness of a nature which shrank from even the semblance of deceit and dishonor.

And Gertrude, too, was happy, for her sensitive conscience was relieved of a heavy weight. Ernest now knew, and had pardoned all. She might henceforward yield herself up, without one misgiving, to the bliss of loving and being beloved. All the memory of the past appeared to fade into so far a distance, that it rather wore the misty indistinctness of a painful dream, than the sterner features of a reality. All seemed unreal, save the actual present, with its dear delights of peace, and love, and joy. Her very tears were luxury; and the throbbing of her heart made delicious music as she listened to its quick pulsations.

Who has not experienced at such an hour as this? Who has not, at some time, felt the utter inefficiency of words to embody the million sensations which well up, pure and warm, from the overflowing heart, and create an atmosphere of happiness about them? They who have not done this, have been deprived of one of those blessed privileges which leave a holy impress, like the footsteps of angels, upon the spirit, and appear to purify the whole being.

The world may have more tumultuous pleasures to offer, more voluptuous joys to dispense; but the searing-iron of passion and of vice leaves a darker trace behind, and one which no after-tears can obliterate.

Pity, that such moments of peaceful joy are brief; and that, weakened by their own intensity, they are soon compelled to give place to the commoner sensations and associations of every day life. Like a Sabbath of the soul, they do but repose, and cannot replace, the less exalted feelings incident to human existence; and are but too frequently slighted or desecrated, until their purifying influence is negatived and disavowed.

And even Gertrude and Ernest, deeply as they had felt the spell of that quiet joy, awoke after a time to a more intimate consciousness of their actual position; and once more the murmured words of affection, and the lightly-born sigh of happiness, broke upon the stillness of the apartment. Gradually, however, the tones grew less indistinct; and the clear laughter of the lover rang out at intervals, as some joyous vision floated before his excited fancy.

Meanwhile Gertrude affected to be busily engaged in collecting and sorting the wools which were scattered over her tapestry frame, a task rendered almost impossible by the partial darkness; and, as she was thus employed, a small morocco souvenir, clasped with gold, fell from the basket in which she was arranging them, at the feet of her companion; who, hastily lifting it from the floor, laid his finger upon the lock, and was about to open it, when Gertrude eagerly stretched out her hand, exclaiming,—

"No, no; you must not unclasp those tablets, Ernest; indeed you must not!"

"What! another secret, Gertrude?"

There was no reply, as the head of the orphan was averted for an instant; but ere long she repeated beseechingly,—

"If you love me, dear Ernest, do not open them. You will laugh at me, and I cannot endure your ridicule."

"Laugh at you, Gertrude! why, what have you been doing? Inditing a sonnet to the moon, or composing an elegy to a dead robin?"

"Now you are too absurd."

"Justify yourself by authorizing me to open the tablets."

"Be generous, Ernest, and give them up."

"Excuse me—I covet them. You have never yet made me a present. I accept these."

"Well, then, since it must be so," said Gertrude, half laughing and half annoyed; "you may keep them; but only on condition that you do not retain the contents."

"Agreed!" shouted the young man, as he bounded towards the fire-place to examine his prize; "Why, what dry twig is this?" he asked after the silence of a moment, as he drew from between two folds of satin a bunch of withered leaves; "And is this the treasure that I am bound to restore?"

"It is, dear Ernest," whispered the soft low voice of Gertrude, as her small hand was pressed lightly upon his shoulder; "and to me it is indeed a treasure,"

"And what is it, dearest?"

"Another and a happier record of the past,' blushed the orphan, as her lover folded his arm about her waist, and drew her to his heart; "The faded cluster-rose of the garden pavilion."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

The Mortimers were domesticated at Westrum, and Mrs. Delamere established in her favorite arm-chair, as she was wont to be at The Grange; but the old house was soon subjected to a metamorphosis which would have rendered it irrecognisable to its former owners. The first care of Mortimer, on his return to England, had been to desire Sybil to select from among the luxuries in her former home all those which she was desirous to retain; and this done, a public auction desecrated that long exclusive abode. The house itself was placed in the hands of an agent for sale; but, with intuitive delicacy, Frederic so made his arrangements, that not a single suspicion of the insolvency of its late proprie tors supplied food for the gossipry of the neighborhood.

Nothing could be more natural than that Mr. Mortimer should prefer the ancestorial associations of his own birth-place to the mere splendors of a strange property, unendeared to him by any familiar memories; and consequently no comments were made upon so simple a fact; and while these changes were in progress, little or no alteration was perceptible in the mood or manner of the newly-married man. The quiet unobtrusive gratitude of Mrs. Delamere, who once more saw herself surrounded by her accustomed luxuries, and left to their enjoyment without one misgiving as to their continuance, revealed itself in occasional snatches of deep feeling and earnest affection, and was balm to his wounded spirit; but the excitement consequent upon those domestic arrangements at an end, a gloom gathered upon the brow of Mortimer, which not even the fascinations of his beautiful Sybil had power to banish, even infatuated as he still was by her attractions.

Their homeward journey, commenced under such unpleasant circumstances, had not been productive of enjoyment to either party. A vague, but not the less a painful suspicion, had grown upon Frederic, that the resolute silence of his wife upon the past involved some secret which she was unwilling to confide to him. And if this were indeed the fact, of what nature was the mystery, which, as it now seemed, was to remain for ever untold?

There were moments of bitterness, in which he cursed the sensitiveness of his nature, which had not permitted him to temporize with the impertinence of the Sicilian prince, and to bear anything, everything, until, through his means, he had made himself master of all he had to reveal; for that much of it bore closely upon the former career of Sybil, had been evident from the little which had escaped him during their one brief interview. He might have insisted upon remaining in Rome, and have cultivated an acquaintance with this man; he might —but, in the next instant, as his glance fell upon the graceful woman beside him, he almost hated himself for his treacherous regrets. It appeared impossible that so fair and radiant a creature, whose brow and eyes were full of that proud placidity which bespoke a nature as faultless as her person, could be other than she seemed. Why should he thus torture himself? There might be nothing to learn—nothing beyond those idle follies so common in the world in which she had been reared, as to be almost the general habit of her sex; and her haughty spirit, spurning at his suspicions, might merely be revenging itself by the silence which he deprecated.

And Frederic struggled to believe that it was so; and once more he lavished upon Sybil all the treasures of an affection as deep as it had been reckless; but the illusion would not last—again and again his doubts and his misgivings recurred. The manner of Saviatti had made a deeper impression upon his reason than even the words which he had uttered; and the more he dwelt upon it, the more keenly the reflection wounded his dignity.

That his wife should be thus lightly addressed, thus superciliously approached, stung him to the very soul. He who had always associated the idea of her sex with a respect and deference almost chivalrous, and who had invested Sybil, above all, with the sanctity of his brightest and holiest aspirations, could not brook that not only the woman whom he had worshipped, but even the wife whom he had won, should, without resenting the insult on the instant, have submitted to the degradation of so unseemly a display of sarcastic insolence. And if she had indeed done this—and that it was so he was only too bitterly conscious—could it be that she would visit upon himself a minor injury, and one, too, which grew out of the sensitive jealousy of his affection? Alas! he once more felt that there was no room for doubt; and that harrowing past over which she kept such stringent guard, rose up before him like a spectre of evil, or pressed upon his spirit like an incubus.

Sybil, too, was changed. She no longer returned his affection with the warmth which she had once shown in those moments of returning confidence, in which, for a brief interval, he resolutely silenced his misgivings, and strove to fasten his thoughts upon the present. He felt that she was changed, and that she rather permitted the demonstrations of his tenderness as a natural consequence of their relative position, than welcomed them as its privilege. The most futile objects sufficed to divert her attention from her husband. She was gradually creating a world of interest and sensation about her, from which he was morally excluded. Even the prospect of becoming a mother did not arouse her from the rapidly increasing egotism which betrayed itself in every action of her life. The necessity for exertion had ceased, and her fascinations and acquirements were no longer put forth to win his praise. A gulf had opened between them, and the venerated roof of his ancestors had ceased to be a home to the imbittered and disappointed Mortimer.

It was consequently with less mortification than he would once have felt that, after the residence of only a few short months at Westrum, Frederic heard his once adored Sybil again and again recur to the unpalatable subject of his social insignificance; and reproach him with a supineness which left him unknown and obscure, when, by a slight exertion of energy, he might be battling his way to fortune, and, better still, to the consideration and respect of his fellow men. He had no longer an absorbing passion with which to counteract the dormant spirit of ambition she strove so resolutely to awaken; and he listened until he began to feel that she might be right; and that he had, indeed, hitherto mistaken his own nature when he believed that he was unfitted to wrestle with the world, and to grapple his way to greatness. He did not comprehend that it was the mere yearning of an unsatisfied heart for something to which it might attach itself; for some new and powerful interest by which it might be filled, which so misled his reason; while it is moreover certain that it requires unusual vigor of mind, and decision of character, to enable a man to withstand the influence of the woman whom he has once passionately loved, and who has become the partner of his life. Be that influence exerted as it may, either openly and boldly, or quietly and inferentially, its general result is the same. The affection may have become chilled, the trust may have grown weaker, but the moral power remains unshaken, and he instinctively imbibes some portion of her tastes, her habits, and her opinions.

This power, regarded in its responsibility, is at once a proud and a fearful one for women.

Where it is healthily exerted, it may be productive of an immense amount of good; and that it has been so, meekly and becomingly, we have many bright examples. How often has the loving energy of a wife sustained the drooping heart, and reanimated the chilled hopes, which no other voice could call back into being! How many noble actions have owed their existence to the pure and lofty aspirations of a woman's soul?

How many evil hands have been stayed, how many base intentions have been smothered, in complianee with her warning whisper? But where she desecrates this mighty influence, and, forgetting the purity and holiness of her mission, puts forth her strength only for evil, then is her power indeed fearful and her responsibility heavy. Involuntarily Mortimer had become subjected to this common law, and had gradually imbibed the prevailing passion of his wife. He required a great and absorbing interest to replace that which he was only too well aware had already ceased to exist. He felt the necessity of silencing the murmurs of a disappointed heart by the louder and sterner tumult, of worldly struggle.

One violent passion can rarely be conquered save by a second still more vehement; and no sooner did Mortimer find some moments of solitude—and they were many, for already had Sybil, as has been said, surrounded herself by interests, most of which were distinct from his own—than he began to believe that he had hitherto mistaken the path to happiness; that it was mere idle absurdity to seek it under his own roof, and in the society of a woman who refused to repay the fervent and overwhelming affection he had lavished upon her by the confidence to which, as her husband, and the companion of her future life, he was so well entitled; and that the home-happiness, of which he had once so fondly dreamt, was a brilliant fallacy, with which he had been cheated, like many others, and from whose influence it behoved him to liberate himself.

This was precisely the state of feeling to which Sybil had been anxious to lead him; and as she detected the workings of his mind, she redoubled all her efforts to complete the task which she had so skillfully commenced. She gradually became subdued, and almost sad. The air of Westrum, and the monotony of their daily existence, depressed her. She had no faith in the local practitioners; and her situation made her anxious to reside for a time in town, where she could procure competent advice.

Such an argument was, of course, unanswerable, even if Mortimer had felt inclined to oppose her project, but such was far from being the case. Like herself, he had begun to discover that everything was dull and vapid about him, and that, as regarded his estate, his steward was even more efficient than himself; while the prospect of becoming a father held out to him new and delicious hopes, to which he was ready to make far greater sacrifices than a simple change of residenee. It is true that he had hoped to see the inheritor of his fortune born beneath the roof of his forefathers, as he himself had been; but this was a secondary consideration, which could not for a moment be placed in comparison with the safety of the mother, and the preservation of the infant; and Mrs. Mortimer had consequently no sooner expressed her wish to remove to London than immediate preparations were made to gratify her inclinations.

Satisfied by her suceess, Sybil beeame once more almost the Sybil who had beguiled him of his better reason. She spoke of his worldly distinction as certain; flattered his self-esteem by enumerating the many advantages under which he would commence his diplomatic career; and declared herself ready to make any personal sacrifice which might tend to his advancement; and once more Mortimer was beguiled.

Within a fortnight they were established in a first-rate hotel, having left the supine Mrs. Delamere sole mistress at Westrum; and as the London season had not yet commeneed they had ample opportunity to select such a residence as they deemed suitable. Upon this point, however, considerable difficulty was experienced; the views of the husband by no means coineiding with those of the wife. In their house hunt—one of the most disagreeable occupations, par parenthese, to which poor human beings can be subjected!—Mortimer steadily bore in mind the amount of his income, while Sybil as resolutely discarded all such considerations.

"Were we about to reside altogether in town," was her constant argument, "or, were we here merely for purposes of pleasure, a very moderate establishment might suffice, provided always that the situation were unexeeptionable; but you must not forget that you have an important purpose in view, and that an ostentatious display of economy will by no means advance your interests. The world worships wealth: there is an oeeult magie in riches which operates even upon the proudest and best principled natures. I never hear a would-be philosopher affect to depreeate the man of money, without feeling a sneer at his want of candor pass over my heart, although I may banish it from my lips. No, no; trust me, Frederic, all such aservation is false and hollow; for do we not, every day of our lives see the affluent courted and flattered, even by those who neither require nor hope to be profited by the wealth they worship? Gold is the religion of the world. There is no shrine so thronged with devotees. In every other creed there are schisms; but Mammon knows no divisions among his votaries. Keep a close hand, and the good qualities which you may possess will be hidden with your wealth; but spread it abroad before the eyes of the crowd, and they will at once give you credit for every other virtue. When you have accomplished your purpose, you will have time enough to retrench; and, meanwhile, believe me, the more you can persuade others that the very object of your ambition is the mere caprice of a man weary of the total idleness of affluence, the more readily you will find friends to push your fortunes. One mistake at such a moment as this may be fatal to your prospects; and you are about wilfully to commit the most serious error into which you could possibly be betrayed."

What marvel that Mortimer ultimately suffered himself to be subjugated by these specious sophistries?—That an elegant residence was secured in one of the most fashionable squares; that a splendid establishment was formed; and that the equipages, jewels, and opera-box of Mrs. Mortimer, were upon a consistent scale—That the Morning Post duly informed its readers of all the movements of the family; that Tattersall rejoiced in the patronage of Mr. Mortimer; and that he was, through the good offices of half-a-dozen of his former friends, who hastened to welcome him to town, in a very short space of time ballotted into two of the leading clubs?

Heart-sick and homeless—for all was glare and representation in the mansion of which he had become the temporary master—Mortimer soon discovered innumerable attractions in the almost bachelor life to which he was thus restored; while Sybil, on her side, saw with gratified vanity and ill-concealed triumph, that she was instantly recognised by half a score of her former acquaintance, who were only too happy to renew what they were pleased to consider as an old friendship, as they caracolled beside her carriage in the ring, or partook of the elegant hospitality of her husband. Thus, for a time, all went smoothly; and as the period drew near at which Mrs. Mortimer anticipated the birth of her child, and that she was comparatively unable to plunge into the vortex of dissipation by which she was surrounded, Mortimer found his expenditure, although serious, yet still defined and regular; and amid the pressure of amusement without, he ere long forgot his anxiety upon the subject.

Not even the habits of dissipation which he was rapidly acquiring sufficed, however, to deaden him to the delight of being a father; and when at length his beautiful Sybil placed in his arms her lovely little girl, he felt all the better feelings of his nature swelling forth again, and made a thousand prudent resolutions for the future. But alas for Frederic! constitutionably unstable, he was now, moreover, under the influence of a firmer spirit than his own, and his wife had formed far different projects. Debarred for a few weeks from those dissipated and exciting pleasures which had been the business of her youth, and had become to her vain and ambitious nature almost a necessity, she had, in her temporary retirement, only grown more than ever anxious to compensate to herself for the time that she had lost; and accordingly she listened with a quiet smile to the sententious orations of her husband; yawned as seldom as possible; and satisfied herself by pursuing her own course as resolutely as though they had never been uttered.

Yet, skilful tactitian as she was, Sybil had nevertheless the mortification to perceive that her train was composed only of such of her former friends as still remained unmarried; and that it was rarely a female guest graced her splendid home. In vain did she hint to the danglers who pressed about her that she should gladly welcome their sisters, their mothers, or their aunts. The answer was always ready. One would immediately have presented Maria, but she moved in a set of her own, and would feel herself perfectly desorientee if she were to venture beyond it; another would at once have brought his mother to pay her respects to Mrs. Mortimer, but really Lady Elizabeth was such a "quiz," so prim, so pious, and so straightlaced, that he had not courage to subject her to such an ordeal; for, after all, she was his mother, and he did not wish to peril his own popularity with his charming friend by inflicting such a penance upon her—It would be like intruding a gnome into the paradise of a peri—An actual kill-joy, to which he would not be accessory for the world; while a third hinted the coquettish propensities of his widowed aunt, from whom he had certain expectations, and who would never forgive him were he to place her in a position so inimical to her vanity. And thus, each excused himself with the best grace in the world as regarded his female relatives, although all were alike devoted to the charms of their hostess, and the good cheer of their host; whom they amused in his turn by assurances of their best efforts to second his diplomatic views, and professions of intimacy with ministers, secretaries of state, and influential individuals of all parties.

And Frederic, despite his new found happiness and recent resolves, listened and persuaded himself to have faith in all this table-talk, for he had already acquired habits of selfish indulgence which warred against his better principles, and which he was too supine to resist; while, as day after day, and opportunity after opportunity, passed over unimproved, he adopted the idea that the fortunate moment had not yet arrived, but that come it must; and therefore, lapped in luxury, and gradually suffering improvidence to sap the very foundations of that independence which was his birth-right, and upon which he had hitherto prided himself—he waited.

Nor did one reproach, or even one expostulation from Sybil, cause him to pause for an instant in his career of pleasure. She had no sooner innoculated him with a desire of self-aggrandizement than she appeared suddenly to have lost all such ambition in her own person. The measure of her secret aspirations was now full even to overflowing; and she had no longer leisure to speculate upon the probabilities of her husband's destiny; her own was amply fulfilled; and they had ceased to have an interest in common.

Gradually she saw a few of the most fashionable women in town gather about her; women of wealth and rank, who possessed all the advantages of life, save indeed perhaps, an unsullied reputation, and she found it easy, even amid her pride, to discredit the rumors which, from time to time, were intruded upon her on this subject.

"The world was so censorious," she declared with a frown of virtuous indignation; "There was so much party-spirit in English society; so many petty jealousies, and idle slanders, ever ready to destroy the best and the brightest, that she would never believe that Lady Clara Flushing had been divorced from her lord from any cause more grave than an incompatibility of temper, in which he was doubtlessly as much to blame as herself; nor that Mrs. Babington had been forbidden to appear at court for any other reason than that the politics of her husband were unpalatable to the Royalties.

In the case of Mrs. Mortimer it might indeed truly be said, that charity had, in this instance, covered a multitude of sins; but meanwhile, Lady Clara, Mrs. Babington, e tutti quanti, were all handsome, highbred and accomplished women who gave a new grace to her drawing-room, and attracted about her all that was most distinguished of the other sex.

Constantly in a crowd, absorbed in perpetual dissipation, and more beautiful than ever, Sybil was as independent of her husband's affection as he was rapidly becoming of her own, and as she always met him with a smile whenever the accidents of a London life threw them together, that she was always well-dressed, did honor to his taste, and sedulously supported his consequence in society, he began to believe that, after all, he had perhaps no right to expect more, and that his former dreams of home-happiness and domestic bliss were a mere idle chimera.

Did he ever remember Gertrude? Who can doubt that, even amid the mad career which he was now pursuing, there were still moments when a terror of the future curdled at his heart, and when all would have been dark and murky, had not one faint and far-off memory, like the solitary star which occasionally pierces through the vapor of the blackest night, gleamed upon the horizon of his heart, and rested there? Yes, guilty as he was towards Gertrude—not because he had not loved her, for in that respect, at least, he had been powerless; but by his cold neglect and selfish forgetfulness; by the indolent self-indulgence which had induced him from day to day to defer those gentle courtesies of affection and kindliness which were due alike to her meek attachment and her orphan state, until he had, at length, felt that he no longer possessed a right to recall himself to her remembrance, nor to tender a helping-hand to her necessities—guilty as he felt towards her, still her image never crossed his mind that it did not for a moment appear to purify and chasten his whole nature. And if there were times when, as he contemplated his loveless home and blighted hopes, something like a regret glanced across his perturbed spirit, who shall wonder? But he soon hastened to banish feelings and thoughts like these. His lot was cast—his destiny was accomplished—and it was idle to look back. On—on—his course must now be onward. His whole future, his whole fortune, his whole existence, hinged upon one wild hope. True, it had hitherto eluded him, but Sybil had declared that he need only 'bide his time' to see it realized, and this assurance had been echoed by the boon companions who sat beside his board, and were the partners of his pleasures.

And thus time wore on, until the season drew near its close, and the languor of exhaustion began to replace the mad excitement which had for the last few months characterised the leviathan city. Royalty had withdrawn to the stately towers and terraces of Windsor; the strawberry leaves were transferred from town mansions to lordly halls and hereditary castles; men of fashion forsook their clubs, and women of ton ceased their cabals. The seething cauldron of high-life, which had so long bubbled even to the brim, emptied itself to the very dregs, and London was no longer habitable, save for those obscure and unimportant individuals who are compelled by their necessities to remain chained to the wheels of the vast machine, and to labor at its preservation, lest the pulsations of its mighty heart should cease to beat, and thus the pleasures and luxuries of the great should suffer at a future day.

In one word, London was empty. Sullen employés compelled by the absence of their principals to mend pens and read the daily journals in dingy offices; men of letters, unable to travel further from the head-quarters of reference and research than to Brixton or Wandsworth; Guards men, sulkily sauntering up St. James's street to the hollow echoes of their own footsteps, and counting the panes of glass in the well-known windows, where in gayer hours they only numbered familiar faces; novelists, closely immured in their modest lodgings, weaving, with wearied brain and aching head, now fictions to amuse the idleness of those who are to pay back gold for health, and strength, and time; the would-be fashionist of slender means and questionable pretensions, who, after aping—as the sign painter apes the artist—for a brief season the follies of the great, closes his doors, not to escape the heat and dust of the summer streets, but to retrench, and to prepare for a fresh season of awkward imitation and uneasy display; the modest household to whom the advent and exodus of the great caravan of idleness are alike unimportant; the careful trader, jealous of every instant which may turn to future profit, and the vigorous artisan, to whom all seasons are alike, so that they bring him daily toil and daily bread;—by such as these alone were now peopled square, and street, and place, in the vast city, which was thus, for a while blotted out from the highly-colored map of the civilized earth.

In short, as we have already said London was empty; and had a second great fire, like that of 1666, supervened, not a single public journal would have found cause to enclose its closely-printed columns with a sable margin; for the disaster would have occurred when there was "nobody in town."

The Mortimers, as a matter of course, followed the example of their associates, and retreated from London to the country; but, unlike most of them, Frederic would not con sent to increase the revenues of the Post Office by subjecting himself to the importunate "reminders" of a host of creditors, and accordingly satisfied every claim which could be made upon him, before he would consent to return to Westrum. The amount of his responsibilities, as a natural consequence of the life which he had been leading, more than doubled its anticipated extent.

We are so apt to forget the by-gone superfluities which we regarded as necessities when we indulged in them, but which, like the magical blue fishes in Vathek, find a tongue when conjured by the potent wand of the better-memoried creditor, that the very wisest of us are apt to be bewildered at times in our arithmetic; no marvel, therefore, that Mortimer was fearfully startled by his own defective calculation. But he had little time either to regret or to resolve, for although Sybil could no longer remain in London, she had at least arranged to transfer her own immediate fraction of London to the obscure retirement of Westrum, and as the infant and its nurse had been sent forward, as well as half-a-dozen servants, to prepare the house for the reception of the expected guests; and that, moreover, Lady Clara was too timid to travel so far alone, and consequently accompanied her dear friend, Mrs. Mortimer, in her own chariot, while the master of Westrum made his way back to his ancestral home by the mail, attended by his confidential servant; he had neither leisure nor opportunity to impress upon Sybil the vital importance of retrenchment.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Sybil did the honors of her house to perfection, and although such a crowd of fashionables had never since its erection been collected beneath that roof, every one was soon perfectly at home except its master. The summer was brilliant, and the grounds, thanks to the provisions of their mistress, were in full beauty. Not one natural facility had remained unimproved, and as the gardener had been transferred from The Grange, and the less skilful functionary who had grown grey in the family, had been compelled to cede his place to this more scientific florist, marvels had been wrought which astonished, even if they did not altogether gratify her husband.

Nor was the change within the mansion less striking than that without; but although even the beloved library in which Mortimer had been accustomed to spend so great a portion of his time in studious and delightful solitude, was invaded at all hours, he felt the futility of remonstrance, and was compelled to console himself by the reflection that at least its most cherished treasures were suffered to remained undisturbed, and that it was in quest only of the ephemeral productions of the day, that the idlers, who now thronged his saloons, so continually broke in upon him with those vapid demi-apologies, which are rather an impertinence than a courtesy.

And, moreover, one source of happiness was still open to him, in whose pure enjoyment none sought to interfere; and that one was the presence and the affection of his child, who already received him with eager cries of joy and outstretched arms, whenever he approached the remote nursery to which she had been consigned, lest her baby-griefs should occasionally prove too audible for high-bred nerves.

And what a treasure was that infant girl to Mortimer! Her smiles were the Lethe in which he plunged all his bitter memories, and for a while forgot them. As her dimpled arms wound themselves about his neck, and her soft and peachy cheek rested upon his own, he for an instant believed himself to be happy. For hours would he wander about the grounds, with the delighted child and her attendant nurse, watching with anxious joy all those mysterious dawnings of intellect which are perceptible only to the eye of a parent, and endeavoring to strengthen the still unconscious affection which she betrayed towards him.

And he was enabled to do this freely, and almost without comment, for the brilliant circle of his wife were for the most part alike careless and regardless of his movements; while Sybil herself, who was provided with an admirable souffre-douleur in the person of her mother, was quite as willing as her guests to dispense with the presence of her husband.

All Westrum was in amazement. The main street of the little town was alive with equipages and horsemen. Provident milliners secured the "last London" fashions from the transient glimpses which they obtained of the fashionable dames as they were whirled along; the breathless post master was no longer the emporium of news and gossip, for the duties of his office occupied every hour of his time; the stalwart carrier, who had long, from prudential motives, remained a bachelor, hastened to claim his promised bride on the strength of his influx of business; and emulous shopkeepers ventured on luxurious innovations hitherto unattempted.

Nor, while such was the sensation produced among the traders, did the gentry of Westrum remain uninterested spectators of the progress of events at the great house. All such as from local position and old custom were privileged to pay their respects there, hastened to enforce that privilege, and even Mortimer himself was satisfied with the courtesy of their reception. The smile of Sybil was as winning, her words as bland, to the prosy rector, and the sententious physician, as to those of her own set. He, in the honesty of his nature, did not understand the necessity, of which his wife was fully conscious, of conciliating all the visitable population of the neighborhood, in order to render them available whenever it might be expedient. He forgot that the court-cards are at times useless without the remainder of the pack, and that it is by shuffling them together that the just value of each is elicited in the great game of life; but the more far-sighted Sybil did not suffer so obvious a fact to escape her.

While Lady Clara could criticize alike the cap and the courtesy of worthy Mrs. Collins, she could afford to spare her own friends; nor was it less desirable to veil, by a drapery of muslin petticoats, the occasional tête-à-tête in which pretty little Mrs. Babington delighted to indulge on a particular settee behind the grand piano.

Let it not be supposed, however, that the honor of visiting at the great house was gratuitously purchased, for such was far from being the case. During the lifetime of its former gentle and unpretending mistress, no moral dais had been raised; no one was compelled to feel that he or she must take their places below the salt; but under the reign of Sybil all was changed. It was doubtlessly pleasant enough for the physician's comely wife, and the rector's good-natured daughters, to comment on the morrow to their admiring and jealous friends upon the courtly society with which they had so lately mingled, but it is, nevertheless, certain that all of them were aware how little they had, in point of fact, formed an integral portion of the brilliant circle to which they had been admitted, and where they had rather been grouped in order to enhance the graces of the principal personages upon the stage, as the coryphées of the opera form a living back-ground to the Taglionis and the Ceritos; and to fill up the occasional pauses of weariness which necessarily ensue in all struggles of display, than received upon equal terms. Who could venture a second time to address a peer's daughter, who vouchsafed no reply beyond a look of wonder at the presumption; or to tender any courtesy to a coquette whose soul was in her flounces?

And yet the worthy people bore all this, and returned again and again, and affected not to perceive that they were merely the pawns upon Mrs. Mortimer's chess-board, in order that they might revenge their own mortification upon the dear friends against whom the portal of this earthly paradise was closed.

Those among my readers who have never done the like, can afford to laugh at their infatuation; but some there will be who cannot claim the privilege of mirth upon such a subject, for this species of moral meanness is not confined to Westrum; and which among us does not find some familiar name trembling upon his tongue, which would prove the degrading fact?

Among the guests of Sybil was a certain Mrs. Lamerly, who was, for some unexplained, and it might be inexplicable, reason, more obnoxious to Mortimer than any other of his lady-visitors. Assuredly it was not from wounded vanity that he disliked her; for, if any of the guests occasionally condescended to remember that Westrum House had a master, it was pretty, languishing Mrs. Lamerly, who by some accident had more than once encountered him in his walks, and even caressed his child. Mrs. Lamerly—as she assured him with a sigh, and a down-dropping of the lids which veiled a pair of large and lustrous blue eyes as dark as amethysts—doated upon children, and had it pleased providence to make her a mother, she was afraid that she should have suffered that one affection to absorb her whole existence. What could be so pure, so beautiful, so holy, as the tie which linked a mother to her child? Did not Mr. Mortimer agree with her that all other tenderness was poor and puerile in comparison? Truly did he in his very heart of hearts; although he only smiled vacantly in reply, as he drew his laughing girl closer to his bosom.

Mrs. Lamerly had, indeed, touched the right chord, but she had done it unskilfully, and it only jarred where it should have soothed. Mortimer disliked this woman. She had been one of the early friends of Sybil, and one of the most eager to renew their acquaintance. She had eloped when very young with the dissipated scion of a noble house, whom his friends, weary of perpetually repairing the effects of his improvidence, at length sent into honorable exile as attaché at one of the petty German courts, where he was ultimately interred with all honor, leaving his young and pretty widow penniless. He had, indeed, made an appeal to his family in her behalf a short time before his death, but it had been made in vain, none knew wherefore; while it was not the less certain that the lady continued for a couple of years to inhabit the same city, frequent the same court, and maintain the same appearance, by some occult faculty known only to herself.

At length, however, the maladie du pays declared itself, and she returned to England followed by the regrets of the Margrave, and the compliments of the whole court circle; as languid and as languishing as ever, with a comfortable although somewhat mysterious income, and a magnificent diamond bracelet.

We have said that Mortimer greatly disliked the diplomatist's widow—Could it be prescience? He never asked himself the question: he only felt that even her blandishments were distasteful to him. And yet Mrs. Lamerly was a general favorite in her set; she simpered out her inanities with such a low sweet drawl; she told such piquant stories of Herr Graff Such an one, and the Grafine So and so, without appearing to be at all aware of the somewhat startling point of her own anecdotes; she sang such deliciously wild and guttural Sclavonic ballads almost with a lisp; she was so original, so odd, and so entertaining, and she had such fine eyes, that it would have been matter of wonder that she still remained Mrs. Lamerly, had she not lingered so long at that petty German court.

But if, even for Sybil, there was still a mystery attached to her friend, it was by no means reciprocal as regarded herself; for the simple, smiling, and apparently unsuspicious little widow was well aware of every incident in the career of her brilliant hostess, and as she looked around her, and contrasted the opulence by which Mrs. Mortimer was surrounded with her own comparatively confined resources, and then, with her usual well-concealed shrewdness, discovered the vaccillation of her husband's character, she began to ask herself how long such a discrepancy need exist, were he to be exposed to fascinations of a different description, and that she were to exert her own peculiar powers of pleasing.

There was something very agreeable to her vanity in such a speculation, and although, in the first instance, it had been a mere idle fancy, the offspring of indolence and an inordinate love of luxury, the thought recurred again and again, until it piqued her self-esteem into a desire to prove whether, indeed, her foreign graces could not accomplish such a revolution. She had no fear of robbing Mortimer of the heart of Sybil, for she had read that heart to its very core, and she knew the "perilous stuff" of which it was composed; while, as regarded Frederic himself, she had not been a week beneath his roof before she discovered that all his affection was now centered in his child, and that his passion for his wife was rapidly degenerating into the most encouraging indifference.

Mrs. Lamerly was a coquette by nature, and consequently she did not pause to ask herself what might be the actual result of her machinations to either party; neither were her principles of that rigid order which would have taught her to pause upon the threshold of so base a treachery as that which she was thus coolly meditating; she only remembered that she was weary of inaction; that after having for a time seen herself an object of exclusive adoration, she had since degenerated into a mere unit in the great sum total of society. She only remarked that Mortimer was by many degrees the handsomest man in their set, and never doubting that she could also render him the most agreeable, she determined at any rate to try her strength, if it were only pour passer le temps; and therefore it was that she contrived to waylay him in his walks, and that she conceived so flattering an affection for his child.

All this is very hideous, but it was nevertheless a natural consequence of the culpable carelessness with which he had suffered his wife to surround herself by associates of equivocal reputation, and to make his home the rendezvous of idle roués and fashionable demireps.

Mortimer believed himself to be as susceptible and sensitive as ever to all which touched his honor, but his principles had in reality become unconsciously enervated by constant contact with profligacy and folly, and if he still discouraged the loose jests of the dissolute, and the social vices of the lax, it was rather because they were repugnant to his taste, than that they alarmed his virtue.

Still, Mrs. Lamerly vainly lavished upon him all her fascinations, all her pensive sighs, her languid smiles, her bewitching nonsense. He never bestowed more than a passing glance upon that fairy foot that scarcely seemed to press the velvet cushion by which it was supported; kept his eye riveted upon the daily journal, while her magnificent arm, circled by its brilliant bracelet, rested like a snow-wreath upon the chords of the harp; talked politics with old Sir John Stickfast, the greatest proser in the Lower House, while she was lisping forth some Germanic scandal, and transferred the slippers which she professed to have embroidered expressly for him, to his valet.

Mrs. Lamerly was nevertheless not discouraged. She had yet a great card to play, and although her vanity would have been gratified could she have been indebted for her triumph solely to the spell of her own attractions, still her spirit of emulation was aroused, and she resolved not to be baffled.

There was a strong bond between herself and Sybil. Ostensibly it was that of old affection and happy memories, of renewed friendship and perfect confidence, but in reality it was one of mutual apprehension. Sybil was well aware that many of the secrets of her past life were in the keeping of her former friend, who was as conscious as herself of the necessity of their concealment from her husband; while the widow, on her side, long habituated to all the luxuries of existence, to many of which her present income was inadequate, too well appreciated the advantages to be derived from even a temporary home like that of Mrs. Mortimer to cast them from her lightly.

It was in consequence of this conviction that she still compelled herself to temporize; but although she succeeded in teaching the beautiful infant to elap its little hands and crow at her approach, permitted it to tear her costly veil of Brussels point without betraying the slightest irritation, and even induced it to leave its father's arms to nestle in her own, still that father remained cold, and she was at length driven to confess to herself that her childish graces were expended upon him in vain.

Languid and listless as it pleased her to appear, Mrs. Lamerly possessed strong passions, and a perseveranee in all she undertook to accomplish which amounted to obstinacy. No wonder, then, that mortified vanity in this instance aroused all the darker impulses of her nature. Had he even loved Sybil, she could have understood this resolute indifference on the part of Mortimer, but her self-esteem had not even this poor consolation.

For the first time she felt the impotence of her efforts, and a spirit of revenge took possession of her. It was in vain that Lord James Blenheim and the Honorable Theodore Bruce whispered their honied words in her ear, smoothed the satin cushions of her fauteuil, and hung entraneed upon her lisping accents. She smiled upon each in turn, it is true, but she estimated their adoration at its just value. She knew that in a crowded country-house all must find amusement for themselves, and that idleness cared little whence that amusement was derived, whether from a pet monkey or a fantastic beauty; that Lord James was an engaged man, and the Honorable Theodore a ruined gamester. Still, the incense of flattery was essential to her, and so she discouraged neither, although each was but a floating straw upon the current of a stream wherein she had resolved to dive deep for a more coveted treasure.

At length her patience was exhausted, and she resolved to incur any risk rather than fail in her purpose. Like all sentimental women, she indulged in an elaborate correspondence. No letter-bag ever arrived at Westrum which did not contain half-a-dozen closely-written epistles to the address of Mrs. Lamerly; and it was curious to see the indolent and impassive beauty seated at her desk, in her turn rapidly covering sheet after sheet of delicately tinted vellum—for the odious and vulgar fashion of colored paper, mystic devices, and emblematic wafers, was at that period just beginning to obtain in England—with the most minute characters, and to watch the facility with which the crow-quill poured forth its stream of soundless words.

Mrs. Lamerly protested that she hated writing, and perhaps she did, but there was sound diplomacy in her perseverance. Her position was uncertain and insecure; she could not afford to lose a friend, and it was, moreover, necessary that she should be constantly informed of the movements of those who might, directly or indirectly, exercise an influence over her fortunes. Thus no occurrence took place in her set, and it was an extensive one, of which she was not immediately made cognisant; and this fact not only enabled her to enhance her popularity by a constant supply of that light and often malicious gossipry so welcome at all times to the idle and frivolous, but also to facilitate such plans as she occasionally found it convenient to devise.

It is wonderful how often a placid and simple exterior deceives the crowd. The old and trite proverb, that "still water runs deep," is full of sound philosophy. Those laughing, rattling, reckless persons, who utter without reflection all that rises to their lips, may work mischief alike for themselves and for others, but the wound is at least laid open, and there is no hidden canker to apprehend; while the blow which bruises rather than breaks, lingers longer in the flesh, and at times corrodes even to the bone, poisoning the stream of life, and inducing the fatal gangrene which can never be eradicated.

Mrs. Lamerly, even while lisping out her German ballads, discussing the merits of a morning cap; reading half-a-dozen pages of a French novel; flirting with Lord James and the Honorable Theodore, quizzing Sir John Stickfast with a pretty smile which almost turned the brain of the bachelor politician, old as he was; waylaying Mortimer in his walks, and dressing a doll for the baby, had mentally completed her project; and it was worthy of her. In one way or the other, as she triumphantly reflected, it must tell, and who could say but it might succeed in both?

Mortimer was too proud to place himself in competition with the foplings by whom his wife was surrounded, and thus he left them a free field in which to display their arts of fascination; but would he do so were he pitted against a more formidable opponent? Would he not awaken to a full sense of his danger if he once saw her the object of adoration to a man with whom he could only doubtingly compare himself? And, in this case, would he not need a friend, a counsellor? A slight and gratulatory flush rose to her cheek as she glanced around her. Where could he so fitly seek that friend as in herself? Had she not already knit between them the bond of his child's affection, which, appear to disregard it as he might, she felt well assured must nevertheless have, in some degree, produced its effect.

It was clear that he despised Lady Clara, and that he barely tolerated Mrs. Babington; and she was well aware that let proud man commune as he may with his own sex in his hours of pleasure, it is the sympathy of woman that he turns to in his season of doubt and trial.

What fervent passions have sprung from a far weaker cause! The haughty spirit, once humbled to seek for help and consolation in the eyes and on the lips of a pretty and designing woman, seldom recovers heart-whole from the moral prostration. Like the silly lamb, he leaves some portion of the fleece upon the brambles; and it was upon this contingency that Mrs. Lamerly cleverly calculated. And meanwhile, what might be the effect of her design on Sybil? A curve of scorn rose to her lip, and trembled there for an instant. Let Sybil look to herself; her honor was in her own keeping. Her honor! How subtle are the distinctions made by the world on the subject of female honor.

The widow laughed in her sleeve; bitterly perhaps, but still she laughed. Mrs. Mortimer was blansée, it is true; had been the jest of half London for a season; had jilted the man to whom she was affianced; had volunteered elopement with another under very precarious circumstances; and had finally enriched herself with the spoils of her first dupe; but still she was an honorable woman, married to an honorable man, who would consider it incumbent upon him to send a bullet through the heart of any one bold enough to assail her reputation; while she herself—there needed no demon-whisper in her ear to urge her on, but it came; close, mocking, and baneful as the blast of the simoom, and the little heart which a career of vice and folly had spared to her, parched and withered beneath the scorching breath of jealousy and mortification.

CHAPTER XL.

"Sybil," said Mrs. Lamerly, in her most insinuating tone, as they stood together arranging some exotic plants in a jardinière, as female taste only can arrange them; "I have such a favor to ask of you."

"What is it?" demanded her companion in reply, moving a few paces backward as she spoke, in order to ascertain the effect of her last grouping; "I trust not to sanction your sending for your blue macaw; you know that my mother's nerves cannot sustain its screams; so, do, pray, be rational, and not urge it again."

"I was not even thinking of Jacko, poor dear," pouted the simple beauty, "though you know how I miss him; but tell me if I did ask you to admit another pet, who never screams, and who could not disturb Mrs. Delamere, or anybody else, would you refuse?"

"That depends entirely upon the nature of your plaything."

The little widow indulged in a peal of rich and ringing laughter, which sounded like the very echo of a joyous heart, as, smoothing her glossy ringlets before a mirror, and drawing closer the cordillière of her pink satin douillette, she said, with an arch look: "You must, in such an establishment as yours, still have one bachelor's room available."

"And if so, Amabel?"

"Why, then, I would ask you to allow me to supply it with an occupant."

"I must, first, know whom you would introduce."

"No one to whom you, at least, will object, Madame la Chatelaine," said the widow with a peculiar expression; "unless, indeed, like many of our monopolizing sex, you will neither take nor give."

"Speak plainly, Amabel, if you would be answered."

"I will speak plainly," said Mrs. Lamerly with a sudden change of voice and manner: "Trevor is just returned to England. All Mortimer as you are, you cannot have forgotten Trevor, Sybil? We met abroad; and time, as you are aware, works wonders. You were married; and, in short," lisped out the lady, bashfully inclining her head towards her left shoulder, until her long light curls rested upon the glowing satin, "I have reason to suppose that I almost succeeded in consoling him."

"You!" involuntarily exclaimed her listener, as, with burning cheek and flashing eyes, she glanced towards the little doll-like figure beside her. "You succeeded in consoling him! Am I to understand that he loves you?"

"You are to draw your own conclusions when we meet," tranquilly replied the widow, as she re-arranged a cape-jessamine. "Thus much, however, I will tell you, that I was the depository of his regrets and his despair—that I it was who played the Desdemona to your jealous Othello; and that while I was very near loving him

'For the (gauntlet) he had run,'

I have sufficient grounds for believing that 'He did love me, that I did pity him.'

"Am I to understand, Amabel," asked Mrs. Mortimer, suddenly becoming pale as the blossom of the arum near which she stood, "that Sir Horace Trevor made you his confidante?"

"That is a searching question, Sybil," was the smiling retort; "but I will be frank, and answer at once 'yes' and 'no.' To tell you the truth, I heard as little as I could; for I hate men to entertain me by talking of other women when they should be thinking only of myself. You loved him, he said; or, at least, he loved you, and you were to be married, and all that sort of thing; not as I was to poor Augustus, but surrounded by all the properties—parsons, and proctors, and postilions in scarlet jackets—when suddenly you jilted him. Yes, I am afraid, Sybil, that, in order to be quite fair and open with you, I must confess that he said you—had—jilted him. Naughty girl! who could not be satisfied with any thing short of a prince; and silly woman! who, having made up her mind to catch her bird, was not careful to lime the twig thickly enough."

"And was this all he told you?" again asked Sybil, with difficulty controlling her emotion, whose very excess enabled her to despise the taunt of her companion. "Did he tell you no more than this?"

"It may be that he did," said the widow, listlessly throwing herself upon a sofa; "but you know of old, Sybil, that I am a bad listener; and my memory has become so defective since I lost poor dear Augustus, that I really remember very little that has happened to me since."

"Listen to me, nevertheless, Amabel," said her companion with compressed and bloodless lips. "You may succeed in deceiving others, but I know you. We were girls together, and your baby caprices cannot beguile me. What is your intention, what your view, in bringing Trevor here? Do not lose sight of the fact that I may have less interest than yourself in forgetting the past."

"I have already told you," was the sullen reply: "I believe that Trevor admires me—and—I am poor."

"I understand," said Mrs. Mortimer, with a contempt which she did not even seek to conceal; "but I doubt that my husband will consent to receive such a guest. Even before our marriage, Trevor was distasteful to him."

"Perhaps so," was the careless reply: "he feared a rival, but of course that danger is now past; and if you represent the matter to him in its true light, I cannot see what valid objection he could raise."

"And yet you have been a wife, Amabel."

"I have; and, therefore, I have not now to learn that these things are easily arranged. Besides, Sybil, Mortimer can only rejoice in the opportunity of displaying his triumph to your discarded lover."

The words were common-place enough, but there was something in the tone in which they were uttered which jarred alike upon the pride and upon the fears of Mrs. Mortimer. The war of wits was equal; and there needed no magician to prove to Sybil that her dear friend held her in the toils. It cost her much to temporize, and gladly would she have spurned her as she sat, but she dared not; and, accordingly, she forced a smile, and throwing herself down beside her, said, in a tone which she struggled to render playful—

"Come, now, Amabel, be true for once, and tell me if you, indeed, anticipate that you shall, one day, be Lady Trevor."

"If Horace can really forget you, I am sure I shall."

"Then are you not throwing away your best chance by asking him here—here, where we shall be brought into close and constant contact? Mark me, Amabel, I do not believe for an instant that you have any thing to fear from my influence, but you know that men are wayward, and surely it would be more judicious—"

"To give him time to forget me altogether. Is that what you would say, Sybil? I give you all due credit for your humility; and I will so far put faith in it as to tell you that I feel quite satisfied you will not exert your influence to my detriment; while, as a natural consequence, Trevor will henceforward consider you only as the wife of his friend, and therefore beyond his reach. Thus, you see that I have nothing to apprehend."

"Amabel, would you only be honest and straightforward for five minutes—"

Mrs. Lamerly laughed; not scornfully or satirically, but as though she really thought the dialogue in which she was engaged very amusing.

"Will you at least hear me?"

"Of course. Do you not perceive that I am listening with all my ears, and that I am vastly entertained to discover that Sybil married has as great a confidence in the effect of her charms as she had in her first girlhood? Why, my dear, my vanity has aged tenfold more than your own; and it is as much as I dared venture to expose my preux chevalire to the captivations of so accomplished a coquette, even now, when she is hedged round with the proprieties of married life. But, Sybil," she added with affected solemnity, as she shook her head, while her chesnut tresses shimmered in the sunlight; "I know all the onerous obligations of matrimony, and all the rigid duties which it involves. You may believe me; for although I was barely seventeen when I married Augustus, I discovered a gray hair above my right temple before I had been a wife more than a week, and almost suspected a wrinkle one short month afterwards. Judge, therefore, if I can enter into your feelings."

"I have done," said Sybil indignantly; "and although I cannot be discourteous enough to weary of an invited guest, I must decline receiving one who is forced upon me." And she rose from the sofa.

"As you please," retorted her companion. "I am then at liberty to tell Trevor that you do not feel authorized to run the risk of seeing him here?"

"Amabel," said Sybil, as she paused before her; "I do not understand you. I can incur no risk from contact with your lover."

"Then why are you so unaccommodating?"

"I have already told you that he is distasteful to Frederic."

"Why, so are fifty other things. He hates Lady Clara, and snubs Lord John; and yet here they are. He detests a home full of flirts and fools, and you will admit that if you are good-natured enough to make room for Trevor, he will be the most rational man, and I the most rational woman, under your roof. You may as well concede that il caro marito has very little to do with the matter."

"If I were only convinced that Sir Horace really intended to make you his wife," said Sybil doubtingly, "all my objections would at once be overcome, but, Amabel, Trevor is a man of the world, and he knew you abroad."

"He did so," replied Mrs. Lamerly, with the most provoking à plomb; "and in like manner Mr. Mortimer is a man of fortune and family, and yet, Sybil, he is your husband. Do not let us taunt each other, love. There are some ugly proverbs which might be brought to bear upon us both. In one word, will you receive Trevor as my friend, or not?"

Mrs. Mortimer stood for a moment irresolute; all her habitual self-possession had forsaken her, and it was in an ill-assured voice that she at length said: "You are ungenerous, Amabel; but I can deny you nothing. Only, if I consent to admit Trevor here, you must promise to keep a secret for me; a poor and puerile one, it is true, but still it must be kept."

"And you will confide it to me?" exclaimed Mrs. Lamerly with a genuine joy, which she strove to conceal under an affectation of childish eagerness.

"I have no alternative, or perhaps I should hesitate to do so," replied Sybil with haughty bitterness; "but this it is: before my marriage with Mr. Mortimer, Sir Horace visited The Grange in order to—to renew his suit——"

A low and almost inaudible laugh broke from the parted lips of her listener; but she was too much excited to remark it.

"Conscious of the jealous temperament of Frederic," pursued Sybil; "and aware that our previous engagement had authorized, in Trevor's eyes at least, a familiarity of manner which my captious suitor would never tolerate, and in fact, driven to some such expedient by the circumstance of his having come upon us when Horace had raised my hand to his lips——"

"Fie, naughty Horace!" broke in the exulting widow, affecting to hide her eyes in her jewelled hands: "But was that all?"

"All, Mrs. Lamerly!" said Sybil sternly; "and that all, simple as it was, would have sufficed to estrange from me forever the hand, if not the heart, of Mr. Mortimer, had I not, upon the impulse of the moment, presented the stranger to him as my cousin."

"Enviable presence of mind!" said the widow, with a smile which partook rather of contempt than admiration. "How the dear old Margrave would have enjoyed such a tour de force! Really, my dear Sybil, you are inimitable! And what said your simple Corydon of his new connexion?"

"He bore with him for my sake; and that is all that I can expect, should he again be compelled to receive him as a guest."

"Poor Horace! However, I will endeavor to compensate to him for the slights of the happy mortal who won you from him. And so I may tell him to come—may I not? And you will welcome him for my sake, for he is at present quite désorienté; only a week from Italy, where he saw your old friend Saviatti, who told him that he had seen you, and all about poor Signor Mortimer being as jealous as an ogre; and that wretched little Lord Squanderleigh being shot in a duel by that dear handsome Florentine Duca, who was kicked out of a saloon in Paris for cheating at ecarte; and a host of other things that you would be delighted to hear. And I will promise to be generous, and to lend him to you until he has emptied his budget: after which gare de loup, for I am a little demon when I am thwarted in what the French prettily call 'affairs of the heart.'"

And so the two friends parted.

CHAPTER XLI.

"False pride, my pretty Gertrude, nothing but false pride," said Mr. Armstrong gaily, as the orphan stood, steeped in blushes, and with large tears swelling in her eyes, in the deep bay of a library window, where she looked in the midst of the heavy dark frame-work of carved oak like one of Guido's angels; "surely when I give you my son, I may also be allowed to offer you a few flounces and farbelows!"

"But, indeed, my dear sir—"

"But, indeed, my dear young lady, I must have my way! Mary has set her heart upon it; and I will not consent that there shall be the difference of a knot of ribbon between you. Do you not hear her every now and then whispering, 'Papa, I should like so and so?' or 'Papa, I must have such a thing?'—And are you not both my daughters?—I can have no more folly of this kind, Gertrude. Had you been wealthy, I must, I know, have allowed you to be as headstrong as the rest of your sex; but as it is, I will not hear another word."

"And yet, for that very reason, dear Mr. Armstrong, I must entreat of you to let me speak. Do you know that even now—now, at this very instant—when you are not only endeavoring to hasten my marriage with your son—I, a poor, penniless orphan, who can only repay your generosity by the gratitude of a true heart, and the tribute of a sincere affection—but are even urging me to share the luxury which, although they may be the birthright of Mary, are all too costly for a portionless bride like myself—do you know, that even now—" and, as she continued speaking, she had gradually approached the old gentleman, until at last she was leaning over his high-backed chair, her arm upon his shoulder, and her golden hair mingling with the grey and glistening locks which clustered over his benevolent-looking head; "even now, I feel as though all this happiness must be a dream; and I start at every sudden noise least I should awake only to find myself once more alone and unloved."

"Silly child!" said the old man, in a voice that trembled somewhat more than usual, as he drew her towards him, and pressed his lips to her glowing cheek.

"Suffer me, therefore, I implore you, to return to my humble home until the period of—of this double marriage. I have already, in my selfish happiness, too much neglected the benevolent relative to whom I am indebted for all that I possess, and all that I am taught to hope. Let me for three short weeks endeavor to prove that the joy of my heart does not extinguish its affection."

"What you ask is only fair, Gertrude, if you really wish it," said Mr. Armstrong reluctantly; "but I very much doubt if either Ernest or his mother will consent to such a sacrifice. As for me, I confess that, between man and man, (if I may use such an expression where an old woman is concerned,) I think you are right."

"I know you would, sir, for you are always alike just and generous; and therefore I may now calculate upon your support upon this point, for which I am really anxious. But I have not yet done; and even in spite of your own disclaimers I do not, I will not despair, that you will still make another and a greater concession, when I entreat it almost upon my knees. Oh, bear with me for an instant! And indeed, indeed, you will admit that I only ask what is reasonable and consistent! Reflect for a moment! Your daughter is about to marry a man of large fortune, and carries with her to the altar a dowry worthy of him, while I——"

"Gertrude, again I say that this is a false pride; and, moreover, surely something is due alike to Ernest and to his family?"

"Much—very much. Nevertheless, I fearlessly persist in my petition—leave me free until I am indeed his wife and your daughter. Do not compel me to feel utterly powerless."

"Poor Mary! Why will you persist in thwarting her?"

"Mary will hear reason, I know she will, and I shall be so much happier. Moreover, my dear sir, poor as I am, I still possess resources which I can explain to dear Mrs. Armstrong and the girls, although I should shrink from detailing them to one of your lordly sex."

"Well, well, I have not the heart to contradict you any longer," said the squire, "so, if you can convince the women, I will not interfere further in the matter; but I warn you that they are likely to prove less ductile in your hands than I have done."

Enchanted by her success, Gertrude warmly thanked the affectionate old man, and hastened to the breakfast-room, where the ladies of the family were busily discussing the merits of Lyons satins, Lisle laces, and orange-blossoms. A general exclamation greeted her entrance. Mary's taste was at issue with that of the London dressmaker, to whom Mrs. Armstrong bowed with implicit confidence, and it has just been decided that the question should be referred to Miss Mortimer.

"Now, am I not right, dear Gertrude?" eagerly asked the other bride-elect; "will not our dresses be infinitely more graceful if entirely composed of lace, than if we merely trim them, and leave the glossy glarish satin unsubdued? And shall you not prefer a long veil of this delicious point to an odious bonnet?"

"The lace robe and the veil by all means, love," replied Gertrude, with a quiet smile; "like you, I shrink from the glare of satin by sun-light; but, unlike you, I shall neither venture upon the one nor the other."

"What can you mean?" exclaimed both sisters with surprise; "Has it not been already arranged that the two dresses are to be precisely similar?"

"It was so arranged, I know," said Gertrude, as she raised the hand of Mrs. Armstrong to her lips, "and grateful, very grateful do I feel for the affection which could prompt such a proposal, but, within the last half-hour, I have induced Mr. Armstrong to rescind his resolution."

"How very unkind of papa," said Mary, with a pretty pout. "Our party will not look half so picturesque, and that is not the worst of it, for I know you so well, Gertrude, that I am quite sure of your motives for this silly whim. But, mark me, I will not stand at the altar with you if you are dressed one whit worse than myself."

The orphan laughed as she silenced the threat with a sisterly kiss. "Do not fear, dear girl," she said quietly: "You have as yet no idea of my heaped-up riches, and moreover I warn you that I shall pride myself more upon my dress that day, than were it composed of lace like cobwebs, or thrice-piled velvet."

"What is it then, Gertrude!" inquired Mrs. Armstrong, anxiously.

"It is the work of my own hands, my dear madam. Simple, very simple in its materials, but rendered somewhat costly by the labor which has been bestowed upon it. Let us, however, rather talk of dear Mary's toilette."

"Ernest will be bitterly disappointed when he finds that you have overthrown our plans, Gertrude," said Eleanor reproachfully.

"And so am I," observed the old lady, as she raised her eyes for a moment from one of those atrocities which, in the shape of illustrations to Magazines of Fashion, Belle Assemblées, and productions of that class, libel at once the good taste of Englishwomen, and the fair proportions of nature. "Only look here, Gertrude, at this sweet costume! I had made up my mind to persuade you both to fix upon this; and now, you see, you have upset everything."

"I am afraid that you will, indeed, be inclined to think so, my dear madam," replied the orphan, after glancing for a moment at the great human hour-glass, overwhelmed with conflicting finery, which Mrs. Armstrong submitted to her inspection, "when I tell you that this is not the only concession that I have induced your kind husband to make. A certain feeling of remorse has reminded me that I owe a debt of gratitude and courtesy to my aunt, and that I cannot better pay it than by devoting to her comfort and amusement the three brief weeks which still remain before——"

"Oh! no! no! Gertrude. Impossible!" was the general exclamation. "Ernest will never consent, and, moreover, only consider that, should you persist, there is an end at once to all our consultations, all our plans. Miss Warrington cannot want you, and will only be annoyed by the perpetual intrusion to which such an arrangement would subject her. No! no! We will yield the first point, if you will give up the second."

"Indeed, I cannot," said the orphan, smiling through her tears; "I cannot, because I feel that I am doing right, and you will see that I shall soon induce Ernest to think as I do. Remember, also, how soon we shall have a right to be constantly together, without sacrificing any sense of duty; and let us not wilfully rush upon so needless a source of regret."

"As Mr. Armstrong has consented," said the old lady, laying down the beflounced beauty which had so long been her study; "as your father has consented to this arrangement, my dears, I think that Gertrude is quite right: for, after all, her poor old aunt must miss her even more than we do; and so, if she can persuade Ernest to allow it, I must desire that you will not say another word upon the subject."

And Gertrude did succeed, although with considerable difficulty, in convincing her lover after having been compelled to hear him utter certain comments upon old women which were anything but complimentary; and their last evening at the Manor House was considerably saddened by the consciousness that they should not, for some time to come, again enjoy that solitary communion in which they had latterly indulged.

"Nevertheless, rebel as your are," said Ernest with a smile, "I will indulge you with one more evening saunter through the grounds: so, throw on your bonnet and shawl, and we will stroll until the dews force us in again."

And then it was, as they wandered through the rich shrubberies, and seated themselves for a time in the pavilion so dear to both, that the orphan, for the last time, poured forth all the feelings of her pure heart to the man who was so soon to become her husband, and listened, with a happy smile, to the rebuke with which he met her earnestly expressed regrets that she should bring him no better dowry than her love.

"I ask, I care for nothing more, Gertrude," he replied, in an accent which carried conviction to her mind. "In possessing you, I shall possess all that I have ever coveted on earth; but when once you are mine, I shall become more ambitious for your sake. Nor do I doubt that by exerting proper means, I shall succeed in leaving you no such cause of regret. I have already a project, and had you been less unselfish than you are, or could I have made up my mind as demurely as you have done, to a temporary separation, I might already have taken some steps towards its accomplishment. However, as you have decided upon returning home where I shall have no chance of seeing you except in the presence of your female jailer—confound all old maiden aunts—I am half-inclined to start for town in a day or two. You can write to me by every post, and I will endeavor to satisfy myself in that way until I ascertain what may be my chance of success. But after all, Gertrude, this new caprice of yours is too bad. Look at Mary, she has never tried Somerville as you are trying me, and I warn you, lady mine, that this is the last occasion, the very last, in which I shall submit to your odious despotism."

Gertrude answered by an affectionate smile.

"How you women love to tyranuize," pursued Ernest. "Meek and mild as you seem, you are all alike."

"Except Mary," laughed his listener.

"Not even excepting Mary," retorted her lover. "She is only deferring her impertinence till she can cover it by the dignified authority of a wife, but you have not had the grace to do this."

"And your project, dear Ernest?"

"Is a secret, fair lady, at present, but I will nevertheless be generous enough to confide to you one of its earliest results, should it prove successful. You remember that lovely little retreat which we drove past a few days ago, Gertrude, half cottage and half villa, with its dainty pleasure-grounds and miniature lake? I covet that smiling abode as our home. But I have said nothing on the subject to my father,—who would, as I well know, strain every nerve to gratify me while it remains in the market,—for Mary's portion must be paid, and I am aware, that he could not, without inconvenience, meet so large a demand upon his means at this particular moment, so that all I can do is to trust that it will not find a purchaser until I am prepared to make it mine."

"And had I not been penniless you might at once have accomplished your wish," said Gertrude sadly.

"Now, fie upon you!" exclaimed Ernest, "thus to steal my secret from me, and then to repay me by outraging the delicacy of my affection. One more such regret, Gertrude, and I shall begin to fear that you have not a proper confidence in my love."

"Rather, then, will I be grateful for the poverty which has left you without one doubt," replied the happy girl, as she wiped away the tears which had started to her eyes; "and henceforward I will speak and act as though I were a rich heiress, and privileged to indulge in every species of extravagance. Will that promise satisfy your exacting nature?"

But often, very often, when she found herself once more domesticated beneath the narrow roof of her aunt, did the conversation of that evening recur to her, and never without a pang. Of Ernest's affection she was assured, nor did she fear that even poverty could weaken it, but still she wept over the sacrifices to which he had compelled himself for her sake, and bitterly felt her utter helplessness to lessen them. She was indeed about to give herself to him, a portionless bride, for even the bequest of her aunt she no longer felt to be her own, and it had already been arranged by Ernest that it should be transferred to Miss Warrington, as a tribute of gratitude for the kindness which she had shown the orphan in her hour of need.

Thus, however cheerfully Gertrude might seem to bear the humiliating fact of her poverty, still it revolted her delicacy, and pained her heart. She could not quite forget the resolute refusal with which Mr. Armstrong had in the first instance met the entreaties of his son; and although he had subsequently treated her with paternal kindness, still the mortification of that refusal had left its sting. It was in vain she repeated to herself that all this waste of feeling, situated as she then was, had become worse than idle; still a thousand memories rose up before her, each coupled with its own regret. She was, indeed, an outcast. Even her cousin, the companion of her childhood, had forsaken her—and she was about to enter the home of Mr. Armstrong, as a wife which his generous son had rescued from the cold, wide ocean of the world; without a home, without a friend, and almost without a name.

It was fortunate for Gertrude, that the daily letters of her happy and sanguine lover, overflowing as they were with affection and gladness, and the occupation with which they necessarily provided her, tended to rouse her mind from the morbid state into which it might otherwise have fallen, while the half-playful and half-serious reproaches of his sisters, who found it difficult to forgive her desertion at such a moment, assisted in no slight degree to reconcile her to herself. They declared that everything had gone wrong since she left the Manor-house; that they could come to no decision upon any point without her assistance; and they even endeavored to enlist Miss Warrington in their cause. The rigid old lady, however, proved impracticable, and laid so much stress upon the propriety of her niece remaining under her roof until the very eve of her marriage, that they rather lost ground than gained it, and were compelled once more to submit.

Thus a week passed by, during which Miss Warrington was more erect and sententious than ever. Not a rumor had transpired in the neighborhood, of the great event which was about to occur. Not even the grey-haired curate had a suspicion of the double wedding; although he had already been apprised that his church was to be honored by the presence of the Archdeacon, who being an intimate friend of the Squire, had been invited to perform the ceremony for his daughter; and thus, although the gossips were busy chronicling every movement between the Great House and the humble abode of Miss Warrington, and found ample food for their conjectures, not only in the perpetual transits of the ladies themselves, but even the comings and goings of grooms and waiting-maids, they naturally attributed all this delightful commotion to the approaching marriage of Miss Armstrong; and marvelled that as the proud niece of their neighbor appeared so essential to the "Squire's people," she should have chosen such a moment to return home.

On the tenth morning after her return to Bletchley, two letters instead of one were, to the surprise of Gertrude, put into her hand. For a moment, her heart beat quickly—It must be from Frederic, and after all, she was not quite forgotten. But no, a single glance sufficed; the writing was not his, and the mysterious missive bore the London post-mark. She had a faint idea that she recognized the somewhat quaint and crabbed characters of the superscription, but she could not identify them; and in another instant she laid the letter down, merely marvelling who could have written to her, and soon altogether forgetting the circumstance as she greedily devoured the contents of Ernest's far more interesting epistle.

Even the letter of a lover, however, comes to an end at last, and Gertrude had no sooner for the second time arrived at the conclusion of the three closely-written pages which composed that of Ernest, than she once more remembered the still unopened packet upon the table.

These were its contents.

"Dear Niece,—"My physician informed me yesterday that I am dying, and I felt so perfectly satisfied that he was right that I at once dismissed him, as it is useless to throw money away which is certain to be lost, both principal and interest. I am aware that the fact of an old man's death can be of little consequence to you, and therefore it is only as the brother of your mother that I now write to tell you, that after having lived for so many years alone, I am weak enough to desire not to die alone. I have no relation upon earth but you, or I would not have troubled you upon such an occasion. I enclose a 5l. note. If you consent to come to me, it will pay the expenses of your journey, and if you do not, you may keep it to buy a black gown, if you think proper to wear one when I am gone, out of respect to your mother's memory. If you do come, you must come at once, or you may be too late. I give you the address of my late office. When you reach town, drive there, and they will send a clerk with you to my house, as you might not be able to find it.

"Your uncle and well-wisher,

"WILLIAM SPENCER."

The agitation of Gertrude was excessive, as she rapidly perused the letter of her obdurate relative; but not for a single instant did she hesitate as to the line of conduct she should pursue. She had not, moreover, a moment to lose; the coach by which she had formerly reached Bletchley only made its London-ward journey twice within the week, and was to leave that very day at noon. Hurriedly, therefore, she detailed to Miss Warrington the emergency in which she found herself, and after writing a brief note of regret and explanation to the ladies of the Manor-house, hastily threw together a few indispensable articles of apparel, and aided by the energy of Hannah, found herself at eleven o'clock traversing the well-known meadows, accompanied by a stout lad bearing her portmanteau and carpet-bag, precisely as she had done on the previous occasion.

Yes; thus alone and unattended, save by a fustian-clad village boy, did the future mistress of the Manor-house set forth upon her second melancholy journey, leaving behind her smiling lips and loving hearts, to encounter at best a very uncertain welcome, and to assist once more at the melancholy spectacle of a death-bed. She reached the road-side inn, paid the modest fee of her impromptu page, and then in a large, bleak, chilly room, whose sanded floor, rude chairs, empty grate, and beer-stained table, combined to form the very acme of discomfort, sat down to await the departure of the coach, and for the first time to reflect.

Her thoughts naturally turned on the probable displeasure of Ernest, when he should learn not only the fact, but also the manner of her departure; she felt that his pride would be wounded, and his fears excited by her solitary pilgrimage, but still she did not repent the step which she had taken. The brother of her mother, however harshly he might have acted towards her, had a claim upon her respect and obedience, which she dared not neglect; and even amid her terror of the present, and her dread of the future, she experienced something akin to joy as she remembered that she had still one relative to whom she was not utterly cast off, and to whom she might even yet prove a source of consolation and comfort.

At length, after much preparatory bustle, the dragging of trunks and packages along the stone passages, the loud laughter and louder oaths of a score of idlers and hangers-on, and the shrill voices of women calling to each other, as it appeared to the trembling Gertrude, from every quarter of the building, the horses were at length put to, and to her great delight she found herself, on entering the coach, in the presence of a single fellow traveller, a comely woman of sixty, who, after having uttered a courteous and respectful "good-day" to her new companion, attempted no further conversation, and thus once more left the anxious girl to her own thoughts.

CHAPTER XLII.

NEVERTHELESS the journey was a dreary one, and well calculated to oppress the already saddened heart of Gertrude. Nothing could be more dispiriting than the constant intrusion of strangers, who, after a coarse stare, and a surly greeting, were anxious only for their own accommodation, and careless of the discomfort of those with whom they were brought into temporary contact; the sudden stoppages, accompanied by hurried departures, and the discordant rumbling of heavy trunks overhead, or the still more annoying searches for small parcels, mislaid in some of the numerous pockets dispersed in the interior of the vehicle; the succession of repugnant fumes of food and strong potations, rendered still more inodorous by the closeness of the carriage, and the selfishness of its occupants, who, having fortified themselves against the external air, saw fit, moreover, to insist upon its entire exclusion; the dreary waiting at the doors of road-side houses, where the other passengers descended to make their hurried repasts, for the sole purpose, as it appeared, of subsequently grumbling over their inferiority; and, ultimately, the arrival in town, and in the heart of the city, in the midst of a twilight deepened by fog, and rendered still more terrifying to a novice like Gertrude by the noise of many voices and the tread of many feet.

A hackney-coach was, however, soon procured, and ere long the orphan, with her slender luggage, was on her way to the office to which she had been directed by the letter of her uncle. Hitherto she had borne up bravely, but this last slow and melancholy, and to her mysterious progress, through narrow streets, where the dim lamps failed to throw more than a sickly beam upon the dirt-obscured, and often iron-barred windows of the lofty and frowning houses, totally exhausted her courage; a thousand fantastic doubts and terrors took possession of her; she was utterly alone, in the power of a stranger, of whose probity she had necessarily no assurance, and as she looked eagerly from the window of the foul and rumbling machine in which she was borne along, she could not obtain the most remote idea of the streets she traversed; all were alike, long and dingy, and dark, without one distinguishing feature which could be discerned through the thick and uncertain gloom.

Nor was her situation apparently much improved when, at length, the cumbersome coach drew up beside the narrow pavement of what appeared to be a squalid lane, and the immense mass of capes and handkerchiefs which enveloped the driver appeared beside her, and his hoarse voice inquired if that were the right house. Gertrude trembled in every limb as she declared her utter ignorance upon the subject, and requested that he would inquire of the inmates. The man turned away with a surly and inaudible rejoinder, but he nevertheless obeyed, and, at his summons, the door was opened by a slip-shod woman, whose uncombed hair fell in revolting confusion about her face and who held in her hand an unsnuffed candle which flared and guttered under the action of the chill wind.

The heart of the orphan sank within her as she felt convinced that this could not be the haven she had sought, and for an instant, she felt crushed by the conviction of her forlorn and helpless situation, thus utterly alone in the streets of a great city, amid damp and darkness; but she was soon relieved from this new terror by the approach of the slatternly portress, who, advancing to the side of the carriage, dropped a curtesy, and inquired if Miss would be pleased to alight, adding, that she had just come in time, as Mr. Jackson had already locked all up, and was preparing to go home.

"No, no, I thank you," was the quick rejoinder of Gertrude; "I have not a moment to lose. If it be, as I suppose, Mr. Jackson who is to be good enough to accompany me to my uncle's, have the kindness to tell him that I am ready to proceed at once."

The woman withdrew into the house, and at the termination of a few minutes she reappeared accompanied by a diminutive man of careworn and haggard countenance, who, as he emerged from the dingy passage, was hastily buttoning a shabby and insufficient great coat over a huge bunch of keys. By the light of the flaring candle he accosted Gertrude with a courtesy which was almost obsequious; and, on her reiterating her wish to avoid all further delay, made a quiet bow, and mounted the box beside the coachman.

The poor girl was entirely ignorant whither she was now proceeding, and she had ample opportunity to reflect upon the discomforts of her position ere they arrived in a narrow street at Walworth, which was their place of destination. Here they once more stopped, and the active clerk having hastily descended from his unenviable eminence, and cautiously knocked at the door, announced to Gertrude that she had now reached her uncle's house.

It had by this time become so dark, that, owing to the absence of street lamps, which, as it appeared, were a luxury entirely dispensed with in that immediate neighborhood, the excited and wearied traveller could form no judgment as to the description of residence selected by her uncle; but she did not long remain in doubt; for once more a door was opened to her, and again a female stood upon the threshold, candle in hand, to inquire her business. To this question Mr. Jackson immediately replied in a low, and somewhat deferential tone, after which, he himself opened the coach-door, took possession of the portmanteau and carpet-bag, which he was compelled to deposit in the front room, in order that the young lady might be enabled to pass into the house, and then, while the neat and matronly person who had given them entrance was respectfully ushering her into the same apartment, he advanced, hat in hand, to inquire if he should discharge the coach. Totally unaccustomed to all such arrangements, Gertrude eagerly and thankfully put her purse into his hand, and, while she was making hurried and whispered inquiries as to the state of her uncle, she was once more startled by the sound of a fierce contention without.

"Don't be alarmed, Ma'am," said the good woman with a smile, as, even by the faint light which she carried she saw the cheek of the orphan turn pale; "It is only Mr. Jackson settling with the Jarvey. They are such rogues, that he has been trying to cheat you, as a matter of course, but for once he has met with his match; he must look sharper than ever he did in his life before, if he imposes on Mr. Jackson."

"Oh, I entreat you, give him anything—all that he asks. That outcry will disturb Mr. Spencer."

"Oh, no, Ma'am," was the quiet rejoinder; "I don't think my master will hear it; but if he does, it will do him good. He will be so glad to know that you have not thrown away your money."

The heart of the orphan sank within her; she knew not how to reply to such an assurance, and involuntarily she glanced round the squalid room in which she stood, as if to read in its arrangements some token of its owner's habits. The survey was soon completed. Fire there was none, and the discolored shavings which filled the grate afforded ready evidence that they had long remained undisturbed; a small and well-worn carpet partially covered the floor, and half-a-dozen rush-seated chairs assisted in concealing the remaining portion of the boards; a small round table, furnished with an office inkstand, a few pens, and a torn blotting-book, stood in the centre; and the walls boasted, for all ornament, a folio sheet-almanac fastened to the faded paper by four pins, immediately above the chimney-piece.

Gertrude had already been initiated into the discomforts of genteel penury; but on her arrival at Bletchley she had believed that the home of Miss Warrington was an extreme example of its class, while now she had only to look round her to be convinced, that even by her last change of residence, she had left, not merely positive comfort, but almost luxury behind her.

In an instant the conviction flashed upon her mind, that the helpless old man who had so unexpectedly summoned her to his bed of death had been ruined by one of those hazardous speculations in which he had formerly amassed considerable wealth; and the question trembled upon her tongue, when it was arrested by the re-entrance of Mr. Jackson, upon whose hollow cheek the excitement of his late contention had almost brought a flush, and who smiled a smile of genuine complaceney as he restored the purse of Miss Mortimer, assuring her that he had succeeded so thoroughly, that the rascally coachman had not carried off a farthing more than his fare. It was evident, by his crest-fallen look, as Gertrude answered only by a silent bend of the head, that he had anticipated both thanks and congratulations upon his victory; but he once more became radiant as she placed the last remaining guinea of Mr. Spencer's gift in his hand, and assured him, in her gentlest accents, that she would not fail to inform her uncle how greatly she was indebted to his care.

How difficult it is for those who have once enjoyed affluence, even though it may have been succeeded by comparative penury, and those gnawing doubts and apprehensions which occasionally accompany the disbursement of a crown-piece, to forget their early habits, where they feel they have incurred obligation! and thus it was as Miss Mortimer of Westrum House, rather than as the niece of Miss Warrington, that Gertrude recompensed the services of the astonished old man, who had been her guide through the mysterious wilderness of London. Never, however, was largesse better bestowed; and could the gentle girl have guessed with what a feeling of astonished happiness that poor office drudge trudged homeward to his obscure lodging, to gladden the eyes of his sickly wife and ill-clad children by the sight of that golden coin, she would have shed tears of delight. When he took his leave, the female attendant, after apologizing to her new inmate for leaving her in the dark for a few instants, as she had no other candle, bolted and barred the door of the house as carefully as though it had closed over the entrance of the jewel-cave of Aladdin, and then, hastily returning, deposited the light upon the table, and, at the request of Gertrude, went to inform the sick man of her arrival.

Again the orphan looked around her in utter sadness. It must be as she had guessed, and the rich relative who had abandoned his family because he could not endure to share his wealth with them, had lived to see it melt away into absolute penury, and perhaps to die amid privation and regret. And then another thought flashed upon her. Miss Warrington as yet knew nothing of the generous intentions of Ernest in her behalf, and, consequently, she should commit no injustice if she proposed to him to divide Mrs. Mortimer's bequest between her aunt and the equally needy brother of her mother. It was little, as she sorrowfully felt, to offer to either, and thus divided, became even less worthy of their acceptance; but it was her all, and it would suffice to convince them that she was not selfishly indifferent to their welfare.

Feeling more happy than she had done since she left Bletchley, Gertrude rose from her seat, and was disencumbering herself of her heavy travelling cloak, when the servant reappeared, and offered to conduct her to the chamber of her unele, who was prepared to see her.

Overcome by fatigue and anxiety, the orphan felt her knees tremble as she preceded the woman up a narrow and unearpeted flight of stairs, and then paused beside a door which stood partially open.

"Walk in, Ma'am, if you please," was whispered in her ear; "that's master's room."

And Gertrude obeyed.

The same solitary candle by which she had been received on her arrival still lent its friendly light, which, faint though it was, enabled her to discover every detail of the closet-like apartment of the dying man. One of those odious inventions called fire-baskets stood in the grate, where a feeble flame was flickering beneath a suffocating clump of coke; a table of unpainted deal was drawn near the hearth with a chair beside it, and upon it stood a spoutless jug and a glass tumbler. A large hair trunk, which had evidently long afforded a banquet to the moths, supplied the place of drawers, and a comfortless tent-bedstead, with curtains so scanty that they refused to meet on either side, occupied the upper end of the room, and partially obscured the window.

Upon this squalid bed lay the worshipper of Mammon, beneath a thin and sullied coverlet; one hand under his head, which was only protected from the chill night air by a profusion of snow-white hair which fell over the pillow, and the other resting upon a walking-cane, that had evidently been left purposely within his reach.

"So you are come, are you?" growled a voice which would have been harsh had not weakness rendered it feeble, as Gertrude moved noiselessly across the floor: "Thank you for that at least." And the bony fingers quitted for an instant the head of the cane, and were extended to her as she reached the bed-side: "Come to see me die—not in a palace—not in a palace, as perhaps you expected, but like an honest man, under a quiet roof, never disturbed by debts or duns."

"Do not despair, sir," said Gertrude softly, "you require care, and I am very grateful to you for having given me the opportunity of becoming your nurse. Young as I am, I am no stranger to a sick room."

"All the better—all the better," was the ungracious rejoinder; "no woman has a right to be so. But sit down, sit down; why do you stand!"

Gertrude possessed herself of the solitary chair, and placed it near the sick man's pillow.

"And you, Mrs. Sharp," continued the invalid in the same low growl, "go and arrange Miss Mortimer's room. Have you borrowed a bolster as I told you?"

"Yes, sir," replied the woman with a slight blush.

"Very well, go then; take the candle with you. We can talk as well in the dark."

Mrs. Sharp curtseyed in silence, took up the brass candlestick, and disappeared. Gertrude remained in darkness with her scarce seen, and dreaded relative.

"And now tell me—tell me," whispered the sick man, when they were thus alone together, "tell me, niece, what has your journey cost you."

"Your generosity, sir, more than supplied my wants."

"Yes, yes; you could not spend five pounds in coming here, unless you sowed silver by the road-side, that it might bring forth gold. London was the trial, child; London, I know it. I have lived in London, boy and man, for sixty years, and now and then they have tried to cheat me. Tried—do you mark me—tried, but never succeeded!" And through the darkness sounded a low chuckle, as the sick man turned abruptly upon the pillow. "I protected you against the tricks of London, when I put you under the care of Jackson—Jackson is as keen as a file, but has never had wit enough to make his fortune. He was too weak to grapple with the world, and to hold what he had clutched. It requires wit—ay, and wisdom too—when a man has once become rich to enable him to remain so, and not suffer his honest gains to escape him;" and full of the image which he had conjured up, the wretched mammon-lover raised his bony arm in the air, and unclosing his clenched hand, spread wide his attenuated fingers, as though a shower of gold-dust were evaporating from between them.

The poor girl shrank before this sudden burst of factitious energy, although its most hideous feature was spared to her by the obscurity around them, and anxious to evade all reply to such an observation, she said timidly,—

"You were speaking of Mr. Jackson, sir."

"True," was the prompt reply, as her uncle once more relapsed into sudden calm: "It is idle to talk to you of what you cannot understand. I was talking of Jackson, telling you that he had been a fool, who never knew how to avail himself of his natural capabilities. But, by the bye—what's your name, child? I have forgotten."

"Gertrude, sir," said the poor girl almost choked by her tears.

"Ah, yes, Gertrude, I remember now; your mother was fond of novel reading, and found the name there, no doubt; but no matter. I say, Gertrude, you did not give Jackson anything, I hope? He's in constant employment; sixty pounds a-year, and only four children. With proper management, sixty pounds a-year will go a great way, and where there are no appearances to keep up—and what appearances can be expected from the junior clerk of a mercantile house?—it is a very comfortable income."

Gertrude made no reply.

"And so Mrs. Mortimer left you 2,000*l.*, child?" pursued the sinking gold-worshipper; "2,000*l.*!! Do you know that millions have been made out of the fiftieth part of 2,000*l.* And what have you done with such a sum of money?"

"Will you forgive me, my dear sir, if I venture to tell you what I should rejoice in doing with a part of it?"

"Oh, then, it is not all gone!" said the eager voice, as the bony fingers again expanded themselves, and sought in darkness for the hand of Gertrude, which they clasped in their skeleton pressure; "Then it is not all gone! And I may live long enough to get you good interest for it; unquestionable security; you may trust me. But be saving, Gertrude, be saving. 'Take care of the pence, and the pounds will take care of themselves,' as Poor Richard says. But what do you want to do with a part of it, child? What can you know about money-matters? What nonsense have you got into your silly woman's head?"

"I scarcely know how to tell you, sir, but I had better confess that when I received your letter I believed you to be living in affluence, if not in splendor."

"I dare be sworn you did!" growled out the harsh voice, and the clasp of the withered hand was suddenly withdrawn.

"That idea alone," pursued the orphan undismayed by the effect of her frank confession, "made me hesitate for a moment in obeying your summons; for I felt that where you could command every comfort and every care, my presence would avail but little; while there were circumstances which rendered me anxious not to abandon my home at this particular crisis. Now, however, I am indeed grateful that I stifled the voice of my selfishness, for since I entered your house, I feel that I may not be utterly useless; that I may be enabled to act towards you the part of a child, and that, with your permission, I may in a slight, although unfortunately a very slight degree, repair the injustice of that fortune which I am painfully aware has deserted you, at the very moment when its favors were the most needed."

"And what can you give me, should I live?" murmured the dying man, even more huskily than he had yet spoken.

"Little, too little, I fear to secure to you all the comforts of existence," replied Gertrude sadly, "but still enough to protect you from want."

"And what do you propose to live upon yourself?"

The orphan blushed, although all was dark about her. "I should, perhaps, already have explained to you, my dear sir," she almost whispered, "that I am about to become a wife."

"The wife of whom, Gertrude Mortimer?" loudly demanded the sick man, aroused into violent although transitory energy: "Beware how you suffer yourself to forget, that although an almost penniless orphan, you are the daughter of my sister."

"I do not shrink before the warning," was the proud reply: "I am betrothed to the only son of Mr. Armstrong of Bletchley House."

Although Gertrude could not see the action, she could hear the dry and fevered palms of the invalid clasp together, and something like a laugh mingle with the hard and laboring cough which ploughed his chest.

"And so," he said at length, "You can help me to live? and I have toiled for years only to be indebted at last to a puny and love-sick girl, who is ignorant of the value of what she gives up so readily! But I am glad that you are to marry an Armstrong, child, very glad. I know their history—part of it is written in bonds and post-obits,—but better days are coming for the Armstrongs, better days; and again I say that I am glad of it. Gold is like the loadstone, girl; only it acts and reacts upon itself. Did you ever see a jewelled dowager seat herself at a card table, that all the gold did not fly to her ringed fingers, from those of the poor and proud adversary who had dared to breast her in the cunning strife? Did you ever see the great speculator pitted against the trembling novice in some fourth-rate venture, that the Leviathan did not swallow the gudgeon? No, no; gold loves gold, child. The sight of it is pleasant; the ring of it is sonorous; the weight of it is satisfactory: the man who has once posessed gold, good, sterling gold, knows its real value, and cannot be cheated by a counterfeit. To him it is food and fuel, home and wife, and children, costly raiment, and proud station. If you could raise again the walls and palaces of Tyre and Sidon, and Carthage and Palmyra, do you know what all their stones would cry aloud in honor of their resurrection? Nothing but gold." And the dying man sank back, panting and exhausted upon his pillow.

Gertrude felt very wretched. Here lay beside her a worshipper of Mammon, evidently excluded from the sordid temple of his cherished deity at the eleventh hour, and yet so fearfully imbued with the one and only idolatry of a long life, that he could not divest himself of his old, and now worse than idle associations.

CHAPTER XLIII.

"And now tell me, child," muttered the wretched man after a pause, "have you brought money enough with you to take you home after all is over here? You had better go back at once when I am gone, for London is a sad place, a very sad place, fit only for those who do not know the value of what they squander. Are you provided with money to take you back?"

"I am, sir," said Gertrude, more and more saddened by the conviction that her uncle could converse upon no other than his one darling theme: "and indeed I blush to have already intruded so greatly upon your generosity."

"That is right," replied the gold-worshipper, evidently much relieved by the assurance; "And now, while we are alone, let me tell you at once that here, in a pocket-book under my pillow, you will find a 20*l.* note. That is to bury me, child. A sad waste of money, when, after all, we need only a few planks nailed together, and a deep hole dug to hide us away in; but we all have our weaknesses, and I wish to be put into the ground like a gentleman. So it must all be spent; do you hear me, Gertrude? All—that I may have the satisfaction of knowing that the thing was done handsomely. Jackson will follow me, and it will be a fine day's work for him; the scarf, and hatband, and gloves, will be a little fortune, for I know well from experience, that they can be turned to good account. He will have earned them, however, for I have given directions that he shall come here and arrange everything. I cannot depend on you; they would rob and cheat you on all hands; while Jackson knows the world, and trusts it as little as I do. Nevertheless, make him show you the account. Twenty pounds is a large sum to expend at once, and a great deal ought to be done with it."

"I will endeavor to follow all your directions, Sir; but would it not also be prudent to make some arrangements in contemplation of a happier result to your illness than you appear to anticipate? These gloomy forebodings can only tend to aggravate your sufferings."

"Gloomy forebodings!" echoed the old man in a tone of sarcastic indignation, "Who has told you that I have any gloomy forebodings? Do you suppose that I am afraid to die?"

"I sincerely trust not, Sir."

"Well, then, you may be at ease upon that point. Afraid to die! Pshaw! the very idea is sickening. What have I left to live for? Are you not aware that I have been compelled to give up business; and that I am indebted, even for the services of Jackson, to the courtesy of my successor?"

"I had indeed suspected, on my arrival here, that such was probably the case."

"You are a shrewd observer it seems, girl; and yet you fancy that I am afraid to die. What is the world to me now, when I have nothing left to do in it? However, if I should live, it appears that you have provided for my wants," and again the exulting chuckle was faintly audible; "but never fear, never fear, all is nearly over with me, and I shall not burden you long."

"You do me injustice, Sir, if you suppose——"

"I suppose nothing, child; I am a man of facts—honest, straightforward, plain facts. My whole life has been one fact—one dry, hard fact—one palpable and tangible principle."

"I was only about to assure you, Sir——"

"You had already done better, girl, you had offered me money, which will go farther than all the assurances in the world; and I hate sentiment."

Fortunately for Gertrude the staid attendant of her uncle entered as he ceased speaking, and thus obviated the necessity of any reply. After having carefully deposited her candle upon the table, she knelt down, and with a piece of stout iron-wire attempted to stir into something like a blaze the dull and cheerless handful of fuel in the wretched fireplace; but, even cautious as she was, the noise grated upon the ear of the sick man, who, drawing aside the miserable apology for a curtain which veiled the head of his bed, exclaimed eagerly,—

"Gently, Mrs. Sharp, gently. How often have I told you that coals are the precious jewels of the people? It is by no means cold, by no means cold," he repeated, as he withdrew his arm under the scanty coverlid when the chill air of the little chamber fell upon it; "and coals are dear, very dear, this winter."

"It is the nasty coke, Sir, that will not catch," said the housekeeper in a tone of respectful remonstrance.

"All the better, Mrs. Sharp, all the better," was the tart rejoinder. "Half the fires that take place in London are occasioned by that injudicious use of the poker which appears to be an epidemic with your sex. Let the coke alone, it crackles and burns away gently, and nothing more is necessary. And now, what have you got to give Miss Mortimer? She may, perhaps, be hungry after her journey."

"We have a cold mutton-chop in the house, Sir."

"Good, good, nothing is so wholesome as mutton; and cold meat after fatigue is always preferable to hot. Go and sup, child, and then let me see you again."

"I thank you, my dear Sir," said the unhappy Gertrude; "but I have no appetite."

"All the better," said the sick man with a smile; "all the better. Meat is heavy at night, and might spoil your rest. Do as you please, my dear, do as you please. Mrs. Sharp will obey your orders. And now give me some water, Mrs. Sharp, I am thirsty."

"Water, Sir!" exclaimed Gertrude earnestly; "Surely you will not run the risk of drinking water in your present weak state!"

The miserable invalid made no reply until the quiet matron had poured a glass of water from the dilapidated jug, and placed it in his hand, then, after having swallowed a portion of its contents, he said ironically; "And why should I not drink water? Is it not the natural beverage bestowed upon us by nature? Beer is privileged poison; tea is costly, and I have a pump in my yard, child, for which I have already paid a tax. Why should I not drink water?"

"I would entreat for myself, however, a cup of tea," said Gertrude, who could no longer repress her tears; "for I begin to feel that I am utterly exhausted."

"Do you hear, Mrs. Sharp?" asked the sick man peevishly. "Miss Mortimer wishes for tea; and, as that is the ease, you may bring me some also; but coffee is cheaper, coffee is cheaper."

"Coffee will be equally acceptable to me, my dear Sir," gasped Gertrude.

"Mrs. Sharp! Mrs. Sharp!" almost screamed the wretched sufferer from his squalid bed; for the delighted attendant had hurried from the room, carrying off with her once more the solitary candle, and had already reached the head of the stairs; "Miss Mortimer will take coffee. Measure it carefully, for should I get well again (and there is no knowing what may occur), I shall not overlook any waste. Miss Mortimer will take coffee, and, perhaps, some bread and butter."

The female functionary replied by the conventional "Very well, Sir," and rapidly descended the stairs; while the orphan, once more alone in the darkness with her unhappy relative, instead of pursuing the conversation, sat and retraced in her mind's eye every feature of the sharp thin face which lay upon the pillow beside her.

One glance had sufficed to show that, in his youth, Mr. Spencer must have been strikingly handsome. The outline of his features was regular and fine, although now pinched and meagre from disease, and she was almost tempted to add—from famine. A hectic circle burnt and glowed upon his cheek; but his forehead was as white as marble, his eyes encircled by a dark ring, and his narrow lips parched and livid. The expression of his eyes was half cunning and half suspicious, and betrayed a nature which his silence might otherwise have concealed; while the continued clutching of his fingers, fastening as it seemed upon some visionary treasure, and the continued restlessness visible in his whole person, told that the spirit within was ill at ease.

Not a vestige of that beautiful placidity and inward peace which make age so venerable and so attracting, drew the heart of the spectator to Mr. Spencer, even in his suffering. The sympathy which he had recklessly cast from him during the course of a long life could not be awakened by the still stern and eager selfishness predominant in every word and look; and even while Gertrude anxiously endeavored to cheat herself into the belief that she should, in time, feel for him the affection due to so near a relative, she was, nevertheless, conscious of a sentiment of repulsion which she could not overcome.

The silence was soon broken by the sick man, to whom a moment's quiet appeared burdensome; but it was evident that he was greatly weakened by the exertion of the past hour.

"You will soon have some amusement, child," he said, as he turned his head heavily towards her: "The paper will be here in a short time. I cannot live without a paper, and I get it cheap from a neighbor by waiting till the evening. All I shall ask you to read to me is the city article, I care nothing about polities, or Old Bailey reports. The money market is the only market worth watching, and when you have read that, you can follow your own fancy as to the rest. But you must be quick, for they call for it again in half-an-hour. I made that arrangement with them," he added, dropping his voice still lower, until it sunk into a confidential whisper, "to prevent Mrs. Sharp from sitting up to read, and burning the candle to waste, for Mrs. Sharp has had an education, and used to bring books and read while she sat by my bedside. Books, indeed! when she might have been repairing my linen, or washing my clothes. I soon sent the books out of the house," and the wretched man laughed once more his low, bitter, and heartless laugh.

The coffee was soon afterwards announced, and at the bidding of her uncle, Gertrude rose and followed the servant down stairs, once more leaving him in the darkness, and alone. She was miserable, but she feared to betray all the bitterness of her feelings before a stranger and a menial, and, consequently, she repressed her tears, and seated herself at the tea-table with one of those forced smiles which are infinitely more painful to witness than any burst of grief.

Comfortless, indeed, was the meal prepared for the wearied and exhausted girl, but she eagerly accepted the steaming coffee which was offered to her, and even endeavored to compel herself to partake of the uninviting bread which was its accompaniment. This last effort proved, however, beyond her strength, and a thick sob arrested the unpalatable morsel ere she could swallow it.

"Let it come, Ma'am, let it come," said the sympathising woman who stood beside her, "it will do you good to cry, and well you may, poor lady. Do not try to stop your tears, you will be better able to bear up afterwards, and I shall be no restraint upon you, for I am going to take my master his cup of coffee. I must water it a little first, however," continued the worthy Mrs. Sharp, as if speaking to herself, "or the poor gentleman will fancy that he is going to the workhouse." And, taking the kettle from the hob on which she had placed it, although there was no fire in the grate, she half filled it with water, and, then, adding the coffee, disappeared steadily in the darkness, as if long habit had rendered her independent of such a consideration.

And when she was once more alone, Gertrude wept, indeed. For a time, the smiling future which was beckoning her on, was utterly forgotten, and she lived only in the cheerless present. She cared not for the poverty of her uncle, she would not have shrunk from any privations, but his narrow and sordid spirit crushed her to the very earth. Not a vestige of that becoming pride and moral independence which would so well have graced his adversity, and recalled the habits and feeling of former days, appeared to have survived his pecuniary ruin; he had evidently sunk with his fortunes, and still clung with a childish pertinacity, to the wealth that he had lost.

The orphan felt her fearful responsibility, she felt how much and solemnly it behoved her to awaken him to a better and a more befitting state of mind; but she could not conceal from herself all the difficulty of her task. How was she to enforce the necessity of a higher and a holier worship—the worship of humility, and self-abnegation—upon one who, like the epileptic maniac, saw everything tinged with the yellow hue of gold? And yet the effort must be made. She must not suffer him, because he had lost his all in this world, blindly to put from him the promises of the world to come; and therefore humbly, and with a deep sense of her own incapacity, she resolved to make an attempt to inspire him with higher and holier hopes.

Poor Gertrude! She had yet to learn that avarice is in itself a religion, and that when once it has fixed its fiery clutch upon the human heart, that heart is evermore preyed upon by the one demon-flame, and the fearful tragedy of the fabled Hall of Eblis is perpetually enacted upon earth. The idol may indeed be consumed upon its shrine, but the infatuated worshipper will still kneel before the empty altar, and pour out his orisons to the memory of the vanished deity.

It was not long ere the attendant returned, and the orphan having wiped away her tears, felt the presence of a fellow-being almost a relief. She, moreover, had some misgivings as to the remaining pecuniary resources of her uncle, which it was expedient either to confirm or to remove, in order that she might know how to act, and accordingly, she determined to question the staid-looking woman who so quietly and resignedly served him, and thus to ascertain, if possible, the exact position of his affairs.

Having once arrived at this determination, she desired Mrs. Sharp, on her re-appearance, to reply frankly to her inquiries; a request with which the matron readily and respectfully complied.

"I believe my master to be a ruined man, Ma'am," she said, "although not actually destitute. I am the widow of one of his late clerks, and to me he has always been just, even if not generous, but he is less so to himself, and it has been with the greatest difficulty that I have induced him to take sufficient sustenance to preserve life. He cannot last long, and yet you see the wretchedness in which he is content to pass the last few weeks of his existence. Before he thought of inviting you here, Ma'am, I ventured once or twice to propose to him that I should engage some young girl at low wages, to do the drudgery of the house, in order that I might devote my time exclusively to him, but he resolutely refused, and I have been compelled in consequence to leave him hour after hour alone on his sick bed. I should not have cared so much for this, could he have rung me up when he required my services, but we have not a bell in the place, and although I substituted the cane which you must have seen near him, it has frequently happened that he has knocked upon the floor for several minutes before I heard him, and I have found him faint and exhausted from the exertion, and almost believed him for a moment to be dying."

"But tell me, Mrs. Sharp, tell me honestly," urged the unhappy Gertrude, "this state of almost starvation in which I find you, can it indeed be necessary?"

"I really cannot say, Ma'am, but I'm afraid so. As regards myself, Mr. Spencer has always paid my salary with the greatest punctuality, but I will not conceal from you, that a portion of it has almost always been spent in purchasing trifles for his comfort which I have been obliged to tell him were presents from my friends, or I do believe that he would have died long ago of actual starvation."

The tears of Gertrude flowed afresh. "My poor uncle!" she sobbed out, "and yet he was once wealthy."

"Yes, Ma'am, and I have been even told, very rich, although he never lived like a rich man, but after the death of my husband, I saw little of him for some time, until he proposed to me that I should become his housekeeper, an offer, which, as I was totally dependant on my friends, I readily accepted."

"I thank you, Mrs. Sharp, for your candor," said the orphan, "and now, we must act in concert and endeavor to render his remnant of life more tolerable. My own resources are scanty, it is true, but they are sufficient for the purpose. Moreover, under the circumstances, I feel it a duty to expend upon his comfort the sum which he forwarded for my journey, and which must have made a cruel inroad upon his scanty means."

"I fear it did, Ma'am, for the forwarding of that money delayed his letter for several days. He even shed tears as he folded it, declaring that should he die before your arrival, he should have ended his life by an act of folly. But now you are come, Ma'am, all will be right, and he already seems more happy in his mind."

Thus instructed, Gertrude hastened to make sundry petty but well-judged arrangements, all tending to the comfort of the sick man, which the housekeeper gladly undertook to realise, and she was still involved in such considerations when a knock at the door summoned Mrs. Sharp to receive the paper, for which, as she remarked, her master must have long been anxiously looking out, from its unusual delay. Nor was she wrong in her conjecture, for she had scarcely returned to the parlor, when the sound of the cane upon the uncarpeted floor of Mr. Spencer's room, announced that he was aware of its arrival, and impatient for his daily luxury.

Gertrude accordingly took possession of the unsavory journal, which, reeking with the smell of tobacco, and fouled by the touch of unwashed fingers, betrayed its tavern origin, and followed by the housekeeper with the ubiquitous candle, hastened to the sick room.

"Good girl, good girl," said the invalid eagerly, "now come close to me, and read very slowly, slowly, that I may be able to understand you."

Gertrude was already repaid for her alacrity. The deal table was drawn nearer to the bed, and the candle placed upon it. The dying man raised himself upon the pillow, an eager expression lighted his dim eyes for an instant. The hand which clutched the pocket-book still remained buried beneath his head, but the other, relaxing its hold upon the cane, wandered over the bed-clothes, and the fingers occasionally traced with wonderful rapidity the figures announced by Gertrude as she read.

"Foreign securities commanded no great attention to-day," she commenced, carefully accenting every syllable.

"Just as it should be," growled the listener, "look at home, is the wisest motto."

"Consols began at 99, and left off at 101 3-8.

"What's that?—What's that?" asked her uncle with a sudden enery.

Gertrude repeated the quotation.

"Good, good," he murmured almost inarticulately, "things are mending. I wish I had 100,000*l.* to sell out."

Despite this species of running commentary, however, the orphan at length reached the termination of her dreary task; and declining the proposal of her host that she should continue the perusal of the inodious sheet for her own private gratification, she ventured to urge her state of fatigue, and to request permission to retire to rest.

Nothing could be more consonant with the wishes of her uncle. Gertrude once withdrawn, Mrs. Sharp might also immediately follow, and the candle be extinguished. It was therefore with something like warmth that he bade her good night, and saw her retreat to the wretched and pillowless bed, upon which she no sooner threw herself, than, exhausted both in mind and body, she had her head upon the borrowed bolster, and sank into a deep, and happily, a dreamless sleep, with the breath of prayer upon her lips.

CHAPTER XLIV.

Nothing could exceed the annoyance of Mortimer, when as he was one morning crossing the lawn, gun in hand, preparatory to a day's shooting, he was passed by a travelling chaise and four, in which he recognised Sir Horace Trevor. Already dissatisfied with the circle which had assembled at his house, and wearied by the coquetry and frivolity of which he was a perpetual witness, he fairly lost his temper, and felt half inclined to warn the intruder from his premises. A moment's reflection sufficed, however, to show him his folly. Had he not already, by his supineness, authorized the presence of several individuals almost equally obnoxious to him? And how could he consequently decline to receive his wife's relation? Nevertheless he was irritated and annoyed, he had always hated this man, and here he was once more bearding him under his own roof. Full of angry and impatient emotions, he forgot for a moment the errand upon which he had set forth, and plunged into the shrubbery, as if to shut out at once all sight of a home which had latterly become odious to him.

Suddenly the happy laughter of his child, fell upon his ear, and, like the harp of David before Saul, it sufficed to restore him to composure. It was therefore almost with a smile that he hurried on, in order to embrace his darling, and still the loud and ringing sound of her artless mirth came buoyantly upon the breeze. It was yet early, and he assuredly was ill-prepared to encounter any one save the infant and its nurse, when at an abrupt turn in the path, he saw before him Mrs. Lamerly, seated upon the grass under a sycamore, with her rich chestnut hair falling in showers about her, and his little girl busy in tangling the gleaming tresses with her fairy fingers.

Mortimer would have retreated, but the child had already heard his step, and, pausing for a moment in her sport, recognised him with a scream of delight. There was consequently no means of avoiding the encounter, and after the utterance of a brief greeting, and the expression of his surprise at finding his fair guest so early risen, he rested his gun against a tree at a little distance from the group, and threw himself down upon the turf beside them.

Despite his dislike of the coquetish widow, Mortimer could not remain altogether insensible to the kindness which she lavished upon his heart's idol, and on the present occasion she looked so extremely pretty amid the disorder produced by her indulgence to the child; the golden waves of her hair glimmered so brightly in the sunshine; her wrapping-gown of white muslin, designed so modestly, and yet so perfectly, the outline of her small but faultless figure; the little foot which, outstretched a few inches beyond the border of her dress, lay imbedded in a rich frame-work of mossy turf, was so exquisitely minute and well-proportioned; her fair cheek was so softly flushed by her exertions, and her large eyes were so "darkly, deeply, beautifully blue," as she looked up at him, half in confusion, and half in merriment, that he began to marvel how he could so long have remained insensible to her attractions.

"But where is Harris?" he asked as the child, after having received and returned his caress, once more extended its little arms to its playfellow, and pursued its former amusement.

"Oh, we dispense with Mrs. Harris's attendance when we are bent upon a frolic, do we not, Eva?" lisped the ingenuous beauty, as she clasped the little girl to her breast, so suddenly as to cover the face of Mortimer for an instant with lr long and perfumed tresses; "and we are it bound to tolerate the intrusion of papa. We al an hour in the morning before mamma her friends have left their dressing-rooms, order to be entirely alone, and it is too bad at our solitude should be invaded by gentlen in leather gaiters and velveteen jacket. e must select another play-ground, my pretty ra."

"You are quite right Mrs. Lamerly," said ortimer, apologetically; "mine is certainly no tire in which to present myself before one of y wife's guests, but you will at once find my cuse in the fact that I could not possibly antipate this meeting."

"Oh, you are quite forgiven," laughed the dy as she affected to be anxious to gather gether her scattered tresses; an attempt hich was, however, frustrated by an impaent cry from the child, "for it must be conssed that I am somewhat in the same preeament, and not altogether in a presentable stume. We must therefore sign a mutual uce, and promise to behave more prettily in ublic."

"One of us, at least, will not succeed in looking more prettily," replied Mortimer, scarcely onscious of what he said, but inadvertently ttering his conviction at the moment; "and hen I consider from how kind, how very kind motive you have suffered yourself thus to be urprised in your present picturesque state of isarray, I should be ungrateful indeed were I ot to appreciate all its attractions."

"Now, fie upon you for a flatterer, Mr. Mortimer," was the retort of the fair widow; "I hall really tell Sybil!"

"Tell Sybil!" repeated Frederic between his enched teeth, and a sarcastic smile hovered for n instant about his mouth, which, transient as t was, did not, nevertheless, escape the quick ye of his companion, "you were one of Syil's earliest friends, and must be quite aware hat I shall be easily forgiven."

"I can scarcely agree with you," said, or rather murmured Mrs. Lamerly, as she bent down and pressed her lips to the rosy cheek of the child, which, wearied at length with its sport, was falling asleep upon her encircling arm; "Even knowing what I know, I cannot believe it."

"And what do you know?" asked Frederic abruptly.

"Oh, nothing, nothing, at least, which should bring such a scowl upon your brow. Sybil, as an unmarried woman, may have been fickle, capricious, perhaps even what the naughty, ill-natured world calls a coquette, but now, of course, all that is over. The feelings of a wife are so different. Compelled to act so as to place her above all reproach, she is naturally jealous of her prerogatives."

"You are an able advocate for the unsullied purity of wives," said Frederic, with a sarcasm which even at that moment he could not control.

"Certainly I am," replied the lady, wholly unmoved by the tone in which the observation had been uttered; "my good friend the Margrave often used to tell poor Augustus that he could not be too grateful to me for all the care I took of his interests, and the sacrifices which I was always ready to make for his benefit, and although this praise was perhaps a little partial and exaggerated, still it gives me some right to suppose that I am not altogether ignorant on such a subject."

"And so my fair Sybil was somewhat of a coquette in her youth, eh, Mrs. Lamerly? To be candid with you, I had already suspected as much. A handsome woman, you know, has so many temptations to a little levity."

"To be sure she has," readily conceded the intimate friend of the married beauty; "and then Sybil was so very handsome, and so much admired, that it is not to be wondered at if she did get herself a little talked of. For my part, I believe it is impossible for any one who is even commonly attractive to escape."

"No doubt of it," replied Mortimer with a saturnine smile; "pretty women are the natural prey of malevolence and slander. There are degrees, however, even of scandal, and so long as nothing can be adduced against them beyond a little harmless coquetry, why, there is not much mischief done."

"True," replied his companion, as if lost for a moment in her own reflections; "but the line to be drawn between coquetry and—and—impropriety, is so extremely fine—such a mere hair's breadth—that, like the bridge of El Sirat, by which the Mahommedans are to pass into heaven, it is somewhat difficult to avoid treading over on one side or the other."

"Aptly illustrated!" said Mortimer, as he swept back one of the long golden tresses of the lady, in order to possess himself of the chubby little hand of the sleeping child, a movement which brought him still closer to the side of the apparently unconscious widow. "Very ably illustrated! We should indeed be merciful to those who lose their footing, even if we cannot save them. But to return to Sybil. You have known her many years?"

"We were girls together."

"And you are acquainted with her cousin, Sir Horace Trevor, perhaps?"

"Oh yes;" and Mrs. Lamerly laughed an equivocal laugh which rang even to the depths of Mortimer's spirits.

"He loved her, I believe?"

"To be sure he did, or he would not have sought to marry her."

"I almost wonder that so handsome and fashionable a man should not have prevailed."

"For shame, Mr. Mortimer," said the widow with a pretty display of childish indignation, as she struck his hand lightly with her slight and ungloved fingers: "For shame; you are trying to make me tell tales out of school."

"Why should I?" asked Frederic, looking into her face with one of those smiles by which men generally retort the condescending familiarities of the other sex; "I have the whole romance by heart. Fierce love on the part of the gentleman; negative encouragement on that of the lady; a proposal on one hand, and a refusal on the other. You see I have nothing to learn."

"Indeed!" was the ambiguous rejoinder;

"and so you consider that to be a romance worthy of an acknowledged beauty? Why, my dear sir, I could weave a better for the gawky daughter of a village curate."

"Never mind the curate's daughter, but indulge me with one according to your own view of things. Something pretty, piquant, and peculiar. I adore love-stories."

It was a strange, almost a frightful look, which Mrs. Lamerly turned upon her companion. There was a mocking triumph in her eye, which darkened its pupil until it became almost purple, and an expression of eagerness in the dilated nostril and quivering lip that added to its fierceness, but it passed away as rapidly as it had risen, and, bending over the child, she said simply,—

"I have no imagination."

"I do not ask you to imagine anything; you know the world so well, and must have such a store of memories."

"Do you suspect that I could be guilty of treachery?"

"I suspect nothing, but, as my meeting with you this morning has marred my sport for the day, I feel that you owe me some compensation."

"You seem to forget that you have given me great cause to complain of you."

"I?"

"Yes, undoubtedly. As Sybil's most familiar friend, I had a right to expect at your hands far greater courtesy than you have shown me."

"My dear Mrs. Lamerly," said Frederic, as he took her hand and retained it, despite a slight, a very slight struggle for its release; "I am not a fashionable man, and always approach my wife's friends with caution."

"How incorrigible you are!" was the smiling reply; "You always will misunderstand everything. To hear you, any one would really imagine that I wanted you to make love to me."

"That would be very easy, and very pleasant," remarked Mortimer.

"Upon my word you are too bad, and I will not allow it," said the widow, releasing her hand from that of her companion; "so in order to punish you, I shall leave you to yourself," and, gently placing the little girl upon her lap, she began to collect her scattered hair, as if to enable her to put her threat into execution.

"Be careful, Mrs. Lamerly," exclaimed Mortimer, springing from the ground; "You will awaken Eva. Allow me to act as your soubrette. I have a strong arm and a light hand; you shall see how well I can acquit myself."

"How very incorrect, Mr. Mortimer!"

"What can you mean? Can anything be more simple? Does not the child prevent you from rendering yourself this service? and is not that child mine? What glorious hair!" he continued, as he gathered it up, and endeavored to bind it round her small and well shaped head; "It is really the shower of Danae realised."

"What nonsense!" pouted the widow.

"It is a sin to torture it in such a way," pursued Frederic; "Were you my wife, I should compel you to defy conventionalities, and to wear it a la Magdelaine."

A slight suffusion rose to the brow of the lady.

"There, that will do, Mr. Mortimer," she said peevishly; "now give me my bonnet, and let me return to the house."

"There is the bonnet," replied Frederic, once more throwing himself down beside her; "but I cannot suffer you to leave me without the promised love-tale."

"I made no promise," said the lady, still only half appeased.

"Be generous, then, and act as though you had done so. Look round; can any spot be more appropriate for such a purpose? Come now, I will prompt you—'Once upon a time'"—

"Be it so," murmured Mrs. Lamerly, as a transient shadow passed across her brow, "'Once upon a time,' then—since that is the fashion in which I am to commence—when I was quite a girl—But no, I am in no mood for story-telling this morning, and moreover, what do you wish to know?"

"All that you will confide to me."

"You deserve nothing at my hands."

"I will hereafter endeavor to do so."

"Well, then, I will be equally generous. Trust not Sybil too far—"

"Ha!—"

"You are, however, perfectly safe at present. She despises the fops and roués by whom she is now surrounded."

"And if her cousin were to arrive?"

"What cousin?"

"Trevor."

"Oh, yes, I had forgotten that Trevor was her cousin," said the simple beauty, playing with a tuft of wild anemones which grew beside her; "I have such a bad memory. Why, if Sir Horace were indeed to pay you a visit—There would be nothing surprising, you know, in such an arrangement between relations—it might be as well to remember that the iron which has already been ignited heats the most easily. But no, no, he will not come here. And besides, even if he should, why should he come only to renew his attachment to Sybil? Lady Clara knows him, though, to be sure, he detests her—that, I will do him the justice to say, and I know him—just as I know Lord John, and a score of other men about town—but I have not the vanity to believe that I can be attractive enough to tear him from the dear delights of gayer scenes."

"But, should he come, you advise me to be cautious. You consequently think that, despite his rejection, Sybil loved him?"

"No doubt she did, or things could not have gone so far. And, perhaps if that odious Palermitan Prince had not come in the way, she would have married him when once they were engaged, but she was ambitious, and the title dazzled her vanity."

"You allude to Prince Saviatti?"

"Of course I do, and after he bowed himself off, it was natural enough that Trevor——But upon my word, we are talking scandal!"

"As you say, it was natural enough, that Trevor, after having 'loved,' should 'ride away' in his turn," said Mortimer with the apparent calm of concentrated feeling, affecting it to have remarked the tardy caution of her lt exclamation; "these are every-day events, rd your romance is no more interesting than r own."

"Ah! but——However, I will say no more lon the subject," remarked the lady, affecting t check herself; "It is, I think, impossible that revor will intrude under your roof, and conse-cently the past is of little importance."

"Trevor is here," said Mortimer in a hoarse isper.

"Here! Oh no, he knows better."

"I tell you he is here, I saw his carriage apoaching as I left the house."

"Your eyes deceived you. It is impossible."

"Nevertheless he is here."

"But upon what pretext can he have come?
pend upon it, you are wrong."

"And if not?"

"If not—why then—Oh, I see it all now," d the beauty with a forced laugh; "his visit ll be attributed to me, for we saw a great al of each other abroad. And perhaps," she ded fixing her large eyes steadily upon her tener; "perhaps I have been too modest, and may be so, in which case Sybil has indeed own her friendship."

"She should be grateful to you for such an mission. And do you also love this man?"

"Really, Mr. Mortimer—"

"We are speaking confidentially, you know,
d we may answer such a question without re-gnance, particularly when I assure you that, ould it be otherwise, he shall not remain four d twenty hours in my house."

"Why, you are a perfect tyrant!"

"That is no reply, and I must have one."

"Surely I am not bound to betray myself?"

"Under the present circumstances I think dif-rently. You have now told me either too little too much, for me not to desire a perfect unerstanding upon the subject. Should you deed be the object of Sir Horace Trevor's pur-it, are you prepared to receive him as a itor?"

"Upon my honor, Mr. Mortimer, I do not mprehend your right to ask me such a queson."

"Perhaps not, and yet it must be answered."

"Well then, it is possible that I might be inuced to listen to him."

"So be it," said Mortimer, rising; "as your cknowledged suitor alone can he remain an mate of Westrum. The romance shall at ast never reach its climax."

"Your readiness to dispose of me is, at any ate, not very flattering," pouted the unsophisicated beauty.

"My dear Mrs. Lamerly, I owe you so much ratitude for your kindness to my little Eva, hat I am unfeignedly interested in furthering our happiness."

"But suppose I do not love this man?"

"You will be fortunate. It is those who mary where they love only to find their affections ast back upon them, who run the risk of being nade miserable."

"Naughty man! What would Sybil say to uch a speech from you?"

"If she could make up her mind to be sincere upon the subject, she would tell you that I am quite right. Believe me, Mrs. Lamerly, it is always safer to marry where you are loved, than where you love. The one is an illusion, and the other a reality."

"What triste philosophy!"

"I am no philosopher. I advance only a plain fact."

"I am sure that my poor Augustus loved me dearly."

"And can you honestly quote that circumstance as a proof against my argument?"

"Of course I can."

"I am glad, very glad to hear it."

"I cannot think why you should doubt any thing so simple. Of course I never could forget that he ran away with me in defiance of all his disagreeable relations. Every woman is proud of such a proof of her power."

"No doubt of it, but gratified vanity is not affection."

"I detest such subtle reasoning."

"Because it is unanswerable; is it not so? However, to oblige you, I am willing to concede that yourself and Mr. Lamerly were examples, despite your love-match, of a contrary result, but you know that exceptions only prove the rule."

"I do believe that you are laughing at me."

"I dare not. You are too handsome."

"Upon my word, Mr Mortimer—"

"And upon my word, Mrs. Lamerly, I am perfectly serious. Again, I repeat that you are too handsome to be trifled with without risk. Suppose now, for instance, that Sybil should surprise us at this present moment——"

"I care not though she should."

"Yet she might think, and perhaps say—"

"She dare not!" exclaimed the usually supine widow, with flashing eyes; "she dare not!"

"Am I to understand that she would dread a retort?"

"Perhaps so."

"Mrs. Lamerly, I beseech of you to tell me seriously—"

"No, I will not say another word. And now, since you have taken fright, leave me, and, if you will do me the favor, be good enough to desire Mrs. Harris to come and take charge of Eva, for I doubt whether I have strength to carry her all the way to the house."

Mortimer paused for a moment, and glanced down upon the beautiful young creature before him, upon whose brow a shade of offended dignity was discernible. Half fascinated, and half terrified by the strange mixture of coquettish simplicity and undaunted worldliness which was betrayed in her every word and action, he could not, at that instant, forbear assimilating her to the glittering, but envenomed serpent, which, while it enthrals the eye, poisons the life-blood. Nevertheless, he could not altogether liberate himself from the spell. It was the first time that he had looked upon her without positive dislike, and yet, instead of resenting a coldness which would have irritated many women less attractive, she had scarcely disguised a far more flattering feeling towards himself.

And at what a moment had she done so! When, dreading he knew not what, conscious of his wife's utter and selfish indifference, and suspicious of every one by whom she was approached, his mortified vanity and disappointed affection alike led him to resent so false and comfortless a position.

He could not doubt that Trevor had triumphed over the heart of Sybil long before he had believed it to be his own—and should he suffer him to enjoy a second triumph over that of the fair creature before him? True, Trevor could make her his wife, but would he do so? Did she even anticipate such a result? Mortimer scarcely believed that she did, nor had he sufficient confidence in her principles to imagine that she would long be swayed by such a consideration. He could not conceal from himself that he despised and almost feared her, but he was becoming reckless, and—he was human.

The result of his momentary silence was a proposal himself to take charge of the sleeping child, and to accompany Mrs. Lamerly to the house.

"But suppose Sybil should see you," said the widow, with an arch and mocking laugh.

"In my turn, I reply that I care not."

"Well, then, suppose that Trevor should see me?"

"You can alone decide if that circumstance is likely to affect you," retorted Mortimer, with offended vanity.

"Such a family group!" again smiled the lady.

"I wish it were!" retorted the gentleman, and in another moment Eva reposed quietly upon the arm which he extended to receive her, and the bright-eyed widow hung confidingly upon the other.

"And now, will you promise not to be jealous of Trevor?" she asked in a low whisper, as she approached her coral lips to his ear.

"We shall see," replied her companion, in the same subdued tone, pressing the little hand which rested against his side still more closely.

"And not to suspect Sybil?"

Mortimer laughed, but it was not the buoyant laughter of earlier days, and of earlier hopes.

CHAPTER XLV.

Nothing could exceed the excitement produced by the arrival of Sir Horace Trevor upon the circle assembled at Westrum. To most of the party he was unknown, save by report, but that report had sufficed to ensure his welcome; for he was precisely one of those individuals whom the women are ambitious to see in their train, and the men to quote as an acquaintance. Self-centred, worldly, and satirical, he possessed every quality calculated to shine in society, and as the said society cares only to be dazzled, tinsel passes current as readily as sterling ore.

Trevor had few vices, and it is probable that, had he been educated in a different school, he would have adopted some more worthy ambition than that of merely figuring as "a man about town," but the evil, which in his case owed its origin to his pecuniary independence, and consequent freedom from the enforced thraldom of professional study, was gradually increased by his own experience of men and manners—aye, and of women too, for even that fact must be admitted in his justification.

Once, as we have seen, he had loved earnestly and well, and moreover, with a perfection of moral courage which had enabled him to disregard the gibes of his more dissolute associates and to look forward without shame to the time when he should have degenerated into a common-place married man, but even here his honesty of purpose met with no answering truth; he became the prey of a coquette, and was made the sacrifice of a heartless cupidity and from that hour Trevor vowed an eternal enmity to marriage. A mere votary of pleasure the whim of the moment was the sole rule of his life, the most minute care of his person his only serious occupation, and as a natural consequence, he became the model of a certain set and was dressed at and aped accordingly.

Capricious as a spoiled beauty, he was one hour the assiduous cavalier of some fair and fashionable trifler, and the next a bitter satirist upon the whole sex. Disappointed in his earliest aspirations, and blighted in his holiest affections he affected to disbelieve in the existence of any pure and disinterested attachment whatever maintaining that human nature, and more particularly female human nature, was incapable of profound feeling of any kind, and could only skim along the surface of sentiment and sensation, as the dragon-fly ruffles the wavelets of the meadow brook upon whose current it is to weak to settle.

As he had begun life by investing everything about him with a fictitious brightness which would not bear the test of trial, so he revenged himself upon his own delusion in after-years, by deepening and darkening every shadow that fell across his path. Systematically skeptical he doubted even where his reason should have been convinced. A Sybarite on principle, he was irritable under everything which interfered with his individual gratification, and when he occasionally encountered persons of more liberal ideas, he either sneered at them as dupes, or denounced them as hypocrites.

But again we repeat that Trevor was only such as the world had made him; that world of fashion, frivolity, and falsehood, which was his peculiar atmosphere. He was a moral wreck which nevertheless retained some portion of its original brightness.

Strictly honorable, according to the conventional acceptation of the word, recklessly generous, and imperturably good-tempered, the bitterness which occasionally passed his lips never penetrated to his heart; he was weak, but not wicked. When he gamed, it was merely to divert his idleness; he cared little for the result and consequently never lost his courtesy with his money. When he betrayed the woman who confided in him, he did so with a perfect conviction that he had simply distanced her in the race of deceit, and when he sacrificed the interests of a friend to his own, he felt no compunction, convinced that the said friend would have done precisely the same, had he possessed a similar opportunity.

Such was the man whose advent beneath the roof of Mortimer occasioned such universal gratulation. He had, as we have seen, arrived early in the day, and Sybil learned, with a sensation of relief, that he had taken possession of his apartment before her other guests were assembled at the breakfast-table. Confident as she felt in her power over her husband, she was for the first time conscious of an anxiety which she had never hitherto experienced. She was quite aware that Mortimer both despised and disliked the circle which she had already drawn about her, and she knew full well that Trevor would be even less acceptable to him. It might be also that a vague presentiment of danger warned her of the probable consequences of her weak compliance with the suggestion of her soi-disant friend Mrs. Lamerly, and that something like a doubt crossed her mind as to the perfect good faith in which it had been made. Her woman vanity whispered that, having once loved her, it was impossible Trevor could be thralled by the baby-graces of the fantastic little Amabel, and if it were not so, why, after the insult which he had offered to her at The Grange, should he be once more forced into her path? Gladly would she have forgotten his existence, for his name it was which was inscribed in the darkest page of her life's volume, but she felt, whatever might have been the evasion of the crafty widow, that she was in possession of the fatal secret which she was anxious to conceal from Mortimer, and that she was consequently so thoroughly in her power that she could not protect herself from the impending evil.

Sybil was, however, no weak and trembling woman to be scared by shadows; and thus driven to rely upon her own strength, instead of yielding to impotent alarm, she endeavored to fortify herself by arguments tending to reassure her mind. Trevor had already tested the power of her former affection by endeavoring to renew it, and he must be convinced of the futility of further pursuit. He had, moreover, offered to her an insult which he must be well aware that no woman of pride or principle could ever pardon. But at this phase of her reasoning Sybil paused, and although no one was near to detect her unbidden emotion, she covered her face with her spread hands, to conceal the crimson blush which mounted to her brow. Alas! what faith could Trevor place in either her pride or her principle? Had she not deceived him cruelly? And was it not from his weakness that she had wrung the resources which had enabled her to make a second dupe?

This reflection, for a time, prostrated her courage, but happily she had been prepared for the struggle which awaited her, and during the time that had elapsed between the departure of Mrs. Lamerly's invitation, and the arrival of its object, she had possessed ample time to decide her measures. She must not receive him coldly, as such a want of courtesy to a bidden guest could not but excite the suspicion of those about her, while it might, moreover, tend to impress Sir Horace himself with the idea that she feared him. Neither must she permit him to resume the easy and familiar tone, which would almost warrant the trial of a second impertinence, from which her dignity as the wife of Mortimer might be insufficient to secure her. No, she must meet him with a smile and an extended hand, it is true, but the smile must be cold, and the hand passive. She must regard him only as the presumed suitor of an early friend, and leave Mrs. Lamerly to do the honors of Westrum to her own visitor.

How she regretted that they still had a mutual secret, and that she could not, without compromising herself in the eyes of her husband, at once, and definitely, divest him of the privileges of their presumed relationship! but this, she was painfully aware, was now impossible. How she loathed the folly which had induced her to avoid confiding in the mad passion of Mortimer before their marriage, when a few tears and smiles would have induced him to overlook even the presumption of an admitted rival, and which had thus bound her hand and foot before the altar of deceit and falsehood.

It was, however, vain to deprecate the past. Were she to confess to Frederic that she had betrayed his confidence in her truth in this one instance, what might he not suspect? And his suspicions once aroused, where would they end? She dared not risk such an attempt. The reverberation of the past storm was beginning to make itself heard, and, for the first time, Sybil felt herself powerless to avoid its contact.

How she lingered at her dressing-table, as if delay could profit her in such an emergency, but at length the last string was tied, and the last frill adjusted. Her maid, astonished, and at length irritated by her unusual tardiness, had begun to busy herself in repairing the disarray of the chamber; the warning bell had rung, and she felt the necessity of controlling her emotion. Not even then, however, could she compel herself to proceed at once to the breakfast-room, but snatching up her gloves and handkerchief by a sudden impulse, she left the chamber, and proceeded hastily to the nursery.

There she found only Mrs. Harris and her assistant, by whom she was informed that Miss Eva had been for the last two hours in the grounds, under the guardianship of Mrs. Lamerly.

"And who authorised you to trust your young lady out of your sight for such a length of time?" inquired her mistress, angrily: the circumstance affording a safe escape-valve for the hitherto hidden bitterness of her feelings.

"Indeed, ma'am," hastened to reply the astonished nurse, "I thought you must have known that the kind good natured lady takes Miss Eva out every morning when the weather is fine enough for her. If I had thought that you would object——"

"Of course I object," retorted Sybil imperiously; "I will permit no interference of the sort. You should immediately have acquainted me with this caprice of Mrs. Lamerly's."

"As my master was aware of it, ma'am, I supposed——" commenced the female functionary, anxious to justify herself.

"Oh, indeed, your master was aware of this arrangement, was he?" interposed Mrs. Mortimer sarcastically, "and does he also undertake to amuse Miss Eva during her daily absence of two hours?"

"I am sure, ma'am, I cannot say," answered the nurse, becoming more and more alarmed at this exhibition of displeasure, succeeding as it did to so habitual an indifference to the movements of her charge.

"You appear to be strangely ignorant of your duties, Mrs. Harris," said Sybil sternly, "and I must request that in future no one may be suffered to interfere with the arrangements which I see fit to make for my own child."

"You may depend upon it, ma'am."

"I do," replied Mrs. Mortimer. "And now go at once in search of the little girl, and bring her here. I will await your return."

At this moment a clear ringing laugh became audible, and footsteps were heard ascending the side stairs which led to the nursery, while in the next instant the lisping voice of Mrs. Lamerly exclaimed in accents of childish amusement—

"Ah! you may open your large grey eyes, Eva, and stare about you with astonishment! Yes, you fell asleep under a tall sycamore, and here you are, you can't tell how, at home again, and on the very confines of your own domain! Oh, fairy, you have guessed all about it now! And have you no kiss for papa, who made so pretty a cradle for you?"

The words had scarcely escaped her lips when the speaker crossed the threshold of the apartment, followed closely by Mortimer, about whose neck the child had clasped its little arms. Instantly, as if by a species of instinctive fascination, the eyes of the two friends were riveted upon each other, but ere long those of Mrs. Lamerly fell before the fixed and almost contemptuous gaze of Sybil, who, after a momentary silence, broke into a forced and bitter laugh, as she said sarcastically—

"Truly, Amabel, you are becoming matutinal? Harris informs me that you have elected yourself head-nurse to Eva, and that you are abroad with her for hours before I have finished my morning sleep. You are really too good. But I fear that to-day, at least, you have been the victim of your own kindness, for I perceive, what I had not before remarked, that the wind must be very high, as it appears to have inconvenienced you during your walk, and a portion of your hair is streaming from under your bonnet."

"That is very probable," replied Mrs. Lamerly with imperturbable composure, "for Eva has been amusing herself by inventing for me a coiffure a la sauvage. I am sorry that you do not admire the effect."

"She had seized an unfortunate opportunity for the exhibition of her talent," resumed Mrs. Mortimer in the same biting accent, "but perhaps you have been too pleasantly engaged to be aware that not only has the second breakfast-bell rung, but also that your friend has arrived."

"My friend? What friend?" inquired the widow, with a pretty assumption of innocence.

"Sir Horace Trevor."

Mrs. Lamerly shot one quick glance towards Mortimer, who had during this short dialogue been endeavoring to induce the child to leave his arms for those of the anxious Mrs. Harris, an attempt in which he had only just succeeded, and as he turned he met the meaning eyes that sought his own.

"Oh! your cousin!" exclaimed the lady with affected joyousness. "How very nice! He will initiate us, in his own dear satirical way, into the latest scandal of half the European capitals, and tell us all about Lady Clara's old flame, General O'Keefe, and Mrs. Babington's French marquis, and poor Saviatti, and half a million of our old friends."

"And is that all you expect from his visit?" asked Sybil, more and more provoked by the perfect nonchalance of her friend.

"Oh! no, believe me, by no means," replied the widow, with marked emphasis; "but you do not say a word, Mr. Mortimer," she continued addressing Frederic, who had remained silently and steadfastly scrutinizing the words and manner of his wife; "are you not charmed to hear that our party has received such a delightful addition?"

"Sybil's relatives must always be welcome under my roof," was the somewhat cold reply; "although I confess, that on the present occasion I am somewhat perplexed to imagine what can have procured for us the honor of a gentleman's society, who, on the last occasion of his presence at Westrum, declared it to be the ultima thule, and regarded its inhabitants as only one degree removed from Hottentots."

"Oh! that is so like Trevor!" said the widow, clapping her little hands, in order to silence the rejoinder which already quivered upon the lips of Sybil. "Did you ever hear him praise anything? He is such a spoilt child. Do you know he is a perfect skeptic, does not believe in the love, nor indeed, I am afraid I may add, in the virtue of our sex. Is it not shameful? When everybody knows that women——"

"Pray, Amabel, do not inflict upon us what everybody knows," said Sybil with affected impatience, "but ring for your maid to dress your hair, or you will not be fit to present yourself at the breakfast-table."

Mortimer was not, however, to be so deceived. He understood the expression of Sybil's speaking features, and he saw at once that no mere dread of Mrs. Lamerly's disregard for appearances could so thoroughly have ruffled her. He was conscious that although the two persons before him had ventured upon a war of wit, which they were unable to control, there was a mystery in the advent of Trevor which neither was anxious to reveal in his presence. Resolved, therefore, to terminate the scene at once, he pointed with a smile to the door, exclaiming—

"You are dismissed, you see, Mrs. Lamerly, and in obedience to your liege lady, have only to withdraw, although, fortunately for all who know and admire you, to reappear ere long with increased attractions."

"So be it," was the laughing rejoinder; "good bye, Eva," and she tenderly embraced the little girl, who was now contentedly playing upon the lap of her nurse; "your frolics have entailed a terrible lecture upon me, but I forgive you"—and playfully kissing her fingers to the child, she bounded from the room.

CHAPTER XLVI.

Sir Horace Trevor did not make his appearance until the morning meal was nearly at an end, and he had no reason to repent the arrangement, for the party had just arrived at that satisfied and complacent point when all which follows is rather matter of idleness than appetite, and each member composing it is not only willing, but eager to repay, by the most assiduous attentions, the ample return of news and gossip.

Fortunately, their first meeting was one of less embarrassment than Sybil had anticipated, for here was such a general greeting on his entrance that no one, save her husband, remarked the slight flush which rose to her cheek, and the almost imperceptible quivering of the lip with which she received him as he made his way towards her, or the constrained "You are welcome, Sir Horace," which was her brief response to his eager address. This partial display of emotion was nevertheless by no means calculated to alarm him, for it was no more than every delicately-minded woman might be disposed to feel upon meeting, after an absence, the man who had once offered her his hand, while in the manner of Trevor himself he could detect nothing more objectionable, as it gave him the impression of a graceful piece of acting, rather than the impulse of deep or excited feeling.

Not one of the guests, however, came to the relief of her hostess so effectually as Mrs. Lamerly, who, with one of her childish exclamations of delight, extended her jewelled hand, and said, half-laughing and half-pouting, "So you have remembered your old friends at last, my dear Trevor, and only just in time, I can assure you, for both Sybil and I had made up our minds to give you up if you did not repent your ingratitude. However, you need not look up so dismayed, we will forgive you, but in return you must tell us everything about everybody everywhere, and make yourself as agreeable as you can. And now, when you have done shaking hands with Lady Clara, come here, and I will make room for you between me and Lord John." And with pretty imperiousness she motioned to the mortified lordling to advance higher up the table, while she removed her own seat sufficiently to enable the new comer to occupy the place assigned to him.

She was not however, so exclusively occupied with Trevor as to overlook the probable anxiety of her host, and more than once she raised her heavy eyelids, and turned upon him one of those rapid glances of inquiry, which betray so little and imply so much. She wished him to understand that she was endeavoring to screen her friend from his suspicions, and sacrificing herself for his peace of mind.

Nothing could be more amiable! And it was beautiful to witness the perfect good-will with which the generous and artless Mrs. Lamerly executed her self-appointed task. Scarcely would she permit Trevor to address his hostess, whose tardy answer was in almost every instance anticipated by that of her friend, and then she had so many questions to ask, and so many half-whispered communications to make, that Trevor found ample employment between his pâté de Perigord, and her unceasing demands upon his attention.

"After all," observed Lady Clara, with one of the dull stares of her lack-lustre blue eyes for which she was peculiar. "After all, what?" the reader may be inclined to ask, nor can we satisfactorily reply; suffice it that this mode of expression—this lucus a non lucendo—was a favorite with the lady. "After all, Sir Horace, I can scarcely imagine how you could make up your mind to leave Italy, where all is so nice, and so easy going, and so pleasant, for this nasty, dull, foggy, catch-cold country."

"Fie upon you, Lady Clara!" exclaimed Mrs. Lamerly. "Do you suppose that our dear Trevor has no natural affections, and that even one glimpse of his cousin will not repay him for the sacrifice?"

"His cousin!" said Lady Clara, doubtfully, "why, I never knew that you were his cousin!"

"Nor am I. I allude to Mrs. Mortimer."

"Dear me!" ejaculated the peer's daughter, more and more mystified; "I cannot understand it. Let me see. Old Sir Reginald, his grandfather had three sons, one was killed in the Body Guards before he was twenty, another married Lady Barbara Dobson, the Nabob's widow, and having no family, left all her fortune to his father. And you, Sir Horace, are an only son."

"You are quite correct, amica bella," replied Trevor, biting his lips to suppress a laugh, while his ally, Mrs. Lamerly, was exhausting all her ingenuity in endeavoring to balance a tea-spoon upon the edge of her chocolate-cup, "right as a clerk in the herald's college—only—you have forgotten my aunts."

"I never before heard that you had any."

"Comment!" cried Trevor in affected astonishment; "Did you never hear the unfortunate history of the beautiful Mrs. Hildebrand, who eloped with her coachman?"

"La! how very horrid!" shuddered Mrs. Babington, settling a curl. "So low!" she whispered to the Honorable Theodore, who lounged beside her.

"And was this sporting lady the ancestress of our fair Sybil?" lisped out the widow innocently.

"Now, all the fates forfend!" said Sir Horace. "No, no, I had another aunt, and were Mrs. Delamere in the room she could answer all your questions, but it is fortunate, as we have fallen upon this topic, that she is not present, for since Honoria's lapse she is always extremely distressed by any illusion to the past."

Mortimer started. Here then was, at last, one tangle of the ravelled skein drawn out, and once more Sybil stood acquitted. A smile, which was almost one of relief and gratitude, flitted across his lip, but meanwhile the sensations of Sybil herself were infinitely less satisfactory. The audacious and unblushing effrontery with which Trevor had thus invented for himself a supposed family connection which had never in reality existed; the easy complacency with which he had calumniated the character of her sex in order to make his tale run more glibly, and the self-satisfied look with which he turned towards her at its completion, in order, as it seemed, to claim her gratitude for his exploit, rendered her more and more conscious of the depth of the abyss into which she had been plunged into by her own levity.

Who can calculate upon the bearing and result of a first deviation from the high and holy principle of truth? To extricate herself from a momentary difficulty, Mrs. Mortimer had volunteered what she believed to be a mere inconsequent falsehood, and she now felt that, at the instant of its utterance, she had herself attached to the sword of Damocles the one frail hair by which it was hereafter to be forever suspended over her head. Henceforward it was indeed vain to hope that the lie could ever be retracted, and she must abide its consequences, be they what they might, while, as if to augment her mental torture, Lady Clara continued to pour forth her surprise in the "Dear me!" and "Well, I never!" of mindless astonishment.

"You must tell us all about your Aunt Hildebrand," interposed Mrs. Lamerly, during a momentary pause. "It must be such a funny affair! I can understand a woman falling in love with a prince, or a——"

"Or a margrave," whispered Trevor in her ear.

"For shame! you are really unbearable," pouted the lady, "but do tell us the story. Or, perhaps," she continued, interrupting herself abruptly, "now that we know all about it, Sybil will give us the details."

"You are too obliging, Mrs. Lamerly," was the indignant response of her hostess, "and, moreover, I pledge you my honor that I am as ignorant of them as you are."

"I am convinced of it," said Sir Horace, with well assumed gravity. "From whom were you likely to hear such a relation? Certainly, not from your mother."

"How very improper Mrs. Lamerly is at times," remarked Mrs. Babington, sotto voce, to her neighbor.

"What! because Sybil's aunt ran away with her coachman?" exclaimed the widow, who had detected the incautious whisper. "Why, what on earth had I to do with it?"

The pretty inanity of this lisped expostulation elicited a general laugh, and to the great relief of both Mrs. Mortimer and her husband, the subject was abandoned.

No man could be more what the French expressly call facile à vivre, than Sir Horace Trevor, and despite all his resolutions to the contrary, Mortimer soon found himself with him on terms of intimacy, which, previous to his arrival, he would have declared impossible. Trevor was in fact, in a few days, emphatically and actually at home at Westrum. An hour had sufficed to render perfectly evident to him the tolerating indifference of Sybil towards her husband, whom he had long learned to despise for the weakness which had betrayed him into the power of a woman without principle or honor, while, had he needed an interpreter, his sworn friend Mrs. Lamerly was ever at hand to render every look and word intelligible.

Between the Baronet and the widow there existed no secrets. He was aware of the whole of her past career; had worshipped at her unrighteous shrine when she swayed the fortunes of the pigmy court of ——; had been indebted to her for a host of those trifling services so invaluable to the travelling Sybarite, and had, in return, vowed to her one of those everlasting friendships which are so convenient to the worldly and unscrupulous, and wherein the give-and-take system forms so efficient a bond of union.

It has already been explained that Mortimer had remorselessly wounded the vanity of Mrs. Lamerly, and embittered her feelings, and that what at first had originated in mere levity and idleness, had become in her eyes an imperative duty to herself, and as she mentally argued, a just and consistent vengeance upon the insolent security of Sybil. How dare Sybil affect at times to question, and almost to sneer, wherever she alluded to the period of her widowhood? Was Sybil then, so faultless, that her past life had woven a circle of light around her which was impassible?

As she asked herself the question, the thought of Trevor recurred to her—but Trevor was at Venice. What then? Could she not summon him to her side? And she did so, we have seen with what result.

"Do you know that you are a species of miniature divinity?" said Sir Horace to his fair and frail ally about a week after his arrival at Westrum, as he found himself alone with her in the morning-room. She was busily engaged in knitting a silk purse, or some other of those useless follies by which the idle and opulent so seriously injure the efforts of the poor and the ingenious; while he, seated on a low stool at her feet, was amusing himself by tuning and untuning her guitar. "You are, indeed! But come now, be frank and honest. You do not expect me to believe that you had no ulterior view in thus bringing me into contact with my improvised cousin, and that it was solely and entirely pour l'amour de mes beaux yeux that you called me from Venice?"

"What other motive could I have?"

"Nay! that is precisely what I seek to learn. That you have one is beyond a doubt, and that it is personal, is equally certain to one who knows you so well as I do. Surely, cara, you do not love this Mortimer? Why, child, you had better bestow your affections upon a willow-bough; satisfied while the wind blows it hither and thither, that it must return to its natural position when the breeze falls, than upon such a human girouette as Sybil's husband."

"What an absurd idea!"

"What is it, then? For that I am no desired, or even desirable guest, to either the lady or the gentleman is perceptible enough, and therefore you had some reason for urging my presence, and that reason I must know, or I bid adieu forthwith to this cave of Trophonious, with its two solitary gleams of sunshine. I love to commence, as Horace—wasn't it Horace?—says, ab ovo, therefore, I must be initiated into all the mystery of the springs before I consent to set the machinery in motion."

"Why will you not be guided by me?"

"Because I do not love to walk through the world with a bandage before my eyes, and, moreover, because I want to comprehend the probable extent of the obligation which you will owe me."

"Well then, I am displeased with Sybil, et pour cause."

"Ha! I begin to understand. You have something to revenge?"

"A great deal."

"But when you have so much in your own power, why should you have resource to my assistance? Make the man love you, and you will have ample means of vengeance."

"And what would that avail me?" asked the lady with some asperity, "save to afford her a new triumph over what she is pleased to consider as my levity? No, no, I will adopt no such imperfect policy. So long as she continues under his roof, and is recognised as his wife, the contest is unequal."

Trevor smiled and struck a few discordant chords on the instrument which he was torturing.

"Now, pray do not make that horrid noise," said Mrs. Lamerly, "but tell me at once if you no longer care for Sybil."

"No longer care for her!" echoed Sir Horace with sudden animation; "Impossible! Why she is handsomer than ever."

"And sick to death of her humdrum husband, and her old-fashioned country-house," pursued the lady in the same tone. "And you a spark of spirit, you would need no prompting from me."

A second, and more intelligible smile gleamed over the features of the Baronet.

"I see it all now," he said with a light laugh, "Sybil once gone—And you really think such a thing might occur?"—He was answered by a significant gesture; "The willow wand would require a prop, and who could he so pleasantly lean upon on as the sympathising friend who would be upon the spot, and who is so well calculated to act as a second mother to his child?"

"And suppose it were so?"

"Oh, I have not a word to say against it. Nothing could be better imagined, and, as a matter of course, it would be an immense relief to my conscience. But—but—I must venture one more question," and Trevor really looked embarrassed for a moment; "As I should be deeply grieved to compromise your pretty self, without some prospect of fulfilling your projects, I tell you frankly that I believe you have little chance of becoming the wife of this worthy squire."

"And why not?" asked the lady indignantly, "Did he not marry Sybil?"

"He did, and it is precisely for that reason that I conjecture he will just have wit enough to be very cautious how he commits himself a second time. Now, don't look so defyingly. You know all that I mean, and you are quite aware how high an opinion I have of your abilities, as well as how sincerely I admire your person, but nevertheless, ———"

"Do you mean to insult me?"

"Not a whit, but if we are to be honest confederates, we must thoroughly understand each other. I thought you had more strength of mind."

"Pray leave me to conduct my own affairs," said the widow sullenly; "I flatter myself that I am quite competent to such a task."

"I never doubted it for an instant, but still I felt it my duty to warn you."

"Wait till I am in danger."

"With all my heart. It is understood, then, that we are to be faithful allies?"

"Have we not a common interest?"

"True. My question was an idle one, and I deserve the rebuke. Our mutual undertaking is, however, by no means easy. Sybil evidently shuns me."

"She fears herself more than you."

"That, at least, is encouraging, and I will trust to your penetration; car vous avez passé parla. Now do not be angry again, frowns never become you, and you know, by experience, that they are wasted upon me. But tell me, for whom are you laboring so diligently?"

"For Sybil," said Mrs. Lamerly, with a sneer.

"What a graceful attention!"

"Is it not? Let it serve you as an example."

And then, having accomplished this mutual understanding, they talked of other matters perfectly irrelevant to the subject which still, however, remained uppermost in their thoughts, and worthy colleagues in evil, did so with smiling brows and friendly tones, undisturbed even by the intrusion of Mrs. Babington and her honorable hanger-on, despite the curious and somewhat supercilious looks which were occasionally riveted upon them. They had so much to ask and to tell, so many dear friends to be canvassed and condemned, and so many schemes of pleasure to arrange, that they both continued apparently unconscious of the espionage to which they were thus unceremoniously subjected.

CHAPTER XLVII.

When Gertrude awoke on the following morning, she was several minutes before she could collect her thoughts, and, as she cast her eyes round the desolate apartment which had been allotted to her, her first impulse was to close them again, in order to shut out all surrounding objects, but, in the next instant, she felt the utter folly and weakness of thus shrinking back upon the very threshold of her task, and springing lightly from her comfortless bed, she hastened to dress herself, and to be prepared for the first summons she might receive.

The dark and soot-laden fog still hung heavily over the street, clung to the dingy windowpanes, and made its way through the ill-fitted frames even into the chamber. No one requires to be told all the wretchedness of such a waking, while to Gertrude, totally unaccustomed as she was to a London atmosphere in any season, it seemed as though her very breathing were impeded. Steadily, however, she persevered in her purpose, and at length, closely folded in a thick shawl, but still trembling with cold, she made her way down stairs, with her writing-desk in her hand, to the little parlor in which she had first been received. The shutters had been thrown back, and as no preparations had yet been made for the morning meal, she found herself at liberty to sit down at once, and commence the somewhat difficult task of explaining to Ernest her sudden evasion from Bletchley.

Until the very moment in which she prepared to do this, she had never become thoroughly conscious of the delicacy of the undertaking, for one look round the squalid apartment in which she was seated, sufficed to convince her that she must still conceal from him the exact nature and situation of her temporary home. Undoubtedly some human feeling of hurt pride and wounded personal dignity mingled with other and less selfish convictions, but it is nevertheless certain that the guiding-spring of her conduct was a consciousness that she had no right to intrude a stranger beneath the roof of a ruined relative, of whom she had already seen enough to be well aware that he valued, at even more than their just price, the privileges of which poverty had denuded him, and would consequently ill brook that an indifferent, and perchance, scrutinizing eye, should be permitted to rest upon the nakedness of the land.

Such a position was very irksome to Gertrude, whose nature was truthfulness itself, but she was compelled to admit that in this case the withholding of the whole truth was part of the painful duty which she had imposed upon herself when she obeyed the summons of her dying uncle, and with a sigh such as she had never thought to heave on sitting down to address Ernest, she commenced her task.

She told him of the hasty and imperative call which had been made upon both her duty and her affection for her mother's memory; of the state in which she had found her unfortunate relative; nor did she shrink from avowing that he had sunk from affluence to poverty. And then she besought him to bear with her if she entreated that he would not attempt to see her until her return to Bletchley, and not only forgive such a request in his own person, but even justify her in the eyes of his family should they appear to resent the step that she had taken.

"He was my mother's only brother," she continued; "a stern and prosperous man, who was regardless alike of family ties and family affections during the greater portion of his life. He existed, consequently, unloving and unloved; absorbed in large financial speculations, and engrossed by gold. Think, Ernest, what must now be the bitterness of his regret, and the desolateness of his position. His hard-earned gains have melted away within his grasp; the penury at which he used to scoff is abiding under his own roof, and he has found no other source of comfort than a desire to possess for the (I fear) very brief remains of a wasted life, the society of his hitherto unknown niece. Can you not, therefore, easily pardon both him and myself? And will you not readily do so? We have so many long years of happiness before us, while his days are already numbered, his hopes annihilated, and his gray hairs bowed down by misery, both actual and mental. I do not fear your reply to such an appeal, for I know your heart, and I have confidence in your consistency. Do not, however, believe, that in requiring you not to seek me out—you, who are in my thoughts at every moment, and perhaps even (for I know little of the great wilderness of which I am now an inhabitant,) within a few streets of the very house of which I have become an inmate—that I do so without an immense personal sacrifice. You will at once feel this to be impossible. Never had I greater need of sympathy, but I cannot on that account add another pang to those by which the wounded spirit of my dying uncle is evidently crushed to the very earth. Bear with me, then, as I would cheerfully bear with yourself in such an extremity. It is already much that I may be with you in thought, and that I am enabled to shelter myself from the present in the future."

Her letter to Miss Warrington was more easily written. To her she had only to announce her safe arrival under Mr. Spencer's roof, and to express her wish that none of the family at the Manor-house should be made acquainted with her place of residence.

"He may linger," she added, "and should such be the case, I feel convinced that Mr. Armstrong would not permit me to remain in his house; a thousand kind, but needless apprehensions on my account, might induce him to prevent the accomplishment of a duty which I consider most sacred, and of which I should lament the omission throughout all my life. I leave my fate, therefore, in your hands, and I am assured that you will not betray me."

Her task was scarcely accomplished ere Gertrude heard a stealthy step approaching the apartment, and saw the staid attendant of her uncle enter laden with the meager preparations for breakfast. The astonishment of the worthy woman was extreme, on perceiving that the young lady whom she had been fearful of awakening after her fatigue, was already up and occupied, and she busied herself with quiet alacrity in rendering her as comfortable as circumstances would permit.

Nothing could, however, remove the aspect of cheerlessness by which the orphan was surrounded; the clinging fog looming heavily and lividly through the window and obscuring every object without, the dusty grate, the curtainless cornice, the time-stained walls within, all conspired to depress her, and it was almost with a sense of relief that she heard the dull sound of her uncle's cane upon his uncarpeted floor, as he knocked to announce that he required the presence of his house-keeper.

Mrs. Sharp hastily poured out a cup of coffee, diluted it as she had done on the previous evening, and then placing a small slice of thin dry toast in the saucer, hurriedly obeyed the summons; nor did she return till the frugal meal of Gertrude was accomplished, when she announced that her master would see Miss Mortimer in a few minutes.

"He is much changed since last night, Ma'am," added the woman, "and although he never alluded to it, I could see that he was very anxious from the time he wrote to you, lest you should refuse to come to him; for I more than once heard him mutter to himself: 'If she does not, there is time yet! There is time yet!' And then he laughed. You have heard him laugh. As for me, I would much rather hear him cry at any time than laugh that frightful laugh—it always chills my blood. But I am wrong to talk of this to you, Ma'am, I was only going to say, that I think when he saw you at last he felt a great deal, though he was too proud to let you see it, and the agitation has been too much for him. He had some trouble to swallow his coffee, and the bread he could not touch. Poor gentleman! I believe that his troubles are nearly over."

"Then for pity's sake," exclaimed Gertrude, clasping her hands entreatingly, "send at once for his physician. Surely you can procure a messenger somewhere in the neighborhood, and I will pay him whatever he requires, provided he lose no time. See to this at once, Mrs. Sharp, and I will attend to my poor uncle during your absence."

The housekeeper shook her head.

"I dare not, Ma'am," she said timidly, "you do not know my master, but if you authorize me to venture upon it, I will send a boy for Mr. Jackson, who can come as if by accident on his way somewhere else, and then he can advise you as to what is best to be done."

"By all means," said Gertrude eagerly, "by all means—now—this instant. I could not incur so terrible a responsibility alone."

Mrs. Sharp curtsied and left the room, and when the orphan heard her open the house-door, and close it gently behind her, it was with a feeling of terror which she could not overcome, that she remembered she was alone with the dying man. Dead, she would perhaps have feared him less, for there is a mystery and a holiness in death which rebuke the weaknesses of the living; but dying, and dying thus—without a thought or a care for the Great Beyond, towards which he was hastening,—without an anxiety on the subject of that life which must endure forever, and wholly occupied by the cares and futilities of that which was so rapidly to close upon him!—It was very frightful, and the poor girl bent down her head, and buried her face in her hands, as she listened breathlessly for the return of her messenger.

It was not, however, the welcome footstep of the zealous housekeeper which fell upon her ear as she sat there in her terror, but the renewed pounding of the heavy cane upon the boards in the room above, and starting from her chair, she swept back the long curls from her forehead, and hastened to obey the summons.

Even prepared as she was to see a change in the countenance of the unhappy invalid, she, nevertheless, started with surprise and fear as her eye first fell upon him. The hectic spot upon his cheek had deepened into purple, his lips were livid, and his brow bloodless, while it was evident, by the rapid convulsions which passed over his features, and the wild fierce light which glistened in his eyes, that nature was making a last and powerful effort, which would in all probability utterly exhaust his slight remains of strength.

"Ah! come—come," he said almost in a whisper, as with faltering steps, which she in vain endeavored to render steady, she approached to his bed-side; "Come—for I can set your mind at ease. I shall not need your annuity, child; what remains in the house will now last my time. Sit down, sit down, and let us talk."

"Shall I not rather read to you, Sir?"

"How can you?" he asked peevishly; "I have already told you that the paper never comes until the evening."

"But in your present state," again asked the orphan timidly; "could I not find something more appropriate, more comforting, than the mere news of the day?"

"Ah! I understand," said the sick man, as a sardonic smile quivered for an instant over his faded lips; "You care nothing about the money-market—You do not condescend to addle your brains with the dull concern of consols, and foreign securities, and all the great interests of a commercial country. I am sorry for it, child, I am sorry for it, for such indifference to the most important considerations of a rational and enlightened kingdom will bring bitter repentance in time. No, no, I want no reading. I want to think, and to speak, and I have little enough time left for either. No fear of being taken at your word, child, the annuity is safe enough!" And that strange, unnatural laughter, deprecated even by the accustomed Mrs. Sharp, again burst from the parched throat of the fevered invalid, but on this occasion, not with impunity, for in the very paroxysm of this forced and bitter mirth, a gush of blood followed the sound, and streamed down over the sheet which covered the breast of the sufferer.

Gertrude uttered a faint shriek, as she flung her arm about his neck, and raised his head from the pillow. It was a fearful moment for the solitary and inexperienced girl, but the sick man soon partially rallied.

"Thank you, thank you," he murmured huskily; "and now give me a drop of water."

Gertrude laid him down softly, and held a tumbler to his lips.

"Began at 99," he whispered with closed eyes, after the silence of a moment; "and closed at 101 3-8. Better times are coming better times. I must keep my eyes about me Gertrude, where are you?"

"I am here, Sir."

"That was a great rise, Gertrude. A great deal may be made by such a rise as that. I used to be very fortunate—very, at least folks said so, though I never believed that luck had much to do with it. Gertrude, if you should ever be rich—you know you will have the annuity which you offered me to begin upon, and many there are in the world who have reared a goodly brood without such a nest-egg—if you should ever be rich, watch the funds, child—watch the funds, and remember your poor uncle."

"Pray, do not excite yourself, Sir," said the anxious girl. "You are, just now, quite unequal to such an exertion. You need rest."

"I shall have enough and to spare before many suns set," was the reply of the faint and exhausted voice. "Leave me in peace, now. And Gertrude—"

"I listen, Sir."

"Gertrude, I say, do not forget the pocket-book, and if Jackson should ask for it when he comes—for he must come after I am gone, you know—don't give it to him, but make him show you his accounts. It is a large sum—a very large sum for a poor man to handle, and—and I want to be quite sure that it will be well laid out."

"You shall be obeyed, Sir."

"Good girl! Good girl! Worth a score of your mother. She married for love, poor fool, and then wanted me to pay the debts of her spendthrift husband. You have been wiser. An Armstrong will do, child, an Armstrong will do. You must be prudent and saving for a few years, and things will come round. Take care of your gold, and—your—gold—will—take—care—of—you. I—"

There was a long pause, for the sick man was utterly exhausted, and Gertrude, drowned in tears of mingled fear and horror, could not even attempt a reply, when, suddenly rallying once more, the invalid panted, rather that uttered: "Why do you close the shutters? Nothing can be done in the darkness. Give me light. I must have light—broad, unblinking sunlight. I shall be robbed in this foul darkness. Robbed? Who shall dare?" and he clenched his dry and withered hand, and attempted to extend it in menace, but he strove in vain; his muscular power was spent, and the shrunken arm fell powerless at his side.

What wild and conflicting, and bewildered visions must have passed over the brain of the dying man during the hour which succeeded, for truly, throughout one long, and, as she believed, interminable hour, did the miserable girl watch beside that unholy death-bed, unsupported, alone, and quivering with anxiety for the return of her messenger, who, meanwhile, having duly fulfilled her mission, had not ventured to enter the sick-chamber unbidden, and was, in her turn, awaiting, in her cheerless solitude, the advent of the poor humble clerk, who was to be their sole support and comforter throughout the coming trial.

Strange unconnected snatches of thought were incoherently revealed by the sick man in disjoined and faintly articulated sentences. Now it was a fresh and far-off glance at his green and joyous boyhood, and a wild smile played about his lip, and the vision of some pilfered orchard passed before him, and while the congenial scene occupied his mental vision, he clutched the bed-clothes with a convulsive grasp, as if fearful of being cheated of the spoil that he had won. But this comparatively tranquil waking-dream soon vanished, and the toil and turmoil of more manly struggles were enacted over again. Like one who saw before him the open pages of a ledger, he calculated immense sums with an accuracy which filled his terrified listener with silent astonishment, pausing at intervals, to utter stern denials, as it seemed, to some importunate petitioner, or to chuckle over some successful venture, and throughout all this fearful time, whatever might be the broad outline of the mental picture conjured up by memory, the same dark shadow hovered over it; the greed of gain hung darkly about; the pencil of avarice polluted all its features. He was the breathing embodiment of a solitary idea. No reminiscence of affection, no soothing consciousness of one generous deed done, and registered for hereafter, flitted like a good angel, through the memories of the past. His horizon was without light, the lurid gleam of gold was the only ray which had power to penetrate the gloom.

Gertrude thought of the placid and prayerful death-bed of the protectress of her youth, and averted her look from the rapidly-working features, and endeavored to close her eyes against the mammon-worshipping words of the dying man who lay before her. Her heart sickened as the conviction forced itself upon her reason, that beyond fulfilling the mere trifling and unimportant duties required by the sinking body, her care could here be of no avail, for the voices of the soul had become clogged by the base yellow fluid to which it had been abandoned, and it no longer found utterance for higher or nobler aspirations.

Suddenly, the hoarse murmur ceased, and then came one of those deep and awful periods of utter stillness so solemn in a death-room. All was silent and chill, and the wordless prayer which was poured out by the stricken spirit of the watcher, arose pure and untinged with one taint of earth; an offering for him who cared not to supplicate for himself. And it would seem that it brought a blessing, for once more the wandering mind was cleared of the mist by which it had been over-shadowed, and when next the sick man spoke, he had regained the entire possession of his temporarily suspended faculties.

"Gertrude," he whispered faintly, "I have no time to lose. Listen to me. Take the key which you will find in my pocket-book—but give me back the book. I like to feel it under my pillow, for then I know that it is safe. Good girl! Good girl! Now, open that chest, and, at the top—at the very top, mind, you need not search lower—you will find a packet of papers. Bring it here."

Gertrude silently obeyed, and placed in the eager trembling hand the sealed envelope which lay ready on the surface of the chest.

"All right, all right," murmured the failing voice of the sick man; "and now lock the box carefully again, and give me back the key. There, that will do." And, for a time, he turned the well-secured packet over and over, gazing at it with a fondness incomprehensible to his companion. Now he clutched it closely between his open palms, as though he sought to make it grow into his flesh, that thus it might become inseparable from himself; then he patted it lightly with his fingers, as a playful mother would have patted the rosy and peach-like cheek of her nursling, and finally, he pressed it to his heart with a sigh so deep that it made Gertrude start.

Soon, however, he became aware that he was no longer equal to the excitement which it produced, and drawing the orphan closer to him, until her head was bent over the pillow, he placed his wasted finger upon his lip in sign of caution, and whispered shrilly—

"You must have it—you must have it—So take it now. It will never be to you what it has been to me, but there is no help for that, there is no help for that. Little as I have to leave, it shall be yours. Sell the furniture, it will pay your journey home. Jackson has the duplicate, send for him. But do not trust too much even to him, Gertrude; I know what temptation there is in gold, and we have no right to tempt others. Look to yourself, girl, look to yourself. Love is all very well, and virtue is a mighty fine thing for those who can afford to dress it out in purple and fine linen, but it will not go far in a money-loving world, if it stands naked and shivering by the wayside, holding out its hand for help. No, no, proverbs are not proofs, except when they are built up upon the wisdom which is only taught by the close contact of conflicting interests. Send a man upon 'Change with his head crammed with stale morality, and a shabby coat upon his back before he has purchased the right to wear one, and you will see what his virtue and his necessities will do for him. Trash! Trash!—I have lived long enough to—"

The voice suddenly ceased—the unhappy man had fainted.

The scream which Gertrude was unable to suppress caught the anxious ear of the housekeeper, who, to the great relief of the agitated girl, entered the room, followed by the poor old clerk, whose stealthy step gave back no echo, as he rapidly approached the bed, and laid his hand upon the breast of the unconscious invalid. His first impression evidently was that his former patron had suddenly expired, but he at once discovered his error, and a few drops of etherized water, forced through the clenched teeth of the wretched man, ere long restored him to consciousness. The hard, keen light had, however, departed for ever from his eyes, which, during that death-like swoon, had become dull and glassy; the breath, which came hot and halting from between his livid lips, heaved his chest almost to suffocation, and beads of damp stood upon his forehead, and dimmed the lustre of his grey hair.

Jackson shook his head, and a moisture stole to his eye. He, perhaps, was the only being upon earth who loved the dying-man then lying panting and struggling before him, but the human heart is strangely constituted, and there is as much of the affection of habit in the world, as that of actual sentiment. Thus the poor, hardworked, and ill-requited drudge, who remembered when he had been promoted from the invidious position of errand-boy to the honors of the raised desk, and the dignified appellation of junior clerk, that he should, in all probability, never have attained even to that dreary pre-eminence without the favor of the stern and exacting principal, (who, having remarked his economical management alike of coal, cinders, and writing materials, resolved to profit by so unusual a demonstration on the part of a subordinate) had vowed an affection and a fidelity to his unendearing master, which no severity or after-meanness had power to weaken, while time, as it passed by, served only to rivet the iron links forged by the one, and worn almost as a trophy by the other.

They had grown old together; their hair had silvered, and their step became less elastic from year to year, and each had noted the change in the other, although unconscious of it in his own person.

Even now, as Jackson looked upon the dying man, worn out alike by worldly anxieties, and the narrow penury to which he was himself condemned by his slender and insufficient means, the tear which started to his eye was impelled thither by no reflection upon his own advanced pilgrimage, but felt solely for the sufferer. Perhaps no thought of the dread debt which all must pay, had even yet connected itself with his visions of the future; he had no time for sickness, and less for death.

Mr. Spencer had withdrawn himself from the firm, and closed his ledgers and day-books for ever; his hours were no longer purchased and absorbed by business, but he was still at his post; his income must be earned, the bread of his family must be won before it could be broken; he came upon earth to work, and so he labored on, like the patient ox treading out the corn of others, and never caring to look beyond the narrow circle of his daily duties. The sabbath brought him rest, it is true, but even that was the merely negative repose of physical and moral idleness. As he lay back in his slippery and ill-cushioned horse-hair chair, with his eyes closed, and his lips quivering, he was generally reviewing in thought all the commercial transactions in which he had been engaged throughout the previous week, or, when by chance, the sunshine wiled him out, and he sauntered forth, with his meek and spirit-broken wife upon his arm, to bask in the warmer and purer air of Tower-Hill, or the Artillery-ground near Finsbury Square. he could command no other subject with which to beguile the way, and thus the bewildered woman, whose faded shawl had seen its seventh summer, and whose solitary silk gown had been chameleon-hued by time, was entertained, hour after hour, by the detail of operations involving thousands and tens of thousands of pounds, and, perhaps taught to repine that, of all the mighty mass of wealth which was yearly poured out under the eyes of her labor-bowed helpmate, so very, very minute a portion ever passed into his own possession.

It may be thought that this moral portrait of the obscure and hardworking drudge of commerce is overcharged, but we know that such is not the case. Even in the present day, many, too many of these human automata, these breathing machines, set in motion only by the peculiar spring adapted to their avocation, and rusted into uselessness for all beyond their own peculiar and narrow sphere of compulsatory action; men in whom even sense of physical enjoyment and moral dignity have alike become deadened, or at best distorted by the mindless monotony of their daily tasks, may still be found in all great cities, but more especially in our own mammoth-like and all-absorbing London. The world-grasping trader, whose argosies encumber distant seas, and to whom the winds come from every quarter of the globe freighted with gold; the merchant-princes, whose ingots sway the fate of empires, and whose occasional ruin shakes the whole fabric of commercial Europe; these ask hands ready and willing, and obedient hands, to work out the design of the one master-spirit of the Pandemonium of gain, but with the head or the heart of the salaried slave, they have nothing whatever to do, so long as they interfere not with the just execution of his allotted task.

Brighter days, as it is hoped, are now dawning, nay, have already dawned, for the obscure but important class of laborers, who, like the miner, prepare the ore of commerce for the crucible, but it will require time to awaken within them sufficient moral energy to send them forth on the heart-gladdening sabbath free from the heavy cares and sordid speculations of their daily and hourly existence.

What refinement of intellect, what generosity of sentiment, can rationally be anticipated from the raw and almost uneducated youth, who grows on to manhood in the close and stifling atmosphere of gain?—Who, year by year, hears every quality of the head and heart exposed to the test of wealth?—Who learns, and who never forgets, that the "best man on 'Change" is he who buttons his snug great-coat over the largest amount of bank bills? Human nature will be human nature still, under every phase, and although the generous spirit may for a while contend, it is ultimately silenced by the potent spell of self-interest and self-advancement.

Yet it is beautiful to reflect how comparatively few of these slaves of the lamp wholly degenerate—how steadily they toil on, surrounded by what they hold to be the greatest good on earth, and yet preserve their honesty. Health and hope may alike fail, but their task is before them, and they perform it nobly to the last, rejoicing or sorrowing as the coffers of their employers are filled or emptied, and making a common interest of what they have almost taught themselves to feel as a common cause.

And Jackson, poor, humble-hearted, long-enduring Jackson, was one of these. The opulence of the house to which he belonged was his glory and his pride, and almost seemed to reflect its prosperity upon his own squalid home. He would not have resented a personal affront; his courage would have failed him for such a purpose, but a syllable which reflected upon the credit of his employers would at once have aroused him to indignation and defiance.

And now, as we have said, his heart was full. His world was a narrow one, and he could ill afford to lose one of the objects about which it had closed in. He spoke to the dying man—once—twice—in a meek, low voice, which faltered with feeling, but no answer was returned. It was evident that the little strength which yet remained to him was expended in the firm clasp which he still retained of the important packet.

At length his lack-lustre eye wandered languidly round the apartment until it rested upon Gertrude, who sat weeping silently apart. For an instant an expression, almost of fierceness, convulsed the muscles of his face, but it passed away, and he motioned her to approach. She obeyed, and then, with considerable difficulty, he placed the papers in her hand, and once more closed his eyes with a groan which no mere bodily anguish could have extorted from him.

Despite his affliction, a gleam of satisfaction irradiated the hard features of the observant clerk. He even nodded his head significantly towards the agitated and bewildered girl, as he murmured almost inaudibly, "It is done at last. It is done at last, and now he will be easier."

Then he drew still nearer to the sick-bed, and bent over the sufferer as if to compel one last look of recognition, but he watched in vain. Mr. Spencer had resigned his most cherished hold on life, and was still battling with the necessity to which he was compelled to yield. He lay for a while still, quite still and motionless, while the laboring spasms from which he had been previously suffering were subdued, and he breathed lightly and almost imperceptibly: nature was, however, only pausing for a brief space, in order to rally all her remaining energies for one last effort, and as the anxious watchers stood around him, he suddenly sat upright in his bed, with extended arms and clutching fingers, as he shrieked out:

"Give me back my gold!—My gold! I have toiled for it, fasted for it, and it is mine!—ALL mine! Give it back, I say! Has it not cost me alike body and soul! Thieves!—Thieves!—Will no one help me? Miserable old man that I am, give me back my gold! I cannot die till I have counted it once more—only once more—and then ———"

But again the crimson tide gushed from his lips, and he fell heavily back upon the pillow; there was a sharp struggle, a low sigh, and Mrs. Sharp drew Gertrude from the bedside.

"You had better leave the room, ma'am," she said, as she supported the tottering steps of the orphan to the door; "You can be of no further service here, for the poor gentleman is gone."

CHAPTER XLVIII.

THE poison worked at Westrum. It was in vain that Mortimer sought some cause of quarrel with his unwelcome guest, for Trevor was too listless and too well-bred to take offence where he persisted in declaring that such an intention was impossible, while, once more thralled by the beauty, and fascinated by the accomplishments of his brilliant hostess, he became cautious in his demeanor, and measured in his attentions. The master-spirit of Mrs. Lamerly was, moreover, at work, and the presence of Mortimer always sufficed to call forth all her playful and pretty coquetry, addressed, as those around her supposed, to the fashionable baronet, but which she tempered by such appealing glances towards Frederic, as encouraged him to believe that he had at least an equal share in their display.

A heart cast back upon itself is easily awakened to renewed happiness, and we already know the morbid yearning of Mortimer for the affection of those about him. Much, therefore, as he despised the friend of his wife, he could not continue insensible to her evident preference of himself. True, she appeared to put forth all her powers in order to dazzle Trevor, but when they chanced to meet without witnesses, the brilliancy of her eyes was softened by an expression of meek and womanly devotion, which, to a nature so sensitive as his own, was infinitely more attractive than the most radiant smiles. All her coquetry disappeared, all her factitious graces were laid aside, and her very voice faltered as though it trembled to meet his ear. Yet still he did not love her. Even slighted as he was by Sybil, she had been too thoroughly the ideal of his fancy to fade at once from his heart, and a gnawing unhappiness, which to him appeared a presentiment of evil, clouded his spirit.

Nor was the position of Sybil herself one of less constraint and difficulty. The unfortunate relationship which she had invented between herself and Sir Horace, naturally invested him with privileges which he could not otherwise have claimed, and although he never addressed her in the language of gallantry, there was, nevertheless, a peculiarity in his manner of which it was impossible for her to remain unconscious, while they had so many tastes and prejudices in common, that his society possessed a charm in her eyes of which she could not divest it.

Too indolent to indulge in the sports of the field, utterly unoccupied by business of any kind, and consequently at the disposal of the circle in which he chanced to move, Trevor found many opportunities of renewing his old friendship with Sybil, and of profiting by the advantages due to her indiscreet deception, while Mortimer was engaged in the superintendence of his estate, and attending agricultural and county dinners, and it was singular upon those occasions, how capriciously Mrs. Lamerly turned all the battery of her baby-graces upon Lord John, or the Honorable Theodore. Lady Clara sneered, and Mrs. Babington raised her fine eyes in horror, but the widow heeded neither sneers nor glances; she was accountable to no one for the variations of her mood, and so she calmly lisped out her piquant slanders, and revenged herself by an indifference to all comment which, in a better cause, would have been almost sublime.

Meanwhile, the intimacy between Sybil and her old lover strengthened with every succeeding day, and unconsciously she recovered the elasticity of spirit which appeared to have abandoned her since her marriage. Every sentence became once more an epigram, and every impulse a fascination. The calmer temperament of Frederic had, in some degree, checked the exuberance of her nature, but with Trevor she was once more her former self. Her vanity was flattered, and she soon ceased to remember all the imprudence and the mortification of the past. Encouraged by his evident admiration, and the delight with which he participated in those sarcastic, witty, and pungent conversations in which she felt that she was unrivalled, she too soon forgot that he cared for nothing save the gratification of the moment, and gave her self up irresistingly to the spell of his sympathy.

With the most intense selfishness did Trevor watch every gradation of feeling which she exhibited towards him, and had he trusted himself to speak upon such a subject, he would calmly have declared that he was neither her mentor nor her guide; that he was in no way responsible for her actions, and that past experience had not tended to discourage him in his present pursuit. But Sir Horace had few friends, and no confidant, save indeed the diplomatist's widow, and even she had volunteered the office, and was endured rather than encouraged. His secret was therefore safe, and the self-deluding Sybil left free to shape out her own destiny.

Surrounded by persons who, from peculiar causes, were at once authorized and inclined to be indulgent, Mrs. Mortimer had no one near her save her mother, who would have put forth a hand to lead her back into the path of prudence, and even that mother appeared wilfully to close her eyes against the growing evil.

But it was not so. No change of place or society had any longer the slightest effect upon Mrs. Delamere. Always languid, listless, and hypochondriacal, her days succeeded each other in the most insipid monotony. Scarcely did she appear conscious of the change of season, or the progress of time.

The boldest flirtation might have been carried on in her very presence, and she would never have remarked it. Her early years had been those of indolence and inertness, by which her mental faculties had been enervated; a period of pain and anxiety supervened, in which, true to her acquired nature, she weakly resigned her own will and wishes—her own better will, and worthier wishes, into the keeping of her daughter, and if at times a sickening dread of the ultimate result of that daughter's actions bowed down her feeble spirit, she no sooner saw her doubts removed, and her terrors terminated, by a marriage which surpassed her hopes, than she sank into a moral lethargy, from which she made no effort to escape.

Satisfied that Sybil was married, she never cared to remember that she might yet have many trials before her, dangerous to so vain and ambitious a nature as hers, and as her counsel or opinion was never asked upon any subject, so neither did she seek to proffer it.

Nothing, in short, save actual bodily absence, could have created a more effectual separation between mother and daughter, than the system which they had severally adopted, and if an appeal was, by some strange chance, made to Mrs. Delamere by a third party, the never-failing reply of, "Sybil knows best," was the inevitable result of so bootless an attempt to identify her with the events which were taking place about her.

Nevertheless, every incidental attention or mark of affection which she received from her child, would light up the dull eyes of the old lady for a moment, but these gradually made a less demand upon her maternal feelings. The spirit of the world, with all its exacting follies and engrossing vanities, had fastened upon the heart of Sybil, and left her little leisure for sympathy in the whims and wishes of a voluntary invalid; while so perfect was her power over the weakened nerves and failing faculties of her mother, that after she had once or twice warned her of the danger of betraying the falsehood of her implied relationship to Trevor, poor Mrs. Delamere almost succeeded in persuading herself that it really existed, and when Sir Horace, half in jest, and half in scorn, occasionally addressed her as his aunt, she replied to his remark without the slightest symptom of discomposure.

Thus all conspired to aid the projects of the vain and worldly baronet; too cautious to commit himself in the presence of Mortimer, by word or look, he had made good his footing at Westrum, while Mortimer himself, too weak to declare and enforce his will, even where he felt it to be right and fitting, lest he should once again be made the scoff of the idle and the impertinent, and cited as a jealous husband, and moreover somewhat engrossed by the clever coquetries of Mrs. Lamerly, suffered the growing intimacy of the soi distant cousins to progress as it might, satisfied that, upon the first legitimate occasion, he should be able to terminate it by a word.

Such an experience is at all times hazardous, but especially so with persons of the temperament of Mortimer—men who are contented to live on au jour la journée; procrastinating for the sake of momentary peace, hedged in by morbid prejudices, and never glancing beyond a certain and narrow range of vision. Men, moreover, who have been reared and fostered in the worship of self, and who must be injured in that precious self before they can force themselves into energy.

An imprudence, or rather be it said, an indiscretion on the part of Sybil, would have aroused him on the instant, because it would have touched his honor, but he had nothing tangible to work upon. The whole tone of his wife's society was objectionable, but it was nevertheless considered a privilege, even by the most prudent and correct of their country neighbors, to be admitted within its charmed circle, and he dared not, therefore, complain. They had talked of retrenchment on their return to Westrum, yet far from taking steps to retrieve their former excesses, they were, even under their own roof, and in that comparatively obscure part of the country, still living considerably beyond their means. Yet here also he feared to remonstrate. Had he not assured Sybil, when she formerly rejected his hand on the plea of her own ruined fortune, that he could so amply supply her every wish, that she would never have cause to remember so unimportant a circumstance? It is true that he had not speculated upon the outlay requisite to gratify all the elegant caprices and high-bred exactions of a vain and worldly woman; that, accustomed to the quiet and unostentatious comfort of his mother's household, he had never calculated upon the amount of expenditure necessary to maintain, in proper keeping and consistency, a large establishment, with its concomitant equipages, attendants, and table. He saw himself surrounded by guests about whom he cared nothing, and who returned his indifference.

He was no longer at home in his own house; he had no interest in common even with his wife, and yet he hesitated to break the spell which was darkening about him. His only hope lay in the attainment of the office for which he was still soliciting, but hitherto he had merely received professions which had brought forth no fruit. Still, the ignis fatuus lured him on. He was afraid to believe that he could ultimately fail, and when he ventured to expostulate with Sybil upon the subject, she coolly dismissed it with the remark, that so long as they continued in the country nothing could be anticipated in the shape of definite success. People must be upon the spot to carry a point of so much importance, and meanwhile he was, if not enlarging his circle of friends, at least binding them to his interests by hospitality and kindness.

Mortimer listened, and even if he did not quite believe, he at least yielded, and Sybil's point was gained. Her days passed on amid admiration and amusement; she forgot the past, and she would not look into the future, and thus week after week went by, and the winter was drawing to a close, and her party rapidly dispersing; Lord John took flight for the last month of the dead season, to dullify dutifully with the duke, his brother, at his old castle in the Highlands; the Honorable Theodore to Baden-Baden, at once to increase his debts and to distance his duns; Mrs. Babington to her aunt's in Dorsetshire, to try the effect of her matured charms on a rich cousin recently arrived from India, and Lady Clara to Paris, to make her annual curtsey at the Tuileries. Mrs. Lamerly, however, still lingered; she had no rich cousins or ducal brothers—no footing at the ,French court, or stake at the rouge-et-noir table, and she found it so difficult to tear herself away from her little pet Eva, and her comfortable home at Westrum, that day succeeded day, and she still maintained her post.

At length, however, when even Trevor, despite the well-worn privilege of his cousinship, found himself compelled to depart in his turn; as Sybil made no sign when her dear friend more than hinted that she was ready to sacrifice herself till the commencement of the London season, Mrs. Lamerly was reluctantly forced to follow his example, and then, for the first time since their marriage, Frederic and Sybil found themselves alone beneath their own roof.

Much as Mortimer had desired such an opportunity of retrenchment, it was not, however, without something like regret that he saw the carriage of the widow drive off. She had amused his idleness, and better still, she loved his child. He had now, moreover, no opportunity of escaping from his reflections, and they were far from consolatory. He had been married little more than twelve months, and he had already exhausted three years' income, lost the affections of his wife, trifled with his self-respect, and compromised the future prospects of Eva.

For a few hours he felt melancholy, and even the caresses of his little girl had partly lost their charm, but as the evening drew in he became less sad, and more irritable. A feeling of indignation mingled with his self-reproach. He began to consider himself as more sinned against than sinning, and as the victim of circumstances which he had neither possessed the power to foresee nor to prevent; while at intervals something like anger against the supine indifference of Sybil to interests which were so vital to himself, mingled with his musings.

They had retired from the dining-room, where they had partaken of a tête-à-tête dinner almost in silence, a nervous attack having confined Mrs. Delamere to her chamber for the day. A single lamp burnt upon a console at the extremity of the apartment, while a small reading-table stood beside the chair of Sybil, who lay listlessly back among her cushions, with closed eyes, mechanically passing a paper-knife along the already opened pages of a review. From time to time, however, she looked up with ill-concealed impatience at the gorgeous time piece upon the mantel, as if to chide the tardiness of the jewelled hands, while Mortimer occupied the other side of the fire-place, and sat gazing upon the mimic pageantry of towers, and rocks, and monsters, presented by the burning mass before him.

A cloud was upon his brow, and his lips were rigidly compressed. The enchantress who had wiled him from himself was placed so near to him that their extended hands could have met, but the enchantment was nearly over, and those hands were not outstretched.

As he arrived at the last phase of his reflections Mortimer suddenly raised his head, and looked earnestly at his wife. Her eyes were once more closey, and this fact only increased his irritation.

"Perhaps, Sybil," he commenced abruptly; "I shall find no better opportunity than the present for endeavoring to impress upon you the necessity for an immediate change in our mode of living. So far, I have only been weak, but, should I suffer it to be pursued much longer upon its present scale, I shall become dishonest. The subject is an unpleasant one for both of us; it must be so, but it is my duty not to shrink from it. The unfortunate delusion into which I was betrayed by my ambition, has, I think, by this time disclosed its utter fallacy, and consequently, the immense outlay which was intended to further its success must finish with it. My fortune, ample as it is, or rather was, will no longer suffice to maintain so large an establishment, and we must also remember that we have a daughter."

"You have chosen a strange moment in which to sermonize," was the calm reply, "nor is the tone of your communication calculated to reconcile me to its import. One would imagine that I was the person to blame for the outlay of which you complain."

"I had no intention to reproach you, Sybil, but, even as you have shared my pleasures, so did I believe that you would be willing to bear your portion of my anxieties," said Frederic: "It is but another disappointment to find that I have been deceived."

Mrs. Mortimer raised herself proudly to a more erect position, as, with a scornful gesture, she asked petulantly: "And I—think you that I have not also had to contend against mortification and disappointment? Did you imagine that I have no cause for regret? Did I not frankly confess to you before our marriage that I could never bear to be confounded with the common herd who are satisfied to vegetate, and have not moral energy to live? Have I not subsequently urged you to escape from this social nullity? And how have you responded to my appeal? Discouraged on the very threshold of success, apathetic where you should be resolute, and looking to the means when you should care only for the end, you have negatived all my previsions, and I am condemned to see you fall back contentedly into the insignificance from which I have been laboring to withdraw you."

"Sybil!" exclaimed her husband, starting to his feet—

"We are both, it would appear, unhappy in the selection of our subject to-night," was the cold response of Mrs. Mortimer to this involuntary demonstration of indignant anger, "but we shall do well to understand each other. My good offices are still at your service, should you care to accept them, although I cannot submit to be lectured like a froward child."

Mortimer pressed his hand upon his burning forehead. He feared to trust himself with words.

After the pause of a moment Sybil again spoke, and it was with less asperity. "Listen to me, Frederic," she said: "Let us not forget the respect which we owe to ourselves by bandying reproaches. You know the ambition of my nature, nor have I to learn the supineness of yours. I cannot forego the hope that I shall see you assume that station in the world to which you are entitled, but I know enough of public men, and of public life, to feel convinced that, without some effort and some sacrifice on your own part, it is vain for you to anticipate success in any undertaking. You just now quoted your child as a reason for withdrawing from a contest in which the attempt itself does you honor, and now I quote her as an incentive to exertion. A brilliant position in life will advantage her more than all the hoarded gold which you could ever accumulate in obscurity."

"But what if I am ruined in the process?"

Sybil shrugged her shoulders. "You talk as though you had no resources."

"They are, at least, not inexhaustible."

"At all events," said the lady, as with one of her most sunny smiles she extended her hand to her husband; "They will suffice to renew the trial. The coming season will, beyond all doubt, decide the question of your success. The first and most difficult step is already taken. Your pretensions are known, and your eligibility for the post you solicit has been admitted. The rest is a mere question of time, and the judicious employment of private and powerful interest."

"Sybil," said Mortimer, as he clasped the proffered hand, and, thoroughly appeased, looked fondly in her face: "that smile has thrown me back upon the past. I shall not seek to resist it. Only encourage my endeavors by a renewal of the affection which I feared that I had lost, and I will again have faith in your prophecy.

Nor did the conversation end here; for Sybil, far from wishing, as she declared, to owe the concession of her husband simply to his consideration for her opinion, was desirous to convince his reason; and she accordingly proceeded to do this by the very effective method of alarming him with the fear of ridicule. What would the world say should he return into obscurity, after so brilliant a début? What could be said, save that his ambition had not extended beyond a momentary appearance, destined like that of a wandering ground-meteor, only to gleam for an instant with a cheating light, and then to be once more absorbed in the obscurity from which it had so uselessly and idly emanated? Should he now retire from the contest moreover, all the expenditure of which he complained would have been made in vain, and surely, this fact required some consideration. And she urged all this so gently, so placidly, with so persuasive a smile, and so convincing an accent, that Mortimer, already dreaming a renewal of the halycon days of their early marriage, was only too ready to admit the feasibility of her arguments and too eager to prove his assent to her propositions.

And so the town-house was once more engaged; the equipages retained; the club subscriptions paid up; and the land-steward silenced for another season.

CHAPTER XLIX.

Gertrude had scarcely reached her room, when the solemn promise which she had made to her departed relative, that she would immediately after his decease take possession of the important pocket-book, recurred to her mind; and terrible as she felt a return to the death-chamber to be at such a moment, she did not hesitate to redeem it. For an instant she paused, however, to collect herself, but only for an instant; and then with a calm step, she recrossed the threshold of the silent apartment, and approached the bed. Beside it knelt the meek and faithful clerk, holding within his own the hand of the dead man; and as, upon hearing the light step of Gertrude, he raised his head, and looked up inquiringly, she saw that there were traces of tears upon his pale and withered cheeks.

Instinctively she laid her hand upon his shoulder and smiled a sad smile, which he appeared instantly to comprehend; for, rising from his knees, he hastily wiped away the tell-tale moisture, and faltered out in a trembling whisper; "I know it, my dear young lady, I know it. I have no right to be squandering time upon my own grief, when I should be thinking of you. But Madam," he continued, with a fresh and irrepressible burst of emotion; "he who lies there was my first friend; almost, I may say, my only friend; to him I owe the bread by which I live. It is hard to part from one's only friend—very hard. The happy and the prosperous cannot understand this, for they have so many that they scarcely miss them as they fall away each in their turn. They do not know what it is to have but one, and to lose him."

"Sincerely do I trust, good old man, that he appreciated your attachment," murmured Gertrude, considerably affected.

"I cannot say, I cannot say, Madam," was the melancholy reply, as he stood with clasped hands contemplating the rigid features of his former patron; "None on earth can ever know what were his real feelings; he kept his own secrets, just as he worked out his own fortune. He always stood alone in the world, and he was able to do it, for his will was strong, and he needed no help from others. I shall never know what he felt for me, neither shall I ever forget what he did for me. But for him I might have been a beggar."

"Your gratitude must have brought a blessing to his death-bed."

"I trust it may, young lady, I trust it may. Bless you, at all events, for uttering such a hope! And now, madam, what orders have you to give me?"

"First, Mr. Jackson, be good enough," whispered the orphan, while a slight tremor passed over her, and she clung to the chair near which she chanced to be standing for support, "to give me from beneath the pillow of my poor uncle a pocket-book which you will find there."

She was silently obeyed.

"And now, if you please," she pursued, "we will go down stairs to the sitting-room, and I will explain to you the nature of the services for which I shall intrude upon your kindness."

The clerk bowed respectfully, cast another long look towards the bed of death, and then opened the door of the chamber for Gertrude to pass out, but she also paused to contemplate for a moment the countenance of the dead man. The eyes had already been reverently closed, and the luxuriant masses of silver hair drawn more closely about the pallid brow; the outline of the face was strikingly fine and intellectual, the forehead high and broad, the lips well set, and full of firm and almost harsh expression, the nose perfectly chiselled, and the whole character of the head calm and noble; but as the glance of Gertrude travelled on along the sheet by which the body was covered, she shuddered to perceive that even the pang of death itself had failed to relax the firm clenching of the bony hands. There was something frightful in this resolute grasp which had fastened upon nothing, when life, and all life's possessions, were passing from him, and with a deep sigh, she bent for a moment over the corpse while she breathed out a silent prayer, and then slowly left the room followed by her deputed counsellor.

On entering the little parlor she found that the shutters were already closed, but that, by the active and judicious zeal of Mrs. Sharp, a comfortable fire had been kindled in the grate, while a couple of candles, placed upon the table, gave the room an appearance of comparative comfort. Thankfully did Gertrude throw herself upon a seat, as she motioned to her meek and silent companion to follow her example, and ien gave an unconstrained course to her tears, id wept for awhile in silence, until the awe and chaustion produced by the scene through which he had just passed became gradually relieved. or did the old man attempt, either by word or esture, to check this overflowing of her surnarged heart. His respect for the niece of his atron was too profound to enable him to offer he slightest interference with her feelings, and ius he sat mutely before her, with his dim, but ow tearless eyes riveted upon the dingy almaack above the fire-place, and losing himself in peculations and probabilities, which, although me of them might point, however faintly and oubtingly, towards his own interests, were verthelcss mainly directed to those of the soliry and evidently helpless girl who now looked him for support.

Perhaps he was not unthankful for this temorary pause. It is, at all events, certain, that e no sooner saw the orphan wipe away her ars, than he drew towards him the tattered riting-case, and requested her permission at nce to inform his employers of the melancholy vent which had just occurred, and to request eir promised permission to absent himself om his desk until his presence should no longer e required beneath the roof of his late master.

Gertrude was grateful for the suggestion, and his necessary missive written, it was immeiately despatched to its destination by a trusty essenger, while a second, more brief, and remiring less precision, was at the same time conigned to the post, to warn the wife of the writer hat she must not anticipate his return until the orrow.

"And now, madam," he said, as the door osed upon Mrs. Sharp, and they were again lone, "you have only to inform me of your ishes, and I am ready to obey them. The poor entleman has, without doubt, already made uch communications to you, as will enable us carry out his instructions."

"He has indeed done so, Mr. Jackson," relied Gertrude, as with a trembling hand she roduced the pocket-book, and proceeded to unasp it; "this case, as he told me, contains the m which he wishes to expend upon—" she aused, unable to proceed.

"I understand, madam," said the old man, hile, with an innate refinement which did him onor, he withdrew his eyes from her face, "and have only to ask if I can be of any service on he melancholy occasion."

"I depend upon you wholly, my good sir," eplied Gertrude, drawing the note from its hidng-place; "I am so utterly inexperienced in all natters of business, that I shall be unable to stir step in this melancholy affair without your id. Will you, then, take pity upon my helpessness, and dispose of the money as you may udge best, being careful, however, to expend it ll, for this one purpose, such having been the xpress command of my uncle?"

"You shall be obeyed, madam."

"But—that is not all," pursued Gertrude after painful pause, during which her cheek and row had become crimson, "will you forgive e, Mr. Jackson, if I ask you to let me see the—he—in short, to acquaint me afterwards with the precise manner in which it was disbursed? Believe me, I earnestly entreat of you, when I declare that no doubt of your honor induces such a request, but I must do my duty to the end, painful though it may be."

"Once more be assured that I understand you, madam," said the humble-minded and broken-spirited clerk, without one symptom of surprise or indignation. "It is no less my duty than your own to obey his will. You shall duly receive my accounts, with which, I trust, you will be satisfied."

Gertrude instinctively extended her hand to her aged protector, for such at that moment she truly felt him to be, but if her inferential distrust of his probity had failed to move him to emotion, such was far from being the case with this exhibition of condescending courtesy.

Everything is comparative in this world, and thus the niece of the opulent head of the house of Spencer, Owen and Co., was, in the eyes of the junior clerk of the firm, so august a personage that, for a moment, he doubted the evidence of his senses, but when he not only saw that small white hand remain outstretched towards him, but also a sweet smile of confidence and encouragement pass over the fair face of the orphan, he rose respectfully from his chair, and having ventured to clasp it in his own, bowed over it reverently, and then burst into tears.

How much of contumely, and harshness, and injustice—how much of hope deferred, and sickening anxiety, and withering privation, had that old man taught himself to endure unmoved during a long life of drudgery and toil! He would have smiled in wonder had any one taken sufficient interest in his fate to marvel at his stoicism, for he had long ceased to feel the consciousness of his endurance; it had become matter of habit that he should be buffeted and browbeat by the world; it was the sure inheritance of poverty, and he had accepted it as such. But to the words, and looks, and tones of kindness, he was all unused, and therein, at least, he was no stoic. It seemed to him almost as though he were robbing another of those signs of sympathy,—as if it could be but a glimpse into some unknown world in which he had no share. And yet that world of love and peace, even transient as was the glance, appeared so beautiful; his self-respect, although in his toil-worn breast such a feeling could endure only for an instant, was so awakened, that he could not support the shock, and thus he stood before the distressed and frightened Gertrude, weeping like a child.

"It is nothing, Madam, it is nothing," he at length sobbed out, as he remarked her look of dismay; "I am better now, but the thought that I was holding the hand of my master's niece in mine, and that she was smiling so kindly upon me, was more than I could bear. It is an honor, Madam, that will go down with me to my grave, and I will prove that I am grateful for it. There will not be many such memories to cheer the death-bed of Thomas Jackson."

"I entreat you not to talk in so sad or erroneous a manner," said the orphan gently. "It is I, Mr. Jackson, who am the obliged person, and who shall have much to remember and to thank you for. And now, what is our first duty?"

"True, my dear young lady, in the joy of my own heart, I had forgotten all else. But it has been so very, very seldom my fate to meet with kindness, that I was for a moment beside myself. Now, however, I will lose no more time, for there is much to be done."

"Are you going to leave me, my dear Sir?" asked Gertrude, as with irrepressible alarm she saw him take possession of his hat.

"I must do so, Madam, for awhile."

"But you will return, and share my melancholy dinner, will you not?"

Again the old man raised his eyes to hers in bewildering incredulity, but there was no mistaking the expression of the sweet face that was turned towards him, and stammering out an answer which was unintelligble to Gertrude, and in which she could only distinguish the words honor, and happiness, and gratitude, he bowed more profoundly than ever, and then hurriedly left the room.

It was a relief to the painful feelings of the orphan to find herself compelled to withdraw her thoughts for a time from the melancholy associations of the morning, in order to give the necessary instructions to Mrs. Sharp for the preparation of the meal to which she had invited her late uncle's humble dependent, nor was it without an expression of delight, which she vainly attempted to suppress, that the worthy housekeeper received her orders. Never before had there been such a prospect of plenty beneath that roof since she had been its inmate, and as Gertrude put the small sum necessary for the purpose of providing the unaccustomed luxuries into her hand, she looked almost as incredulous as the poor clerk.

"I am sorry to give you this additional trouble, Mrs. Sharp," said the gentle girl, "but Mr. Jackson is so very kind, and my uncle respected him so much, that I could not bear that he should feel himself neglected. Above all, do not forget the wine, he will have much fatigue to encounter to-day, I fear, nor will you stand in less need of some additional support."

How Mrs. Sharp longed to throw her arms about the neck of the considerate young creature who had even remembered her at such a moment! but respect restrained her, and she could only falter out her thanks.

"All shall be done as you desire, Ma'am," she added, after an instant's silence, "and should you require anything in my absence, the nurse is already in my master's chamber, and her daughter waiting any orders that you may please to give, in the next room. I ventured to engage her without your permission, as I feared that you would feel lonely when I was obliged to leave the house."

Gertrude very sincerely expressed her thanks for this consideration, and felt considerably relieved by the consciousness that, on the departure of the housekeeper, she should not be condemned to the sole companionship of the death-room. Moreover, her conversation with the worthy woman, inconsequent as it necessarily was, had tended to restore her to composure and accordingly she had no sooner withdrawn than Gertrude seated herself at her desk, to inform both Ernest and Miss. Warrington of the near cessation of her duties in town, and her approaching return to Bletchley.

She could have chosen no more judicious employment, for the death of her uncle once communicated, her imagination bounded into the future, and she forgot her present trials in the contemplation of her coming happiness, and thus she poured out her whole heart to her lover, and confessed to him that now, when they were so soon to meet again, she felt all the wretchedness of their brief separation, but she should return to him, as she trusted, a wiser and a better woman, for she should be more than ever able to appreciate all the blessings of her destiny. And then she had a thousand affectionate messages to send to Mary and Eleanor a thousand things to ask of them when they were once more together, and so she wrote on and the time passed away unheeded, until a gentle knock at the door announced the return of her guest.

This was succeeded by the appearance of the housekeeper with the preparations for dinner, and although, as she came and went, Gertrude and her new friend were several times left together, Mr. Jackson carefully abstained from any allusion to the business upon which he had been engaged, nor did the orphan venture to question him. The common sense of the old man taught him that the subject was not only likely to increase either the appetite or the spirits of the delicate girl, who was now in some degree under his charge, and so he talked respectfully of the weather, and the state of the streets, and endeavored to turn her thoughts to other and less depressing topics.

He was repaid for his care by seeing a faint smile at intervals rise to her lips, and as the pleasurable impression produced by the letter which she had just been writing had not worn off, she seated herself at the table with less repugnance than she had anticipated, and if she did not profit by the comfortable meal before her to an extent which satisfied the anxious Mrs. Sharp, she nevertheless compelled herself to partake of it.

Meanwhile, the modest old man who shared her hospitality was still less at ease than herself, for even his feeling of regret for his lost master could not overcome his sense of confusion at the strange situation in which he found himself so unexpectedly placed, but gradually as he saw with what anxious and even affectionate attention his young hostess supplied and almost anticipated, his wants, and found himself cheered by a glass of tavern wine, which, questionable as might be its quality was to him, nevertheless, a most unaccustomed luxury, he resumed a certain degree of self possession, and was able to partake with comfort of the good things before him.

But even this dinner, strange as was such a meal in that abode of famine, could not endure for ever, and when the cloth was drawn, the candles snuffed, and the fire renewed, Gertrude and her companion were once more alone.

For a time both were silent. They had so few subjects in common upon which they could converse, and even these, with one exception, were already exhausted, yet still the old man shrank from renewing that one. He felt that all he had to tell was so sad and so harrowing, that every moment gained was a pang spared to the inexperienced and sensitive girl, but ere long he began to feel the futility and even danger of any further delay. From one moment to another he anticipated the arrival of those whom he had summoned, and he consequently rallied his courage to prepare Gertrude for their appearance.

There is always something sad, if not revolting, in the visit of those unsympathising servitors of dissolution, who first break upon the stillness of the house of death; the very nature of their errand is fearful—they come to claim all that is left of what was once life, and will, and action—to tread heavily over the floor where others have previously moved with a noiseless step—to talk in hoarse although suppressed voices where the dull echoes have latterly been hushed—and coldly to pursue their avocation in the very presence of eternity.

Perhaps it is well that there is no possibility of delaying this first trial, for where the ties of love have been rent asunder, who would have courage to sanction so unhallowed an intrusion?—Who could summon to the bedside, so lately the scene of agony and prayer, the unsympathising eyes and hands of mercenary strangers? Human nature is ever prone to resist where resistance is possible, and suffering certain; happy is it, therefore, that it is taught in so solemn a moment to feel its own impotence, and to submit.

In Gertrude's case the greater anguish of such a trial was spared, but still it was not without a shudder and a sickness at the heart, that she learned the near approach of her lugubrious visitors. Vainly did she endeavor to combat her emotion, for alas! her thoughts reverted to another and a dearer death-bed, and she remembered what she had formerly experienced. Nor was this all; for memory is as ingenious to wound as to console, and as she dwelt upon the loss of her earliest friend, all the sorrows which had succeeded that bereavement came freshly before her.

The sullen tread of feet in the narrow passage, and the murmured sound of strange voices, at length announced the advent of the expected functionaries, but it was not until the stairs had ceased to creak under their steps, that the kind-hearted old man, who had averted his eyes from Gertrude as he saw her suddenly conceal her face in her handkerchief, and struggle for composure, rose silently from his seat, and followed them.

Poor girl! she felt very wretched, and more thoroughly alone than she had ever yet done. Fain would she have shut out every sound, and still, with that morbid yearning to the terrible so inherent in a sensitive nature, she strained her ear to detect their movements, and followed them in fancy through all their gloomy task. It was a great relief to her when they at last departed. The first sad act of the drama of death was over, and she breathed more freely.

CHAPTER L.

When the old man, who was now her sole support, again entered the room, which he did a few minutes subsequently, he was even paler than before, and there was an expression of anxiety upon his care-worn face, which he could not conceal; he however seated himself in silence, and made no attempt to break the stillness. Some time consequently elapsed in dark and dreary thought on both sides, until Gertrude, more and more convinced by the uneasy working of his features, that he desired, but had not courage, to make some necessary communication to her, resolutely addressed him.

"You have something to say to me, Mr. Jackson, by which you fear that I shall be distressed?"

"Not distressed, I trust, my dear young lady, but you have already suffered so much, that I cannot bear to add to your trial by telling you that you have still a painful duty to perform. Mr. Spencer perhaps informed you that he had left a will?"

"It is in my possession," replied Gertrude quietly.

"Are you also aware that I hold the duplicate?"

"I am."

"And this will, Madam, do you desire at once to ascertain its contents? If so, I must summon Mr. Collins, by whom it was drawn up, as I believe that it would not be legal, and certainly, in any case, it would not be advisable to open it in his absence."

"We will, if you please, defer all such considerations until after my poor uncle's funeral. Under any circumstances, I could not permit myself to exhibit what I should regard as a disrespectful anxiety, by suffering its contents to be investigated at an earlier period, while now, as you are well aware, it is a matter of no consequence whatever."

The worthy clerk looked up in the most profound astonishment, but he made no comment upon her words.

"We have, fortunately," pursued the orphan, in the same calm and unexcited tone, "received from his own lips all the instructions necessary to enable us to fulfill his latest wishes as regards himself, and to those only I am anxious to confine my thoughts until they are scrupulously accomplished. The rest of our task will then be reduced to a mere painful ceremony."

"But, my dear young lady," urged the old man deferentially, "would it not be well so to arrange as to enable you to conclude all your painful duties on the same day?"

"I shall be most grateful to you, if you can accomplish so desirable an object."

"Leave it to me, leave it to me," said her companion, flattered by the confidence which she reposed in him. "My present principal, Mr. Owen, will wish to be invited to the ceremony, for he has already mentioned the matter to me, while, as I before ventured to observe, we cannot dispense with the attendance of Mr. Collins. Are there any other persons whom you desire to summon?"

"I am a stranger in London," replied Gertrude, gratified to find that her uncle would be followed to the grave at least by two of his former associates, "but you may probably be aware of other individuals to whom the attention is due."

Jackson shook his head. "He lived much alone, Madam, as I have already told you, and made few friendships. He was an able man in his office, and found there all the amusement that he required. I believe that we can do no more."

"So be it, then," said the orphan, "I leave everything in your hands, satisfied that you will act with kindness and judgment. And, my dear Sir, should some small increase of funds be necessary, do not scruple to say so. I have not much in my power, but——"

"Not a pound, not a shilling, young lady," was the rejoinder, "it is not from a residence like this that people look for an expensive procession. I have already made my calculation; we are amply supplied, and, in accordance with my poor master's directions, have only to assure ourselves that the money is well laid out."

Gertrude sighed; to her it was so difficult to reconcile the idea of wordly prudence with the exigencies of the death-room. She had yet seen too little of life to be aware how often the sublime is merged in the vulgar; how small interests jar upon lofty duties, and how tenaciously the demands of every day existence retain their hold under the most solemn circumstances.

The week which succeeded was a trying one to the lonely girl. The shrouded and coffined corpse, the closed windows, the measured tread, the suppressed voices, were all full of dark and gloomy association, but slowly as it seemed to wear away, it at length terminated, and from her narrow window she saw the modest procession leave the house. Her tears fell abundantly, as she remembered that the cold corpse which they were then bearing to the grave had once been warm with life, and had, if not loved her, at least felt for her, during a few short days, the interest of a relative, and she was thus bound only to two other beings on earth, while even one of those two had ceased to admit the claim.

Moreover, the house of death is always desolate when the one object of all the thoughts and cares of the survivors is borne from it for ever, and not even the unaccustomed stir and lightsomeness which so soon succeed, can for a time disperse the sadness by which it has been so long invaded.

Wearily and heavily, therefore, did the time pass by until the return of the funeral party, at which period the orphan was aware that repugnant as it might be at such a moment to her feelings, she must prepare to meet and thank the friends of her uncle, who had thus testified their respect for his memory.

Beyond this consideration Gertrude never looked. She was aware that the will of her deceased relative was to be read, and she had been warned by the careful old man, who had superintended all the arrangements, that she could not reasonably absent herself. It was therefore a duty to be accomplished, and she prepared to fulfill it, only marvelling at the necessity of a will where there was nothing save the squalid remnants of poverty to bequeath. It seemed like a mockery under the circumstances, and a mockery so solemn that it could produce nothing but pain.

"Would that my poor uncle had trusted to my good feeling!" she murmured to herself, as she smoothed back the glossy braids of her hair, bathed her swollen eyes, and cast a last languid look at her mourning dress, which, since the death of Mrs. Mortimer, she had never laid aside; "He had so little to leave, and the two faithful, although humble friends, who have tended him to the last, have so richly earned that little, that he had only to express a wish, or to confide in my sense of justice, to have dispensed with this last needless ceremony. But such has been his pleasure, and I have only to obey."

Calmly, therefore, although affected by a nervous tremor which she could not control, as she remembered that she was about, after a period of utter seclusion, to meet persons to whom she was totally unknown, she awaited the message which was to summon her to the parlor, and when the gentle tap of Mrs. Sharp sounded at the door, she rose without a word, and followed her with the important document in her hand.

As she entered the little sitting-room, both the gentlemen gave a perceptible start, but in the next instant they bowed profoundly as they were presented to the pale and beautiful girl, who, in her close mourning dress, and with downcast eyes, stood timidly before them. A chair was already placed for her beside the table, and in a few moments she recovered her self-possession.

The common-place condolences exacted by the occasion were courteously uttered, and as courteously received, and then, as if aware that their presence must be rather irksome than desirable to the desolate young creature by whose grace and beauty they had been so forcibly impressed, the two gentlemen exchanged a glance of intelligence, and Mr. Collins respectfully inquired whether Miss Mortimer was prepared for the reading of the will. Gertrude replied, by placing in his hand the sealed packet which had been delivered to her by her uncle, while the old clerk at the same time deposited upon the table the duplicate which had been committed to his guardianship.

The seals were broken, and the man of law, already aware of the contents of the parchment, commenced reading, in a calm and clear voice, all those technical preliminaries which betray no trace of what is to succeed, but as he advanced in his task his accent became slightly animated.

Mr. Owen leaned forward in his chair, with an expression of genuine satisfaction upon his mild and benignant countenance, and the kind-hearted old Jackson, who, during the last few days had learned to love the orphan as he had never before loved anything on earth, bent his aged head upon his breast, and rubbed his thin hands together, as though his delight were almost irrepressible.

Suddenly, however, he started, and a vivid flush rose to his cheek. He could scarcely credit the evidence of his senses! And yet it was so—his name had been really mentioned in the will of his first patron. There could be no mistake, and the kind and congratulatory smile of his present employer assured the happy old man that he had heard aright.

Then a deep stillness fell upon that narrow room, and for a short space, no one cared to disturb the silence. But ere long the genial feelings of the warm-hearted merchant could no longer be controlled, and extending his hand to Gertrude, he said affectionately: "My dear young lady, suffer me to be the first to congratulate you. My poor friend could not have disposed more judiciously of a noble fortune. Long may you live both to enjoy and to adorn it."

"Very little short of £80,000, Miss Mortimer," said the lawyer with a courteous bow, "exclusive of a case of jewels, which your deceased uncle has declared to be contained in a chest in his sleeping-room, and of whose remarkable value I am aware. Give me leave to wish you all happiness in their possession."

The orphan could only look her thanks, for, bewildered by an event which had been by her utterly unforseen, she was greatly and even painfully agitated. To what privations had not her generous relative—for it was thus that she considered his conduct—to what privations had he not submitted, in order to enrich her beyond her wildst hopes! And he was now in his grave, beyond the reach of her gratitude; she could not pour out before him all the warm feelings of her overcharged heart—she could never repay the mighty debt by which she was weighed down.

No thought of her increased importance, not even a recollection of the opportunity which she should now possess to repay, in so far as wealth could do so, the disinterested affection of Ernest Armstrong, crossed her mind at that moment. She saw only, she remembered only, the squalid bed, the fireless grate, and the comfortless desolation of her uncle's sick room. And he had submitted to all this for her sake, and she could not even tell him what she felt!

"And you also, Mr. Jackson," said his considerate principal, who at once detected the inability of the orphan to sustain a conversation, "I very sincerely congratulate you also, sir. The bequest of Mr. Spencer is honorable to you both. I was well aware that he valued you highly, and he has now proved it to yourself. A good servant, sir, will, under all circumcumstances, as you see, make a good master."

"A very pretty little legacy indeed," followed up the more matter-of-fact man of law. "I have seldom been better pleased, Mr. Jackson, than I was when I put that £100 opposite your name, for I had known you well for years. This young lady will pardon me, I am sure, for such a confession, as I had not at that period the honor of her acquaintance."

"You could not have rejoiced more than I do, sir, at such an instance of my uncle's justice," said Gertrude, for the first time breaking silence, as her warm heart sympathized in the evident happiness of the modest dependant, and once more her hand sought that of the old man who had modestly risen to reply to the flattering expressions of Mr. Owen. "I also owe you much, very much, nor will my claims upon your kindness terminate even here, if I can prevail upon this gentleman to consent to your becoming my escort to my home. May I trust, sir," she asked timidly, as she turned towards the smiling merchant, "that you will indeed spare our old friend to me for a few days? I am quite alone, and so shaken by the trials of the last fortnight, that I fear I could scarcely have courage to encounter the journey under any other escort."

"I am sure, my dear young lady, I may safely pledge myself that Mr. Jackson is at your disposal for whatever period you may require his services," was the ready reply. "He certainly does not look an objection, and I, as certainly, cannot advance one. But may not I also be made useful?—or Mrs. Owen, who would be proud and happy to receive you until you leave town?"

Gertrude burst into tears. Her spirits were exhausted, and she could scarcely express her acknowledgments. There was no possibility of mistaking the cause of her emotion, and accordingly both the gentlemen rose, talked together for a moment of their several engagements, and then, warmly shaking hands with the new-made heiress, left the room, attended by the happy old clerk, who appeared to himself to have suddenly entered upon a new existence, and to have thrown off the weight of at least twenty winters.

He had not closed the door after him as he retreated, and it was fortunate, for when, as the last carriage drove away, he returned to the room, he saw Gertrude upon her knees, and forthwith, retiring with a noiseless step, he made his way to the kitchen, where, in an emphatic whisper, he related to the wondering and delighted Mrs. Sharp, and her temporary assistants, the marvellous events of the last hour.

Poor old Jackson! He even looked at his thread-bare coat with a smile, for if he wore it longer, it would be that such was his good will and pleasure. He need not again shrink before a shower, as he remembered the dilapidation which must ensue to the hat of many winters, that he had so long fostered, and then he thought of his wife, and of her faded Sunday gown, of his home, with its many wants, and finally, overcome by a tide of feeling which had never before been unsealed within his breast, he leaned his venerable head upon a table, and wept for very joy.

Life lends us few such tears, and withered be the hand which would check their flow!

CHAPTER LI.

Nothing could exceed the exultation of Mrs. Mortimer upon finding herself once more in London, and in the midst of the dissipation which she loved. All, save her own gratification and amusement, was again forgotten. Scarcely did she spare a thought to the lonely and now really suffering mother, upon whom the lethargic habits of years were beginning to produce the baneful effect of premature old age. Satisfied that during her absence, Mrs. Delamere could still enjoy her well-cushioned chair, her novel, and her ether draughts, Sybil did not care to remember that she was yet susceptible of other gratifications, and the kiss which she had pressed upon her brow when they parted, had been too cold to elicit any demonstration of deeper feeling on the part of the forsaken invalid.

It was only when Frederic affectionately took her hand, and entreated, with an earnestness not to be mistaken, that should she feel herself more dull than she anticipated in her solitude, or that her health required greater care than usual, she would immediately inform him of her wishes, when he would hasten to escort her to town, while Sybil made the necessary preparations for her reception; it was only then that the tears gushed into her eyes, and that she was aroused for an instant from her habitual apathy.

She protested, however, and with sincerity, that she could not encounter the fatigue and discomfort of such a journey; that all she required to recruit her strength was perfect quietude, which the departure of the family would ensure to her; and that as her existence, under all circumstances, had now for some time been one of estrangement from society, she should not suffer from their temporary absence. With this assurance Mortimer was compelled to satisfy himself, and he did so the more readily that Sybil did not appear to share in his apprehensions. She had been so thoroughly accustomed, and indeed encouraged, by her mother herself, to consider that mother during many years as a mere cypher, that it never occurred to her as just possible that there were duties incumbent upon her which she could not conscientiously neglect.

Thus it was without one feeling of self-reproach or compunction, that she drove away from Westrum, to recommence the existence of expensive folly which alone enabled her to realise her ideas of happiness. Moreover, although she was probably not aware that this consideration greatly added to her eagerness to escape the wearisome monotony of home, Trevor was already established in town; nor could she doubt that his time and his services would once more be at her disposal.

Trevor was the fashion; and fashion was Sybil's idol. It might be, as she shudderingly murmured to herself, the last occasion upon which her influence would be sufficiently powerful over her husband to induce him to renew the career of extravagance in which she had involved him; and consequently she resolved to fill her cup of enjoyment even to overflowing.

She had already had painful experience that Mortimer was not likely to remain for ever the passive tool which he had hitherto shown himself in her hands. A single interview had sufficed to prove to her that her power was already on the wane; and therefore like a skilful general, she determined to use it to the very dregs, while she yet possessed the opportunity.

A single week sufficed to settle the Mortimers once more in London, and to collect about them all their former circle. Sybil's opera-box was such a convenience to her female friends, and Frederic's well-ordered dinners so potent an attraction to his male associates, that day succeeded day in one endless round of pleasure.

There was no leisure for thought; and even Mortimer himself was no sooner launched for the second time upon the sparkling tide of London life, than he entered upon it with a zest almost equal to that of his brilliant and selfish wife. The renewed solicitations which he was induced by her persuasions to make in every direction which offered a prospect of success to his diplomatic speculation, rapidly enlarged his circle of acquaintance, and either filled his house with new and equally expensive guests, or withdrew him from it to share in other gaieties equally imprudent.

Mortimer had fallen into the dangerous error of believing in the possibility of an after-retrenchment, which would enable a man who, instead of contenting himself with the income arising from a fine property, lives for a time upon the principal, to redeem his past imprudence. He suffered himself to forget, or at least to disregard the fact, that he was not merely decreasing the actual amount of his ancestral fortune, but also crippling its future proceeds; or if occasionally some such startling conviction would pertinaciously intrude itself, he made a compromise with his conscience by resolving that this should be the last occasion upon which he would be guilty of the folly.

It is so easy to delay until to-morrow what it is unpalatable to undertake to-day.

Nothing could have been more unfortunate than the rapidly increasing estrangement of Mortimer from his home; and it is probable that one expostulation from Sybil would have awakened him to the fact; but this expostulation was never uttered, and it is doubtful whether she would even have remarked his constantly-recurring absences, had it not been from the sense of relief which they afforded.

Despite all her pride, she was aware of a certain restraint in the presence of her husband for with all his constitutional weakness, Mortimer was upright in thought and word, and discouraged by the gravity of his demeanour, and even at times by objections still more decided, the witty and envenomed persiflage in which she so much delighted; and by which she revenged herself, as she believed, upon a world that had undervalued her. It was only with Trevor, and individuals of his stamp, that her brilliant sallies and piquant sarcasms were appreciated as she desired; and thus it was pleasant to see herself surrounded hour after hour in her splendid drawing-room by kindred and applauding spirits.

The relationship of Trevor—a farce which still continued to be enacted, to the secret amusement of many of his friends, who were quite conscious of its fallacy—while it authorized a degree of intimacy which encouraged him in his dishonorable views, tended in no slight degree to lessen the feeling of respect which some among them might still have been induced to concede to herself; and as he rode with her in the park, sauntered with her amid the noble shades of Kensington-gardens, or quietly established himself for the evening in her opera-box; sundry significant smiles were exchanged by the initiated, which were as full of malice as of meaning.

Still no word or look had ever escaped Trevor tending to put his victim upon her guard. He had but limed the twig, and he calmly waited to see her entangled through her own free agency. It sufficed him to believe that the moment would come, and that perhaps at no distant period, and meanwhile, he was aware that he was an object of envy to half his acquaintance. The beauty of Sybil was so radiant and queenly in its character, her wit so sparkling, and her fashion so undeniable, that her intimacy was a privilege to be coveted. It mattered little that she had forfeited the esteem of the wise and the virtuous; in the pursuit of mere selfish gratification, men do not require to respect the women whom they admire, and thus, turn in whatever direction she might, the beautiful and courted Mrs. Mortimer met only smiles and plaudits, and that tacit encouragement which vanity can always invest with words, and second by its own impulsive force.

As time wore on, however, and Trevor felt more secure of his influence, he ventured to try the force of sarcasm. Sybil had already essayed its effect over the mind of her husband, but she believed that she was herself beyond its power.

Nothing renders a woman more blind than her vanity.

"How sure I was," said Sir Horace, on one occasion when they were tête-à-tête, an occurrence which had, moreover, long ceased to be singular—"that all the pretty pastorals with which you favored me when I visited The Grange, were mere words, very sentimental and picturesque if you will, but still mere words. If I mistake not, you then told me that you were about to marry a country gentleman, and prattled charmingly of his tenants, his local duties, and the delights of a life of rural responsibility and rural leisure. You wanted to persuade me that you were about to become a true Baucis to your rustic Philemon, and you looked daggers because I ventured to hazard a doubt. Now, perhaps, you will admit that my skepticism was not altogether unfounded. You have been a wife two years, or thereabouts, and I find you once more in town, as devoted to its pleasures as of old, and as able to increase them in your own person."

"The interests of my husband—" commenced Sybil, biting her lip.

"Femme modèle!" interposed Trevor with a smile, "but hear me out. I know well that your passion for the world was far from being extinguished; that you were playing a part—Nay, don't frown—unconsciously, perhaps, but still playing a part. And what then? I am acquainted with so many charming persons who are doing the same. Pretty women, who have a store of admirable maxims upon their lips, of which they consider it their duty to prove the fallacy upon the first opportunity which offers; that I am not at all likely to blame you. Only, I would have you understand that I was not duped, although too courteous to contend the point."

"So be it," said Mrs. Mortimer evidently annoyed; "You have no mission from Government, and need not volunteer yourself as the Captain Cook of your acquaintance."

"Why should you be angry?" asked her companion with perfect composure; "Surely one may look back for a year or two without giving offence, especially when, as in your case, the retrospect can afford nothing but pleasure. Do you imagine that I could see you—you, Sybil Delamere,—whom I had known, courted, followed, and extolled, by all that was brilliant in London society, coldly and wilfully settle down into the Lady Bountiful of a country town, and become the victim of a social suttee for the sake of—"

"Spare my husband, if you please," interposed Sybil, but it was almost with a smile.

"I will—'Hector requires a demi-god to combat,'" said Sir Horace with quiet insolence; "But to return to yourself. Did you really believe that with all your art you could impose upon me?—that you could induce me to suppose that you preferred a shady lane to an opera-box, a back-parlor to a ball-room, or—be it said with all respect—a sighing Strephon to a man of the world? Fie upon you, my fair cousin! For once you undertook a task beyond your strength. I no more believed you than—"

"You believe in our relationship."

"Oh, excuse me, I have the most perfect faith in all that brings me nearer to you."

"Pray do not exert yourself to be absurd. A recollection of what it was which necessitated the deception should suffice to keep you silent upon the subject."

"Oh, Mr. Mortimer's somewhat precocious jealousy? But surely you are not unjust enough to make me responsible for his weaknesses?"

"Enough, enough," said Sybil hastily. "Why do you not marry? That is the best step which you could take. You are now at the very apogee of your fashion, and are free to choose where you will."

"Thank you, I never felt inclined so to forget myself but once, and then——"

"Well, sir," said Sybil with a frown, as he paused.

"Why, then, the folly was cured, thanks to you. I felt that my love would not suffice to win the only woman to whom I would willingly have surrendered my liberty, and the abortive trial rendered me wiser."

"A poor excuse," said Mrs. Mortimer, resolutely overcoming her confusion; "You must find a better."

"Be it so. I remembered that conjugal love has no wings—that it is 'of the earth, earthy,'—a lingering, grovelling deity of habit, rather than of taste, only fit to surmount the moss-grown pedestal of a cabbage-garden."

"Civil, at least."

"True, if not civil. Come, confess, what can be more monotonous, or, if not monotonous, still worse—what can be more oppressive than such a yoke, padlocked by a priest, riveted by custom, logged by the law, wherein, however you may be separated in spirit, you are chained in fact. I would rather bind day and night together, the roses of June with the snows of January, the fiery falcon with the timid dove—any contrast, however monstrous, for none could be so revolting."

"When you amuse yourself by imagining so extreme a case, all argument is useless."

"Can you confute mine?"

"Perhaps, but I am not in the humor."

"And you are right; it is scarcely worth while to make the experiment when you are forewarned of the result."

"Do you know that you are becoming impertinent?"

"Tant mieux—that will put the finishing stroke to my reputation."

Sybil was silent. What would she not have given to have been free to resent the insolence under which she writhed? But she dared not.

And the rubicon once passed, these conversations were perpetually renewed; until Mrs. Mortimer, already more than half inclined to consider herself a victim, became superlatively convinced of the fact. What had she, as she asked herself, in common with the man to whom she had given her hand? and her vanity readily and promptly answered, "Nothing." Did she sigh for his society when he was absent, or await with impatience for his return? No! Did she require his counsels? Did she value his affections? Again and again, No! She stood married, as she had stood single, alone! And yet not quite alone; there was another thrall upon her, of which she did not as yet recognise the strength. She believed that she had never been more able to suffice to herself than at the very moment when her weakness was apparent to all around her.

How idly, how carelessly, how unreflectingly, do we all talk of the London season! Of those few months of mummery and madness which absorb the means, and frequently destroy the morals of after life,—Of that periodical vortex which too often swallows up prudence, propriety, and good fame; points the finger of scorn at some, and prompts the withering smile of idle and inactive pity at others. And yet those two little words contain a mighty significance, they involve a mighty total, in small things as well as large; they exert a strange, and it would almost appear, an insurmountable influence. The opportunities of evil, too eagerly rendered available; the small beginnings of error, which, like the grain of mustard-seed sown in a genial soil, are fated to bring forth a many-branched and far-spreading tree, destined to overshadow the soul, and beneath whose boughs the winged vices of society may nestle, and amid whose leaves the thorns of remorse may spring and germinate.—Do they not produce all these?

Let those answer who have reaped remorse, disappointment, and ruin, in the bitter harvest of imprudence and folly.

The embarrassed squire, whose stately dame has dreamed for years that the first season of her pretty daughters in town, if properly managed, must see them at its close, if not marchionesses, at least millionaires, and who has consequently managed to sink in four short months the savings of as many years—the innocent girl, whose pure heart is sullied by the touch of falsehood, and whose young affections have been made the spoil of heartlessness—the young wife, who panted to see more of the world before she gave up all the best feelings of her heart to home-happiness, and who returns to that home only to find it cold and dreary, after the unnatural excitement of an admiration and homage which she never should have known:—let these answer!

But what, it may be asked, has this to do with Mrs. Mortimer? She, at least, was no novice in these paths of danger, she brought no unsophistication to lay as a sacrifice upon the altar of the world. And it may be that she did not. But still, even to her, the London season was not without its perils. It absorbed her husband in his own vain and futile pursuits; it left her comparatively free; it gave her opportunities of evil which she might have avoided beneath that husband's ancestral roof. She learned to trust herself, because the very errors of her nature lent her a factitious strength; she learned to over-value her attractions, because the world stamped them with its showy counterfeit; in a word, she learned to look on life as a mere showy pageant, in which she was called upon to enact a part, and to put forth all her energies in order to render that part striking and brilliant.

Having arrived at this conclusion, she felt how little she was supported in the struggle by the husband whom she had chosen. In the retirement of the country, Mortimer had, to a certain degree, maintained some sort of influence over her mind; she despised, but nevertheless she feared him, weak as he might be; she was compelled to respect his principles, and to admit his moral worth; but in town he had rapidly degenerated into a mere frivolous man of fashion, and even that character he supported with an awkwardness which was by no means lost upon her. Conscious that he was laboring to effect a purpose, and that all his friendships and courtesies tended to the same end, there was no freedom or spontaneity even in his follies, and he was aware that it was so. Day after day he saw his exertions fail, and his hopes wane, and consequently the worm of disappointment was at the core of all his pleasures. When alone with his wife he was morose, and sometimes bitter; in society he was merely reckless and insignificant.

Here, therefore, the ambition of Sybil found no answering impulse, and thus she retired into herself to gather strength. And for what? She did not know—she never asked herself the question. She only felt that she was like the drowning mariner, who clutches at every passing wave, in the hope that it may bear towards him the life-sustaining plank by whose help he is to accomplish his preservation.

Mephistophiles never murmured a more shrewd whisper into the ear of the devoted Faust than when he suggested the worthlessness of all that he possessed, and the value of that he had not attained.

CHAPTER LII.

Thus were things situated in town, when wearied by the perpetually-recurring dinners at which Mortimer collected all the idle and dissipated men of his set, who had amused themselves by vaunting their interests in the very quarters where he had been so long soliciting the constantly delayed appointment; Sybil, resolved not to be torn for ever from the world in which she delighted, without one brilliant memory, issued without consulting her husband upon the subject, cards for a ball, in which she determined, moreover, to excel herself.

It is true that her list of female associates was sufficiently limited, but as a stone flung into stagnant water not only creates its own circle, but also produces other radiations beyond, so she at once perceived that she might simultaneously amuse her own friends, and at the same time afford them the opportunity of obliging others. Many a brilliant ball-room is filled by the same device, aye, and crowded. Some attend, as they declare, merely to oblige the person by whom they are bidden; others because they cannot resist pleasure, offer itself in what shape it may, and others, again, because they are curious to examine an intérieur of which they have heard so much, and which they never intend again to invade. Moreover the male portion of the guests were unexceptionable. Men whom every body knew, or wished to know, men of rank, and wit, and fashion, well-looking, well-mannered, and well-bred.

An unlimited order to the most eminent upholsterer of the day, had sufficed to render the really beautiful mansion of Mrs. Mortimer a scene of light and splendor. Turkish tents opening upon miniature gardens, with marble basins flinging up their slender threads of water, which, on rising into the perfumed air, parted in a shower of silver dust, that fell like dew upon costly exoties, and drew out all their perfume; Moorish chambers, with their quaintly gilded ornaments and velvet ottomans; a vast conservatory filled with tall tropical plants, and only lighted at intervals by painted Chinese lanterns, which left all in a voluptuous twilight; a ball-room blazing with tapers of pale pink wax; and a staircase garlanded with flowers, and bright with festoons of parti-colored lamps; enormous mirrows, cabinets of buhl, japan, and ormolu; vases of alabaster, burning within their precious cavities the most subtle scents; all, in short, which luxury could invent, or wealth could purchase, was lavished for one brief evening with unsparing hand.

Probably no one of his guests was half so much impressed by the magnificence of the whole scene as was Mortimer himself. Sybil had skilfully availed herself of his temporary absence from town to accomplish all her plans without the opposition which she foresaw that they would otherwise have experienced, and thus it was not until he entered his own house, after a quiet dinner at his club—which his wife had forewarned him would be impracticable at home—that the extent of her vain imprudence became known to him.

It was, however, too late to expostulate, and, moreover, no where could he find Sybil. He hurried to her favorite boudoir with a cloud upon his brow, but after having with some difficulty found his way there, so thoroughly was the interior of the whole mansion metamorphosed, he only saw himself at the entrance of an Ottoman tent surrounded by a low divan covered with orange-colored satin, the floor overlaid by a gorgeous carpet, and the walls hung with white Persian. More and more disconcerted, he retraced his steps, resolved to shut himself into his own dressing-room until the arrival of the guests should compel him to emerge, but in such a hope he once more deceived himself. On arriving at the threshold he discovered that the door had been removed, and that the opening was now veiled only by curtains of silk gauze, falling one over the other, and all differing in tint.

Greatly annoyed on finding that even his own peculiar apartment had been invaded—although it need scarcely have been a matter of surprise to him had he reflected for an instant, that Sybil, who had suffered such an intrusion into her own, should have been equally unscrupulous as regarded her husband—he thrust the gossamer curtains somewhat roughly aside and entered, in order to satisfy himself to what extent his personal arrangements had suffered from the idle folly of the hour, and he was almost angry to find that, for a moment, his irritation yielded before his astonishment and admiration.

Never, assuredly, was there a prettier conceit. The idea had been Sybil's, and the fashionable artist to whom it had been imparted had worked it out to perfection. It looked like the airy realization of a poet's dream, when he has sunk into slumber with passion in his heart, and a song upon his lips. As the vapory hangings fell behind the intruder into this nook of fairyland, no vestige of the entrance could be detected. The whole room, from the centre of the ceiling, (where a winged goddess of burnished silver held in her clasped hands the extremities of all the floating draperies, which, forming one continued iris over the whole dome of the roof, were ultimately fastened down along its edge by a slender thread of the same glistening metal,) was covered with the transparent folds of the silken cobwebs, which trembled and heaved with every breath as they fell, tier over tier, to the floor, perfectly unconfined, while on the carpet of white velvet, richly painted with groups of scattered roses, stood a table of white marble, whose pedestal was a Cupid crowned with myrtle, trampling upon an hour-glass and a scythe, the whole artistically wrought in silver, as was also the lamp, wreathed with passion-flowers, which, with a few newly-gathered roses, and a couple of feather fans, shaped like wings, were arranged upon its snowy surface. Two chairs, covered with silver tissue, in the form of conch-shells, were placed beside the table, and this was all. It was evident that no amusement was to be pursued in this unearthly-looking temple save that of conversation.

Mortimer stood for a few moments entranced. He had sufficient poetry in his heart to appreciate the calm, luxurious, dream-like scene before him, and as the etherial hangings trembled beneath his breath, he forgot for a few brief instants the cost at which they had been so skilfully arranged.

Soon, however, a darker reflection crossed his mind, and the recklessness of Sybil, as it forced itself upon his memory, recalled him to other and less agreeable sensations. All his warnings, it was now evident, had been unavailing; she was coolly preparing his ultimate ruin, in order to gratify her own weak vanity, and she had, moreover, condescended to take advantage of his absence from his home, to plunge into a vortex of extravagance which she was well aware that he must disapprove, and would have forbidden.

It was consequently with anything rather than a smile that the master of this palace of pleasure, which was still loud with busy voices and hurrying steps, once more emerged from what, despite its beauty, he considered as his desecrated dressing-room, and having with some difficulty succeeded in finding one of his own footmen, was conducted to a small apartment, opening from the servants' hall, which had been hastily prepared for him.

His valet was soon in attendance; every temporary arrangement had been judiciously made for his comfort; a cheerful fire blazed upon the hearth, and could he have divested himself of all thoughts of the future, he would soon have recovered his equanimity. But, alas! the most painful reflections are always the most intrusive also, and as he seated himself in his accustomed chair, and took up a book in order to conceal his chagrin while his man gave the last finishing stroke to his preparations, the words danced before his eyes, and he saw only visions of unpaid bills and enforced mortgages.

Sybil, meanwhile, was radiant with happiness and triumph. She had resolved not to meet her husband until she was protected from his reproaches by the presence of her guests, and thus she had the whole long, glorious night before her. "After which," she whispered to herself with a smile, as she turned from her looking-glass to examine more minutely than she had yet done the snowy dress which her maid had spread out in all its graceful amplitude upon the bed; "Advienne que pourra; the deed will be done, and I shall have shown the envious women who affect to scorn me that they have not indulged their prudery without a sacrifice!"

And for whom and what had the selfish and heartless woman, who thus exulted in her own improvidence, committed so disgraceful a folly? She scarcely knew herself. It is true that her intimates had glibly run over a long list of well-sounding names, and announced to her guests of no common station. But would this promise be fulfilled? Lady Clara was rich in French countesses, baronesses, and marchionesses; Mrs. Lamerly engaged herself for sundry German Gratinnen and Italian duchesses; Mrs. Babington was strong in Spanish donnas, and Iberian fidalgos, and, better than all, the diplomatist's widow had giddily pledged herself for a foreign ambassadress.

As regarded the male portion of her guests, Sybil had no anxiety. She knew her power. She had but to make a sign, and she was aware that she should be obeyed. Were her friends only faithful and zealous, therefore, her proudest ambition would be realised, but, nevertheless, there were moments in which a feeling of anxiety, for which she scorned herself, made her tremble in spite of all her self-possession.

How laughable would it be, were it not so degrading a jest, to analyse the real amount of gratification to be derived by the mistress of a stately mansion, on seeing her spacious saloons filled by a glittering crowd to whom she is utterly unknown, and on hearing, in her very presence, the insolent criticisms of those who have thronged her rooms to feast and to revel at her expense. The actual pleasure which she experiences on being presented to one of these high-born, and hitherto unknown guests, from the impertinent stare and scarcely perceptible bend with which her identity is recognised, or by the total indifference with which, when they are wearied of the pleasure that she has gratuitously afforded them, they depart one after the other, reminding their personal friends of their common engagements, making social arrangements among themselves, and finally sweeping down the illuminated staircase to their carriages, without even the courtesy of a parting salutation to their exhausted hostess.

And it was to secure so questionable a triumph, and so equivocal a gratification as this, that the proud Sybil had subjected herself to possible mortification, and her husband to inevitable embarrassment;—to parade her vanity for a few hours in all its panoply of luxury and recklessness, and to be the theme of gossip for a week. Yes, even so it was; this had been her empty and paltry day-dream from the very period of her marriage, and, despite her occasional misgivings, her heart beat high, and her cheek flushed with excitement.

Even little Eva was forgotten, and not once, during that busy day, did she even see her mother. But what then? Had not that mother been fully engaged in her domestic duties? Had she not unweariedly superintended every arrangement, and regulated every movement of the anxious and noisy crowd by which her house was invaded? Certain it is, that as the last lamp was lighted, the last workman dismissed, and she stood before her Psyche in a snowy dress of white crape, looped with clusters of the wild apple-bloom, and her high smooth brow cinctured by a garland of the same graceful blossoms, no feeling of compunction for any duty unfulfilled dimmed the lustre of her eyes, or blenched the glow upon her cheek.

It was fortunate for the poor child, whose loving heart was already susceptible of neglect, that Mortimer even amid his annoyance and anxiety, had been more considerate, and he could have chosen no better antidote to his exaspérated feelings than the visit which he payed to the nursery before he commenced his toilette for the evening. Eva was asleep whee he entered, and tears were hanging upon her long eyelashes. As he bent over her, she looked like a cherub which had wept itself to rest over the follies of the world.

"Miss Eva has been crying for you and her mamma, Sir," said Mrs. Harris officiously, as she heard her master sigh on detecting the tell-tale tears; "I thought I should never have got her to sleep. However, she is fast enough now, and it will be all right when she wakes to-morrow."

"And did not Mrs. Mortimer see her this evening?" asked Frederic in an unsteady accent; "not see her for a moment before she was put to bed?"

"Laws, no, Sir, my mistress hasn't had a moment of time all day. Poor, dear lady, such a deal as she has had to look after! No wonder, Sir, that she couldn't come up stairs to Miss Eva, for she hasn't even had her drive."

"That is conclusive," said Mortimer with a bitter smile.

"In course, Sir," was the ready reply, "and I tried to explain this to the dear child, but she is too young yet to understand such things."

"Probably."

"And so poor dear, she would fret, but as I said before, Sir, she'll be all right to-morrow."

"I wonder," murmured Mortimer to himself, "whether the dreams of children of this tender age are troubled by the sorrows of the day."

"That they are, Sir, for sure," exclaimed the quick-eared nurse; "only to hear how Miss Eva has sighed in her sleep to-night, you would know it directly."

"Ha!" said the fond father with a start, "then she shall have no more such dreams. Eva! My darling! Will you awake, and bid good-night to papa?"

The little girl opened her large blue eyes, gazed for a moment around her, bewildered by the glare of the candles, then smiled, and extended her dimpled arms to her father. Mortimer caught her to his breast, but as he clasped her, a sudden revulsion of feeling came over the only half-awakened child, and she burst into a passionate fit of grief.

"Papa, dear papa," were the only articulate sounds which she uttered amid her sobs, but they were all that the heart of Sybil's husband coveted at that moment. His child loved him—clung to him—wept over his absence—joyed at his approach. Life was not yet a blank. He forgot his gilded saloons, his vanished hopes, his gnawing anxieties, and in five minutes he was deep in play with the now happy Eva upon his knee, smoothing down her glossy curls, and sunning himself in her large eager eyes.

An hour passed by, and as the child had betrayed no symptoms of weariness, Mortimer still lent himself to all her pretty caprices, and listened with delight to her clear joyous laughter. It might be a weakness thus to lose all memory of the pomp and pageantry which awaited him below stairs, but certain it is, that he had never bestowed a thought upon the matter, until a discreet signal at the door warned him of the presence of his valet, who respectfully suggested the necessity of his not further delaying the duties of his toilette. Eva pouted, but she no longer wept. When her father replaced her in her little bed, she obediently withdrew her clinging arms from his neck, and with a last low murmured "Dear papa!" and a long, long kiss, suffered him to leave her.

Ere long, carriage after carriage drove to the door, and deposited a bevy of pretty women and fashionable idlers in the illuminated hall. The rooms filled rapidly, and as Sybil stood near the entrance of the principal saloon, and received her guests with the high-bred self-possession for which she was remarkable, many a haughty eye rested upon her for an instant in wondering curiosity. For the moment she had disarmed criticism. The elegant simplicity of her dress, rendered the more conspicuous by the magnificence with which she was surrounded, astonished those who came to smile or to sneer at the parvenue who filled her rooms by the agency of her acquaintance, for it was evident at once that Mrs. Mortimer was no novice. There was even an affectation of indifference to the comments of all around her in the studied plainness of her attire, to which no single ornament of any description had been appended, and a consciousness in her whole deportment of the uselessness of such adjuncts to heighten her superlative beauty, which betrayed the perfect woman of the world, careless or disdainful of the empty sarcasms of the impertinent.

Surprise followed upon surprise. No incongruity was perceptible in the splendor of her princely saloons; no paltry expedients, no ignorant deficiencies could be detected; all was perfect, and a low murmur of admiration, reluctantly extorted, and therefore the better appreciated, ere long met her ear on all sides. Noble and sonorous names were declaimed in her ear; jewels flashed, and feathers waved before her eyes; that sweet and subtle perfume with which a crowd of fair and fashionable women always freight the atmosphere about them, mingled deliciously with the breathings of flowers and the stream of costly essences.—and still Sybil remained calm and unmoved; no heightened color flushed over her cheek, no triumphant light danced in her large dark eyes. She was only realising the vision of years, and not a pulse quickened as her smile greeted each new arrival.

At length her first duty was fulfilled; the strains of music were audible from the ball-room; the confusion had in some degree disentangled itself; there were groups of talkers, solitary gazers, smiling couples established upon sofas in confidential tete-a-tete; gray-headed nobles and overdressed matrons established at the card-tables; in short, the skein was unravelled, and Sybil had time and opportunity to think only of herself.

Some scores of her guests had no sooner made their bow to their hostess upon the threshold, than they had utterly forgotten "what manner of woman" she was, and among these were mothers, who had brought their young and beautiful daughters under a strange roof, simply because they knew that there they would meet once more with a timid or undecided admirer, and that as the season was drawing to its close, every opportunity of collision had consequently become tenfold more desirable: young wives, weary of home, and greedy of admiration, and fair girls whose hearts beat high and whose eyes sought the floor, at every name which was announced, while caring only to distinguish one.

To these, and such as these, the donor of the fête was a personage too unimportant to occupy their thoughts beyond a moment. They had deeper, or at least more personal interests, and thus, as Sybil glided through her costly rooms, she did not escape the penalty of her weakness.

"What improvidence!" said a portly old lady, beside whose chair she was compelled to pause for a moment, the pressure of the throng rendering it impossible for her to advance; "And I understand these people are nobodies! It is really a practical impertinence. What would they say to this in your belle France, Madame la Baronne?"

"Ma foi, ma chère," replied a small, meagre, copper-colored figure beside her, as she inhaled a huge pinch of snuff from an enamelled and diamond studded-box; "It is only your own England of liberty which can show such anomalies as this. Le cher Empereur was roturier enough in one sense, but even then, in order to elbow nous autres so familiarly, it was needful to be a célebrité of some sort. Noblesse de robe, or d' épée or artiste, or something more than a mere rentier; Ah bah! the good old days are over."

With some difficulty Sybil at last passed on.

"But should I be presented to Mrs. Mortimer, mamma," said a lovely girl deprecatingly, as the hostess was once more stopped by the broad shoulders and jewelled turban of a voluminous dowager; "What am I to do!"

"Be civil, Honoria, of course, but no more. You did not come here to form an acquaintance with this person, but to meet Lord Alfred. Once for all I tell you, child, that there is some strange story about her, and that is enough. All that you have to do is to remember why I brought you here, and to make a better use of the opportunity than you have done of others which I have given you. Recollect that this is your second season."

Once more Sybil moved on.

"And Saviatti really told you this story, and vouched for it?" were the next articulate sounds which met her ear, as, partially concealed by the draperies of a window, she stood behind a group of young men. "Upon my conscience, the jest was a good one! And so Trevor was done?"

"Aye, thoroughly, but he only lost his money. What say you to the simple Damon who like a silly sheep as he was, stepped into the breach?"

There was a light, mocking chorus of laughter.

"Nevertheless, she is a monstrous fine woman," remarked one of the party.

"Glorious!" was the ready response, "Incomparable for a wife a la Regence, but——"

"Suffer me to pass, gentlemen," said Sybil haughtily, as she emerged from her concealment, and stood before them. "My duties as a hostess compel me to disturb your conversation."

A general but silent bow succeeded, and, as the group made way, Mrs. Mortimer passed through it with the air of an empress.

Her comparative solitude was, however, now over, and even although her spirit burnt within her at the insults to which she had been subjected, she was too thoroughly mistress of her emotion to suffer one trace of displeasure to become apparent.

And still the revel progressed, the lights shone brightly, the music swept like speaking odors through the vast apartments; fond vows, and many false as fond, were whispered in the dim conservatory; hundreds exchanged owners at the card tables; the luxurious supper-room was perpetually filled and emptied of its votaries, and daylight, at length, struggled to penetrate through the satin folds of the jealous curtains.

CHAPTER LIII.

Mortimer had staked and lost heavily. He dreamt for several hours that he had found a counter-influence to that of his wife, but he deceived himself; her eyes had never beguiled him more surely to his ruin than did the cards that night. Eager to forget, and equally eager to enjoy, he had readily fallen into a snare, and surrounded by a bevy of his friends—those friends who are ever ready to fool to the top of his bent l'amphytrion où l'on dine—he had, after a score of desperate plunges, become their prey.

In vain did his brow burn, and his eye flash. Upon whom could he revenge his defeat? Those about him were honorable men, a shade or two more skilful, perhaps, than himself, with the cards and the dice-box, but still honorable men, and above suspicion.

Eva was asleep in her little bed above stairs—asleep, with a happy smile upon her lips. Occasionally, as a louder strain than usual burst from the orchestra, and came sighing along the stair-cases and passages, even to the remote nursery whose door had been flung back by the undernurse during the absence of Mrs. Harris, (who had abandoned her charge in order to secure her share in the dissipation of the housekeeper's room,) and stole, like a wandering spirit, to the snow-curtained couch of the slumbering cherub, she stretched forth her dimpled arms in a pleasant dream, and murmuring: "Papa, dear papa," again sank to rest.

Sybil had left the ball-room on the arm of Sir Horace Trevor, and was listening with delight to the enthusiastic encomiums which he lavished upon her taste, and the perfect harmony of all her arrangements. It soothed her to hear that, by one at least of her guests she was appreciated, but the one spot of flame still burned and festered upon her spirit. No, she had not revenged herself upon a world that she despised. Even beneath her own stately roof, among the flowers that she had wreathed, the luxury that she had created, the harmony that she had invoked, she knew that the world which she had resolved to subjugate paid her back scorn for scorn, but this conviction had not humbled her, it had only made her desperate.

"Wealth is a wizard," she answered, with a contemptuous smile, to one of his remarks. "The wife of a soap-boiler could have done all this, aye, and more, had her resources served her; but come this way, and I believe that I can show you something which no mere gold could have created," and, as she spoke, she led him towards the gauze-screened cabinet which has been already described.

"Just as I could have wished," she said, rather speaking to herself than addressing her companion. "The giddy fools have not hitherto discovered this retreat, and yet it is the pearl of the huge oyster which I have opened for their amusement. What say you to this fairy-nook, Sir Horace?"

"What can I say?" murmured Trevor after a momentary pause, during which his quick eye had glanced from floor to ceiling. "What can I say?" he repeated as they advanced towards the table, followed in their progress by a moving vapor of gauze, which floated above and about them, as the tinted clouds undulate beneath the beams of the setting sun, "save that the shrine is worthy of the goddess?"

Sybil smiled as she took possession of one of the vacant chairs, while Trevor established himself in the other, after having drawn it to her side.

"Nothing can be more poetical, more dream-like," he pursued, lifting one of the light fans from the table. "Why should it be but the mere vision of a night, to be subjected to-morrow to the rude hands of hirelings, and desecrated by vulgar intrusion?"

"Learn like me," said his companion, "to live in the present, to leave the future to its own developments. Do you know, Trevor, that the consciousness that you would appreciate this graceful phantasy sufficed to me, and I cared little though it should be overlooked, as you see it has been, by the soulless beings who have passed it by to bask in light, and to bewilder themselves by noise."

As she ceased speaking, Sybil turned with one of her most radiant looks towards her listener. She anticipated some acknowledgment, but for a moment he made no reply; his eyes were riveted upon the pretty plaything, composed of marabouts, and dusted with silver, which he was twirling in his hand.

The silence was only temporary, however, and it was abruptly broken.

"Sybil," murmured the baronet, without changing his position, or abstaining from his inconsequent occupation, "I had no idea that Mortimer had either taste or nerve for high play."

"And has he?" asked the worldly wife in an accent of the most supreme indifference.

"His prowess of to-night would seem to imply as much. When I left the card-room he was a heavy loser."

"He should not have ventured beyond his depth," was the quiet retort, and the words once uttered, Sybil began, in her turn, to amuse herself by collecting and clustering the scattered roses which were strewn over the table.

Trevor glanced at her as she leaned forward, and never had he thought her so beautiful. The opaque white of her dress contrasted in a striking manner with the glistering silver of the chair on which she sat. A slight languor, the result alike of physical fatigue and concealed mortification, hung upon her eyelids, and softened the whole expression of her face. Her very movements were subdued. The moment, as he felt, was propitious.

"Mortimer was rash, at such a time, and in such company, to tempt fortune," he continued, as he drew one of the roses from her hand, and after pressing it to his lips, placed it in his bosom; "but some men are fated to commence every undertaking with the left hand. If you do not exert your influence, he will soon undermine his fortune."

"What if no such influence existed!"

"Conte des Fées—Impossible!"

Sybil playfully shook her head.

"Is not the man human?"

"Very—I must not suffer you to wrong him, even by a doubt. Does he not live? breathe? move? frequent his clubs? and pay his tradesmen's bills?"

"But should the ruin come, Sybil?"

"Once more, I say, leave the future to its own resources. Where do you spend the summer?"

"In Italy, or——at Westrum."

"Oh, not at Westrum," exclaimed Mrs. Mortimer, startled out of her habitual composure; "we are to have maison close during the next nine months."

"Then, decidedly, it must be Italy."

"And who are your party?"

"I am weary of joint-stock tours, where the sum-total is composed of insignificant units. I covet a single companion, and will admit no more."

"Be wary, then," said Sybil, almost with a sigh; "you do not know the misery of an ill chosen and enforced companionship with one solitary individual."

"I can imagine it."

"No doubt," was the rejoinder, as the eyes of Trevor flashed with a sudden light; "but imagination is not experience."

"I shall not tempt that experience. I shall act upon sure grounds."

"We are all wise in our own conceit.'

"I know it, but the wisdom rarely extends itself beyond that conceit. I will be wiser."

"But why leave England, where you have so many resources?"

"Because I am sick of the folly and selfishness of all about me. I have lived for pleasure long enough, and will henceforward live only for happiness."

"Then, after all your disclaimers, you are really going to marry?"

"You are epigrammatic, Mrs. Mortimer."

"But is it not so?"

"And what if it were?"

"You will make a bad husband, Trevor."

"Do you think so?"

"I am sure of it."

"And why?"

"Because you detest coercion, and were you mated with an angel, you would quarrel with her wings because she had allowed you to clip them."

"Well, perhaps you are right," conceded Sir Horace, fixing his eyes steadily upon her face; "perhaps I might despise her, when I remembered that she had weakly resigned the beautiful and glorious prerogative of freedom, and meanly chained herself to the steps of the altar on which she should have towered as the idol; that she had, for a mere puerile clinging to the convictions of a society which possessed no right—and perhaps as little inclination—to dictate her actions, tamely scattered upon the earth the leaves of the roses with which she should have crowned herself."

"You justify yourself like a libertine."

"The word is sufficiently comprehensive, at all events."

"Is it not applicable? What can I understand, but that you contemplate the companionship of a mistress?"

"You take strange liberties with our barbarous vernacular to-night, fair Sybil. However, in one sense, I admit the term, unpoetical as it is. Yes, the partner of my wanderings beneath the blue skies and flowery bowers of Italy, and wheresoever else her good pleasure may direct my footsteps, even though it should be beyond the cataracts of the Nile, or to the sandy deserts of mysterious Africa, shall, indeed, be the very mistress of my soul—the supreme sovereign of my destiny. I will have no will, no wish, no existence, save in her."

"Beware of such utter self-abnegation; she may deceive you."

"I have no such fear: I am fore-armed."

"By what occult power?"

"By my love—my claim—my—I will echo your own words—my perfect self-abnegation. I could have no better safeguard."

"You are a happy man, even in your voluntary delusion."

"Pardon me, I am not deluded—or—should it, indeed, be so, Sybil—"

Mrs. Mortimer started, and her cheek burned. She turned away; she would have spoken, but she could not control her voice.

"Listen to me, Sybil," said Sir Horace gaining courage from her visible confusion, and, as he spoke, he grasped her hand, and retained it despite her struggle to free herself from the clasp; "you are not happy. Remember you are not the acquaintance of yesterday, and that our hearts spoke audibly years ago. I love you—I know all the paltry and pitiful restraints of your present position. To-night, you are the queen of a brilliant circle—the admired and the envied mistress of a fairy palace, but the night, wiredraw it as you may, can only last some three hours longer, and then comes to-morrow—to-morrow with an irritated and reproachful husband, who, forgetting his own imprudence at the gaming-table, will visit upon you the results of an improvidence to which his fortune is by no means adequate. Look at the floating of the light draperies which are heaving about you as your struggle to escape my hold; to-morrow the hammer of the workman, a few nails withdrawn, and a few sturdy blows, will reduce all their gracefulness into a heap of rags. You will be once more alone with an angry and resentful husband, in a noisy and ungenial home, and after that—for more remains behind, Sybil—after that you have a long and dreary perspective before you, to which you cannot, you shall not tamely yield. Westrum, with, as you have already confessed, closed doors, a dreaming mother, and a sulking husband! And is this to be the end of all, Sybil? Was it to fulfil such a destiny as this that nature made you a mark for admiration and worship? That you were gifted with talents that dazzle, with a wit that fascinates, and with a mind which can appreciate and sympathise with all that is grand and beautiful?"

"Enough, Sir Horace, enough."

"Yet must you hear more," relentlessly pursued her tempter, "for I have resolved to convince your reason. For what, and why, do you willingly and wilfully bow your proud neck to such a yoke? To gratify the prejudices of an exacting and misjudging world which you would elevate into a censor? Nature, nature has been your benefactress; it is her, and her alone, to whom you owe allegiance; the world has to you been only a stepdame, or you would not be to-day the wife of Mortimer—of a man who cannot comprehend you, but who wears you as the ignorant parvenue wears her diamond necklace—not with an appreciation of its real brilliancy, but with a vulgar consciousness that it is an object of envy. What have the refined and town-bred Sybil Delamere and the country squire, whose soul is in his acres—what have they, I ask, what can they have, in common? As yet you have blinded yourself to this truth, for as yet you have not been utterly flung upon his insignificance for companionship and sympathy; he has left the reins loose, and the bit has not galled you, but you are already warned that the scene and the system are both about to change."

"Sir Horace, I will hear no more."

"Only one last appeal—Sybil, divine Sybil! Be at last just to yourself. You once loved me, and there are yet moments in which I fancy that I can detect some evidence that you love me still. I offer to you the devotion of a life, the resources of an ample fortune; an existence of splendor and indulgence; the undying fervor of a passion which you alone have been able to awaken—Sybil, do I indeed plead in vain?"

Mrs. Mortimer strove to rise, but her companion was already kneeling beside her, and his grasp was strong upon her dress.

"Are you not aware, Sir?" she asked, with flashing eyes, "that you are urging me to dishonor?"

"Sybil," murmured Sir Horace; "your ear is quick, and your eye keen; has not the revel of to-night, held in your own saloons, provided by your own gold, created by your own taste, taught you to despise so poor a chimera? There are noble dames yonder, rustling their satins, waving their plumes, and parading their magnificent nothingness—but is one of them at your side? Has one of them claimed com anionship with you? Have you met respect, r even consideration from one of the haughty yes which have fastened admiringly upon the audy toys that you have scattered in their ath? Are you not aware that among the dittering mob which you have collected about ou there are friends of Saviatti, and that aviatti is——"

"A fiend! a demon!" fiercely exclaimed ybil.

"You help my argument," was the rapid ejoinder; "and as such the less scrupulous. ou have the effects of his idle indiscretion efore you. And, mark me, Sybil—Mortimer, eak as he may be on other points, is sensitive nd jealous of his honor! A husband—the act is proverbial—may be, and generally is, he last to hear that by which he is the most losely affected, but, trust me, he is eventually nlightened. Do you comprehend your position ow, my adored Sybil? And do you believe hat, loving you as I do, I can coldly abandon you to such a fate?"

"Trevor," whispered Mrs. Mortimer hoarsely, as her head sank upon her bosom, "you are unmerciful!"

Sir Horace still knelt before her, and was about to soothe the wounded dignity which he had so relentlessly excited, when the vapoury curtain was thrust aside, and the baby face of Mrs. Lamerly protruded like some frightful vision through the opening. A slight shriek escaped her lips, as she suffered the light folds of the gauze to float back into their places, and then succeeded a ringing laugh, as her lisping voice was heard exclaiming imperiously —"No, no, you shall not move a step further! It is the prettiest place you ever saw in your life; all white and silver, like a moon among the clouds, but you shall not see it. We should all be de trop; for Mrs. Mortimer is there with Sir Horace Trevor, and I think they are rehearsing a tragedy, or a comedy, or something of that sort, for he is on his knees, and she looks—but, upon my honor, I scarcely know how she looks!—it would have been so indiscreet to intrude longer."

Then followed a deep silence, broken only by the sound of retreating footsteps, and the agonized ear of Sybil detected that they were those of several individuals. The thickly-piled carpets soon muffled that light sound, and then all was still as the grave.

"Sir Horace Trevor," said Mrs. Mortimer, as she arose from her seat, ghastly pale, and with a quivering lip; "You have bought me at a fearful price! Leave me now. We shall meet again."

"To-morrow, Sybil?"

She coldly bent her head in token of acquiescence.

"Farewell, then, till to-morrow." He hastily raised her cold fingers to his lips, drew back the curtains of the door, and disappeared.

A wild and acrid smile convulsed the features of Sybil for an instant, and she clasped her forehead in her spread hands, as if to deaden the throbbing of her burning temples. One word, and one only, escaped her as she stood there—the word "Eva!" and she pronounced it with a shudder which shook her whole frame, and a gasp that seemed to threaten her for an instant with suffocation.

It was the last whisper of her guardian angel ere it took flight for ever, and she had echoed it involuntarily.

But even amid her anguish the proud spirit of Mrs. Mortimer scorned to bend, and after a severe struggle she succeeded in subduing every vestige of emotion, and with a steady step and a proud eye returned to her guests. She saw Mrs. Lamerly surrounded by a group of curious listeners, who were all too earnest in their attention to detect her approach, and towards them she firmly made her way.

"Why are you not dancing, Amabel?" she inquired with perfect composure, as she reached her side.

The diplomatist's widow started, flushed, and stammered out with some difficulty; "I am fatigued, Mrs. Mortimer."

"Mrs. Mortimer!" echoed Sybil, raising her eyebrows in affected and playful surprise; "Why Amabel, you are ceremonious to-night. Remember that you are in a simple English drawing-room, and not in the court circle of your dear, friend, the Margrave."

"I do not understand—" faltered the widow.

"What I understand, ma chère," broke in a little German Gräfine, who had been one of her listeners; "is, that you have betrayed me, and you know the proverb, 'Wie gesäet, so geschnitten.' I shall not expect you to-morrow evening Good night." And, with a haughty and indignant bow, the ruffled beauty swept from the room.

"As she pleases," said Mrs. Lamerly, with a pout, "but I could quote, if I pleased, the old saying about glass windows and throwing stones. However, my turn will come."

Sybil turned away with a haughty mien, but her very soul was sick within her. She had heard and understood all. There were other demons in the world besides Saviatti, and how she began to hate and scorn that world! Trevor was right, and she would trample it even to the dust.

Her rooms emptied rapidly. The lights were beginning to fail, the musicians were putting up their instruments; group after group passed her by, on their way out without one token of observance or recognition. At length the very link-boys dispersed—the revel was over, and Sybil was left amid the relics of her brief splendor utterly alone—alone with her hopes, her fears, her stifled passion, and her corroding thoughts.

CHAPTER LIV.

The morrow came, and with it all the discomforts usual under such circumstances. Sybil had paced her room until wearied nature in its turn overcame mental disquietude, and throughout her vigil the perpetual coming and going of the servants, who had abandoned all idea of seeking their beds at so undue an hour, and under such an accumulation of duties, had fallen upon her ear utterly unheeded. What were to her the sounds of the external world, when there echoed amid the depths of her spirit the hoarse and sullen reverberation of a more personal and absorbing agitation? She had not seen Mortimer since the departure of her guests; the avoidance had been mutual, for both had within themselves a consciousness of error to be concealed, and of weakness to be expiated.

Frederic had retired to his room, angered, repentant, and reflective; Sybil had sought hers fevered, undecided, but nevertheless desperate. The husband, boldly looking into the future, although with a sick heart and a stricken spirit, had passed his time in hasty and imperfect calculations, and those vague, but passionate resolutions of future prudence, which, like snowflakes in the moonlight, show so substantial and so brilliant, but which require only one touch of heat to annihilate them altogether; the wife had sought solitude to brood over the past, to deprecate the present, and to defy the future. She was aware that previous improvidence, first counselled, and ultimately encouraged and augmented by herself, had stricken deeply at the root of her husband's prosperity. It was true that the extravagance of a couple of seasons could not ruin Mortimer, but she was aware that it had sufficed to embarrass his movements and to cripple his resources. Sybil had always loathed and despised all monetary considerations, and she felt that she could never brook his justifiable, but nevertheless wearisome, reproaches upon such a subject. If she had sought to become his wife, it had been from no blind attachment to himself, but in order to regain, through his means, the social station which she had forfeited by her own levity, and to share with him the affluence without which she considered life to be but a mere mean and paltry game, to be played out to the end only by mean and paltry spirits.

And all this purpose had failed; she was still a mark for the insolent comments of the proud and the scornful. The memories of the past, like the stones cast behind them by the twin heroes of the mythology, sprang to life, armed, and ready to do battle, but it was against herself. The gold which she had lavished to purchase at least a temporary triumph, had melted as she scattered it around her, and scorched the hand that poured it forth.

And what remained?

Sybil had dismissed her attendant. It seemed to her as though every eye could read her secret, and as her thoughts fastened upon her last interview with Trevor, she thrust back the dark braids from her forehead, for even their light and accustomed pressure appeared to weigh her down, and then, rising from her chair, flung open one of the windows in order to breathe more freely.

There is always something awful in the return of a new day; in the doubtful light which creeps almost reluctantly across the sky, as though it feared to hasten on a mission which condemned it to look for so many hours upon scenes of error and of crime. To the virtuous and the pure there is a sublimity in its stealthy progress, but to the erring and the guilty its charm is lost; to them there is a sad reproa in its silent advent, and it is the hour of others the most difficult to fill with purely s fish thought. Even Sybil, as she bared l brow to the chill wind that heaved the curta behind which she stood, and looked out up the desolate garden of the square, where t night-dews still hung upon the branches of t stunted shrubs, and the dense vapors wc rolling off in folds of dull yellow and mur brown, was not altogether unaffected by its fluence.

Where were now the light and the revelry which her soul delighted? Where were nc the glance of admiration and the words of pi sion which to her was as the day-spring of h existence? She stood upon the dull and myst rious tomb of the past; upon the vague a shapeless threshold of the future, and both we alike, "without form and void." She heard on the low moaning of the cheerless wind; s saw only the gloomy awakening of a new da disturbed by the occasional footstep of one those rude sons or daughters of toil who nev calculate time save as a mean of gain, or of tho still more enslaved victims of vice, who fe that their task is ended when that of virtuo poverty begins.

Sybil closed the window abruptly, and thre herself upon the bed. Body and mind we both exhausted, and at length she sank sleep.

Did she dream of the husband who, much he was injured, still confided in her truth? the child to whom her own good name wou be the best and the meetest heritage? Of tl man who, wronged, deceived, and almost fo gotten, once more pursued her with words passion and of promise? No, she dreamt none of these things. Her heavy head presse the pillow like a thing of stone. Her slee was as the sleep of death; the condemned felo whose rest is to be broken on the morrow b the gibbet and the rope, sleeps this deep a mysterious slumber; the waveworn mariner the raft, the only link between him and eter ty; the soldier in his bivouac on the eve battle,—all, in short, whose nerves have bee braced to the uttermost for hours, and who su denly find themselves alone and unsupported b the pride which has sustained them beneath th gaze of their fellow men, have experienced th same deep, and dreamless, and death-like slee save, perhaps, the coward, whose fears for th morrow keep him waking, but Sybil was r coward. She had suffered, and she slept.

It was long past mid-day when her mai ventured to enter her apartment, and her re was so deep, despite her undrawn curtains, an the disorder in which she had flung herself upc her bed, that for a few seconds the woma looked upon her almost in terror. Her lon hair fell like a shower of jet over her face an shoulders, her hands were tightly clasped t gether, and there was an expression of su pressed but terrible agony upon her countenanc that mere physical fatigue could not have in pressed there.

No wonder, therefore, that forgetful of th reprimand which her unbidden officiousnes night draw down upon her, the terrified Abigail ventured to awake her.

"Ha! is it morning so soon?" murmured out Sybil, who had started from her sleep at the first whisper.

"I beg your pardon, Ma'am," was the respectful reply, "but it is now nearly two o'clock. My master has been out for the last three hours, and desired me to say that he should not return home until the evening. Miss Eva has had her walk, and Mrs. Harris wishes to know if you will see her before dinner-time."

"No, no," said Sybil hoarsely and hurriedly; "I am too much fatigued. There—look!—upon the dressing-table you will find a locket, hung to a small gold chain. You know the one I mean—with my hair in it, at the back of her father's portrait. Tell Mrs. Harris to give it to her with my love, and to let her wear it till I see her again. Is there anything new? letters, or——"

"No, ma'am, only Sir Horace Trevor has been here, but when he found that my master was out, and that you were not up, he left word that he would call again at two o'clock, as he wished to see you, Ma'am, on some particular business, and so I made free to come into your room."

"You did right, Symonds, perfectly right," said Sybil with a slight shudder, as she partially raised herself, and, sweeping back her dishevelled hair, leaned her head upon her hand. "And now come here, Symonds, here, close to my pillow. Can I trust you?"

"Try me, Ma'am," said the woman stolidly.

"You must have seen that I am not happy," commenced Sybil, fixing her eyes steadily upon her attendant.

The Abigail shrugged her shoulders.

"You were with me when I married?"

There was a sign of assent.

"I did wrong," pursued the once haughty mistress after a short pause; "I mistook Mr. Mortimer, and it is probable that he misunderstood me. Things cannot go on thus, Symonds."

"Of course not, Ma'am."

"It is possible that I may travel before long. Are you willing to accompany me?"

"Do you take Miss Eva, Ma'am? I can't undertake to travel with children; it's out of my line."

The mother for a moment conquered the woman of the world, and Mrs. Mortimer turned aside to avoid the fixed gaze of her hired menial, but in spirit she had passed the rubicon, and she rallied on the instant.

"No," said she, with some effort; "I go alone."

"Alone, Ma'am?"

"That is, neither your master nor Miss Eva will accompany me."

"I see, Ma'am," was the reply, uttered with one of those intelligently-confidential smiles which are the first-fruits of error, to a proud spirit.

"I am quite at your service, and ready to go wherever you please. But you are forgetting the time, Ma'am. If Sir Horace Trevor should be here before you are dressed, is he to wait, or to come again?"

"Let him wait," said Sybil, with the superb expression of disdain by which the haughty lip so frequently conceals the secret of the quailing heart. "He is probably not in haste."

The Abigail pursed up her mouth. Had her mistress given her a printed book to read, knowing that mistress as she did, she could not have guessed the truth more thoroughly.

"Sir Horace was quite put out, Ma'am, when he found that you were not up," she ventured to remark, as she placed the velvet slippers beside the bed.

"Indeed!" said Sybil, with affected indifference.

"And then, Ma'am, he inquired for my master, and I told him that he was gone out for the day."

"You told him so?"

"Yes, ma'am, did I do wrong?"

"Oh, no, no! it is a matter of no consequence. By the bye, Symonds, you will not mention to any one that I think of leaving England."

"Of course not, Ma'am, if you wish it."

"I do, Symonds, and I believe that I can trust you. Is my bath ready?"

The first scene in the drama of guilt was played out, and Sybil felt that she was in the power of her own salaried dependent.

Sir Horace Trevor was once more beneath her roof long before Sybil left her room. He knew the spirit with which he had to deal, and he felt that the ball of the preceding evening had served him well. Her pride had been galled, and sufficient time had not yet elapsed for her to recover from the mortification she had experienced. To profit by a vulgar but expressive phrase, the iron was still hot, and he was too good a tactitian to suffer it to cool. Rejected by the world, and estranged from her husband, he offered her a refuge from daily increasing annoyance, and although he had long ceased to be jealous of her affection, and learnt its fallacy where it interfered with her own interests, he was still thralled by her beauty, and subjugated by her wit.

Too indolent to make amusement for himself, Sybil was precisely the woman calculated to supply the occasional void produced by satiety. His taste would do him honor in the eyes of his associates, and moreover, perhaps, he also had something to revenge. Her treachery had been the one crushed roseleaf on the couch of the fashionable Sybarite, and it was with a sensation of triumphant complacency that he reflected how soon her own hand would be employed to smooth it.

For her improvidence he cared nothing. His means were ample, and he could, moreover, disengage himself at any moment from a tie which must sit loosely from the first. A man does not take his mistress as he takes his wife; there are no life-long responsibilities to make him pause; a fancy prompts the imperfect union, and a caprice may equally annul it.

True, this is a feature in the arrangement to which he allows no prominence in the first season of vanity and adulation, but still the fact exists, and it is for the erring woman who is about to barter her honor and her fair fame against the temporary indulgence of her head strong passions, and the mortifications of probable abandonment, to remember it in the hour of temptation.

The tiger gives no warning before he springs; it is for the traveller to be wary. The serpent utters no threatening before it springs; the intended victim must defend himself against the venomed tongue, and thus, in like manner, the woman who sees only the gorgeous skin or the gleaming scales of vice, and wilfully closes her eyes against the poison to which they lend a mocking and a worthless charm, finds little pity, and excites no sympathy. The man of pleasure uses his natural weapons as the beasts of the forests use theirs, with as much carelessness of consequences, and generally with as little compunction. Selfishness is the foundation of every vice, and where the seducer has all to gain, and his victim all to lose, it is scarcely to be anticipated that he will forego his own purpose in order to shield her from evil.

The antecedents of Sybil were perhaps also calculated to render Sir Horace Trevor even less disposed to shrink from the treachery which he meditated towards a man whom he had called his friend, and a woman whom he had, once at least, sincerely and honorably loved. He knew her reputation to be sullied, and her nature to be essentially egotistical, but she yet remained beneath the roof of her husband, and, weak and faulty as she had undoubtedly shown herself to be, the one great crime against society, the one reckless contempt of its opinion which finds no indulgence even with the most charitable, until it has been bitterly repented, was still uncommitted. She had yet a place among the matrons of her country—yet a chance of redeeming herself in the eyes of the world, and in her own. And he was about to overthrow this last bulwark, and to render her henceforward dependent upon him alone.

Thus, even under all circumstances, he might well have paused. But wherefore? These were considerations for Sybil, not for himself. These were the self-evident consequences of the step which she meditated, and she could require no prompter to point with officious warning to the fact. Moreover, this was the price which she must be content to pay for luxury, liberty and love—for her escape from a cheerless home, an estranged husband, and the trammels of encumbered mediocrity.

What wonder, then, that the worldly baronet stood fully acquitted in his own eyes?

It were idle to dwell upon the scene which ensued when they met. Sybil, with all her meaner passions in arms, smarting under a sense of what she considered as her wrongs, scared by the consciousness of her husband's well-grounded displeasure, devoted to self-indulgence, and shrinking from a future of monotony and privation, did not, and would not, pause to remember that she had not even the excuse of passion to offer for the baseness of which she was about to become guilty; that her attachment to Trevor was merely the impulse of gratified vanity, in which the softer and more womanly delusions of the heart had no share, and that she saw in his proffered love only the prospect which it held out of affluence, and gratified vanity, and that freedom from constraint to which she had so long been accustomed, that it appeared to her to be as indispensable to her existence as the very air she breathed. Trevor, full of that impassioned egotism which lends eloquence even to a bad cause, believing himself, moreover, enamored of the first love of his manhood, and mistaking the sullen murmurs of former mortification for the whispers of re-awakened affection.

How could such an interview end save in error? And so indeed it ended. Sybil forgot even her child in the intoxicating dreams of a future, over which she was to be the sole and unquestioned mistress; she forgot the husband who had given himself to her without a doubt or a misgiving, despite the warning voice which would have held him back; she forgot the mother, now hovering between life and death, whose whole existence had been one unmurmuring vassalage to her single will. She thought only of herself; she saw a new votary at her feet, a new jewel cast upon her path which the world had so lately strewn with thorns and brambles, and thus she listened, believed and yielded.

In such a case the preliminaries of the meditated flight were rapidly and readily arranged, and Trevor had no sooner left the house, than the twice-perjured wife ascended to her own room, and summoning her maid, busied herself, with a calmness which in a holier cause would have amounted to heroism, in making such arrangements as she deemed necessary. Ere sun set all was accomplished; her carriage at the door; the imperial freighted with her jewels, and a few indispensable articles of apparel, and then, and then only, while she drew on her gloves to depart, it might be that a thought of her suffering mother obtruded itself, as she suddenly desired Symonds to ascertain if any letter had arrived for her by the late post. The active and watchful Abigail was already prepared to answer. There were half a dozen awaiting the return of her master, but none addressed to her lady, and Sybil asked no more.

Perhaps, even in that last, that supreme moment of her destiny, had she paused as she passed through the hall to glance at the superscription of the letters so heedlessly flung down, she might yet have paused—yet have been saved. But, no! She had ceased to remember that she was a mother; how, then, could she have lingered to remember that she was a daughter!

Mistress Symonds, with a ready wit which equalled her cupidity, had found an easy pretext for the unaccustomed appendage which was to be affixed to the carriage, and nothing occurred to delay the departure of Sybil from that home which she was never again to enter. Assuredly, the path of vice is ever a smooth one, and if something like a pang shot to her heart as she passed the threshold, and if she cast one backward glance to the windows of the nursery in which her only child was at that moment either slumbering or sporting, unconscious that it would soon be worse than motherless, her step never faltered, her will never failed.

The place of rendezvous had been arranged, and on her arrival Mrs. Mortimer alighted; the mperial was detached, and conveyed into the ouse; a trivial message delivered to the ser- ants, and the carriage dismissed. All this was ery commonplace in seeming, but not so in fact. A gulf, never again to be over-passed, had open- d between Sybil and her home—between the wife, the mother, and the woman, and those acred duties which, once violated, cannot be ighteously resumed.

With a mortal cowardice, in perfect keeping vith his character, Mortimer had delayed to the ast moment his return to a disorganized house, nd the exertion of an authority which he was onscious must be at once assumed, if he would till preserve himself from ruin, and it was con- sequently, late in the night when he once more ound himself under his own roof. The hateful ask of recrimination and reproach was thus de- ayed until the morrow, and as he ascended to his dressing-room, already restored by the acti- vity of his valet to a tenantable state, he con- gratulated himself upon an arrangement by which he had secured some additional hours of tranquillity.

His only inquiry was for his child, and satis- fied that she was well, and sleeping the sweet sleep of innocence and peace, he drew on his dressing gown, and seated himself at his writ- ing-table, resolved to bestow a few hours to the careful inspection of his steward's accounts be- fore he retired for the night. Upon the desk, however, lay the letters which had been men- tioned to Sybil, and he opened them mechanic- ally. The first which came to hand was brief, but a shadow darkened over his brow as he read it; scarcely did it comprise half-a-dozen lines, yet he pondered over them for seconds, and then, by a sudden impulse, he crushed the paper in his hand, and flung it impetuously into the fire which was burning in the grate. His correspondent had simply and courteously ac- knowledged a check for 900*l.*, lost by himself at the gaming-table on the previous evening. The next was longer; the writing more round, stu- died, and methodical, and treated of a debt not yet discharged, in less courtly terms. The third was a civil refusal to exert the interest which he had stooped to solicit in furtherance of his favorite project, by one of his most intimate as- sociates and most frequent guests, and a bitter smile convulsed his lip as he laid it down. There was, still, however, a fourth, and without even glancing at the superscription, he tore it open. In an instant he had mastered its con- tents, and starting from his seat, he rang the bell violently.

In another moment the summons was obeyed.

"Howton," he said, in considerable agitation; "I have received a letter from Westrum; Mrs. Delamere is dying, and not a moment must be lost if we can again see her alive. Send one of the men to order post-horses, throw together some linen, and whatever you may consider necessary, and let the carriage be at the door by the time your mistress is ready to start. Meanwhile I will go and prepare her. We must be on the road within an hour."

"I fear, Sir, that it will be impossible."

"And why so? Nothing should be impossi- ble at such a moment."

"My lady is from home, Sir."

"From home?—where?—when did she go?"

"She left at about six o'clock, Sir, accom- panied by Mrs. Symonds, and dismissed the car- riage after alighting at her milliner's."

"And what orders did she give?"

"Merely that the carriage might return, and that she would let them know when she required it again."

"Ha! I see it all now—I understand it all," said Mortimer in an accent of vexation; "your mistress has found herself inconvenienced by the noise and bustle of the workmen, and has consequently left the house for the night; but surely there must have been some note or mes- sage to explain this arrangement to me?"

"Nothing of the kind, Sir, or I should of course have been informed of it."

"Still I am convinced that I am right," per- sisted Mortimer, "and she probably determined too suddenly to pursue this plan to remember that I might be uneasy."

"I scarcely think so, Sir," said the man steadily, "for Mrs. Symonds had the imperial of my mis- tress's carriage taken to her room early in the day, and it was packed when she left home."

"A convincing proof of the correctness of my suggestion," retorted Mortimer, without one misgiving; "That fact alone would suffice to satisfy me that I have discovered the truth, as it was impossible that she could pass the night out of her own house without some preparation, but as it is equally impossible that she will re- main at her milliner's, and as we do not know to what friend she is gone, I do not feel that I should be justified, under the present circum- stances, in delaying my own departure until to-morrow. Prepare everything, therefore, with as much dispatch as possible, while I write a few lines to break this melancholy news to Mrs. Mortimer, and be careful that another set of horses are in readiness for her to follow me im- mediately on her return home."

The man bowed, and left the room, and if he marvelled at the blindness of his master, he had at least the discretion to remain silent.

Mortimer assuredly felt no extraordinary af- fection for Mrs. Delamere—hers was not one of those endearing natures which command attach- ment, but he respected her as the mother of his wife, and he was aware that the absence of Sybil only rendered his duty to that mother the more imperative. Hastily, therefore, but considerate- ly, he communicated in the note which he pro- ceeded to write, the absolute necessity of her immediate appearance at Westrum, urged her to fortitude, and even to hope, and informed her of the arrangements which he had made to fa- cilitate her journey. Not a word of reproach, not a sentence of harshness or displeasure es- caped him; he respected her sorrow, and forgo. his own suffering, in order to soothe hers. And when this was done, he stole to the bedside of his slumbering child, not to awaken her, for his moments were counted, but to look fondly and silently upon her cherub face before he left her, and to impress again and again upon the obse- quious nurse the necessity of constant vigilance and tenderness.

This was scarcely accomplished, when his travelling chaise was announced, and five minutes afterwards the portmanteau and carpet-bags were packed away, master and man were seated in the vehicle, and it drove off in the direction of Westrum at the best speed of four swift horses.

CHAPTER LV.

By a singular coincidence Sybil and Gertrude quitted London on the same day. The one to immolate upon the altar of vanity all her dignity as a wife, and all her purity as a woman, and the other, to seek in the bosom of an attached family the reward of her past trials. The one impoverished by her own follies, and burthened with the ruin of her husband who had confided in her; the other, rich in hope, and about to secure the happiness and prosperity of all whom she best loved.

We cannot follow Sybil and her seducer on their journey. In so far as they are concerned our task is ended. Vice ever writes its own history in blood and tears; no honest pen can fitly chronicle a career of error and of sin. Angels bow their radiant heads as the dark shadows pass, and they bow them in silence.

Gertrude left London as she had entered it, pure, humble-minded, and gentle. Not even the officious congratulations of her legal adviser, nor the anxious courtesies of her late uncle's partner, had sufficed to impress her with a conviction of her increased self-importance. She only felt that she could now repay in some degree the disinterested affection of Ernest, and the friendship of his family. Her spirit was still saddened by the remembrance of the squalid death-bed beside which she had stood so lately, and she almost felt as though it were a sin to exult in the possession of wealth which had been purchased by such privations. Yet still she smiled as she remembered that she had left one happy heart behind her, and that the humble Mrs. Sharp, made rich beyond her hopes by the possession of the scanty stock of furniture at Walworth, and permission to follow her in a few months, in order to be established under her roof for life, had blessed her as they parted, and that the meek old man who now sat beside her in the chaise, proudly attired in a new suit of glossy black, was rescued from a drudgery unsuited to his years by a slight alteration in her uncle's will, which had exchanged the bequest to an income of the same amount.

How cheaply had she thus purchased two grateful hearts, and how the consciousness that she had done so, lightened the tedium of the way, and beguiled her of the memories which still cast a cloud over her young brow, and how her pulses bounded as the woods, and streams, and meadows of Bletchley came in sight; the village street, the dingy cottage, and finally the rigid figure of her aunt!

Miss Warrington looked doubly erect and doubly stern, as she saw her niece not only alight from an expensive travelling conveyance, but even introduce beneath her roof, and without her permission, a person to whom she was a stranger, but an hour had scarcely elapsed ere Gertrude was forgiven; thanks to the eager zeal of the honest clerk, who, well versed in the jealous captiousness of poverty, at once and effectually proceeded to exorcise the threatening spirit.

A messenger was despatched to the Manor-house to announce the return of Gertrude, and ere long, Ernest Armstrong bounded into the house. Welcomes and reproaches were poured forth volubly from his lips. Gertrude had no right to sacrifice herself the to selfish caprices of a stranger.

"My dear mother's only brother!" urged the gentle girl.

"And still a stranger," persisted the young man as he sat beside her, clasping her hand, and looking anxiously into her face; "And have you reflected on all the results of your ill-advised journey?—Upon your pallid cheeks, which we had taught to bloom again at Bletchley?—Had we not, Miss Warrington?—Upon a responsibility to which you were unequal, and a fatigue, against which you had not physical strength to contend? You smile! Well, then, I will ask only one more question; has it never occurred to you that the same quixotic delicacy of feeling which took you, like a lady-errant, to London in search of extraordinary adventures, and which may perhaps prompt you to delay a marriage already definitely fixed at some six weeks hence, may at least weary out my forbearance?"

The happy girl shook her head defyingly.

"Do not be too confident in your own strength, Gertrude," said Ernest impatiently; "Sydenham vows that Mary shall keep her word, and I vow——"

Gertrude playfully laid her hand upon his lips.

"And the villa?" she asked.

The young man looked up anxiously and inquiringly.

"You know, Mr. Armstrong, that you have promised me that villa behind the hill, with its pretty shrubberies, and fish-ponds, and balconies, and aviary, and flower-gardens. I have set my heart upon becoming its mistress. Are you prepared to gratify me?"

The orphan quailed for an instant as she saw the light fade from the face of her lover, and the smile die away upon his face. Could it be that, even for one brief moment, he had mistaken her? But no; Ernest rallied ere the sound of her voice had well ceased, and raising her hand to his lips, he said sadly, but firmly,—

"Alas, my sweet Gertrude, that dream at least cannot be realised! I have failed in my efforts to secure personal independence—miserably failed, and you must even be content to accept the home which my father offers to us under his own roof. Will you not do this, dearest?"

Gertrude was, even amid her gentleness, still woman enough to exult in her power, and while she returned the fond pressure of his fingers, she whispered softly,—

"No, I must have the villa. It will require—will it not?—at least six months to effect all the alterations which you proposed. When these are completed, and not before, I will, on my side, fulfil my promise."

With a gasp of agony, Ernest Armstrong started to his feet, but she held him back.

"Listen to me," she said with a pale cheek, and a trembling voice, "listen to me, and forgive me!—I have returned to you rich—fabulously rich—this gentleman—my aunt—will tell you all! Do I not owe respect to the memory of him who has enabled me to give myself to you without a blush at my own penury? I have played with your feelings, and I am self-condemned; pardon me, therefore, and grant my last request: defer our marriage, and hereafter I will have no will but yours!"

The tale was soon told, and even the lover was convinced, although he still murmured. Gertrude was restored to him, and, although in the first joy of meeting he was comparatively insensible to the fact that she had returned home a wealthy heiress, an instant's reflection sufficed to convince him of the effect which such a circumstance must naturally produce upon his family. The flushed cheek of Miss Warrington, the proud eye of Mr. Jackson, and the meek affection of the orphan, which almost seemed to ask forgiveness for a prosperity that rendered her his equal in the eyes of the world, all tended to awaken him to a perfect consciousness of the great and unexpected change which had taken place in her fortunes, and yet it was with a mingled feeling that he murmured, as he released her hand,—

"Gertrude, I rejoice for you—for myself—for all!—and still, I would ask you never to forget that I loved you before this strange event had come to pass.

"When I forget it, may I forget myself," murmured the orphan, overawed by his emotion. "But why should you look so coldly, Ernest? Is this gold to bring distrust between us?"

Who cannot guess the answer? And who requires to be told that the villa was ready long ere the six months of mourning had expired? Was Gertrude happy? Yes; she had with her all the elements of happiness! Her empire was home—her throne the heart of her husband—her ambition a career of virtue, purity and affection. She was no heroine, as romance-readers understand the term, but a gracious and graceful woman, strong in trial, gentle in prosperity, and firm in right. And yet she had one more pang to suffer, the last, but the keenest.

It was a fortnight after her return to Bletchley, and it came to her, as sorrow often comes, through the most common-place medium—the post. When she rose in the morning, she found a letter which Hannah had laid upon her dressing-table. The handwriting had been long unseen, but never forgotten.

Thus ran the letter:—

"Gertrude,—I used to shun, but I now welcome the idea that you once loved me. I dare not disbelieve the hope. If it were indeed a fact, I am saved; if it were only a fiction, strive, I implore you, for the sake of one as pure, as lovely, and as loving as yourself, to remember that we were bound together in early years by the ties both of relationship and affection. I have no right to appeal to you, nor do I arrogate one. I will not even seek to justify myself at the expense of another. I am conscious, too miserably conscious of all my weakness, all my inconsistency. But my mother—my mother—Gertrude, loved us both. Listen to me, for her sake. I am sitting here alone—alone! Do you comprehend all the meaning which may be condensed into that solitary word?—Alone, in the stately saloon of one of the stateliest mansions of London. My child is above stairs. I dare not trust myself at this moment to see her near me. I have just returned from Westrum; from the vault of my family, where I stood, as an empty niche received the body of—yes, Gertrude, of the mother of my wife, which I had bid them place beside my own,—and would you know where that wife was, at the very moment when I was thus engaged? I will tell you. In the arms of a paramour; a pretended cousin; of a perfidious friend, of a fiend, whose name will hang like a curse upon my lips in my death-agony. Go, sleep amid your riches, will you say to me, proud in your virtuous poverty. You do not know Sybil. She has ruined her child. For myself I care not. What have I to regret? Yet Eva is young, too young to have been contaminated by bad example, or humbled by compassion. Ah, Gertrude I cannot tell you what she is! Her glorious beauty may perchance be the reflection of her mother's, but her clinging love, her gentle nature, her endearing sweetness—these are all your own. Will you reject her? England is no longer a home for me. The principles which I imbibed from my mother's lips, ill as I have employed them, forbid self-destruction, and I will live on as some expiation for four years of weakness and of folly. But I cannot endure shame. The first finger which was pointed against me would sear into my spirit like a brand, and therefore, from henceforth, so long as I may be condemned to drag on an existence which has become weary and loathsome to me, I shall remain an exile. Yes, Gertrude, an exile from all that I have loved; my country, my home, and, above all, my child, my blessed child! But let me not weary you. I have looked my partial ruin steadily in the face, and I have ascertained that it may be repaired by time. Eva is yet an infant, and thus I have ventured to retain a sufficient income to secure me against want, which will be remitted to me by a confidential friend, who will know, and will faithfully preserve the secret of all my movements. When these remittances cease to be claimed, I shall be at peace, and, meanwhile, Eva's prosperity will be secured. Gertrude! this is a last appeal. Receive it as a request from the grave. I shall remain in England until I ascertain that my child is happy under your protection—happy in your love—safe in your example. I advance no claim upon your pity, your charity, your forbearance. Again I say that I dare not. Yet still I hope—

"Frederic Mortimer."

* * * * * *

"Who was the beautiful woman with whom you were conversing just now?" asked Lord Francis Lorimer of his friend Greville, between the pauses of a quadrille.

"Beautiful!" echoed Greville with enthusiasm. "She is an angel! You remember Mortimer, whose wife eloped with Trevor about twenty years ago, when we were somewhat younger than we are to-night, and were dancers instead of lookers-on. Well, that radiant woman was her daughter—a mere infant in the nursery—and see her now! One of the most lovely and estimable women in England. How proud —— is of her. By the bye, that was a glorious speech he made in the House last night! He's a rising man, depend upon it! There's good stuff for a minister there. And such a wife!"

"By Jove! she treads like an empress," exclaimed his listener.

"And feels like a woman," retorted Lord Francis; "I know but one wife or mother in the kingdom whom I value more than herself, and that is ——"

"Mrs. Armstrong," said Greville with an animated smile! "And glad am I to find that even amid your admiration for younger and brighter beauty, you can still do her justice. Had I fifty sons, I would strive to marry them all to the daughters of Mrs. Armstrong."

THE END

THE WIFE'S TRIALS.

CHAPTER I.

"Should I another love, then must I have Another heart, for this is full of her,
And evermore shall be; here she is drawn
At length, and whole——"

Hymen's Triumph.

SEABROOKE PRIORY, the principal theater of our tale, had, as the name indicates, originally formed part of an extensive property belonging to the Romish Church. In the reign of Henry the Eighth it was cut, and carved, and distributed as best suited the views of that libel on kings; and while its hundreds of acres were shared among those who best abetted him in his tyrannic sway, the Priory itself, and the rich lands in its immediate vicinity, were bestowed on the especial favorite of the day, or rather hour, caprice being as much the characteristic of this monstrous blot on history's page as cruelty.

Through the hands of various masters did this fair specimen of nature and art successively pass —now belonging to a Papist, when matins and vespers rang out, and other ceremonies of popery prevailed—now owning the rule of a Protestant courtier, till the civil wars threw all into confusion, and the stern, uncompromising Independent, denouncing all who differed in opinion from him, as tares fit only for the burning, seized upon Seabrooke as one of the strongholds of the scarlet abomination, or the scarcely less hateful prelatic schism, and confiscated it to the uses of the state.

Afterward came the Restoration; when, sadly shorn of its fields and pastures, its sweep of rising ground to the east, and its river to the west, it fell into the hands of a parasite of that court, whose profligacy and infamy were the disgrace of the nation which permitted them. Again and again, and each time more speedily, did it change owners, and at every change, like the bottle containing the imp, fetch less; till, when the South-Sea Bubble was nearly at its height, one who had speculated fortunately, was equally fortunate in realizing before the explosion occurred, and thrice fortunate in escaping the disgorging process, which fell with ruinous effect on so many, purchased all that remained of the Seabrooke estate for a sum which furnished its late possessor with funds for discharging a so-called debt of honor.

"Cabin'd, cribb'd, confin'd," as were the limits of this once almost regal property, so eminently beautiful was the situation, that had it been converted into some huge and tall chimneyed factory town, its natural attractions could scarcely have been defaced; while a fair stream, which soon swelled almost to a river, flowing through land that richly repaid the tiller's toil, seemed to defy alike distribution or disfigurement. All around was beauty and fertility, proving that if the world-denying monk knew how to select his residence so as best to draw tribute from wood, earth, and water, he looked at scenery with the eye of the painter, and often with the feeling of a poet.

The Priory, though still so called, was no more the Priory of past generations than if it had actually been razed to its foundations and rebuilt —for, except the foundations, few traces of its original arrangement were left—passages along which many a holy man had glided with thoughts fixed on sacred subjects, had since resounded with the warlike tread of him whose trade was slaughter, and whose thoughts were of deeds of violence and blood—the spot where the simple cells had stood, whose walls had echoed many a sigh of regret, many a groan of remorse, many an agonizing cry for pardon, when the overburdened spirit must speak or die; adorned now with the rude luxury of more modern times, received its reeling occupant through the various stages of debauchery, from tipsy excitement to the most degraded state of drunken insensibility, and resounded with ribald jests or fierce imprecations. The very gardens, with their fragrance and loveliness, were less fragrant, less lovely, when thronged with the fallen angels who were occasionally invited to the Priory revels, for "the trail of the serpent was over them all."

Thus it had gone on with a downward tendency, when, much to the astonishment of his compeers of the Stock Exchange, Mr. Ashley became the purchaser; nor was this astonishment lessened when they found that he not only intended to keep his bargain, but to lay out a considerable sum of money on its improvement. This was carried on with a good sense, which showed that he had well understood his wishes, and calculated his means. Gradually, by advantageous sales or exchanges of out-lying patches, and equally advantageous purchases of alienated land near the center of the property, he possessed, in the course of a quarter of a century, one of the most compact as well as beautiful estates in England. Thrifty but not penurious, never generous but always just, for years and years after his death, he was cited as the greatest benefactor the Priory had ever called master; and this title was inherited by both son and grandson, who carried on his plans without attempting to extend them.

The building itself was completed by his grandson, and had received but trifling alterations since his time, when decending still through the Ashleys, a race whose enterprise and love of accumulation seem to have ended with the origional purchaser, the Priory, with its valuable tenements, hereditaments, etc., etc., became the property of Horace Ashley, the very last male heir of a family which had lately boasted of six sons. The father of Horace, a younger son, fell in battle, leaving a widow, and their only child. She was of noble birth, but poor, and on the death of her husband gratefully accepted the offer of a relative, that at his expense Horace should be educated for his father's profession; but death after death among the Ashleys, at length left this boy the possessor of a property which, at his birth, had seemed as far removed from him as a kingdom.

After completing his education, no longer as a soldier, but as a wealthy landed proprietor, he set off, as was the fashion, on his travels; and in France was introduced to the family of Lord Westrough, to whose daughter, Lady Frances, a beautiful girl, he became passionately attached. Horace, from early delicacy of health, had been much with his loving and true-hearted mother—to him she was a type of womanly virtues and excellences—a model of all that was lovely and good; and the virtues he had ever found in her were, by a poetic and chivalrous temperament, believed to exist equally in the lovely Frances.

His proposals were received with scarcely concealed delight by the noble but needy parents; and by the lady herself with, at least, no opposition. He returned to England the happy lover, and was making extensive and costly preparations for the reception of the fair fiancée, when he received the dreadful intelligence that she had privately married the handsome but profligate Captain Templeton.

Horace never recovered from this shock to his best and tenderest feelings; but too benevolent to visit on his fellows generally the treachery of one, he became neither a misanthrope nor a recluse; if love had been rudely crushed in his heart, other feelings still beat warmly and kindly to those around him—if one had been false, he had troops of friends true and constant—and though sad himself, he had the blessed privilege of bringing joy to others. Ah! why had not this noble nature been early taught, that where respect is lost, love should not be allowed to linger; a lesson which is still unknown to some of the best and gentlest, who have mistaken the glitter of tinsel for the luster of pure metal.

Doubly endeared by this trial to his mother, who sought with all the ingenuity of real affection to mitigate the effects of this bitter disappointment, he resided henceforth with her, chiefly at the Priory; and when, at an advanced age, she died, he spent the remainder of his days in carrying out their joint schemes for improving and benefiting all around him. At length his own career of unobtrusive goodness ended, and great was the curiosity to know to whom the large and productive property at Seabrooke would descend.

It then appeared that he had never forgotten her, through whose heartless conduct his whole life had been clouded. Captain Templeton had died about eight years after his marriage, leaving a son and daughter, with their mother, entirely dependent on relatives. The daughter, by a little management, had been received by her great-aunt, and resided with her in Scotland; but as Lady Anne's income was small, poor Laura might easily have learned how hard it is to eat the bread of another, had not a kind friend, whose incognito it was easy to guess, from time to time forwarded sums of money for her especial benefit.

Lionel lived with his mother and an unmarried uncle, and was destined for his father's profession; the silly mother's predilection for a scarlet coat and gold epaulettes not having been cured by her dearly-bought experience, that they may cover a heart quite poor in all noble sentiments and upright principles. Petted and spoiled when a child, insolence and selfishness marked his boyhood, nor was there any one circumstance in which he was placed that tended to root out, or even weaken, these hateful qualities; for though often obliged to conceal them, and to seem humble, because he did not dare to be overbearing; or to affect courtesy when he longed to insult, because self-interest counseled restraint—these fostered vices of his character broke out with double violence when they could do so with impunity.

At the death of his uncle, which happened when he was about six-and-twenty, he and his lady mother found themselves almost destitute. His uncle's income died with him, but the little he had saved purchased a trifling annuity for Lady Frances; while other relatives, having been alienated or estranged by the exclusive appropriation of their deceived kinsman and his means, studiously kept aloof.

Nothing so mean as selfish pride. Lady Frances, quite unconscious that the heart she had wounded could still smart at her touch; quite thoughtless or regardless that in referring to past times, and in pleading the cause of her son, the man, childless and solitary, would feel doubly desolate; she skillfully alluded to some service he had recently rendered government, and entreated his aid to procure for Lionel some subordinate appointment then vacant.

The reply was distant, cold, almost haughty. In serving government, Mr. Ashley claimed neither reward nor recompense; but understanding that Mr. Lionel Templeton had been educated for the army, he placed at his command a commission in a regiment leaving for active service in the Peninsula, and had the honor to remain her Ladyship's obedient servant.

Brief was her remark—"Unless he had altogether refused, he could not have done less nor worse." She knew not that this formal, business-like letter had cost the writer many hours of sharp anguish. "He is a regular old bore," was the grateful criticism of the son; and he also little knew that this very commission had been procured with difficulty and great cost, at a period when men were eager to distinguish themselves on the battle-field, for the express purpose of removing him from the pernicious influence of his weak mother, and by placing him among men of honor, and the stern realities of an active and responsible duty, to afford him a chance of becoming wiser and better.

Though taking but little part in the busy hum of men, Horace Ashley was not entirely ignorant what passed in the modern Babylon, and lis-ned with a painful interest to the proceedings of ady Frances; for though all he learned proved r to be utterly destitute of any quality that ins respect or esteem, by him she was remem-red as the beautiful girl, who had realized his sions of the fair spirit that was to minister to m through life. Her folly, with regard to her n, he greatly deplored, and when applied to on s behalf, responded to the appeal, as we have en, with the kindest intentions, and in the most fectual manner.

At first, Lionel vapored and gasconaded about efusing the commission; he upbraided his mother r having subjected him to this impertinent med-ling, and insinuated that Mr. Ashley had taken is opportunity of showing her how a beggar ould be answered, though at the time she pro-osed making the application, he, with the hope obtaining something more agreable to his notions ease and enjoyment, had warmly seconded the fort. With the next post, however, a change ame over him; it brought a convincing argument, the form of a bill for one thousand pounds, to rocure the outfit and pay necessary expenses; he donor, as it appeared, not anticipating a refu-l of his offer. Lionel then took another tone; nsolence was exchanged for meanness, bravado r fawning, ungrateful sneers for expressions of lmost servile obligation.

Happily for his comfortable estimate of himself nd his importance, this new-born abasement did ot survive the touch of the money; this singular umility vanished at the sight of the commission, nd his letter of thanks was manly and gentle-anly—accompanied by one from his mother, an dd mixture of platonism and sentimentality, in hich she talked a good deal of namby-pamby bout former friendship and days long past, and inted that Lionel was most anxious to express is thanks in person, to one who had been so kind friend; but as no notice was taken of this sug-estion, it is presumed no answering anxiety was elt to see him; and so he went with his regiment o win battles and gather laurels; to try for ame and fame on those fields where liberty and life are both so often lost.

Lionel was not deficient in either ambition or ourage; and though the discipline to which he vas subjected was galling to his pride and opposed o his habits of self-indulgence, he had sense enough to know that during the stirring times of war, he who aspires to high rank as an officer must prove his claim to promotion by being a good soldier; and promotion did follow his endeavors, for his name was honorably mentioned in the General's dispatches, and friends in England sud-denly recovering their memory, began to call on and congratulate Lady Frances; when an engage-ment took place in which his regiment suffered severely, and he, as it was supposed, fell mortally wounded—supposed only—for his body was not found, while a soldier who fought near him, but who escaped, declared he saw him fall—struck from his horse by a violent blow on the head.

These dreadful tidings and the harassing sus-pense were fatal to his mother; and when, more than a year afterward, he appeared, great was the astonishment at his escape; greater still at his silence. It was quite true that he had been violently struck on his head, and he supposed, while in a state of insensibility, he must have been ridden over, as when consciousness returned he suffered acutely from various contusions and a fractured arm. He ascribed his escape en-tirely to the intervention of a priest, whose religious duty led him into the ranks of friend or foe to help and console—by him he was taken to his convent, and there nursed till perfectly recovered—but he always seemed careful to avoid entering into any particulars connected with his long absence, and was equally uncom-municative regarding the reasons for his strange silence.

To his wealthy friend he wrote announcing his return, and again received substantial proofs of his favor and generosity; and the gay and hand-some Lionel, now Colonel Templeton, became the hero of various fashionable coteries, while the fair, the young, and the wealthy made him the hero of their romance.

Among those who combined all three of these gifts was the Honorable Ellinor Grantham, to whom Lionel contrived to make himself so agree-able that she consented to give him herself, and, what he by no means undervalued, all her rich belongings also. Ellinor's brother, Lord Gran-tham, who was not the least in love with the all-conquering Colonel, reminded her that Lionel, before he left England, had established for him-self a character which was composed of several unattractive, not to say ugly, features—that it was hinted he was dissipated, whispered that he gambled, and openly asserted that he was selfish and false. But Ellinor did not believe either the hint, the whisper, or the assertion; and they were married, her romantic confidence leading her to place the whole of her large fortune at his disposal.

A few months after their marriage they went abroad, and traveled about from one place to another, during which time two girls were born, with whom Colonel Templeton and his wife sud-denly returned to England, summoned by the death of Mr. Ashley—who, to the breathless astonishment of almost every one, had left the whole of his beautiful estate, Seabrooke Priory, to Colonel Templeton, in trust for his son; five thousand pounds to the Honorable Mrs. Temple-ton for her especial and independent use—ten thousand to Laura Templeton, and legacies of greater or less amount to his particular friend, the Rev. Charles Vernon, and his family, who also held in trust a handsome sum for charities.

CHAPTER II.

"'Twas no fantastic object, but a truth—
Then dumb magician, that without a charm
Dost make my entrance easy, to possess
What wise men wish and toil for."

The City Madam.

By some it is thought that adversity is the true touch-stone of character; some, on the contrary, maintain that prosperity is more trying; but the truth seems to be, that each only develops those qualities which, but for its aid, would have remained dormant or unobtrusive. The man who with cheerful resolution sets his shoulder to the wheel which adversity has driven deep into the mire, and, having extricated it, will help or teach another to do the same, is very likely to bear prosperity with equanimity, and a generous sympathy for those less fortunate; while another, who has shrunk from exertion when most needed, and submitted to a paralyzing dependence, or degrading pauperism, would be very likely, were wealth to become his, to overvalue it as a miser, or squander it as a selfish spendthrift

"Do you know any thing of Colonel Templeton?" inquired Mrs Vernon of her husband, as they took their hitherto privileged walk in the beautiful grounds more immediately near the Priory, a few days before his arrival.

"Not much," was the cautious and rather equivocal reply, even to his beloved wife—for had he finished the sentence, it would have been thus, "to his advantage."

"He has been living chiefly abroad since his marriage, has he not? I wonder whether he resembles Mrs. Sinclair? if so, he must be very handsome!"

"He is said to be a very handsome and fascinating man," said Mr. Vernon; "but owing to their early separation I should expect but little similarity in character between brother and sister, whatever there may be in looks. This opportune legacy will, I hope, relieve the Sinclairs from their dependence on Sir Alan, and, by reconciling him to the match, induce him to exert his influence in a more fatherly way than in trying to banish them to the fever-giving coast of Africa."

"But I thought he gave his consent to the marriage," observed Mrs. Vernon.

"So he did—but he then believed Miss Templeton was heiress to something better than Lady Anne Ferguson's old chairs and tables—even now, I believe, he resents what he considers a trick much more than the loss of fortune."

The speakers were the rector of Seabrooke and his wife, whose characters may be briefly expressed in the wish, that all in situations of similar responsibility possessed similar excellence. He was an intelligent and benevolent looking man of about thirty-five; she, a gentle reflection, a few years younger. Mr. Vernon was the nephew of the late Mr. Ashley's dear friend and traveling companion—the only one, except his revered mother, who knew all the particulars of his disappointment and its trying effects—and after her death the only one with whom he could ever revert to the past. When the event which doomed him to solitude had calmed down from the sharp agony which wrung alike mind and body, into the patient endurance, if not quiet resignation, which time produces, Mr. Ashley turned to take a survey of what, amid this great wreck, had been left—and he found his mother and his friend—these he at first believed to be all—but gradually mother and friend convinced him that there were still noble and inexhaustible resources, from which much happiness—yes, happiness, so they said—might be derived. He was at first skeptical, but he tried them—tried them well—and they were not found wanting; and hence the large, but judicious, expenditure of his handsome income in plans which slowly, but surely, did lasting and extensive good.

Mr. Vernon it was who gained information for him of Lady Frances and her children, though neither he nor his nephew Charles thought it needful to enter into the details of that chit-chat which dubbed her ladyship a fool and her son a vaurien. But when Mr. Ashley, pleased with what was publicly told of Lionel, and especially with his marriage into a family so much respected as that of the Granthams, talked of making him his heir, then Mr. Vernon suggested that the property should be entailed on a son, arguing that the income arising from it was so ample as to admit of a style of living not only generous but lavish; and, in short, that, under any circumstances, it was always better to restrain those who had been educated in such thoughtless indulgence, as it was notorious Colonel Templeton had been. Thus then it was settled, and little did the Colonel know to whom he was indebted for the clog to this magnificent bequest, which he so often found irritating and galling.

On Mr. Vernon's death, which occurred shortly before the death of his friend, the living was given to Charles Vernon, who, with his wife and family, took possession of the rectory, and entered zealously on the performance of his important duties.

Both church and rectory had been repaired by the first Mrs. Ashley, who was grieved to think how long the work of ruin must have been allowed to go on unchecked. She found both in a state of decay and neglect, only too sadly typical of the minds and morals of the people generally. But now few things could offer a more striking contrast between the past and the present. The church, one of those rare specimens of Gothic architecture occasionally found in England, had been restored, not destroyed; while the rectory, built to harmonize with it as much as due regard to internal comfort would permit, was a model of taste and beauty—it was within an easy walk of the church, and nearly two miles from the Priory, of which there was a lovely view from the study windows; from the drawing-room, over the gently-sloping lawn, the sea was visible; toward the north it was sheltered by the eminence on which stood the church, and by a well-contrived plantation of hardy trees. But oh! the rectory garden—let us peep at it over its shining laurel hedge, though it may be very early spring—for it is always pretty from the suggestions of taste which the mere arrangement called up. Look at those well-contrasted evergreens, keeping watch over the hidden treasures, till suns and genial weather shall disclose them—see those beds of varied and fantastic shape, and imagine what they are when the inhabitants come forth in all the glory of their gay attire—hundreds of roses of various hue and form, when summer comes, will fill the air with their clear, delicious perfume—and then that formal piece of arabesque, how dazzling must be the effect when the artistic contrasts of color shall burst upon the delighted eye.

But all this time the Colonel is waiting, and not very patiently either, for it may be whispered as a secret, not to be elsewhere divulged, that at the very time this rich inheritance came to him, he was meditating an appeal to the hoards of his nseen benefactor; sickness, increased family, nforeseen expenses, or any other fabulous plea e might have invented, would have been used—ad he done so, certain peccadilloes, which seemed lways to dog his steps, might have become nown, which would have stood between him and is bequest; but all was safe—here he was, again et up in the world, and once more going to start air.

"I think I must quarter you and the children n your brother, while I run down and see what his place is like," said the Colonel, the day after heir arrival at Dover.

"Could we not accompany you?" suggested is wife; "Cecil's house is not over-large, and I ear we may incommode them"—for she remembered that a correspondence had passed between ier husband and brother, which had not been of he most oily character; and that when the last housand pounds of her fortune had been demanded, her brother, roused from his usual indolence, had warmly and sharply remonstrated. But it suited Colonel Templeton to forget this—n short, he never remembered any thing that nterfered with his arrangements; besides, it also suited him to be friendly with his wife's brother, whose station and character reflected credit which wealth alone could not; and he rather piqued himself on thus maneuvering to send Ellinor with one olive branch in her hand, and the other in the nurse's arms, to Lord Grantham, who would, he hoped, receive them as pledges that the deluge was over, and that sunshine might be looked for.

Lord Grantham was a good-tempered, easily-managed, indolent man; who, happily for himself and his children, had married an amiable, cheerful wife, possessed in abundance of the energy and activity he wanted. Not easily repulsed or abashed, it was through her reiterated solicitations that one of her relations, who was in office, bestowed a snug little post on her husband, the late lord having sadly encumbered the family estate; it was through her laughing but persevering entreaties that the godfather of her eldest son gave him a cadetship; and she was so determined on it, that an Indian director, whom she besieged, capitulated, and promised to give the second boy an appointment in the East; while she never scrupled smilingly to avow, that she kept her hands ready to catch any windfall that might suit the youngest, a mere babe; and all this was done so heartily, so fearlessly, so frankly, with so complete an unconsciousness of departing in the least from the strictest propriety, that those who looked on became unconscious also; perhaps the more readily and easily, because she was always so ready to help others—when she had helped herself—that it was impossible for friends to censure very severely that by which they occasionally profited. Then, she was so true and honest in all she did; so courageous in suiting her expenses to her husband's income; so judicious in training her boys, by early self-denial, bravely to meet the privations they must encounter in making their way through the world; that every one, especially men of sense or experience, felt a pleasure in forwarding her views and lessening her cares.

In person she was exactly the woman we should expect to see—eminently "la femme de la situation." Tall, well-formed, promising to be what is politely called a fine woman—Anglice, stout—her clear complexion, bright, well-opened blue eye, and mouth of unrivaled beauty, all gave tokens of a genial, happy temperament.

"How I ever was induced to marry that dawdle Cecil, I can not imagine," she remarked one day to old Admiral Western, who had been laughing at her naval speculations for the third boy, and had pronounced her the head of the family.

"I suppose, my love," replied Lord Grantham, quietly looking over his newspaper, "it was because you did not know what to do with your superabundant energy, and so, in pity to your overloaded self, bestowed it on one who so greatly needed it."

"Most likely some such charitable motive influenced me; though, now I come to think of it, how he had the courage to ask is still more wonderful."

"Perhaps it was leap year," slily suggested the Admiral.

"And you would insinuate that I asked him," she replied, laughing; "well, even that is not utterly impossible."

"Right," retorted the old sailor; "there is no harm in asking, you know—eh, Lady Grantham?"

"None that I can find out; but I perceive you are thinking of that plan I mentioned respecting Alfred."

"What, Alfred the little, dear Etta?" asked his lordship; "why, the child can not speak plainly yet."

"An excellent reason why his mother should speak for him; and Admiral Western has kindly promised to use his influence for him, when he needs it."

"You take time, indeed, by the forelock; and that reminds me, I have ordered the man to bring up the pony, which, I think, will match the one you have. He should be here by this time."

"Indeed, Cecil, I am sorry you have taken this trouble, as, with many thanks for your kindness, I must beg leave to decline the gift."

"But I thought you said you would like a pair; and the truth is, I do not like you to drive only one."

"You are quite right as to my liking, but not quite wise, dear husband, about your own. I must have a governess shortly for Cecilia; she can no longer be left to nurses; and it is clear how it will be decided when it is education versus two ponies."

"She is a capital wife and mother, too," said the Admiral to himself, as he left the house; "and I certainly shall not forget that boy when he is old enough to need my aid."

"And now, Cecil, I must talk to you about the Templetons; they will, of course, be coming home to take possession of this handsome property, and I hope that any little asperity which may have occurred during your correspondence with the Colonel, will not, for Ellinor's sake, lead to an estrangement."

"If it should suit him to be friendly, it certainly will not," replied Lord Grantham; who, though indolent and apathetic generally, had a nice and correct appreciation of character, and had rightly read that of his handsome brother-in-law, and being besides a most affectionate man, loved his sister tenderly. "You know my opinion of Templeton, and that I always consider it an evil day which bound Ellinor's fate with his—her large fortune is entirely gone, and had it not been for this unexpected bequest, I know not what they would have done. We have nothing to spare, and there is not another rich aunt to endow my sister again with twenty thousand pounds."

"It is useless to regret Ellinor's infatuation in refusing to have any portion settled on herself; such romance, or, as I read it, folly, is wholly incomprehensible to me," said his wife; "but I understand there is a small legacy left under this will, entirely at her own disposal: let us hope that experience has made her wise, and that she will take care of this—though, of course, she will now have some provision made for herself and children."

"Do not deceive yourself, Etta; there will be none, unless the will enjoin it: but here are the letters—Dover post-mark, doubtless from them—from Ellinor. Read it, my dear."

"Dear Cecil:

"We feel so sure of your kind welcome, that I purpose coming in person to receive it; therefore, if Henrietta can take us all in, babies and nurse, directly I receive your answer I shall start for town. The interval will be very profitably spent in recruiting my strength by needful rest, as the letter which summoned us found us at Baden-Baden, which place we left immediately, and traveled without stopping, to cross by the first boat. Lionel has just started for Seabrooke, but thought the journey too much for me and the children, and, relying on your ever-ready hospitality to receive and shelter us I only await your reply. This all seems to me a dream, almost too delightful to be true, though, to make it complete, I must find you and your dear ones all well. Best love to Henrietta from your tired and sleepy, but affectionate sister,

"Ellinor Templeton."

"Can we receive them?" asked Lord Grantham, turning to his wife with an anxious look.

"Can we? dear Cecil, what a question! Ellinor will take one spare room, the nurse and children the other; and Watkins must admit them during the day to her domains. Shall I write or will you?"

"Oh, you, by all means, and say we long to see her."

"My dear Ellinor:

"As usual, Cecil makes me amanuensis—I suppose because he fears he shall not make you understand how rejoiced we shall be to receive you: perhaps here I shall also fail, so let it pass till our meeting tells it for us—a pleasure which we are glad Colonel Templeton's thoughtful care so early procures us. We both congratulate you sincerely on your accession to the Seabrooke property, which we also venture to hope will be a sufficient inducement to your remaining in England. Au revoir.

"Henrietta Grantham."

"Thoughtful care!" repeated Mrs. Templeton, again reading the brief but kind note. "Gretchen," she continued, in German, addressing a healthy-looking woman, who was amusing one pretty little girl, and singing lullaby to another, "we shall leave immediately; collect the few things we have unpacked—I will dress Miss Helen and take care of the baby."

CHAPTER III.

"Si l'homme savoit rougir de soi, quels crimes non seulement cachés, mais publics et connus ne s'épargneroit-il pas?"—La Bruyère.

On the evening of the same day, once more was Mrs. Templeton seated in the very comfortable drawing-room of her brother's small but well-appointed house, hearing of much that had occurred since they had parted, though evidently determined that they should hear little from her in return.

"And Cecilia," she asked, "where is she? Has she kept her promise of being her mother's image?"

"Oh, she is with my sister Lucy, who so sadly spoils her that I am going to have her home now for a permanency. I mean to engage a really clever governess, if accomplished all the better, but not essential, and to resign Cecilia to her guidance for the next few years; your other question is not so soon answered."

"Merely," interrupted Lord Grantham, "because every body calls Cecilia a very handsome girl, and Etta is afraid, if she acknowledges the likeness, she may be called vain; but her fear does not change the fact of resemblance.

"For shame, Cecil," she said, justifying his compliment by a most becoming blush, and a smile which displayed the beauty and wealth of her mouth; and turning to her sister-in-law, she added, "but I wish your fairies did not look so delicate."

"Helen is by no means really so, nor my little Constance either, but our journey was both hurried and fatiguing."

"Which also may account for your pale cheeks," said her brother; "so I vote that you seek a good night's rest, and to-morrow shall bring its full share of news and gossip."

"I really shall not decline the prescription; the fact of being once more under this roof insures success, and so good-night."

"Cecil!" said Lady Grantham, fixing her clear eyes on her husband, with rather more than their usual sparkle in them.

"I know, my dear Etta, all that your indignant looks mean, but it is evident she has taken her resolution, and it is not for us to interfere, especially unasked."

"Quite my idea," she replied; "but good heavens! what can it all mean? Left with only a foreign nurse, with scarcely the luggage of a lady's nurse, and apologizing for a shabby toilette! Oh, Cecil! Cecil! what does it all mean?"

"Simply this," he answered quietly, but in a tone of deep feeling; "Ellinor has made a mis-ake; whether she is yet aware to what an extent, I know not; but I repeat it, our course is plain."

The following morning Mrs. Templeton and her ress looked better, though still both looked worn; ne, however, expressed great pleasure at again pending a short time with her brother and his rife.

"I have a few words of business, which must ot be delayed, to say to you and Henrietta," she ather abruptly observed, as they sat at breakast; "are you too busy to grant me an audince?" turning to him.

"Ellinor, you are satirical," said Lady Granham, "or you are ingenious in imagining impossibilities. Now, my dear sister, when did you ver know Cecil to be either very busy or very lurried?"

"He was very busy when he was trying to seure you," replied Ellinor.

"And I am sure I was dreadfully hurried to each your mother's house the day we were married," he remarked, interrupting her.

"Oh, because you had forgotten all about it, and were behind time," his wife maliciously rejoined, with her merry laugh; "but what is this business that must not be put off?"

"It must not," said Mrs. Templeton; "and on that account I wish to name it to you and Cecil. You know the late Mr. Ashley left me five thousand pounds entirely at my own disposal; it was a blessed thought, and deeply grateful do I feel—I mean," she said, correcting the energy of her tone and manner, "that it is pleasant to have a few pounds at one's own command;" and again feeling that she was on self-forbidden ground, she boldly plunged in "medias res." "This money I mean to place so that I can not, under any circumstances, touch the principal, which I shall settle on my daughters, the interest to be used as I like. Can this be done, and can it be done immediately?"

"Yes; and I will send for my lawyer before you leave."

"And I propose an amendment," said Lady Grantham; "drive Ellinor to him before luncheon: let him receive her instruction, so that if summoned away, it may still be done and sent to her for signature, or any other legal formality."

Bravely and stoically bidding back her tears, and denying herself the pleasure of falling on her sister's neck, Mrs. Templeton said, "Thank you for the suggestion; I should very much like to have it done at once, but as that, perhaps, can not be, we will avoid all needless delay."

"And Lionel?" asked Lord Grantham; "what will he say?"

"He must be so astonished at his unexpected wealth," she replied, "as not to think or care about mine; in short," she continued emphatically, "I have decided in this case for myself, and do not mean to have any interference."

A few days after this, came a letter from the Colonel to his "dear Ellinor," thanking her brother for his hospitable reception of "his treasures," desiring the said Ellinor to draw upon his banker to any amount for replenishing her wardrobe. ("Not before it is wanted," mentally remarked Lady Grantham.) To be ready to join him in the course of a week, if he should be prevented fetching her, and to arrange with Lord and Lady Grantham for a long visit to the Priory, whenever it suited them to give him that pleasure.

The next day was spent in making the necessary purchases, among which Mrs. Templeton contrived to include a few handsome presents for her niece and nephews; and at the end of a fortnight came the summons for her to meet the Colonel at the Priory, which her brother and sister promised to visit, when she should write and say she was ready to receive them.

No one who had not been well acquainted with the change which a few years had wrought in the character, feelings, and, above all, in the hopes of the trusting, loving, inexperienced Ellinor Grantham, could have imagined the soothing and restgiving effects of her short visit to her brother's house, where, for the first time, she was received as the Honorable Mrs. Templeton. Three years only had intervened; but in that short time what lessons had she not learned! thrice blessed are they who forever remain ignorant of them! She had, during that period, learned that her love was a mistake; that her confidence was a mistake; she had dreamed a dream in which she had ever by her side one with a noble and true heart, one who gave her love for love, who was generous and honorable; who shielded and protected her from trial and sorrow, by bravely interposing himself, and she had been rudely awoke, never so to sleep and dream again!

The journey to Seabrooke, with her helpless companions—for Gretchen, though a most valuable aid in her own country, was certainly a charge in England—was extremely tiring; and Mrs. Templeton was anxiously looking for the last change of horses, when, on arriving at the inn, she was much gratified and surprised to find Colonel Templeton awaiting her arrival.

"I calculated you would be here about this time," he observed, "and therefore drove out to meet you; Gretchen and the children can follow with fresh horses, but I shall like to drive you myself to the Priory."

"I shall greatly enjoy the drive in an open carriage, for, truth to tell, I began to find the journey long."

Is it really true that she will never so sleep and so dream again?—Quite true.

"I see you have not brought your own maid down with you; does she follow with the rest of the luggage?" asked her husband.

"I have not engaged any one to attend on me; you did not mention it, and our luggage is in the post carriage. With respect to the children, I prefer looking out among the country people for some one to assist Gretchen, and Lady Grantham will kindly supply and forward any thing I may have neglected."

"Very well, then give her carte blanche; it will not do for you to want any thing which my position demands; for I can tell you, Ellinor, that it is different now from what it was a year or two ago."

"It is indeed," she thought—not said. Three, four years! What a long time that was—it was the whole life of her love—within that period it had been born, neglected, ill-used, had pined away, and died!

They drove along several miles in silence, till at length the scene became one of such exceeding beauty, that she was roused from her listlessness and revery, and exclaimed with something of old animation, "Oh! Lionel, what a lovely place this is! I hope the Priory is within a drive of it."

"We are now driving on my property," he replied; and checking the horses, he pointed to an opening: "yonder you have a peep at the building."

"Charming! charming!" she murmured, tears filling her eyes as she looked on the peaceful beauty of all around. They then drove slowly through an avenue of trees—and such trees!—through which she caught glimpses of meadows and plantations, stream and park, all in a state of such order and beauty, as showed that the eye of taste had directed the hand of skill. And now they suddenly came on an extensive opening, and the whole front range of the Priory burst on the view.

"There," exclaimed the Colonel, his handsome face beaming with pride and pleasure, "there is Seabrooke Priory; and look behind, Ellinor, there is the sea in the distance, and the little bright stream winding through my property, to reach it."

She rose and looked, while a throb of gratification stirred her heart. Oh, how glorious! how lovely! it was not sublime, it was not even grand—but it was nature in one of her most fascinating forms—it was beauty in repose and at peace. The emerald sea with its life-like movement, the azure sky, the silver stream, the varied and rich tints of field and wood, all were "Lieder ohne Worte;" and then, when she turned to the gray and majestic old building, her future home, whose folding doors were flung wide open to welcome the new owners, she thought that, if place could give peace, here it must be found.

"Why, this is quite a territory," she said with enthusiasm; "it is a little principality."

"By Jove! you are right there, Nelly. I wonder what some of those foreign fellows we met in Germany would think of this place; it would lower their paltry pride a little, if they could see me here."

"Heaven in its mercy forbid that desecration!" was her silent ejaculation.

"But here we are;" and as he handed her out, he saluted her cheek, bidding her welcome to Seabrooke Priory—a welcome which was echoed by several servants in waiting, and improved upon by a respectable-looking woman, who introduced herself as Mrs. Dawson, with the additional wish her station permitted her to make, of—

"Welcome, madam, to the Priory, and health and happiness to your ladyship."

"I thank you," said Mrs. Templeton, smiling her usual sweet smile on them all; then addressing Mrs. Dawson, she remarked, "Our daughters, with their nurse, can not be far distant, and as the latter is a foreigner, let them be brought to me directly they arrive."

"Would your ladyship like to see your apartments, those the Colonel has ordered to be prepared?"

"Yes, for I am weary, though the drive through this beautiful neighborhood has taken away half the fatigue."

Attracted by the beauty, gentleness, and grace of her new lady, and quite won by this compliment to her native place, Mrs. Dawson, in high feather, led the way across a spacious hall, up a flight of marble stairs, and along a corridor, adorned, seemingly, with rare and costly works of art, to a suite of rooms splendidly furnished, which she said the Colonel had selected: "And, indeed, madam," she continued, with a smile, "he has chosen what are considered the best, both for convenience and prospect. If you will please to step here, you may see part of the village—that house, near the church, is the rectory, and yonder you can just see Hurstwood Hall—it used once to be a very gay place, but since the death of Lady Blanche, the old Lord sees no company, and young Lord Stanley is abroad. Can I have the honor of doing any thing for you till your maid arrives?"

"Nothing, thank you, but I should like you to accompany the children when they come. I must introduce them to you, and bespeak your indulgence for any spoiled ways," said Mrs. Templeton, greatly pleased with the manner and countenance of the housekeeper.

"No need of that, madam," was the reply; "bless their innocent little hearts! more need for you to forbid my spoiling them. My late dear master used always to say, when the beautiful darlings from the rectory came here, it was well there were no children for me to spoil;" but here her comely and sunny face was overcast, as she turned and left the room.

And Ellinor stood alone—mistress of that noble mansion—almost all she looked at from the windows of that room was hers—hers, as well as her husband's, and yet, not once had he associated her with himself in the exulting thought of ownership. Was it only a careless omission—or was it part of a selfish system?

CHAPTER IV.

"And eyes forget the gentle ray
They wore in courtship's sinjing day,
And voices lose the tone that shed
A tenderness round all they said;
Till, fast declining, one by one
The sweetnesses of love are gone."
Lalla Rookh

Brought up in her father's house, if not amid all the luxuries of vast wealth, at least with all the comforts and refinements suited to her rank, the Honorable Ellinor Grantham, though ever ready to sympathize with sorrow, and, as far as her at one time limited allowance permitted, to help and relieve poverty, had, however, no very clear idea of all that this word poverty implied. She knew that at many aristocratic houses where her father was ever an honored guest, there was a style of expenditure which his encumbered property forbade his imitating; and also, that among many families she highly esteemed, an economy was practiced which he disregarded; and these formed the only degrees of comparison with which she was actually conversant; and though she must have been both stupid and selfish, had she ignored the extremes of destitution and misery which sigh and die in the holes and corners of great cities; beyond relief through some deputy, she knew not of them—never came into personal contact with them.

This knowledge was reserved for her wedded life—it was to be acquired by the Hon. Mrs. Templeton—the instructor, her husband—the lessons, his vices. From Paris, its luxuries, its refinements, its Bal Masqué, its coulisses, and its gaming-houses, she took her first lesson—she read from the lives of faithless wives, of betrayed lovers, of broken hearts and ruined fortunes, whole pages which sickened and disgusted as she read—from Germany, with its sentimentalities and its grossness—its mouthing patriotism and its wearisome egotism—its Cursaal with a rouge et noir table licensed by some princely pettiness, and its immorality reeking of beer and tobacco, but concealed by song and poetry—she learned a still sadder and more peace-destroying lesson; and it was there she buried her dead love, and with weeping eyes and trembling hands inscribed on its tomb—Ichabod—the glory is departed!

Shortly before the birth of Constance, she found herself, with the little Helen and the good Gretchen, in one of those lonely villages so common toward the north of Switzerland. Lionel had been absent more than a week, and her anxiety for his return was much increased by her wish to seek a place offering better accommodation, and by her absolute want of funds to meet daily expenses. She knew he had gone to receive a remittance from England, by means of which he had promised to remove her to Basle; but day after day passed, and no longer daring to delay, she sent for the landlady, and frankly stating her embarrassment, inquired how she could most advantageously dispose of a few ornaments, so as to defray the debt already incurred, and secure the services of a doctor.

After some consultation, during which she met with great kindness, Mrs. Templeton learned that the pastor would be the one most likely to inform her; and to him she sent. He was a Protestant, and to the active benevolence, so needful in the discharge of his duties, united the simplicity and straitforwardness so common among the Swiss clergy.

After satisfying her inquiries regarding the sale of her trinkets, he advised her to secure, at once, medical attendance; and he not only recommended an attentive and skillful man, but offered to send his wife to see her—an offer most gratefully accepted; and expressing himself really grieved that he could not do all he wished, by at once advancing a loan, he left her much quieted.

Neither doctor nor wife arrived much too soon; and in a small Swiss inn, with none but foreign eyes to look kindly at her, none but foreign tongues to cheer her, did the Hon. Mrs. Templeton give birth to her little Constance Franciska, so called after the lake near which she was born, and the friendly Madame Rotthal, the pastor's wife, who found it both easy and pleasant to love and assist this desolate, beautiful young mother.

At length, remittances arrived from Lionel, who desired Ellinor to join him at Baden-Baden; but, alas! for her generous, grateful spirit! when just debts were paid, there was barely enough money left for the expenses of the journey; however, a few articles of silver, the relics of a once splendid toilette present, were tendered as keepsakes, and Ellinor vowed the first opportunity she had of showing these good Samaritans her grateful remembrance of their kindness should be eagerly seized; the few very trifling ornaments which Lionel had left of her costly cadeaux de mariage were sold to procure some needful clothing for the children; and after an affectionate parting from those who, when she was sick and a stranger, had visited her, she set out for Baden-Baden. Nor was it till she arrived in London that she had ever had any thing like the sum she required to purchase the most trifling tokens of her gratitude; and then she took from the money sent for dress, a portion, which she spent in useful presents to her Swiss friends, and which were forwarded with a report of herself and children.

Now, as she looked on the fair prospect which lay before her, she thought of that foreign lake and its mountains—of those foreign friends—of her lovely baby, of the wayside inn, and its scanty appointments; and then her attention was for the first time directed to the luxurious details of all around her. She stood in the sleeping-room of a suite of apartments, which seemed to occupy the whole length of one wing—on one hand was the dressing-room, beyond the bath-room—and on the other side was an elegant boudoir, magnificently furnished, leading to a conservatory, from which a flight of steps led to the most perfect gem of a flower-garden that could be imagined. She had just glanced at all this unwonted luxury, and was trying to banish painful retrospections, and thinking, that if wealth can not give happiness, it may still give comfort, and that she would henceforth try and be contented with her lot, when Mrs. Dawson brought Gretchen and her little charges; and then the mother's face wore a smile, and looked almost sunny, as she listened to Mrs. Dawson's honest praises of the children's beauty.

"We will now visit the nurseries," said she. "Gretchen will be glad to feel at home, and I must apply to you to recommend some respectable young person, who will be able to help her—though that must be by instinct," she added, with a smile, "as Gretchen, my much-valued nurse, can not speak many words of English."

"I know a young woman whom I can safely recommend, and who, I think, will suit; she has been very often at the rectory with the young folks, and can be sent for at once."

"To-morrow, perhaps, you will settle her here, and to-morrow also, Mrs. Dawson, you and I shall become better acquainted, as I shall prefer being quiet after dinner."

We have, most likely, all read the tale in Eastern romance, where the beneficent fairy transforms a rude hut into a sumptuous palace; in which, from attic to cellar, all is furnished with a profusion and splendor quite marvelous. Some such fairy seemed to have furnished Seabrooke Priory, though certainly she either did not know Lionel Templeton, or never intended such as he to profit by her gifts. It is true, it was not a palace—true, that diamonds and precious stones were not used instead of nails—but if the chairs and tables were not of silver, there was an immense fire proof closet full of silver articles of unusual value: and if the walls were not hung with cloth of gold, in the state drawing-room were pictures selected with the eye of a connoisseur, worth more than a hundred times their weight in that precious metal—so valuable indeed were they, that with the greater part of the plate, some antiques and articles of virtu, they were catalogued as heir-looms; this restriction was, however, for the present forgotten, or not felt by the fortunate man, who had so lately and unexpectedly had greatness thrust upon him.

So well satisfied was he, that he even invited Ellinor, the next day, to walk through the house with him, and accompany him to the extensive and well-arranged gardens; nay, what was more extraordinary, on her declining a further walk, on the plea of fatigue, he promised her a carriage and pony for her own use—and still more wonderful, he kept his word, and the next week she had it.

Their neighbors gave indications of friendly intentions; among the first were the rector and his wife; and to her great delight, Ellinor found Mrs. Vernon one of those women it is so easy to like, and this feeling was soon extended to her excellent husband. Two fine boys, and one little girl, rather younger than Constance, formed their family; and when their other neighbors had visited and been visited, Mrs. Templeton began to feel at home—to look more cheerfully to the future—to be tranquil and thankful.

CHAPTER V.

"Il faut juger des femmes depuis la chaussure jusqu'à la coiffeur exclusivement, à-peu-près comme on mesure le poisson entre quatre et tête."—LA BRUYÈRE.

"HERE is a letter from Seabrooke," said Mrs. Sinclair, as she and her husband were seated at breakfast in the handsome drawing-room of an hotel, looking toward Edinboro' Castle. "I see it has been forwarded from Craigalan; Lionel wishes us to visit them before we leave England—read it, and decide on the answer—of course, if convenient, I should like to see them, for his wife is still a stranger to me."

"Certainly, then we will go, my dear, and as I have not yet been introduced to either of them, I join in your wish. We can very well spare them a fortnight if we start at once, so write and say all that is proper."

And she must have thought "all that is proper" was a very comprehensive term, judging from the length of her letter; but then Mrs. Sinclair was reputed a very clever woman, and, perhaps, one proof of cleverness is the ability to write long letters.

When Lady Frances Templeton and her husband found their finances in that state of debility that the grasshopper becomes a burden, it is no wonder that the weight of two fine healthy children was almost unbearable. So her ladyship wrote to a childless aunt, the widow of a Scotch gentleman, to inform her that Lionel had accepted an invitation from Sir Alan Sinclair, to pass a few weeks in the Highlands, during the sporting season; and that, as they passed through Edinboro', they would, if agreeable, like to pay their respects to her.

Lady Anne Ferguson was old enough, and worldly wise enough, to have known better; but she wrote to bid them welcome, without restricting them as to number. Lionel the second was safely hooked to his uncle's purse, therefore it was Laura who must travel and be introduced to her great aunt. Though she was really a very beautiful little creature, the truth must be told, that, had she been Medusa and all her snakes, Lady Anne could not have felt more petrified than when this fashionably dressed doll was presented. "What on earth could she do with this child?—who was to take care of her?" inquiries rather intimated than expressed.

"Laura is so independent, she gives no trouble," said her mother, in answer to the old lady's thoughts, "and she was so desirous to come and see you, we really could not refuse her; one of your nice fresh-looking Scotch lassies will easily do all she wants. Doubtless, Mrs. Margaret knows of one." Mrs. Margaret suggested her own niece. "Nothing can be better, such recommendation is sure to be safe, and Laura will be really well off."

But the difficulty seemed how her fond parents could be really well off, and leave her in this northern elysium. And after they had stayed so long, that Lady Anne was as impatient for their departure as Sir Alan was said to be for their arrival, Lady Frances protested that they could no longer postpone their visit. "But as we shall be absent only a few weeks, and Laura is so happy, so improved in every respect, it is quite cruel to take her away; and really, aunt, I think you have bewitched the child, she is so fond of you." And thus flattering Lady Anne, who had long ceased to bewitch, and adroitly propitiating her waiting-woman, Mrs. Margaret, or scaring her by hints of what might happen to her pretty niece in a house full of sportsmen, a reluctant consent was given, and Laura was left.

After the visit to Sir Alan had extended to more than two months, the Templetons returned with a large party to London, but did not take Elinboro' in their way—it was not convenient, therefore Laura was to await an escort. In short, for some "most exquisite reason" or another, the little girl remained with Lady Anne till her father's death, when there was a committee of ways and means held, respecting her mother's affairs; and the old lady having become strongly attached to Laura, consented to keep her, "at least for the present," as she guardedly expressed it.

Years rolled on, and Laura, a handsome, clever girl, won the love of Archibald Sinclair, the younger son of her father's friend, Sir Alan, who readily consented to the match, for Laura was universally considered her aunt's heiress; and as Lady Anne lived in good style, this term, to him, signified something like thousands. The many hundreds which had been received from the invisible friend, Lady Anne never alluded to; he evidently shrunk from having his good deeds known, and why should she not respect both his secret and his modesty? and when on the engagement being made public, a munificent gift of a thousand pounds reached Laura, it was still thought needless to talk about such fairy gifts, and Sir Alan was the more deceived by the ostentatious display made at the marriage. But when, three years after, the old lady died, and it was discovered she was but an annuitant, having sunk the small property left by her husband, great was the wrath of Sir Alan; he felt he had not only been mistaken but tricked, and a suspicion that his handsome daughter-in-law was cognizant of the truth rendered that fair creature's presence so little desirable that he plainly intimated, as Captain Sinclair, his eldest son, was expected from Canada, Archie could take this opportunity to visit his wife's relations in the South.

Before doing this, there were a few gleanings from Lady Anne's property, which furnished them with the means of living, till Archibald ascertained the result of an application he had induced his father to make in his behalf; the reply to which was, the offer of an African appointment of most unpromising aspect, which, however, would be kept open for his acceptance still several months; and he was in correspondence with some really sincere friends, respecting another plan which looked less desperate, when the legacy already named came to his wife.

Mr. Sinclair, an honorable and energetic man, immediately decided that the whole of this money should be settled on Laura; but though in most cases she was a cool, scheming woman, she did love her husband, and was so earnest in trying to convince him that at least a few thousands left free for immediate and judicious use, by at once relieving them from all embarrassment, would bring the best return, that he consented. Exertions were also made to obtain something less dismal than the coast of Africa, and, after some difficulty and delay, a post at Calcutta was promised.

But a change had also come over the prospects at Craigalan—Captain Sinclair was drowned on his return from America, and now Sir Alan wished his only son to remain with him. This Laura vehemently opposed, not because she was resentful—she was too calculating to give way to temper—but she saw visions of wealth and splendor in the glowing East, such as the wild Highlands, with their bleak extent of hill and valley, could never give; and she courageously resolved to try whether, by a temporary expatriation, she could not bring the treasures of the former to soften and gild the rugged features of the latter.

This plan, so consonant to her husband's active, independent character, met with his ready acquiescence, and even Sir Alan was reconciled to the idea of his son's being in circumstances, not only to keep up the old feudal style of living, but to restore the property to former splendor—a splendor which had been rather dimmed by certain mortgages, which threw a vail over it, an obscuration never pleasant in the eyes of landed proprietors.

"What will you do with Laurette?" asked Mr. Sinclair, "we can not take her with us to India, and it is time she was in training."

"I have not yet decided," was the reply, when luckily arrived the invitation to Seabrooke, and Mrs. Sinclair, who well remembered how cleverly she had been quartered, came to the conclusion, that she could scarcely do better than imitate so laudable and successful a scheme, and hence, in some measure, the lengthy epistle to which we have alluded.

CHAPTER VI.

"Instead of beginning with a scene that discovers something of the plot, I begin this play with a whisper.—The Rehearsal.

"I SUPPOSE that is Laura's reply to my invitation," said Colonel Templeton, opening the letter bag, which he always did when at home, and handing a letter to his wife; "what does she say?"

Ellinor opened the letter and read, "My dear sister—"

"Stop," said he, "I do not want to hear all that long rigmarole—just tell me if they are coming; I rather want to see her and her husband—the latter I have never met."

"Mr. Vernon, who is acquainted with him," was her reply, "speaks very highly of him; but in order to satisfy your curiosity as to their coming, I must first read the letter," which continued thus: "We had unfortunately left Craigalan when your kind invitation arrived; this will account for a delay in replying, which we both regret. From the tenor of your remarks about Africa, I conclude Lionel has not heard that Mr. Sinclair has obtained an Indian appointment, which presents so hopeful a prospect of rendering him independent of many pecuniary claims on the property, that, though it will exile us for some years, and though Sir Alan wishes us to relinquish it, we both, on due reflection, prefer going. The chief obstacle, or rather difficulty, is my little Laurette, who is precisely at an age to require a mother's care and a mother's guidance. There is no one here who could in any way supply my place—Sir Alan wishes us to leave her with him, but Mrs. Effie Sinclair, who resides with him is, on many accounts, unfit to undertake the charge. I had thought, through your introduction, to have consulted Lady Grantham, of whose excellent management I have heard from many quarters; for my own experience of northern education assures me it does not afford all, I think, a girl in Laurette's station requires. But here I am chatting to you as if we have been friends from childhood, instead of strangers—and yet, I must recall that word—the wife of Lionel is not strange either to my thoughts or my affection, and though he and I have been much separated, I trust he has so interested you in favor of his sister" (he had scarcely ever named her till very lately), "as to have secured her a place in your heart. They do say we are so much alike" (God forbid that the resemblance should extend to character, was the silent prayer of the reader), "that no one can doubt the relationship, and therefore hoping he has not monopolized all your love" (a sigh so deep that even the Colonel looked up from his papers), "I put in my sisterly claim for a portion. Of my dear husband I do not trust myself to speak—those who love goodness, honor, and truth, must love and respect him. Laurette—it is well the paper reminds me there are limits to it, and that there ought to be the same even to a mother's garrulity—in brief, like herself, for she is petite, I earnestly hope she may win a place in your esteem and that of her uncle, as readily as I shall bestow mine on your dear little girls. I was very nearly verifying the old censorious remark, that the real substance of a lady's letter is in the postscript, but I remember in time to escape the charge, that we shall all, Laurette of course included, be delighted to find ourselves your guests on Friday week. Laurette has just come in. 'Well, darling, what message to Seabrooke?' 'Oh! mamma, a thousand, thousand kisses to my cousins and my beautiful aunt and uncle.' After that Orientalism, tame English can furnish nothing more expressive. With love to Lionel, adieu, your affectionate sister. LAURA SINCLAIR."

"What an interminable letter! but Laura could always say an infinite deal of nothing," was the fraternal remark, as Mrs. Templeton closed the letter. "Do they come, and when?"

"Yes, and on Friday week."

"For how long?"

"Mrs. Sinclair does not say, but she mentions an appointment to India instead of Africa, which will keep them there for years."

"To India! with Laura's handsome legacy (it was not equal to half the amount of his wife's fortune), I should think they might have managed to remain."

"She alludes to some incumbrances on the property, which Mr. Sinclair wishes to clear off."

"The more fool he, to go toiling and broiling for such a purpose. Why can not he help his father to sell?"

"Perhaps they may have strong feelings about family name and old inheritance. I like the idea of working to retain the property, it shows an independent and unselfish spirit."

"What nonsense you are always talking, Ellinor,"—she very rarely volunteered an opinion, but something in this letter had more than usually stirred her—"really it is quite wearying to be perpetually listening to such sentiment and absurdity; however, it is not my affair; I only know that all my ancestrial acres, if I had ever possessed any, and all my ancestors too, might be sold to the highest bidder, before I would be chained to the oar in this manner." And after this dignified exposition of his sentiments he whistled himself out of the room.

The Sinclairs came, but Mrs. Sinclair was baffled in her scheme of leaving Laurette as a pledge of her confidence in her brother's affection. And though no one could be kinder than Ellinor, it was not possible to persuade her that Helen, little more than three, and Constance, scarcely two years old, would be better attended to with a nursery governess than with their homely but sensible German nurse; and as Lionel never once responded to her hints, that in so large a house as Seabrooke Priory a few rooms especially devoted to Laura and a governess would never be missed, and only add to the cheerfulness of what she secretly thought rather a dull party, she, quite unruffled by disappointment, decided that Laurette must be placed with some lady near London, as the only means of securing the advantage of those accomplishments she deemed indispensable; and as Ellinor had requested leave to have her at the Priory during her holidays, a request which was readily accorded, Mrs. Sinclair left the matter there, thinking it very likely one of the holidays might extend to a permanent residence.

Happily Mrs. Sinclair, though like her brother in personal advantages, and with something of his calculating selfishness, had, in most other respects, an advantageous dissimilarity. She was affectionate and grateful, capable of understanding and appreciating honor and truth in others, and of practicing them herself, when no sophistry led her to fancy they would injure her cause—faint praise this. In short, she was one in whom dependence and narrow means had developed all that was paltry and mean; perhaps wealth might have equally brought about the same result, but it would not have been so glaring and contemptible. Be this as it may, the impression she made on her sister-in-law was decidedly in her favor, while to Mrs. Sinclair, Ellinor freely accorded the respect and trust his character eminently deserved; and they parted with feelings of mutual regard on the side of the ladies, though Laura was bitterly disappointed in the discovery she made of Lionel's real worthlessness, and his conduct to one whose goodness and gentleness merited a far better return.

A few weeks after the Sinclairs had left, Lady Grantham, with her characteristic frankness, volunteered a visit, which to Ellinor was particularly agreeable. She was strongly attached to both her brother and his wife; the cheerful acquiescence of the former in many privations, his firm opposition to expenses which his rank seemed to demand, but which his means forbade, were strong bonds of union between them, for Ellinor shared all her brother's horror and hatred of debt and dependence; and never, perhaps, had she so thoroughly valued the transparency of Lady Grantham's unaffected manners and candid nature than during this visit, following so closely as it did that of the Sinclairs, when Ellinor, with all her wish to feel kindly, had sometimes been oppressed by the studied manners and well-turned phrases of Laura.

The Granthams spoke in raptures of the Priory; the beauty of the situation and the magnificence of the house furnished an unfailing topic for praise and admiration, while his lordship thought sometimes, with a sigh, of his own deeply-mortgaged estates when he beheld Seabrooke, not only so lovely and well-managed, but so uncncumbered.

It happened that while they were at the Priory some races took place, which were to be succeeded by a ball, at which, of course, the Templetons, who had been generally adopted by the neighboring families, must appear; and it was during a discussion about the mode of going, that Lady Grantham inquired if they should be expected to go en grande tenue?

"Of course," replied Lionel, very decidedly, "it will be our first appearance in public, except at the races, and I mean it to be said, that I take two of the best dressed, as well as two of the most beautiful women in the room."

"As Colonel Templeton commands," she gayly replied, "to hear is to obey—easy, perhaps, as to the best dressed—but to be so, I must ask you, Cecil, to desire Coutts to forward my jewel-case. Ellinor described all here as so Arcadian, that I had no idea of full dress. I suppose," she continued, turning to Ellinor, "you will wear your pearls, unless," with her charming smile, addressing the Colonel, "you have presented her with something more splendid."

"I do not know—I believe not"—stammered Mrs. Templeton, blushing to the very temples.

The Colonel struck in to spare her—no, not her—to spare himself. "By the way, Ellinor, has Storr returned your set? they were rather antique, according to present taste in the setting," he added, with ready wit; "remind him by this post, that he must hurry and forward them."

"He has sold them," said Lady Grantham, to herself only—she had not made many remarks about his sister even to her husband; nor was this mental assertion withdrawn or weakened when Mrs. Templeton, on the appointed evening, appeared looking very lovely and wearing a parure of pearls of great price, which scarcely enhanced her beauty. On Lady Grantham's admiring the resetting, Colonel Templeton carelessly remarked, "Diamonds would have been almost too ostentatious; have you seen Ellinor's?" and receiving a negative, they were brought, pronounced regal, and sent back to the—jeweler.

CHAPTER VII.

"Quelles intrigues ce présentent à nous dans les histoires! quel renversement des lois et des mœurs, quelles guerres sanglantes, quelles nouveautés contre la religion quelles révolutions d'état causées par le déréglement des femmes! Voilà ce qui prouve l'importance de bien élever les filles."—FÉNÉLON.

HELEN was now eight years old, and though her mother had hitherto found her chief pleasure in teaching her children herself, she began to find that, as Constance put forth her claims to attention, she could not give so much time to this duty as it required, and decided, therefore, on having some assistance, without relinquishing the superintendence—in short, to engage a lady who would be always with the children, and relieve Gretchen from that constant attendance which her faithful love so willingly gave, but which was no longer needful or advantageous to the little girls.

On all subjects connected with her children, Mrs. Templeton decided and acted without reference to her husband; she never yet had consulted him in any of her arrangements; there seemed to be some secret compact, that here she was quite independent, though, on almost every other occasion, she was passive, waiting merely to do what he proposed. She therefore wrote to Lady Grantham, and the result was, the arrival of a lady-like young person, who had been well educated, but who from the death of relatives and loss of fortune was forced to exert herself for a maintenance.

Thus recommended and heralded, she was received by Mrs. Templeton with all that thoughtful kindness which adversity teaches the benevolent and gentle-minded how to practice. A set of comfortable rooms was prepared, and with the ready aid of Mrs. Dawson, who loved her quiet lady and pretty children, every thing was arranged so as to make the stranger feel at home.

When the Colonel was absent in town, or elsewhere, as he often was, Mrs. Templeton would invite Miss Grant to walk, or drive, or sit with her, when free from her duties with the children; or she would ask leave to be herself a guest in the study; and thus all went on pleasantly and successfully for more than a year, when Mrs. Templeton was grieved to perceive a great change come over her young friend, for so she kindly termed her. She at first thought that the monotony of her duties was becoming wearisome; but Miss Grant applied herself more assiduously than ever to their performance, frequently declining invitations to a drive or a walk, under the plea of preparing for the lessons of the following day.

"You do not look well," remarked Mrs. Templeton, one morning; "give the children a few days' holiday, and let me drive you a little about this charming country. I am so indifferent about change or variety myself, that I forget you are younger and less sober minded." Then, seeing tears in Miss Grant's eyes, she added, cheerfully, "Come, we will be very gay, and drive over to Seaport; the children want a few playthings, so we will all go en famille."

These, and many acts of similar kindness, appearing only to increase the depression of her companion, Mrs. Templeton thought she had made a grand discovery, and resolved to try another remedy.

"Miss Grant," she said, one evening, when they were alone, and kindly laying her hand in a motherly way on her shoulder, "I am not so old as quite to have forgotten my youth," and she bravely kept back a sigh. "I think I have found out your secret."

"Heaven forbid!" exclaimed Miss Grant, shrinking from her touch, and looking up wildly.

"Nay, nay, this excitement is wholly uncalled for; if you expect to find a severe censor in me, you are mistaken, I have no doubt, from all I have seen of you, that any one you love is quite worthy of the distinction. Am I not correct in my guess?"

"Oh! no, no," almost groaned the poor girl.

"In that case, there is the greater need of some friend to whom you can unburden your mind; can not I be that friend?"

Miss Grant looked earnestly at her for a moment, and then, in a paroxysm of tears, murmured, "Oh, never, never! this kindness will kill me!"

Mrs. Templeton, perceiving her efforts at present were fruitless, rose, and saying, "Well, no more to-night, but to-morrow we must again talk of this, when I think I shall have a little plan to propose, which I hope will please you," left the room.

Then did Miss Grant indeed give way to the very frenzy of grief, when she found herself alone—then, amidst sobs and sighs which seemed wrung from a broken heart, did she utter words of strange and fearful import; till, worn out with sorrow and weeping, she laid her head on her pillow, and fell into a feverish sleep, from which she, however, awoke calmer, and better able to think what she must do.

The next morning, a kind inquiry, which Miss Grant's heavy looks called forth, gave an opportunity for renewing the subject, which was met so calmly, that Mrs. Templeton proceeded at once to say, she thought a short visit to her friends might be of essential benefit, and enable her to resume her duties with renewed energy. Rather to Mrs. Templeton's astonishment, this offer was eagerly accepted, and it was settled that in the course of a few days, she should have a holiday for at least several weeks.

She went, and at the expiration of the appointed time, Mrs. Templeton received a letter from her, in which she said, that not finding her health equal to the resumption of her charge, she, with deep regret, resigned it.

The post-mark of the letter was from an obscure place in Wales, but, greatly to Mrs. Templeton's vexation, no address was inclosed; and she, who truly regretted the termination of their acquaintance, and especially that illness was the cause, and whose kind and generous heart would have prompted her to say so, was obliged to keep silence, and trust to some future letter for information which should enable her to express this.

An interval of a few months then occurred, and again she busied herself with her children's education, when Lady Grantham paid a visit to the Priory; this time she was accompanied by Cecilia, a splendid hoyden of fourteen, but whose perfect temper and unselfish habits rendered her a favorite with every one.

Before they left, Colonel Templeton returned from one of those absences for which he never accounted by the most distant hint, and Cecilia quickly won him to humor all her whims, and laugh at all her tricks, by her undisguised admiration of him, and her fearless attacks upon what she called his bad habits. She influenced him as no one else ever had done—she made him put away his cigar, because she hated its horribly vulgar smell—she lectured him for reading his paper, instead of making himself agreeable—laughed when he frowned, because it made him look old, and insisted that he should go riding with her and Ellen, though he declared she disgraced him by her bad horsemanship; and when she alleged that, as a reason for riding all the more frequently, because he could teach her so well, he would yield, and order the horses to be ready, for, what she called, a good scamper before luncheon.

Still, with all this harum-scarum manner, Cecilia was never betrayed into any thing like vulgarity, a soupçon of pride and command in all she did giving it a piquancy which was very attractive to her uncle; while her high principle and daring truthfulness rendered her equally agreeable to her aunt.

After this short inroad on their quiet, the usual calm settled on the majestic old Priory, and once more were the children's studies resumed, this time under the direction of an older and more accomplished governess than Miss Grant—a lady whose family were friends of Mrs. Vernon's. At first, Mrs. Templeton thought she had made a mistake in this engagement. Miss Lee was much less accessible than her former favorite; she kept the study more to herself, and made it evident that her hours of leisure were strictly to be such. Occasionally this reserve was laid aside, and Mrs. Templeton then became sensible that, if she had lost in youth and simplicity of character, she had gained in all that valuable but hard-earned knowledge which experience and high intellect alone achieve: and again all seemed to go well.

Col. Templeton also was more at home, and frequently proposed excursions and drives about the neighborhood, in which he accompanied them.

Mrs. Vernon and her daughter Caroline, the latter a very desirable companion for the Templeton girls, were now frequent guests at the Priory; and when Laurette joined them during some of her holidays, and above all, when Cecilia Grantham was there, the mirthful sound of young voices, and the ringing laugh arising from cheerful young hearts made pleasant music, and broke the customary quiet of Seabrooke Priory very agreeably.

Scarcely, however, had Mrs. Templeton so fully realized this sunny change, as to have indulged in the hope of its being durable, than again clouds darkened her domestic horizon; and again they collected, lowering and threatening, from the same quarter.

Miss Lee, hitherto so unobtrusive and retiring, seemed restless and uncomfortable if left alone; she was often at the Rectory, or with the children, of whom she never liked to lose sight, hovering about Mrs. Templeton, in a manner strangely at variance with her former love of solitude and her remarkably studious habits. One evening—well did Mrs. Templeton remember it—after a day spent in a social picnic with the Vernons, to whom the Colonel had been unusually gracious, and during which every one had appeared particularly happy, she had retired rather earlier than was her custom to her rooms, and was writing to Lady Grantham, when a knock was heard at the boudoir-door. Believing it to be her maid, she uttered the usual "come in," and Miss Lee presented herself.

"I fear I intrude," she remarked, glancing at the writing materials, still, however, advancing.

"Not at all, my letter can well be postponed, and give place to a little chat with you;" but raising her eyes to her visitor's countenance, a foreboding of something, she knew not what, but which she was certain would be unpleasant, made Mrs. Templeton feel faint.

Miss Lee could hardly be called handsome; and yet there was so much character in the face and well-shaped head, so much intellect in her flexible and eloquent features, that no one could dispute the existence of mental superiority—there was also the irritability of a sensitive, perhaps a hasty temper, in her quick movements and decided action, though this was never suffered to appear in the well-disciplined tone or word.

By an evident effort, she replied to the friendly speech of Mrs. Templeton, saying rather abruptly, "I have come to a decision which is very painful to me, and which compels me to say that I can no longer discharge my duties to your dear children—that I must leave them and you—and at once"

"Is it so—and is it ever to be so?" murmured

Mrs. Templeton, more as if to herself than in reply to Miss Lee's communication; "but will you not tell me why you decide on a measure I must so deeply regret? is the place haunted, that some unknown evil spirit thus drives away first one, and then another?" and she tried to smile at her own absurd supposition.

But there was no answering smile on that resolute-looking mouth, no mirthful spirit was it that sparkled in those expressive gray eyes.

"Madam," she said quietly but sternly, "you have unconsciously spoken the truth—the place is haunted, and by an evil spirit that knows neither remorse nor pity—on whom the sacred considerations of wife and children have no effect—whose touch is contamination—and whose words and looks are dishonor—need I proceed?"

"No—yes—Heaven help me! what have I to hear—what have I still to suffer?" She hid her face in her hands for a brief space, then by an effort crossed the room and fastened the door.

"Now, Miss Lee," she said, seating herself by her, "speak, and tell me all—let no false pity stop you."

"Dear Mrs. Templeton," she replied, with a voice and manner whose gentleness contrasted forcibly with the inflexibility of her opening words, "when I entered this room such was my intention; and though I had anticipated a difficult duty, I confess the task is more painful than I expected; I therefore ask you neither to pardon nor excuse what I may say, for if you blamed me I should still say on. Do you know any thing, since she left, of the lady whose place I supply?"

"Only," replied Mrs. Templeton in a husky voice, "through one short letter. I much regretted her departure, especially as she left in ill health, and, I fear, in sorrow—but this you have often heard me allude to."

"Yes I have, but you do not, then, know that she is dead?" A faint shriek burst from the horrified and unhappy listener. "She died giving birth to a child, who died also—the father is Colonel Templeton!"

"Oh, this is too much, too much—my burden is greater than I can bear!" groaned the miserable wife.

Miss Lee, scarcely less moved, drew near; she took the passive hand, she pressed it kindly, and with a tremulous voice asked, "You do not hate me for telling you this?—believe me, nothing but a strong sense of what was due to you, to your innocent girls, to myself, to my whole sex, could have carried me through this distressing disclosure. And now you are quite overcome, shall I ring for your maid, or will you permit me to wait on you—or shall I go?—only say what will be the least painful to you."

"Stay," said Mrs. Templeton, endeavoring to rally her thoughts, "stay; my maid never sits up beyond a given hour, which is past—but you will be overtasked," she added, with her usual kindness.

"Not so; if I might choose, I would prefer remaining," and she did so; and after calming herself by a powerful effort, Mrs Templeton begged her to relate at once all she had come prepared to say.

CHAPTER VIII.

"Turn all your eyes on me; here stands a man,
The falsest and the basest of this world.
Set swords against this breast, some honest man."
Philaster.

"After the novelty of my situation had worn away, I hope I need not tell you that my duties were performed with punctuality and cheerfulness; naturally shy, I at first kept myself secluded, from both habit and choice. I felt that if your kindness allowed more familiarity, I could easily throw off my reserve; but I shrank from encountering a repulse for too much freedom. Pardon me, if I say that it was impossible to be many months domesticated under your roof without giving up all my energies to serve one so amiable as yourself, and, as I soon perceived, so unhappy. You remember, soon after my arrival, Colonel Templeton left for Paris—how pleasant was that period to me—you had encouraged me to emerge from my shell, and I ventured to look forward to the time when, having completed your children's education, I should be remembered as your friend—dear Mrs. Vernon was delighted at having been the means of introducing me to such a home, where for some years, at least, the future to me seemed sunny and cheerful.

"It was then that the Colonel returned; and again I would have withdrawn to my privacy; but this your kindness, which included me in all your parties of pleasure, prevented. At first Colonel Templeton's equivocal manner perplexed, without alarming me; and though I could not understand the meaning of various circumstances which occurred, they yet made me uncomfortable and uneasy. I really did feel so secure in my own integrity and freedom from all doubtful behavior; so sure that the very situation I filled was a safeguard, that it was long before a suspicion of the truth dawned on my mind, and very slowly did I admit it; it seemed too horrible—the father of my beloved pupils, the master of the house! Again he left for a short time; but since his return, a system of quiet persecution has been commenced, which has alarmed me. A fortnight ago I named much of this to Mrs. Vernon; she fancied, or hoped, I had been oversensitive, but she was far from blaming me, and enjoined the utmost caution, both in my own behavior, and in speaking of what might lead to so much domestic misery. To-day, this evening, the study has been intruded on, and"—she paused, more from indignation than embarrassment, being far too much roused for the latter feeling—"and Mrs. Dawson heard me order Colonel Templeton instantly to leave the room. This, after first rudely refusing, he did: I confess that I was much overcome by his insulting conduct, and gladly accepted Mrs. Dawson's offer to remain an hour with me; from her I learned the dreadful tragedy of my predecessor's fate, which has become known through the gossip of the Colonel's servant."

Such, in brief, was her statement of the case; but Miss Lee, as much out of pity to her pale listener, as respect to herself, had suppressed many things which marked the deep depravity of her persecutor, and invested him with all the characteristics of a hardened profligate.

She finally expressed a hope that Mrs. Templeton would approve of her prompt disclosure, and equally prompt resolve; both were imperatively called for to prevent any recurrence in future of such proceedings; she now placed herself entirely in Mrs Templeton's hands, being most desirous of acting so as not to increase her difficulties.

"Your course is plain, dear Miss Lee—you must leave me. Pained and humiliated as I am at hearing this disgraceful history, believe me, I feel infinitely your debtor for your having with such honor and courage shown me exactly how I am placed. My path is, in many respects, and for many causes, neither so clear nor so easy to pursue. But after what you have learned, and the prudent use you have made of that knowledge, concealment of the sad mysteries of my life is impossible, as well as needless; though you will be the first, yes, the first, not excepting even my dear brother, to whom I have ever hinted at my situation or sorrows. My marriage was a love-match—on my side—I mean—Colonel Templeton married my fortune; when that was gone, he had no longer a wife I could not, if it were useful, tell you all I have suffered, or relate to you all the infamy I have passed through; it was no arm of earthly love which led me, uncontaminated, through these horrors; it was no husband's honorable solicitude which kept me from falling as low as any of the degraded beings among whom I, a young wife, a young mother, was thrown God was very merciful to me, and remembered me in my agony and trial; agony and trial to body and mind. He led me safely through, and once more has He brought me to the shelter of my home and my relatives, and for this, praised be His name." She paused, and for a few minutes seemed lost in thought; then looking up, and seeing Miss Lee's eyes fixed with inquiring sympathy on her, she remarked, "You look as if you thought I had redress in my own power; you forget my children, my beautiful, innocent girls; had I separated from Colonel Templeton, think you that they would have been left with me? if so, you know nothing of the cruelty and revenge of which a base and depraved nature is capable; besides, he does not wish me formally to leave his house; he knows that one step taken in that direction must lead to another, and in eyes of the world he has still something to lose, which he would gladly retain. Thus, then, the matter stands between us. I consent to remain, having entire liberty to do as I please with my children, for which an ample allowance is made; but beyond this I am fettered; if I move, so will they, and be taken from my loving care for years, perhaps forever; and, great God! to what might they not be exposed? for if once an open rupture were made I have every thing to dread from him. I am convinced he would pause at nothing by which I could be wounded. No, no, mine was the mistake, on me be its consequences, but oh! spare my sweet girls!"

She burst into a passion of tears, which were as freely shed by her auditor, but more silently; then raising her head, she added, "We are both too much agitated and excited to prolong this interview. To-morrow we will be guided by event in the mean time, if you can think for me, do so."

Inexpressibly touched by her gentle but s looks and tones, Miss Lee respectfully raised h hand to her lips; but Mrs. Templeton kissed h fondly on the cheek, saying, "Out of evil w come good, if from this bitter trial I gain friend."

And with strange and sorrowful feelings fillir the hearts and thoughts of each, they parted.

CHAPTER IX.

"Give sorrow, words; the grief that does not speak, Whispers the o'erfraught heart, and bids it break."
Macbeth

The following morning every thing seemed proceed as usual; for the children always takir their breakfast in the study, Miss Lee's mann could cast no shadow of coming events, by whi their shape might be recognized when they d arrive. Had Colonel Templeton taken much n tice of his wife, he would have perceived that sl looked paler and more thoughtful than commor but this he did not, and, in fact, rather relieve her, by planning a little excursion for the ne day, which she understood as a proof that he w ignorant of the disclosure that had been mad in which she was correct.

Quite unable to enter quickly into difference character, and unobservant of the quiet digni and reserve which marked Miss Lee's behavior, had ranked her among the sentimental romant class to which poor Miss Grant belonged; a cla who have honor, affection, and sense enough carry them through life, respected and loved, kept from temptation; but who with no princip to sustain, no strong feeling of right to suppc them in the hour of trial, when that time com fall an easy prey to the destroyer.

Directly she was at liberty, and her husba busy with his agent, Mrs. Templeton hastened the study, and sending the children with Grete en to the Rectory, where they were ever welcon she informed Miss Lee of the result of her anxio vigils.

"It is evident to me that I can not, that I mu not even attempt to carry on my children's educ tion under this roof."

"I agree with you," said Miss Lee; "y would not be justified in making the attempt."

"But what then can I do? From the spe mens which I have too often met with of sch education, I have contracted a very strong repu nance to exposing either Helen or Constan especially the former, to the influence of girls whom I myself know nothing. I am not obje ing wholly on the ground of difference of statio though the effects of that are also to be consider —not because of less nobility or less wealth, b because, among unselected associates, vulgar opi ions, low sentiments, and paltry feelings are to dreaded; added to this, I own to a very decid prepossession in favor of home influence, whe the mother, as I trust I should be, is ready to s in concert with an intelligent instructress."

"My opinion entirely coincides with yours," answered Miss Lee, "and I know not why any dread of being misapprehended should deter me from trying to aid you; though this will involve a display of egotism to which I am not much addicted."

"Oh, help me, if you can," exclaimed Mrs. Templeton, with energy; "and give all false scruples to the winds."

"My sister, Mrs. Loftus," said she, thus adjured, "is the widow of an officer, who died about eighteen months ago in India. Her right to some property is disputed, but we are assured vexatiously and unjustly—still, while it is withheld, my sister is reduced to a very scanty income. She has two little girls, rather older than yours; and it is, I know, her earnest wish so to educate them as to render them independent of any adverse circumstance except ill health. To assist her, by pecuniary aid, I am here; but in order fully to carry out her views, she is very desirous of obtaining two, at the most three, pupils, to educate with them. This would justify the expense of engaging superior talent in various accomplishments, and it would make all the children feel, from an early age, that they are not to measure excellence by their own attainments, nor limit it by their own powers; superiority will thus encourage industry, not foster conceit—and inferiority will not depress, but keep them modest."

"Said I not well that out of evil comes good?" eagerly interrupted Mrs. Templeton; "my own vision realized—except," she added with a sigh, "the separation."

"But that only for a short time," suggested Miss Lee.

"True; and now the best way to arrange all this? Put me immediately in correspondence with Mrs. Loftus—that appears the first step I have never yet left the Priory for a night since my arrival, but to gain this great advantage I shall not hesitate to do any thing that is needful; and by cheerfully consenting to part from my darlings, I give them the best proof that my love is unselfish and wise."

"I think, nay, I am sure, you will like my sister," said Miss Lee; "she has seen much of the cloudy side of life, and I have often felt, when you have been discussing various subjects, that you and she entertained the same opinions."

"Shall you reside with her?"

"I rather think not; I have an unmarried brother, whose housekeeper I was till her bereavement and return to England, and when I came here she took my place. But if, through any arrangements you make, she can succeed in her plan regarding her children, I shall again resume the reins at my brother's till he marries."

"Then consider that quite settled," said Mrs. Templeton; "and now about yourself—what are your immediate wishes and intentions?"

"I was up very early this morning, and have collected and packed all my belongings, purposing to leave, so as not again to meet—in short, to go at once."

"Of course," said Mrs. Templeton, "Mrs. Vernon can not know of this last occurrence."

"Certainly not," replied Miss Lee; "she knows nothing since we parted yesterday—though, as I informed you, I had previously consulted her—and no one here, but Mrs. Dawson, on whose discretion I can fully rely, is aware that any thing unpleasant has happened."

"Will you object to remaining a few days at the Rectory," asked Mrs. Templeton; "I have so often heard Mrs. Vernon urge it, that I am sure she will be delighted. In making this request I am rather selfish, I shall be so glad to have you near while in correspondence with Mrs. Loftus; it will also remove any suspicion Colonel Templeton may entertain as to my being in your confidence, a fact he will never learn from me; it will also show him that you are well protected, and render him more cautious how he ventures to persevere in his insulting conduct."

"I shall willingly remain, as you see no objection, and most happy shall I be to further your negotiation with my sister."

"Then we will go at once," said Mrs. Templeton, "for I have decided on another measure, the result of our conversation last night. I have felt so great a relief from having in this slight degree opened my heart to you, that I shall no longer go about with this terrible secret, as if it were my crime instead of my misfortune, and deny myself the comfort of sympathy and advice. You look as if this resolve surprised you."

"I own it does," said Miss Lee, courageously; "the good sense and propriety, no less than the fortitude of your conduct, are exactly the qualities in which society at large are so deficient—I render a deep and voluntary homage to the character of those who can say—

> 'There is a silent sorrow here,
> It heaves no sigh, it sheds no tear;'

but perhaps I am rather stoical; I know I am not very fond of pity on my own account."

"I must try and make myself understood," said Mrs. Templeton; "otherwise, though I think we agree, you will fancy we differ. Colonel Templeton is my husband—no matter what else he is—his conduct will not affect my argument. While I consent to remain with him, I think nothing would be more reprehensible than for me to weary alike friends and acquaintances with his faults and my sorrows—my silence does not, at any rate, make the matter worse, my complaints certainly would; and it is this strong conviction which has hitherto guided my proceedings. But events may arise, when the aid and counsel of another may be useful, indeed necessary—when trials, which are never purposeless, may, by our unwise reception, become irritants, leading to murmuring and discontent, instead of blessed instruments for correcting and hallowing all our feelings. I am, therefore, determined no longer to close my ear to the voice of wise and friendly sympathy; nor to infold myself in an iron shroud, which buries alike my hopes with my disappointment. Am I now very wrong? To the many I am still dumb—but do not forbid the over-racked victim to groan—do not say the sharp pang shall force out no cry."

"Far from it, very far from it," said Miss Lee, with animation; "you are fully justified in the resolution you have taken; you would, indeed, be wrong if you refused this means of relief. What I meant to censure was, that the egotism which perpetually talks of itself in the most wearisome of characters, that of complainer—which parades its sorrows before every one, and collects sympathy as a tax. Not that I ever thought it possible you, with your refinement and dignity of character, your studied avoidance of domestic and petty details, could ever descend to this level; but I was jealous, dear Mrs. Templeton, lest you should not, in every respect, fully offer an excuse for my deep admiration of your character."

"But you do not suppose me proof against a little delicate flattery," she observed with a smile. "Now we will no longer delay our drive to the Rectory, where I shall leave you, depending on your kindness to do all you can for me."

The children and Gretchen were sent back in the carriage, which was to return and fetch Mrs. Templeton, who was happily spared the feverishness of hesitation and doubt, by finding Mr. Vernon at home. With him she had a long and private interview; and though her beautiful face looked very sad, and tears stood in her loving, dark eyes as she kissed and bade farewell to Miss Lee, she whispered, "I was quite right, for though you must go away, I have wise and warm friends left here."

Colonel Templeton expressed no astonishment when informed of Miss Lee's sudden departure, though he felt surprised when, through his private inquiries, he found she intended to remain a week at the Rectory; and where, in spite of all his maneuvers, he never could see her; but undeterred by this, he took effectual measures to trace her thence to London, fully determining not to be baffled in his pursuit, by what he thought either prudery or deliberate artifice.

Helen and Constance were loud in their complaints at her absence, and most persevering in their inquiries as to her return; but in less than two months the negotiation had been so successfully carried on with Mrs. Loftus, much facilitated by her spending a few days at the Rectory, and saving Mrs. Templeton a journey to London, that, avowing herself weary and disheartened by these perpetual changes, Miss Lee having decided on remaining with her family, she now intended to place Helen and Constance at school, where, for the present, Gretchen would accompany them as their personal attendant.

Various were the comments passed by various individuals when the plan became known; but as these parties have been rather disrespectfully kept in the background, leave we the children to acquire as much knowledge as their brains will comfortably bear, and to gain as many accomplishments as they have talents for, while we become enlightened as to the neighborhood, or rather the neighbors of the Priory.

CHAPTER X.

"Si on n'goûte point ces caractères, je m'en étonne; si on les goûte, je m'en étonne de même."—LA BRUYÈRE.

THE Forresters of Forest Hill, as one of the oldest county families, claim precedence, though, as they never stood out in very bold relief on any occasion, not even during an election, they will soon be dismissed; they must, however, be put in the catalogue.

Mr. Forrester had married late in life a lady of suitable age; for if she had gained but little knowledge of life, it had not been for lack of time. By the death of her brother, the handsome estate of Hargraves became hers, and though this acquisition was by no means the reason why Mr. Forrester thought the lady suitable as a wife, it certainly had something to do with suggesting that idea.

Had Hargraves been a hundred miles off, it is probable he would never have cared for it or its owner; but Hargraves joined Forest Hill, and those who have ever noticed the effect of such propinquity on country gentlemen, will understand how it influenced the thoughts and feelings of Mr. Forrester. Therefore, if, as Miss Hargrave, she was good, as Mrs. Forrester she was better; but when she became the mother of the future heir of Forest Hill and Hargraves to boot, she was decidedly best. Mr. Forrester was proud, pompous, and cold, very kind to his dependents, among whom he was extremely popular; honorable and just, almost to sternness, in all his transactions; stately and repulsive, well-bred and exclusive. His wife was his reflection in almost every respect, except that, while the father was prouder of Hubert as his heir than as his son, the mother reversed this, being fonder of her handsome boy, her affectionate, her beautiful Hubert, than proud of him as the future representative of two families, which had been known and respected for many centuries.

Sir William and Lady Dallas, with their numerous but youthful family, come next in order. They were people of good property, who inhabited the Grange, a building which originally merited that name, but it had been gradually so changed, enlarged, and improved, as to resemble, in point of identity, that celebrated stumbling-block to metaphysicians, Sir Francis Drake's ship, which had been so often patched and repaired, that not one piece of the original remained. So with the Grange; now a handsome mansion sheltered from all ungenial influences, and surrounded with beautiful gardens, rich fields, and fertile meadows.

Nearly as it now was, Sir William received it from his father, the first Baronet; and having married a lady of large fortune, good connection, and fashionable tastes, the Grange became, par excellence, the focus of gayety and amusement. Their arrival as residents had been previous to that of the Templetons, between whom and themselves, in spite of many impediments to strong friendship, there sprang up much kind feeling.

Sir William was a frank, amiable man, and an indulgent husband, passionately fond of country sports and agricultural experiments; exactly the man whose active habits, intelligent mind, and ample fortune enabled him, without injury, to introduce those scientific measures, the failure of which would be ruinous to the small farmer, but which, when hazarded by the rich and enterprising landed proprietor, eventually lead to real improvement and final success.

And Lady Dallas, what was she? Miss Lee has already alluded to one of her habits, as being, in her opinion, particularly objectionable. Her ladyship was a complainer; it was not exactly from discontent, for she was too grateful to feel that; still less was it low spirits, for when she had emptied her tiny vial of small troubles on the head of some luckless listener, who so gay as she? It often reminded a spectator of the little man and woman in the weather-house; as the one listened and grew weary or sad from sympathy, so she became gay and cheerful, and fluttered away, ready to chirp and sing with the first merry bird she encountered.

Kind but egotistical, teasing and complaining, but ever ready, nay, eager to serve others, it seemed as if she realized in her pretty little person the John Bull character of her countrymen —that she is never happy but when grumbling. Quite free from pride and envy, she was, upon the whole, popular; still she was occasionally oppressive and wearying, for, in a word, tant soit peu, she was a bore. She bored about her servants, her children, her relations, and what, in Mrs. Templeton's opinion, was most inexcusable, about her husband; and yet all this was the result of thoughtlessness and want of employment; it gave her an opportunity of talking about herself, and indirectly paying herself a compliment; she would tell of her trials—her trials, forsooth! and then allude to the magnanimity with which they were endured. This she would evince, by being the very butterfly of the place, driving about from house to house, and depositing everywhere her little amount of boredom. Added to this, she was essentially without tact, utterly insensible to the eloquence of the tone, the look, the manner, which, to the sensitive, speaks with the clearness of a trumpet, and tells that sympathy and politeness are exhausted, and that weariness is beginning; but on she went, humming, drumming, complaining, lamenting, "and inflicting her tediousness" on all who would permit it. As to comprehending the character of Mrs. Templeton, she was no more capable of doing that, than of reading the Arundelian Marbles; and not having the least suspicion, till many years after their introduction, of her real situation, she constantly made her the subject of her indirect animadversions, by canvassing her proceedings, and being astonished at her doings; and all this without the least malice or ill nature.

Lord Hurstwood, in point of rank, should have been first introduced, but as age, infirmity, and a severe loss in the death of an only daughter, rendered him quite a recluse, we pass him over; his son being a bachelor, and an absentee, in neither character has a claim on our notice, and will therefore remain unannounced till he becomes one of the recognized inhabitants of the county.

Toward the seaward side of the village was a pretty little place, claiming and meriting no more dignified appellation than that of Seaview Cottage, occupied by a lady, whom, almost simultaneously with the arrival of Miss Lee, Lady Grantham had introduced to the notice of the Colonel and his wife as an early friend of hers, recently a widow, in fact, a distant connection of Lionel's. Her husband, Mr. West, had held an excellent appointment, the income of which he not only spent, but exceeded; so that at his death, which happened unexpectedly, his widow had nothing but a small annuity, and very delicate health. Her only child, a boy, was most generously adopted by an unmarried relative, the next heir to the Westrough title and estates, the present Lord having only daughters.

Lord Ernest West had lost, by death, the lady to whom he was passionately attached, and since that event had led a very secluded life, having withdrawn to the solitude of Old Court, which, with a splendid fortune, he inherited from his mother, the late Lord's second wife.

Lady Grantham shrewdly suggested that in this adoption of the young Reginald, the possible heir to the title, there was some arrière pensée of contracting him to one of his lady cousins; and perhaps she was correct. But the undoubted consequence of this measure was, that Reginald remained at Eton at Lord Ernest's expense, and that his mother's income received a small addition, sufficient to insure her comfort.

Under these circumstances, Mrs. West received kindness and attention, not only from the Templetons, who readily admitted her claim, but from the whole neighborhood, whom her gentle and ladylike manners could not fail to please; while Reginald, a handsome, spirited boy, about fifteen, mounted on his pony, or driving his mother in her tiny chaise, was quite as much at the Priory as at the Cottage, or, as Cecilia observed, as he was on the road, and by whom in allusion to his equestrian tastes he was laughingly called the Honest Highwayman.

"How beautiful your flowers are," remarked Mrs. Forrester to Lady Dallas, as they walked through an elegant conservatory recently added to the Grange.

"Yes, they are very pretty; but I advise you, Mrs. Forrester, never to have your conservatory opening on to the drawing-room—sometimes I am quite overcome with the perfume from the cape jasmine, orange, and other scented flowers."

"You have only to close the double door; besides, your caution is too late to me."

"As to shutting the door, that is useless; Sir William is perpetually going through, and is so thoughtless, he always forgets—really his new plans and inventions keep us in constant confusion —only imagine, the new-fashioned flues were over-heated last week, and we were terrified by the cry of fire."

"But I was told you were quitte pour la peur," replied Mrs. Forrester; and as gardeners will over-heat even old-fashioned warming apparatus, it is better to have one which is so easily managed."

"Oh, you have no idea of the trouble all these things are; there was our coachman the other day"—but seeing or feeling from which quarter the wind was blowing, Mrs. Forrester, as she had often done before, shortened her visit.

"Is it quite true," inquired Lady Dallas of Mrs. Vernon, on whom she was calling, "that the little Templetons have been banished to a London school?"

"Perfectly true, that they are being educated near London, with two other children, but not that therefore they are banished."

"Happily," remarked her Ladyship, "I am not addicted to envy, or I certainly should envy Mrs. Templeton the perfect control she has over every thing. You, who can so easily educate your only girl, have no idea of the trouble I have with mine —I am perpetually obliged to change governess or nurse, and the children always lose with every change—now here is Mrs. Templeton freed from all this trouble, and quite at liberty to go about and receive her friends as she pleases."

"I think," replied Mrs. Vernon, smiling, "that you do not seem to find either duties or imprisonment very severe in your case, for I hear of you at all the parties near and far."

"Oh, that is because Sir William can not bear to go anywhere without me—so different from Colonel Templeton, who goes about as if he had no wife."

Almost provoked at her folly, and yet afraid of opening the eyes of one with so clapper-like a tongue, Mrs. Vernon suggested that perhaps Lady Dallas was quite as fond of being with Sir William as he with her; a truth which was at once frankly and laughingly admitted.

But, unfortunately, her Ladyship had not yet exhausted her stock of astonishment and comment—a portion of both was reserved for the Priory. Thither she drove, and on the broad terrace was the Colonel, and he being an admirer of her pretty face and fashionable dress, though he sometimes thought, when wincing under her random lashes, that if he were her husband he should infallibly strangle her, hastened to hand her from the carriage.

"Really, Colonel Templeton," she said, as he accompanied her through the noble hall to the drawing-room, "I hardly ever come here without thinking what an enviable life Mrs. Templeton's must be."

"The same idea occurs to me respecting Sir William's," was his insidious reply, "whenever I have the pleasure of seeing your Ladyship; but she, scarcely hearing him, and certainly not attaching any import to the words, went chattering on, as if he had not spoken.

"I think this place a perfect Paradise. Ah, my dear Mrs. Templeton, how do you do? I was, as usual, raving about this lovely place—it is a real garden of Eden."

"But there was something ugly even there, was there not? or my memory deceives me," boldly chimed in the Colonel, with a laughing sneer on his fine face.

"Now, Mrs. Templeton, did you ever hear such unblushing asking for a compliment; but my real object in coming was to hear how your daughters are—I was so surprised to learn that they were at school—I assure you I have been trying to persuade Sir William to send our two eldest, but he will not listen to it."

"If I suggest that every husband is not like me, I fear your Ladyship will again, though without cause, reprove my vanity;" for he saw that Ellinor could scarcely command her tears from falling.

"Fear nothing of the kind, for it is exactly what I said to Sir William," she gayly replied, "I told him to come and take a few lessons from you; but now I am here, I hope, Mrs. Templeton, you will give me your recipe for governing husbands."

"I believe," said she, trying to echo the badinage, "it is by letting them have their own way."

"Now I appeal to you, Colonel;" but he was gone. Ellinor had answered to the spur, and she might be ridden or baited to death, just as her tactless visitor chose.

And suns rose and set on Seabrooke, and the bright-green tints of spring were exchanged for the rich, brown hues of autumn, but they brought little variety in the life of its mistress, except that afforded by visits from her children, every one of which rendered it more difficult again to part with them; still, the evident advantage of her plan rendered her the more firm in pursuing it; and as she beheld what, even to her fond eyes, had been faults in her children's characters, gradually disappearing under the influence of judicious instruction, she decided that no selfish indulgence to herself should interfere to deprive them of its benefit.

She perceived, with delight and gratitude, that Helen's timidity was exchanged for a gentleness strengthened by firmness; her original indolence for an active industry in pursuit of all intellectual acquirements; her dependence on others for an unobtrusive self-reliance, which gave an irresistible charm to her touching style of beauty. Nor had Constanee failed to profit by these favorable circumstances; her vehement temperament was subdued to a generous warmth and energy, which had nothing of self-will; her prejudices and prepossessions were more under control, and though she was still impulsive, the impulse was better directed; the rare amiability of both Kate and Fanny Loftus had very much modified and corrected her almost painful love of the beautiful, for they were, as regarded regularity of feature, plain children—and this had, at first, affected Constance disadvantageously; but as she learned to value their beauty of temper, and subsequently their beauty of intellect and talent, she felt that she could, she must love them, though they had neither the loveliness nor grace of her standard, Helen.

The ever-welcome visits of Lord Grantham and his wife occasionally interrupted the monotony of Mrs. Templeton's existence, still further broken by the joint presence of Cecilia and Laurette, who had now become lady-like and intelligent companions to their aunt. Laurette was very often at Forest Hill, the Forresters having formerly been old friends and guests of her grandfather, for Sir Alan was dead; and her parents were expected by the next ship, bringing with them wealth, honor, and what they seemed, by their letters, to value still more, a son and heir five years old, and a little baby girl.

CHAPTER XI.

"(Enter Sparkish, fuddled.)—If I can but meet with her, or any body that belongs to her, they will find me a match for 'em. If the champagne does not hurt my eyesight, the enemy is marching this way."—WYCHERLY.

As time has been rather anticipated, we will return to the period at which Helen and Constance left their home, and relate a trifling event which afforded a little diversion, if that term be not thought inappropriate to the peaceful revolution of the seasons.

About six months after the children's departure, the Colonel announced his intention of leaving home; this was nothing uncommon, only, contrary to his usual custom, he informed those whom it might concern, that his journey was toward the Highlands. But though he was an excellent horseman, he must on this occasion have been riding very carelessly, for he was thrown, had two of his front teeth knocked out, and his handsome lip so cut that not even his mustache could hide the scar—nor, till time the healer stepped in to cure the bruised gums, could the skill of the dentist hide the gap—in short, it seemed a mercy that it was no worse.

As disfigurement and pain are not counter-irritants, it is but reasonable to expect that neither temper nor manner would be improved by this accident, and, to tell the truth, they were not; and though all within his influence bore testimony to this effect, none perhaps more so than the servant who went with him on his Scotch expedition, and who being his personal and favorite attendant had more than a due share of his master's ill temper; indeed, so much was the man tried, that he in his turn, as was but natural, revenged himself wherever he durst; and on one occasion, when reproved by Mrs. Dawson, and reminded by her that it was a Providence he had not met with the accident, he very profanely denied there having been any Providence in the matter, and that as to mercy, he added with a sneer, there had been very little of that; and threw out hints and inuendoes which, had they reached the ears of his worthy master, would have led to his dismissal—that is, if the Colonel could have ventured on that measure, for the profligate master is the slave of the servant who knows his secrets. But not to linger on the rack of curiosity, or trust to fable and fiction, let us listen to the voice of history; and thus she saith—

Undeterred, by Miss Lee's departure, from persisting in his base pursuit, and unconvinced by her proceedings that it would be in vain, her gallant admirer, after she had left the Rectory, learned her brother's address; and when she took up her residence with him, which she did directly her sister's plans were arranged, the Colonel began to arrange his.

Mr. Lee held a very good post under government, and as his private residence was a short distance from town, his sister would have been much alone, had they not had for neighbors the family of an old friend, to one of whose daughters Mr. Lee was engaged. As Miss Lee was one day waiting for the garden-gate to be opened, a gentleman slowly passed on horseback, who was evidently making a note of the house; she felt annoyed, alarmed, for though not quite sure, as she did not see his face, she was almost certain it was Colonel Templeton.

For several days after this she most obstinately kept at home, in spite of the remonstrances of Clara Forbes, who delighted in going to meet Edward Lee on his return from business, but hesitated to do so unaccompanied by Annie.

As, however, nothing further happened to warrant alarm or caution, Miss Lee hoped she had been mistaken, and again made her peace with Clara, by resuming their afternoon walks. They had both set off on one occasion to meet Mr. Lee, but fancying they had time to spare, stopped to make some purchases; and while doing so, he passed on toward his home, and the ladies, when they had concluded their business, walked on.

"I begin to think Edward will not return to dinner to-day," said Miss Lee; "and I am really quite tired, for we have long passed the usual trysting-place."

"Sit here, while I walk to the turnpike, and inquire if they have seen him?"

As Miss Forbes went on for that purpose, a gentleman on horseback passed her, but having no motive for looking after him, she proceeded to make her inquiry, and heard that Mr. Lee had gone through some time ago. Retracing her steps, she was surprised to observe Annie in earnest conversation with a gentleman, but something in the manner of both induced her to hasten forward and address her friend—on doing so, the stranger, throwing the bridle to his servant, walked away, and to Clara's surprise she found her agitated almost to tears. "I will explain all when we reach home," said Miss Lee in answer to her looks; "but where then is Edward?"

"At home, before us, I hope—"

"I hope so too," and in silence they hurried on; but what was Miss Lee's dismay, when she saw Colonel Templeton, for it was he, boldly ring, and when the servant opened the gate, enter, just pausing to announce that the ladies were in sight.

The brief interval which had elapsed between her seeing him and their own arrival at the house, had given Miss Lee time to recover her self-possession and presence of mind; and though the measure she adopted will forever incapacitate her for shining as a heroine of romance, a character, it is true, which she laughed at without mercy, let us hope vulgar, common-sense mortals will think she did right when she whispered to the amazed servant, "Quick, quick, fetch a policeman," and closed the gate herself.

Colonel Templeton politely raised his hat to Clara Forbes, though his look was rather impertinent, and observed, "Miss Lee has not favored me with an introduction."

"Nor has she given you a welcome," replied she, with spirit; "Colonel Templeton, I warn you that my brother is at home, and but little likely to suffer this intrusion quietly."

"With two such fair apologies, I am sure he will not be so ungallant as to pass a severe judgment."

"He will not only pass a severe judgment, but inflict a severe punishment, on any one who is insolent enough to molest these ladies, or intrude on these premises," exclaimed a well-known voice, though the tone was raised, and Miss Lee saw her brother hastening toward them from the side garden.

"Clara, go in, and you, Annie, also," he said, as he strode forward with looks ominous of a coming storm.

"Then I shall give myself the pleasure of accompanying you," said the Colonel, who certainly must have been excited by wine, or even he would have never so far forgotten himself as thus grossly to outrage every gentlemanly feeling.

Miss Lee looked along the road; in the language of the fair Fatima, she was ready to cry out, "Do you see any one coming?" and happily it was something more useful than dust or a flock of sheep which she described—it was that phenomenon, a policeman when wanted—who was hurrying on as fast as his pinched waist and strangling stock would permit, listening to the account of the servant, who gave him to understand, that an offender of no common kind was going to carry off the plate from before their eyes.

In the mean time, the intruder made good his threat. He entered; but just as he was following Miss Lee into the drawing-room, her brother rushed forward and seized him by the collar, not, however, before the riding-whip carried by this brave son of Mars had fallen heavily on the shoulder of Edward. The latter, a tall, powerful young man, roused to fury at the touch, wrenched the whip from the again uplifted hand, and with the thick end gave his adversary so severe a blow as to cause the loss which has been so pathetically lamented; and following up the attack, hurled him with such force and rage toward the door, that had not the policeman broken the fall, it might have had serious results.

"Hilloa!" exclaimed this guardian of peace and property; "a pretty go this is, isn't it?—to enter a gen'man's house in this way, and I at hand—and a regular swell too, I declare," surveying the dress of his prisoner, and discerning his aristocratic look and air.

"Let me go, fellow!" shouted the Colonel as well as he could articulate, and struggling to free himself from the ignominious grasp.

"No, no, my fine chap—not so soft as that;" and then, as Mr. Lee advanced, he looked at him for information.

"The scoundrel! the unmanly ruffian!" was his ejaculation; "drag or kick him out, policeman, and if you ever see him prowling about this place, remember he is a base blackguard, and treat him accordingly."

"You shall hear of this," menaced the Colonel.

"You paltry villain, if I ever meet you, you shall feel something like this," breaking and throwing the whip in his face. "And now, policeman, clear my premises of the fellow; and, I warn you, keep a sharp lookout after him."

Miss Lee stood in the hall, quite silent during this scene, but Clara was almost in hysterics, and under the medical treatment of the cook, who had left her warm regions below to behold the hotter work going on above; but perceiving that the heat of the fracas, or as she termed it, "the row," was over, she disappeared, muttering, as certain odors saluted her olfactory nerves—"Ah, there's them stupid chickens a letting themselves be scorched to a cinder, and them peas a biling as yaller as guineas."

Mr. Lee closed the hall door as quickly as he could, leaving the policeman to manage the Colonel, who being reminded by him that any resistance would oblige him to summon aid, went off with that public servant, muttering imprecations both loud and deep.

"He is gone, dear Clara," said her lover; "and, James, tell cook to put back, if she can, so as to give us time to wash this out of our heads—and then we will sit down to, I hope, our uninterrupted meal. Annie, I half guess the meaning of this, but now I must know all. Why, Clara, you little coward, a pretty aid-de-camp you make—come, girls, you must give me a kiss to set me to rights, and then go up stairs." And they did give him a kiss—each of them did—the first he ever had from Clara, according to his own statement, and this he said should plead for "that fellow," as he called him, if they ever met again; but they never did, though Mr. Lee for some time after their rencontre at his own house, kept a little elastic coil in his pocket, ready to do good service. But sober reflection, his dilapidated mouth, and scarred visage, however they might exasperate and tempt the Colonel to revenge, all counseled silence; and in this case he listened to their counsel.

CHAPTER XII.

"Give me a spirit that on life's rough sea
Loves t' have his sails with a lusty wind,
E'en till his sail-yards tremble, his masts crack,
There is no danger to a man that knows
What Life and Death is." CHAPMAN.

RETURN we now to the Priory, which we left bewailing the efforts of its master's bad jockeyship; but whether that comely sufferer felt most irritated at the image of himself reflected from its costly mirrors, or at the friendly condolences of Lady Dallas, who never met him without trying to thrust some eminent dentist down his throat, spite of his diminished masticatory powers, is not known; but this time he certainly did go to Paris, where he remained some weeks.

During his absence the Sinclairs arrived, and were received by Mrs. Templeton with all her usual kindness. Their long exile had, in its results, surpassed their most sanguine expectations; the Craigalan estates were freed from all incumbrances, Lady Sinclair was liberally dowered, and a handsome fortune was ready for Laurette.

Under these circumstances, her mother decided that they should both be presented; Lady Sinclair herself having never gone through that ceremony. But she was desirous of doing so under the chaperonage of a relative, and Lady Westrough was fixed on for having that honor. Who, indeed, more suitable? she was the wife of her mother's first cousin, and though at one time Lady Frances had been shunned by the elder branch of the family, and her children never noticed at all, Lady Sinclair was too reasonable to take offense at this; she felt that, in their circumstances, had Lionel's claims once been admitted before he became lord of Seabrooke, they would most effectually have frustrated every plan for reinstating the Westroughs in their just position. "Therefore," mentally said she, while weighing the question, "let bygones be bygones, and now for Lady Westrough."

But she had never had the most distant acquaintance with this valued or valuable relative; never mind—Lady Westrough she had selected, and Lady Westrough it would be.

The first step was to secure a house in town—it was now quite early spring—time enough between this and the London season—so calls, acquaintance, friendship, were soon established with Mrs. West, one of the most guileless of mortals, who was won to any one and any thing, through praises of her son, her idolized Reginald—he, in his turn, became the decoy to catch Lord Ernest, who was to catch his sister-in-law, who was to introduce Lady Sinclair.

A profound observer of cause and effect says, first catch your hare, then skin it. Her ladyship was also a profound observer, and she did first catch her hare—namely, Mrs. West: fortunately it was not necessary to skin her, so she escaped that process; for Lady Westrough, on learning what was the service required, was glad on such easy terms to establish a friendly feeling between her own family and her husband's relations.

Reginald West, though received everywhere as the adopted son of his uncle, as Lord Ernest chose to be styled, was much more with his mother than with his lordship; for though the latter was not only kind but generous to his young kinsman, there was little congeniality between the tastes and pursuits of the secluded man, whose prospects had been overcast almost before their dawn, and the energetic youth, who looked at life through a glass couleur de rose, and whose experience had never led him to think there was any other hue or shade.

From a very early age, Reginald's mind had given promise of unusual power and activity; how could this assimilate with that of the man who lived only in the past, and who thought life and all its gifts was only to be endured, not used—to whom the future offered alike little to hope or to fear?

> "Oh! who can bear to look upon > A sky without a cloud or sun?"

He was, however, too unselfish to wish that Reginald should purchase his favor by the sacrifice of those associations and pursuits so suited to his age and character, and therefore readily permitted him to follow where his affections most naturally led him. And these led him to seek the society of his pale, failing mother, to whom he was most tenderly attached, and whose style of life, necessitated by a narrow income, pleased his simple and independent tastes; above all, the society by which she was more immediately surrounded, or, as he called it, the choice treasure of the Priory, his favorite Mrs. Templeton, and the rich and rare gems of the Rectory, presented attractions of unusual interest to his intelligent and enthusiastic mind.

Ashley Vernon was especially his beau ideal of worth and talent—they had been together at Eton, whence Ashley, who was intended for the bar, had gone to Cambridge, and there again Reginald was to join him.

"Mother," asked he one evening, after a day spent between the Rectory and the Priory, "what does my uncle intend me to be?"

"What an odd question, my dear boy," she replied; "your uncle has adopted you, and though there is an impropriety, which I am sure we both shrink from, in alluding to the future, at his death you will be his heir, which, as he inherits the whole of his mother's fortune, means that you will be rich—and then, as Lord Westrough has no son—"

"True, mother," he remarked quickly, interrupting her; "I have often thought of this—and I hope, as you say, without meaning any thing wrong or paltry—but only in connection with you and me, I mean with our plans. Now suppose my uncle Ernest should marry—and, after all, he is only my father's cousin—I should then be something I very much dislike, and no way of escaping from it. As to Lord Westrough, I assure you, mother, our fellows at Eton led me a rare life for some time, because I unluckily once alluded to my heirship, though only in joke—they effectually drubbed that vision out of my imagination."

"I am sure, my dear Reginald, you make me feel very uneasy by these strange remarks; on the strength of Lord Ernest's promise, you know, or, indeed, perhaps you do not, that after paying every debt, I purchased an annuity with the small sum remaining—so from me you have nothing to expect; and I fear," continued she, tears starting to her eyes, "it is too late for me to retrench and save up for you."

"Nonsense! how you talk, you dear, miserly mamma; and I can not think how I could be so selfish as to torment you in this way—only Ashley returns next week to Cambridge, and we have been talking of the comfort of having something to turn to and rely on, in case of need—what a croaking, calculating fellow you must think me. But now let us have tea, with some of that delicious cream Mrs. Templeton sent. Mother," he suddenly exclaimed, after a pause, "what a woman she is—do you know I sometimes dream of her, after I have spent an hour or so in her company—I can not express to you the extraordinary feeling that comes over me occasionally—sometimes I fancy little stories about her, in the style of a distressed princess and knight." And his animated and handsome face looked almost fierce with excitement, and any kindred spirit that had noted the broad, noble brow, and the strange expression of the dark-violet eye, that seemed as if, for the moment it looked on another scene than that presented by the comfortable cottage drawing-room, would have said, "On that is enthroned genius—there looks out the spirit of poetry."

This conversation, however, left on his mother's mind a vague suspicion of realities which she had never before contemplated, and though but a suspicion, it was strong enough to induce her to write to Lord Ernest; and without giving her reasons either consistently or in plain language—she was too cautious, or perhaps too much perplexed herself, to do so—she suggested that, as Reginald was fond of literature, and delighted in the exercise of intellect, whether it might not be be as well to turn his attention to some object in life, so as to employ and stimulate A kind reply was returned, but a negative was given to all her wishes. "Reginald," she was told, "would, at a proper age, have some appointment given him; but both army and navy"—his lordship appeared to ignore any other channel for superabundant mind—"both army and navy were unpleasant ideas to him. Besides, he hoped Reginald did not want any thing—if so, he had only to ask; of course, when he went to college, a suitable allowance would be made him; and begging Mrs. West would oblige him by purchasing any ornament she might like, as a token from him, of his good wishes on the lately begun year, he inclosed a small draft;" it was for a hundred pounds, and "remained, hers truly."

Poor Mrs. West read the conclusion with tingling cheeks, right glad that her son was not present. She felt convicted of having, indirectly, asked for the inclosure, though nothing had been further from her thoughts, and yet there was no way of explaining away the fancied imputation; so she acquiesced in his decision; reiterated her thanks on Reginald's account, and in a few words disclaimed the extravagance he must suppose her capable of, when he inclosed so handsome a sum for an ornament.

CHAPTER XIII.

"All is in motion; rings, and plumes, and pearls Are shining every where." Doge of Venice.

"Cecilia," said Lady Grantham, one morning, to her daughter, now nearly twenty, "put aside your purse, I want to have a consultation with you."

"Dear mamma, how delightful," said she, "but I can always listen better when my fingers are busy on work that requires no attention; so begin, for there is nothing I like more than these little confidential chats. I always think they have done me good, and made me feel wiser and older."

"Few young ladies would thank the mother who, at your age, added to their years," she replied, "but I understand what you mean. And now, my treasure, listen. You know that your dear father has always had to struggle against the difficulties of an encumbered estate, bequeathed in that condition to him. It has never been a secret that we are not rich; to my children especially this was made known, in order that they might early learn to submit cheerfully to privations, and to prevent the encouragement of chimerical hopes and wishes. Some people have thought me too ready to look out for the loaves and fishes; but years ago, I lost an only and beloved brother, fighting for his country, while, on the same dreadful occasion, my sister lost her noble young lover, whose memory she has ever since cherished more like his widow than his affianced bride; two years ago, my brave, my beautiful Cecil was offered up on the same altar." Her voice faltered, while the tears fell thick and fast on Cecilia's trembling hands; for she remembered the sorrow which had stricken them all to the earth when this calamity befell; she recalled also the figure of her quiet, secluded aunt Lucy, whom she had never seen out of deep mourning, and could easily imagine all the sorrowful recollections which now filled her mother's heart.

She drew near to that loved mother, and silently kissed her; the caress was fondly returned, and wiping away her tears, Lady Grantham resumed, "Henry is now shortly expected home, and well has he won all he has gained during his long sojourn at Constantinople; and as he is of age, he will, at once, assist your father to free himself from the pressure which has weighed upon him for so many years. It is then our intention to go abroad for six or eight months, and though this will be our first outbreak, we are not going to forget economy. Therefore, assuming that it will be agreeable to you, I have accepted an invitation from your aunt Ellinor, for you to spend that time chiefly with her; not, however, excluding the claims of other friends who may wish to see you; and now, dear, what say you to this?"

"Oh, mamma, I shall be delighted. I always think the Priory one of the most beautiful places I ever saw—and aunt Ellinor is so graceful and kind, I feel as if I could do any thing for her. But, mother," she continued, "let us always speak truly and openly to each other. I can not understand my uncle Lionel. At one time I thought him perfection, and though he is still always very kind, nay, indulgent to me, I confess I have quite changed my opinion of him—dear mamma, we with our small fortune are richer by far than he with his large one, for love and union are with us—while there—but mind," she continued, impressively, "only to you has this ever been breathed, I can not take salt and betray; well, then, for I must say it, I am sure that there is sorrow in that splendid house, such as we have never known, no, not even when dear Cecil fell. And then Helen and Constance separated from their parents, and educated from home, a thing so unusual in their station; why is all this?"

"I can not very well tell you, even if I would, my dearest," said her mother, very gravely. "I do but guess, and if I am right I most warmly approve of your aunt's decision, involving, as it does, so great a sacrifice on her part. But it is of your cousins I wished more particularly to speak. Constance is but a child, though they both look older than they are, for Helen is little more than fourteen."

"Oh, mamma, how beautiful they are!" exclaimed Cecilia, impetuously interrupting Lady Grantham; which do you admire most?"

"Indeed, it would be difficult to say," was the smiling reply. "Helen is more like her mother, I think, in character, as well as appearance; but they are sweet angels, both of them; it is in reference to this beauty I am about to caution you. In the first place, your papa and I have a very decided objection to a marriage between cousins—do not open your really fine eyes so wide—secondly, and were it not so, the rich heiress of Colonel Templeton is no match for the future Lord Grantham; but as I have frequently remarked, that serious and sad mischief is done by a careless remark, an unmeaning joke, or even by ostentatious care; do not, by any of these means, put an idea into Henry's head which would otherwise never have entered it—but what is the matter?" as Cecilia turned her glowing, and evidently indignant countenance, full on her.

"I know," she said, "that I am often called abrupt, or, if you will, rude, because I can not, or will not be false; but what should ever have led you, mamma, to suspect me capable of such vulgar conduct or conversation, I do not know;" and she was really angry.

"Why, you passionate lamb," said Lady Grantham, laughing most merrily, "what a waste of heroics is this—surely I did not, even by implication, accuse you of vulgarity."

"By warning me against such acts, and forbidding them, you did," she replied, slightly appeased. "There is scarcely any thing I more hate and despise than the very fault you spoke of. Jokes about love and lovers are quite unsuited to a lady; they are left, with their old-fashioned clothes, to their servants."

"Well, my dear, I humbly sue for peace—only in my own vindication I may be allowed to remark, that there are some—and ladies they still are, in spite of it—who do not adopt, or at least do not act on your correct notion—so smooth your ruffled plumes, or I shall think you slightly a shrew—there, take and give the kiss of peace."

"Mamma, you are very good to pardon my pettishness," she replied, sunshine again settling on her polished brow, "and perhaps I am oversensitive on this subject; but what about my uncle's property—does it descend to my aunt and cousins?"

"Only by their father's will, who, I believe, could dispose of it otherwise, as he has no son; but on this point I am not quite clear; and now, to terminate this long conference by something royal and gay, you must speedily decide on your courtdress."

"Oh, here you must help me," replied Cecilia; "you have your own to think about also. It is long since you were there, mamma, is it not?"

"I have never been since I was presented on my marriage, and then I well remember it; I am old enough now to allude to the circumstance, without the risk of being called vain. Lady Blanche Stanly was the same day presented by her aunt, the Dowager Duchess of Isleford, to whose son she was engaged, and it was said that she and I disputed the prize for beauty."

"Ah! I am sure you merited it," eagerly decided her daughter, looking at her mother's still attractive face; "but I thought the Duke was never married."

"He never was—a few months after the town had rung with accounts of the preparations for her marriage, she was buried. Lord Hurstwood never recovered from this blow; and though a man neither liked nor respected, every one felt much for him, she was such a sweet, lovely girl."

"And this was your last visit to Court; I do not wonder you remember it."

"It was, for our finances never permitted of such costly affairs; but your papa now wishes me to present you, and aunt Lucy has generously furnished the sinews of war, so do not let your taste disgrace her."

"It will be white—certainly white," was the prompt reply. "Laurette is to pass the ordeal on the same occasion, and I had a note from her yesterday, touching this all-engrossing affair."

"And I one from Lady Sinclair; if she can not secure the services of her relative, Lady Westrough, she claims my promise. I am also to see her diamonds any day next week at Storr's."

"I hear they are splendid," said Cecilia. "and will set off Lady Sinclair's peculiar style of beauty admirably. I wonder whether Laurette will be entirely in white; she is very fond of colors, to the great annoyance of Constance, who will not wear any thing but white or blue."

"You may be sure Laurette will be dressed in the most becoming style—she knows her complexion will bear a skillful use of colors; but do not let any whim of hers influence you, or induce you to dress like her, unless her choice suits you. You are both likely to be looked at, still you are very different."

"Yes, Laurette, though rather short, is one of the most elegant girls I know."

"Stand up, Cecilia," said her mother; and when she obeyed, and Lady Grantham looked at the elastic, well-proportioned young figure before her, and glanced at the stately carriage of the head and shoulders, the mother's pride as well as admiration was excited, as she imagined the effect such a figure and face were sure to produce.

CHAPTER XIV.

"Now here comes in a scene of sheer wit, without any mixture in the whole world. First, one speaks; then presently t'other's upon him, slap, with a repartee."—The Rehearsal.

And the effect which Lady Grantham had predicted, was produced, and the drawing-room was over, and the ladies had gone home, to talk of their friends and their conquests, and to repose on their laurels or their sofas, as best pleased them.

At the club, meanwhile, a group of fashionable critics had clustered, to discuss beauties and dissect characters; to speculate on the forthcoming on-dits, and fabricate genteel scandals for the gulling and gulled journals; to try the strength of their own callow wit, and to kill the time which hung so heavily on hand.

"Well, boys! what think you of the drawing-room?" inquired an Adonis, a veritable antique, cleverly repaired and restored, who was lounging on a divan.

"By the Lord, Harry!" said a fair-haired but gallant guardsman, point device in all the pride, pomp, and circumstances of war, "it was splendid—what a lot of girls, and some of them decidedly fine ones, I can tell you," caressing his mustache (gently, for it was false).

"Where do these ancient hens hide their pretty chicks?" inquired another; "one sees nothing of them till the sovereign calls, and then, down they come, fluttering their feathers with a vengeance."

"No matter where they are hid, it is really a refreshing sight when they are shown," remarked Adonis; "such an assemblage of beauty is seen at no other court."

"Why, you did not see them, did you?" innocently asked a black-eyed and espiègle-looking man.

"To be sure I did," was the reply; "why, my dear fellow, I was close to you when Lady Grantham passed—you remember she bowed to me."

"Yes, but I thought you had not your spectacles on."

A roar followed this honeyed remark, in which the object of the sneer faintly joined.

"But, àpropos of Lady Grantham, who was the queenly-looking girl she presented?"

"Her daughter, the Honorable Cecilia Grantham."

"And 'pon honor," said the Guardsman, "I never saw such lilies and roses in my life as that girl's complexion was composed of. I was close behind her; and, marble and snow! such shoulders!"

"Mortimer wanted to touch them, to be sure they were not wax," interrupted the owner of the dark eyes.

"By Jove! Sidney, you are too bad," exclaimed the brave blond.

"Oh, I was told you threw yourself into a regular attitude, and were heard to whisper, rather loud by the way—

"'Excellently done, if nature did't all,
'Tis beauty truly blent, whose red and white Nature's own sweet and cunning hand laid on.'"

"Yes," said another, "and some fellow who had never read the original went about telling every body what a poetic genius Morti has."

"Laugh as you like, you can not make me unsay my assertion; if she is a Grantham, she comes of a good stock; my lady has her wits about her, and has, I dare say, taught the lesson to her daughter."

"Hear! hear!" was the rejoinder; "he is making a bargain; he brings money, she sense; each takes what the other wants;" and again there was a laugh, in which Adonis joined, but more heartily than before. And, rising to leave the room, he sententiously remarked—

"Lady Grantham is both a good wife and an excellent mother; and, what is of much more importance, she is but little changed since I met her nearly ten years ago, and I can tell you it is a capital thing to belong to a family that wears so well;" and having uttered this sentiment, with as much gravity as if it had been worth remembering, he carefully adjusted his hat on his "best substitute for your own hair," and affecting a slow pace, to conceal his want of agility, departed.

"What an artificial old fellow Chilvers is," said one.

"How do you mean—bodily or mentally?" asked Mr. Sidney.

"Oh, both. Do you know that nothing will induce him to go to the Zoological Gardens—guess why—you can not? Give it up? Why, for fear the elephant should roar out, 'Give me my ivories!'" A laugh, and cries of "Too bad!"

"And that reminds me of Templeton," said Sidney; "what is that story about his accident? I have been so long abroad I am quite behind-hand with the choice bits of news. I met him some time ago at Versailles, and was at once struck with his changed appearance; he looked also really ill; but when I asked about it, he gave me a fabulous version. I know he did, by the look of the servant, who was near enough to hear all. Mind you look at a confidential servant, if he is by, when you suspect his master is cramming you; some one afterward told me he was horsewhipped by a young fellow, whose wife he was trying to carry off."

"No," said the fair Mortimer, "it was a sister; but this happened ages ago, just after you left England. I had it all from the policeman who saw the whole transaction; my fellow traced it up from the waiter of the hotel where the Colonel was first nursed, as I wanted to learn the particulars for a reason I had; and the next time this marauding soldier troubles his head about my steeplechases, and tells my old aunt of them, I will cast this in his teeth, I was going to say; but I will expose him, as sure as my name is Mortimer."

"Good heavens! Mortimer, you are excited; he will faint—fetch the salts!" cried Sidney.

"Cease your confounded banter," said Mortimer, still looking hot and angry; "but seriously, I never hear of that heartless profligate, Templeton, without envying the man who disfigured him. We are none of us too good, though Heaven forgive our odious folly, some not quite so bad as we boast of being; but do you know, some years ago, this base fellow misled a poor girl, his children's governess; and had it not been for my sister, Lady Wingrove, she would have been destitute in her utmost need. As it was, she and her child died."

"Poor thing!" was repeated, and "Brave Lady Wingrove!" while every hat was raised in honor of her ladyship; but the mood was too good to last.

"But I say, Morti, you who were in the very garden of beauty, tell us who was that magnificent Sultana, quite a blaze of diamonds?"

"Why, the sister of this very Templeton—Lady Sinclair, the wife of Sir Archibald of that ilk; when I asked her name, I expected to hear she was the Queen of Golconda—they are enormously rich, and that dark-eyed girl in white with her, was her daughter."

"Well, gentlemen," said the Honorable Sidney Staples, who was reported to have spent already two splendid fortunes, and who was often abroad when looked for in England—"well, gentlemen, you seem to have collected and catalogued your spoil, do not fall out while sharing it;" and humming "If she be not so to me, what care I how kind she be!" he sauntered away.

CHAPTER XV.

"Il y a dans quelques femmes, une grandeur artificielle, attachée au mouvement des yeux, à un air de tête. . . Il y a dans quelques autres une grandeur simple, naturelle."—BRUYÈRE.

CECILIA and Laurette were now both at the Priory; the latter having expressed her wish to defer her return to Scotland till she had taken leave of her numerous and kind English friends, and the Granthams having at length started on their long-talked-of continental visit.

Mrs. Templeton, who was always fond of the society of young people, on this occasion laid aside her habits of seclusion, accepted the invitations of her neighbors, and threw open her own house in return. She was also busy, and interested in the study of two characters so dissimilar as those of her young relatives; nor was the analysis the less attractive because it so often puzzled her.

Laurette, though not beautiful, was extremely elegant and fascinating; sometimes Mrs. Templeton fancied she reminded her of her husband; but she hastily banished the idea, as cruelly unjust to the young girl; and on those occasions she would studiously endeavor to explain away the conduct that did not appear straightforward and true. Laurette was clever and accomplished, but she was not original; she talked well on most subjects, or, rather, she made the hearer fancy she did; for, when remembered and examined, what she said was more the echo of your own sentiments than any thing new, or even additional.

In order to understand her better, Mrs. Templeton compared her with Cecilia; she found that if she asked the opinion of the latter, it was given at once. Laurette tried to extract that of the inquirer, while with the utmost tact she avoided all subjects that might involve her in discussion. Cecilia attacked them all, evidently desirous of arriving at the truth. Laurette was a most skillful flatterer, so nicely apportioning the dose that it was inhaled rather than swallowed; rarely did she avow a dislike, though she would most ingeniously hint a defect or insinuate a deformity.

Cecilia never flattered; she often praised, and openly expressed both love and admiration. Too kind to censure individuals, she made it a rule to avoid personalities; but abstract qualities, which excited her disapprobation, she treated without either mercy or quarter.

But Laurette was the popular candidate.

Lady Dallas quoted her as an oracle; Mrs. Forrester cited her as a high-bred and well-bred girl; while Mrs. West, whose son had received great attention from the Sinclairs during their residence in London, only wished Heaven had made her such a daughter.

Still, after much wavering, Mrs. Templeton, though owning that Laurette was charming, found herself involuntarily seeking Cecilia, when she wanted the help of truth and openness.

Caroline Vernon, though considerably younger than either of Mrs. Templeton's nieces, was always received as a welcome addition, and often came accompanied by Fanny Loftus, who had lately recovered from a severe illness, and whose rare worth rendered her a great favorite with the Rector and his wife. Lady Dallas would have added, and with Charles Vernon also.

This spinster party, as Laurette called it, was occasionally diversified by the arrival of Henry Grantham, between whom and Hubert Forrester a mutual good liking arose. Henry, though young in years, being hardly three-and-twenty, had seen a great deal of life; nearly four years had been passed at Constantinople, where his first lesson in diplomacy had been learned; and he had learned it so well that he expected before long to be sent on a duty of some trust and responsibility

Hubert was a handsome, gay youth, who had just entered at Oxford; he was the idol of his parents, the favorite of fortune, and rather the pet of Mrs. Templeton, who, without any exaggerated opinion of his talents or attainments, liked his cheerful light-heartedness, which to her had a peculiar charm; and as she looked at the youthful group, occasionally increased by reinforcements from other families, she thought of the time when her own girls would stand in their young beauty by her side, and wondered how it would be then.

It was during this visit that Cecilia first became aware of some points in Laurette's character which, to her upright and rather haughty mind, were especially unpleasant. Till the appearance of Hubert Forrester, so gracious had Laurette's manner been to Henry, who was evidently fascinated by her elegance and accomplishments, that Cecilia, though little addicted to castle-building in the air, had, perhaps, ventured to erect one small cottage, in which her brother and her friend might pass their honeymoon; when the arrival of another convinced her the cottage was en espagne, and built only of cards. At first, she thought her anxiety about Henry had made her discover what was not—it seemed so unlikely that Laurette should condescend even to coquette with Hubert, so unequal to her in acquirement or intellect, not to mention his being, at least, two years younger. But further observation convinced her that Laurette really did admire Hubert, or that she was playing him off against Henry; in either case Cecilia felt indignant. She was, however, relieved from all fear on her brother's account—perhaps his eyes were open, as well as hers—perhaps he had never cared more for Laurette than as an agreeable companion, and her friend; at any rate, though his manner toward her was altered, he was as gay as ever.

"My dear Mrs. Templeton, I am so glad to find you at home and alone," said Lady Dallas; "I do so wish to speak to you."

"I hope nothing unpleasant has happened," politely inquired Mrs. Templeton, expecting nothing worse than one of her domestic grievances; either the lady's maid had eloped with the butler, or the butler had eloped with the plate. For though Lady Dallas no longer envied Mrs. Templeton, or thought of sending Sir William to take lessons of the Colonel, and was in many respects much improved, she still cherished a talent for making discoveries, and for letting all the world benefit by her acuteness.

"Oh, no; only as a friend and looker-on, perhaps I see more than you do, who are one of the players. It is about your young ladies and their squires."

"Indeed," said Mrs. Templeton, in a freezing tone; and then reflecting that this was an opportunity she ought not to lose, for impressing her visitor with her own feelings on what she promptly divined was her object, she proceeded more graciously; "I hope the squires have not been birds'-nesting, and the young ladies purloining fruits and flowers."

"Not exactly that," said Lady Dallas, trying to look intelligent and arch; "but the young ladies may be purloining hearts, and the squires trying to do the same."

"Do you mean that either of my nieces are carrying on a flirtation?" asked Mrs. Templeton; "for though the word is one I dislike, I must use it to express conduct I despise."

"Oh! nothing so naughty as that," was the reply. "You have put the case in too strong a light."

"Then place it exactly as you mean me to see it," said Mrs. Templeton, perceiving, by her ladyship's manner, that her grave reception of the badinage had its effect; "but let me first inform you, that so much do I disapprove of any conduct by which young ladies lay themselves open to censure, however innocently or thoughtlessly, that if they are convicted they leave me directly, and Hubert and Henry will be forbidden my house till they know better. If, therefore, there is talk of this, I must act at once."

"Now, my dear Mrs. Templeton," cried her ladyship, rather afraid of the spirit she had evoked, "what a rigid censor you are; there is only a little harmless love-making."

"Marriage is the only proper termination, or rather result, of any love-making; and I apprehend the parents of those under discussion would at once forbid the banns—but even this supposition is impertinent and affronting. May I ask who is your informant?"

"The truth is—no one—and my remark to you was half in jest; I had no idea you would take it up so warmly, and merely meant to put you on your guard."

"I thank you truly for any friendly intentions; and you will much increase the obligation by avoiding all mention of this topic, even in jest—especially to the high contracting parties themselves," said she with a smile; and rather alarmed lest she had already done mischief, Lady Dallas readily made the promise—and kept it.

Nearly a year before this time, Lord Hurstwood, who had, for a very long period, scarcely ever left his own spacious grounds, died. His son was abroad when this event happened; and duties, which he could neither delegate nor resign, had prevented his return. It was now rumored that Hurstwood was preparing to receive its new lord, the Lara of the neighborhood, as Cecilia said; and while she openly expressed a wish that he would arrive during her visit, Laurette said nothing, but became a little, a very little, more distant in her behavior toward the "Squire."

But fate, or her aunt, had decreed that Cecilia should not be there when my lord came; she was invited by Aunt Lucy to accompany her to Brighton, and Laurette accepted an invitation to Lady Westrough's.

It was not, however, on Lord Hurstwood's account that Mrs. Templeton had dismissed her nieces and broken up her youthful coterie; for though he was a courtier, a man of the world, and one of whom report had whispered various scandals—there would have been no such imperative reason for clearing the place of all that was young and attractive—the cause was closer at hand—the danger nearer.

Colonel Templeton had written to his steward, announcing his approaching return; and his wife had heard from Lady Grantham that he would be accompanied by some friends—and as these were not of the kind or character she would willingly have introduced to her daughter, she had arranged so as to prevent it—hence Cecilia's departure. To Henry, her ladyship had written with her accustomed frankness; expressing his father's dislike to his having any acquaintance with the persons his uncle would bring with him. Wondering to what kind of association she was now to be exposed—since the mere mention of it had banished all the innocent and happy spirits which had lately surrounded her, Mrs. Templeton once more found herself alone—alone at that beautiful Priory, which reposed in all the quiet and touching loveliness of mid-autumn, when its master and his associates broke upon its stillness.

They arrived; and to Mrs. Templeton's eyes, this absence of a few months had produced in her husband's appearance the wear of years; there was an expression over the whole countenance difficult to define, but plainly and painfully felt. His habits, also, were less like those of a gentleman—his language was not only rude, but coarse—his foreign guests and their cigars were met almost everywhere; and though there were still some rooms free from its vulgar and, we were going to say, its profaning effects, it was enough that this disgusting innovation was permitted. Late and noisy revels were not uncommon; while billiards, and still more ruinous amusements, were stimulants alternating with tipsy carousals. All order and sobriety were set at naught by a crew, half-swindler, half gambler.

"Thank God, my children are safe from this den, at least for the present; and may the same mercy prevent its recurrence when they do return," thought Mrs. Templeton, one night, when the sounds of revelry rose more discordantly than usual—and she almost shuddered when she remembered, that in the course of two years, perhaps less, her gentle Helen would be called upon to realize life.

However, before Christmas, the house was cleared; and, as Mrs. Dawson declared, underwent a thorough purification.

During almost the whole time that these orgies were going on, all intercourse with their neighbors had been suspended. A very stately and sumptuous entertainment had, soon after the Colonel's return, been given, but not one guest had offered any invitation in return—on the contrary, this Comus crew had, as by magic, made the place desolate. The Forresters left at a season quite unusual for them; Sir William Dallas openly declared he would not introduce his pretty wife to such a set—and as Lord Hurstwood, whom Colonel Templeton had met abroad, and whom he seemed desirous to propitiate, held aloof, though by no means of the straight-laced school, it is probable the Colonel did not care to brave such a hornet's nest. Whatever the cause, before Christmas they all left in his company—but he soon returned.

CHAPTER XVI.

"Will fortune never come with both hands full?"
Henry IV.

"No rose without thorns."

FREQUENT and long, as well as stormy, were the conferences now held with Mr. Johnson, the agent, on whom, hitherto, the chief management of the estate had devolved.

Johnson had held this office under the late Mr. Ashley, by whom his judgment and integrity had been so highly esteemed, that he was named with respect in his will, and strongly recommended to his successor; nor had his conduct, in any instance, shown that this opinion was ill-founded.

But he was now old, and lately much of an invalid; his son, a clever young man, who had for some time assisted him in all the more fatiguing details of his office, and who seemed to inherit his honesty as well as knowledge of business, was now his deputy on most occasions, and was generally considered secure of his father's situation, whenever the latter died or resigned.

When Colonel Templeton took possession of this property, he found it in the most flourishing condition; most of the tenants held long leases; some had within a few years expired, and been renewed; and though, on several occasions, the Colonel had evinced a desire to drive a hard, or, as he would have said, a good bargain, Johnson had convinced him that a long lease, and a lower rent regularly paid, were better than a high rent and uncertain occupation.

It happened, at this juncture, that several leases had fallen in, and Johnson, as usual, was desirous of acting as umpire between the landlord, who demanded a much higher rent on account of increased value of land, and the farmer, who asked to have his lease renewed on former terms.

But now, for the first time, the Colonel was obstinate and unguidable; the consequence was, that two excellent tenants left.

Johnson was vexed and mortified—indeed, through the whole affair, the Colonel had treated him so cavalierly, not to say rudely, that he took it greatly to heart; so deep an impression did this, and several other instances of diminished confidence and unanimity, make on the worthy man, that he never quite recovered his usual spirits; this, added to increasing age and illness, soon unfitted him for exertion, and before the end of the year he died.

Young Robert, his son, applied to be continued in the office, but was coolly told that a person from London was already engaged. On the young man this blow fell heavily and unexpectedly—what was to be done? he was married to a niece of Mrs. Dawson's, an active, industrious woman, and had three children.

"Can I do any thing for them, Dawson?" asked Mrs. Templeton, when that worthy creature, with tears in her eyes, told her of the circumstance. "I do not offer to speak to the Colonel in his behalf, for if he has engaged another person it will be useless, besides"—she paused, for she knew that, "besides," her entreaty for any one would be unheeded.

"You are always very good, madam," replied Mrs. Dawson; "the only thing I can ask of you is to write to the Honorable Mr. Grantham, who, when he was here last autumn, saw a good deal of Robert, and asked him about farming, and such like; perhaps, among his friends, if he would condescend to remember the poor fellow, something might be found to turn up."

"I will do it immediately, as well as to Sir Archibald Sinclair and Lord Grantham;" and so she did, and to her great satisfaction received a letter from her brother, or rather his amanuensis, saying, that if Johnson did not require too high a salary for their means, Cecil would be really thankful to have an honest man on his property, as he knew nothing about its management himself, and did not think favorably of the agent at present engaged. And this being settled to the wish of all parties, by the time his late father's accounts were prepared and passed, which even the Colonel could not do without expressing his satisfaction, Robert's new employer was ready for him.

In speaking of the Priory and its lands, it was said that the first Mr. Ashley had endeavored as much as possible to bring the property into a compact form, so that the building itself should form a kind of center; and this he had done, not by extensive purchases, but by judicious exchanges of the distant for the near. One piece of the property, however, formed an exception, and was never exchanged; it was on the side toward the sea, and is perhaps best described as a kind of "chine," as similar places are termed in the Isle of Wight, only that here the height was of solid rock, it being the commencement of a small range, if that word be not too ambitious.

Tradition called this the Hermitage, a name which many things justified, for till the reign of the late Mr. Ashley's grandmother, it consisted of little more than two rather large, but sheltered, excavations; the view from the roof of these was perhaps as fine as from any part of the estate, and offers had frequently been made for its purchase. But Mrs. Ashley was so attached to the spot, that though a strip of ground now belonging to Sir William Dallas separated it from the Priory demesne, it was, by her wish, kept in the family, and built on.

The ancient excavations served as excellent cellarage to a stone house built in strict external accordance with the old architecture of the Priory, but within, containing rooms the snuggest, and most comfortable. Here there were no "rich windows to exclude the light, and passages that lead to nothing," for every passage led to some small, but cosy nook; and the stone-set casements let in a glorious view of the deep and dark-blue ocean, and its sparkle of ever-restless waves; while, on the only side which admitted of it, was a window, giving rather a tantalizing view of the Priory and church steeple, which, however, by ascending about a dozen roughly cut, but safe steps, burst on the sight, with a most advantageous effect.

This place, though apparently far superior to what his station demanded, had always been inhabited by Johnson; but then the agent was a favorite, had become almost a friend, and had also married a young person, who had been brought up as a companion by the mother of Horace.

Determining to secure a permanent residence on the property for his faithful and respected superintendent, and yet not wishing to alienate this favorite spot of ground, or rather rock, Mr. Ashley granted Johnson a lease of the hermitage for ninety-nine years, at a nominal rent.

By this family, celebrated for their flower-loving tastes, it may be almost superfluous to add, that a garden, with a patch of meadow, was attached to the hermitage; and here Johnson had lived from early manhood to old age, and here Robert was born.

Colonel Templeton, though in most things a clever man, and certainly, in all matters where self was concerned, both shrewd and calculating, was by no means conversant with the dry details of business as they related to landed property; but with Johnson continually at his elbow to prompt him, this had been of little consequence, except that it had prevented him from discovering his need and his deficiency. Frequently, when transacting affairs with his employer, Johnson was astonished to perceive that he never fully understood the real position he occupied with respect to the Seabrooke property, both as regarded his responsibilities and his privileges; so that he had often found it difficult to show him what he might, and what he might not do. Rich prey this, to fall into the hands of the spoiler!

And now that the village had wondered and concerned itself about young Johnson's dismissal, till it was tired, all stood on the tiptoe of expectation and curiosity to see the new agent; and after various false alarms, and cries of "he comes"—he did come, but so quietly, that those on the lookout felt themselves aggrieved, swindled, defrauded. "Scandalous, after all the excitement and flutter of expectations, to sneak in so silently"—and then, when he was seen, it was no great sight—and this is true—for there certainly was nothing in his appearance either to attract or repel; he looked like a man who had once been a gentleman, or nearly so—a sort of narrow escape. His manner was self-possessed, neither vulgar nor rude, sometimes, though rarely, there was a tinge of arrogance and presumption; his language indicated a man of education, while his voice gave tokens of refinement. But much of this seeming incongruity was explained, when he, as if by accident, alluded to a military career and college education.

Mrs. Templeton was present when both these antecedents were glanced at—she made no remark, it was not her custom; but she remembered this, and subsequently named it to the Rector, now Dr. Vernon—who ascertained that, as regarded the university, the statement was correct; though a few circumstances connected with his college life, which the Doctor at the same time learned, was by the agent either forgotten, or not thought worthy of being mentioned. But a surprise awaited the Colonel and his family, and, indeed, many others, though the last were not concerned in the event. Mrs Templeton was the first who was informed, and this by Mrs. Dawson, that Johnson had let the Hermitage furnished, to a gentleman who had already been spending a few weeks there before his father's death. Dawson added, that the late agent had consulted her about the propriety of consenting to the residence of a lodger, and fully intended to have named it to the Colonel, but the vexatious differences between them, and his illness, had almost banished the matter from his mind; that immediately after his death the negotiation was renewed, for hiring the Hermitage as it stood, for a term, and that Robert was too glad of this opportunity to increase his income, to think of hesitating.

Knowing her husband's feelings as regarded any intrusion on his property, though the Hermitage was at the extremity, and on one side separated from it, Mrs Templeton was certain that fierce and loud would be the explosion of his anger. Nor was she mistaken. Directly he heard of the Hermitage being thus tenanted, he sent Mr. Cooper, the new agent, to ascertain the facts, which being simply what his principal already knew, namely, that the Hermitage was let, he returned with little to impart, except that the lodger was a Mr. Morton, and that he had paid a quarter's rent in advance.

Then went the Colonel himself, in a towering rage, breathing threats of expulsion, razing to the ground, and sundry warlike denunciations of learned length; but he found there only a middle-aged negro, and a respectable female servant, by whom he was told that their master would be down next week, and from whom he received his address at a London hotel.

Next week, again went Mr. Cooper; perhaps, in his zeal for the Colonel, he slightly forgot himself, an obliviousness to which, in one sense, he was never prone—for one of the village gossips happening, by chance—busy-bodies always happen by chance to be where they are not wanted—happening to be going by the Hermitage during the interview, which took place in the garden, heard words of threatening import in a strange voice, and remarks which were any thing but complimentary to Mr. Cooper, which when the Colonel heard of, he waxed wroth, and swore, as the simile says, like any trooper.

The matter, however, for the present was left in peace; first, by the departure of the intruder, who left only his sable hostage—next, by a strict investigation of Robert's rights—and lastly by a curt, but determined note, from a respectable lawyer in town, addressed to the Colonel; which, while it by no means stopped the Colonel's oaths, stopped his agent's visit.

But lo! compensation is in store for the vexed and excited Seabrookians—and this celestial and even-handed visitant arrives in the shape of a comely dame, aged about five-and-thirty, and her charming daughter of sweet sixteen—and oh! crowning joy! her juvenile son, some years younger. Sister, niece, and nephew to the thrice-blessed and sweet-voiced Mr. Cooper; and rejoicing in the name of Mrs. Mordaunt—pardon the omission, one the lady was never guilty of—Mrs. Captain Mordaunt—it was so on her elegantly embossed cards—Miss Juliet, and Master Augustus.

This delightful trio had come purposely to superintend the domestic economy of Mr. Cooper's Dulce Domum, to see after his creature comforts, and to help him to gather up the crumbs which fell from the Colonel's table. And well worth the gathering were these said crumbs. Hampers of wine from the cobwebby cripts; geese from the larder, and ducks from the pond; fruit, which Saunders sent accompanied with many a Gaelic sigh, and strange sounding words, which fell on the ear like a Celtic imprecation; flowers over which he muttered incantations in Glasgow classics, which, had he known how, would have turned them to thorns and thistles—but, alas! curses, like chickens come home to roost, and the sorely vexed gardener—in the main, a pious Presbyterian—was often heard, after these outpourings in unknown tongues, to groan from the fullness of an overloaded conscience, in good broad Scotch, "the gude forgie' us," or "the gude save us, sirs!"

But Saunders was not the only one who sometimes forgot good manners; for whispers began to arise in the course of a few months, and they rose and rose till they might be heard in almost every house in the village—that, if the Priory sent its good things to the agent's, it also sent the master to look after them. He was almost as frequently seen consulting Cooper down at his house, as the latter was attending him at the Priory. Some of the matrons of the place said, the Colonel came to look at his image in the youthful Augustus; others, that it was to partake of the delicacies his mother, that "neat-handed Phyllis," prepared; while a third set, who dealt in prophecies and second-sight, shook their heads; not the memorable Burleigh shake, for they spoke out—and, in a friendly way, very friendly indeed, advised Miss Juliet's mamma to look sharp after that innocent maiden.

However, Mrs. Captain Mordaunt proved her right to that warlike epithet by her clever military tactics; she despised them all, and their insinuations to boot—she braved them all—and her good-looking face outfaced them all—she snapped the fingers of her mind at every one of them; and had they been deeply read in the legitimate drama, and politely inquired, "Do you bite your thumb at us?" trust her for the reply—it would have been ready,—"I do bite my thumb!"

It was rather a singular coincidence, but one that was fatal to the efficacy and popularity of Dr. Vernon's sermon, albeit he preached as faithfully and as eloquently as was his custom, that the very first Sunday Mrs Captain appeared at church, leaning on her fond brother's arm, and followed by the two pledges of her departed and martial lord, the occupant of the Hermitage made his first appearance in public also. Some, I am sorry to say, every man jack of them women, actually half rose, to look at him. But he entered the Rectory pew, and was lost to their longing gaze by the envious curtains.

Never mind, fair daughters of Eve, if knowledge at one entrance is shut out, let it pour in at high-service pressure at another; and true to their inquiring nature, they did; for while Mrs. Templeton, Lady Dallas, or even any stranger visiting these families, might have escaped notice, sharp and minute was their criticism on the fair Mrs. Captain.

"Good heavens! she has two, four, actually five flounces!" "And how many breadths?" "I could not well make out; but, never mind, it sets out beautifully behind." "Is it whalebone or buckram?" "That is of no consequence, it is exactly like the last fashion picture." Such was the oracular fiat pronounced by that learned judge, the village dressmaker. And her mantelet, trimmed with real lace! And the tasty bonnet and its becoming ornaments so redolent of Paris—and the youthful Juliet, and her pink ribbons—and the elegant simplicity of the little dandy sailor son. Well, well; though some of the village dames looked as if they thought it the reverse of "well, well."

But what can keep the people so long in the church? usually the organist may shuffle over, or omit, the last half of his playing out; but today, what are they waiting for? However, he closes the organ and dismisses the exhausted bellows-blower—and by that time the congregation become aware of the aggravating fact, that the Rectory pew is empty! Yes, there is the beadle undrawing the curtains—"stupid old dawdle, not to have done it before!" and the stranger has gone into the vestry.

And how provoked were all these loiterers the next day, when Mr. Morton was seen quietly walking through the village with the Rector, who appeared to be pointing out to him various views and sites of picturesque beauty or interest.

And the black servant who had been a sort of bête noir to the ignorant rustics; and even among the tradespeople had excited a nine-days' wonder, proved to be a very common-place, matter-of-fact person, who spoke quite enough English to be pumped for information, but who said little that repaid the trouble; for all he told was, that his master was a widower, was rich, had traveled a great deal, and that his son, Master Victor, was at school in Germany.

Received, as he was, in a most friendly manner by the Rector, several of the neighboring gentry left their cards at the Hermitage—but though this attention was returned, and Mr. Morton frankly expressed his wish to be on social terms with those who had thus honored him, he smilingly alluded to his limited garçon-like quarters, as a reason for not accepting hospitalities which he could not return—but he owned, that when his son came to England, he should covet for him all the advantages their society offered.

It was well known that Colonel Templeton had rudely opposed his occupancy of the Hermitage; but as he remained, as Cooper never ventured to couple his name with any remark of an injurious nature, and, especially as the Colonel himself was far from being popular, Mr. Morton was allowed to visit or not as he pleased. And this liberty was the more readily accorded, as subsequent acquaintance proved him to be, in every respect, both the gentleman and the scholar. He was one who had seen life in many strange lands, and whose conversation was enriched by that knowledge which they, who have traveled and thought, alone can possess.

About a year after his domestication at the Hermitage, his son returned from one of the then little known continental colleges: he was another, and not less interesting study to the English country gentlemen; and apparently not to them alone—for as the handsome youth sauntered along the village high street, singing snatches of strange airs to words equally strange, many a pretty lass peeped over the little curtain, or ran to the door to look at him and his foreign dress—the blouse and leather belt, the lay-down collar, and the jet-black locks, displayed a little ostentatiously from beneath the small gray cap, that seemed scarcely to touch the well-shaped head—while the boys and men gaped and grinned as, by the skillful use of his Alpenstock, he flew over hedge and ditch, and cleared at one bound the rapid and silvery Brooke.

"He's a rare one," said the butcher's jolly wife, who had just taken his orders to supply his dogs regularly.

"He's an impudent young dog himself," replied her neighbor, the village haberdasher, shaking her head and laughing; "he came to choose a 'kerchief for his neck, and when Betsy turned to find a choice, what does my young gentleman do, but clear the counter at one spring—and who but he, rummaging among the ribbons and tapes."

"He looked very handsome though, mother, in that crimson one he took, and made me tie properly for him."

"Yes, yes, and took a kiss in return," remarked the old lady; "you shall keep to your sewing while the young hermit, as he calls himself, remains here."

However, as all he did was done so openly and frankly, and seemed so entirely the result of exuberant spirits and happy youth—for many a good looking matron had to complain of young saucebox, as well as the daughters—Victor was a universal favorite; all welcomed him with a smile, and no one thought there could be much to blame in one who was so often the companion of the Doctor, and the guest of Mrs. West.

It happened, one day, shortly after the arrival of young Morton, that Mrs. Templeton, having been to Sea-View Cottage, was returning through the grounds. She had walked on, for about a quarter of a mile, lost in deep thought—for the inroads that illness was slowly but surely making on Mrs. West had, during this visit, been painfully evident—when shew as roused from her revery, by hearing the words of a German song, which recalled to mind days long past; a remarkably sweet voice sang this in snatches, leaving off abruptly, to whistle to the birds; the sound of approaching steps, also, caused her to look back; when, within about twenty paces, she saw one of the handsomest youths she had ever beheld; but as he is already known to us, in two words we introduce Victor Morton to Mrs. Templeton.

Respectfully doffing his cap, and revealing by the act the fine head, and its glossy ornaments, he approached her, saying, "I fear I am unconsciously trespassing; but I am almost a stranger, which I hope will secure my pardon."

"You are within the precincts of the Priory private grounds," replied Mrs. Templeton, "but never mind that, we shall soon see some one who will guide you out, and meanwhile you are very safe with me."

"That I am quite sure of," he returned, bowing, and glancing at her gentle dark eyes. "My name is Victor Morton."

Pleased with his manner, though startled to think that the son of one who had already incurred her husband's displeasure, should be found intruding on his strictly kept property, she said, very decidedly, though she smiled kindly,

"You do not seem one I should consider a dangerous trespasser, yet, as Colonel Templeton is rather particular, I shall at once warn you out. Do you know Sea-View Cottage?"

"I spend half my leisure time there."

"Look then, between these oaks, there is the roof of the house; keep it in view, and you will find the gate; and as you visit Mrs. West, we shall be sure to meet again."

"I am glad of that," was the frank remark. She smiled, and shaking hands with him, they parted.

"Oh, father!" exclaimed Victor, rushing into a room where Mr. Morton sat composedly reading, "I have seen such a woman!"

"I hope, not the horrible 'White Lady,' who finds her way into so many of your German legends."

"Oh! no, quite the reverse," he replied.

"A black one, then? perhaps Juba's departed wife."

"Nothing like her, I fancy," said Victor, greatly amused at the difference between Mrs. Templeton and what he supposed the defunct Mrs. Juba might have been; "no, but I have seen Mrs. Templeton."

"So you did, at church."

"Hardly; and besides, that was very different from looking at her, and talking, and shaking hands with her, as I have done to-day; but you do seem surprised at last: the truth is, I wandered into the private grounds without knowing it. I met her, and we have made assignations without end, at Mrs. West's; now, father, what do you think of that?"

"I think, my dear boy, that you will find yourself in some scrape with your wandering habits; well for you not to have met the Colonel."

"Mrs. Templeton hinted as much; is he then so formidable?"

"I do not find him so, though I fully expected it, after his useless opposition to my residence here; still, you had better keep off his grounds till invited."

What might have been the temptation to disregard this warning, had Victor remained at Seabrooke, it is impossible to tell. But shortly after this rencounter he and his father left, and did not return for some time.

CHAPTER XVII.

"Look upon this face;
Examine every feature and proportion.
And you with me must grant this rare piece finished.
Nature, despairing ever to make the like,
Brake suddenly the mold in which 'twas fashioned"
MASSINGER.

Ever since Johnson's death, affairs at the Priory had gone a little crooked, and spite of the more frequent attendance of Cooper at the house, and the many conferences in the village, where, doubtless, the wisdom and experience of Mrs. Captain were of great use to the Colonel, scarcely a day passed without something happening which ruffled the serenity of that patient martyr.

Money, which had hitherto been always ready to meet every expense, suddenly became scarce; and it was remarkable how this invariably happened after any London or continental visit, so that even during Johnson's management he had hinted to Mrs. Dawson his fears that his master lost large sums at play; apprehensions which were confirmed by the conduct of the foreigners who had accompanied him to Seabrooke. Still, so ample was the real income, that these difficulties had been but temporary.

But it was different under the new agent's reign; the halcyon days of plenty seemed coming to a close, so frequent were the lowering and stormy clouds when payments were required; and as Mrs. Templeton was once driving about the property, she was surprised to see a number of trees marked, and a man busy doing the same thing to others. "What is this for?" she asked, and was told that Mr. Cooper had advised the Colonel to thin the woods. The last felling of importance had taken place under the direction of Johnson, only three years previously, and she remembered he had then said, a long time must elapse before cutting to any extent would be again proper; and on noticing more carefully those marked, she thought the greater part looked much too young.

Another lease also fell in, of one of the best farms on the estate, and again there was a dispute about increased rent—that demanded was plainly declared extortionate and unfair; words arose—Cooper interfered, was insulted and threatened, and the Colonel was compelled to listen to some very unpleasant truths before several of the servants, who had been summoned by their furious master to eject the daring offender.

The woods were, however, thinned, under the artistic superintendence of Cooper; money was ready, and again there was a lull.

The letter-bag, one morning, unfortunately, was the means of destroying this calm; it seemed to be a very Pandora's box of annoyances – so much so, that Mrs. Templeton, astonished and half terrified at her husband's manner, and at an ejaculation of surprise, almost of horror, which burst from his lips, inquired if he had received any ill news; a large packet containing various papers lay before him, while his trembling hands seemed scarcely able to hold any of them; his face was as pale as ashes, and perceiving his wife was approaching, he hoarsely desired her to remain quiet; by a powerful effort shook off his emotion, and collecting the contents of this packet, without another word withdrew to the library, whence he did not emerge till nearly dinner-time. His manner then was so extraordinary as to make her furtively glance at him; and though he scarcely tasted any thing, he drank glass after glass of wine, and she did not again see him till toward noon the next day, when he announced his intention of going at once to London, and gave Cooper various instructions, in lieu of a prolonged absence.

Henry Grantham at this time married, and chose for his bride a lady who, in every respect, was agreeable to his parents. Cecilia accompanied the newly-married pair on a short visit to Seabrooke, after which they all went to Italy, whither he was sent on public business. Laurette was at Craigalan, but had promised to travel south when Helen and Constance came home. Charles Vernon was engaged to Fanny Loftus, and Ashley had just begun his legal education in London; while Reginald hovered about, ready, so he said, for any mischief, because he had nothing to do; therefore his kind friend Ashley invented a sort of literary penance in expiation of this speech; and to prevent the prophecy from becoming true, put him, in jest, through a course of reading, to which the other applied in sober earnest.

Lady Dallas, thanks to a sweet temper, which never took offense at the truths that were uttered in kindness, had listened not only to the hints of Mrs. Vernon, but to her plainly-spoken advice, and had looked at her own character so courageously as to have recognized its many faults and weaknesses. Some she corrected—some she tried to correct—some she feared were incurable; but the result was, that to a very great extent, she entered cordially into the pursuits of her kind husband—found by comparing him with others—or one other—how excellent he was; and instead of gossiping about imaginary or trifling grievances, looked at the bright side of every thing and talked of it accordingly.

And so the sun went down, with a promise of rising in full splendor by the time that Mrs. Templeton's idols came home, to be placed on the pedestals her love had prepared for them.

And it was coming; it drew near—that happy, happy period, when she was to reap the reward of her patiently-endured sacrifice, and welcome Helen and Constance home—for they were to return together—such had been the reiterated request of Constance, that her mother had yielded.

How happy their lives had hitherto been! how careful had their worshiping mother shown herself, to surround them with all that was wise, healthy, and holy! how she had, without pity, analyzed her own character, tried to trace each fault, each weakness, to its cause, so as to banish it and its baneful influences from her children; and, to a great extent, how successful had her plans been—understood and improved upon as they were by Mrs Loftus.

Helen, who in appearance strongly resembled her mother—like her, also, though very gentle, possessed strong affections; she loved her doll, Gretchen, her bird, or Constance, and above all, her beautiful mother, with an intensity which was positively distressing, when loss or separation came; she had now, by her frequent and long absence from the latter, learned to bear these better, to anticipate them cheerfully, and, when they came, to meet them bravely.

Constance, beautiful as one of Raphael's angels, was like her father; she had the Templeton eye, with its haughty glance when offended; and the brow, so noble-looking in repose, could, like his, almost startle by its stern and determined contraction, when opposed; but her wilfullness was softened by her loving nature—her quickness to resent was tempered by her ready candor to excuse, and her generosity to forgive.

Both the sisters possessed minds of no vulgar stamp. Colonel Templeton, having an idea that his daughters, his heiresses, must marry into noble families, was carried by vaulting ambition a little farther, and beheld them the wives of ambassadors or diplomatists high placed in foreign courts—therefore his only injunction had been, "make them modern polyglots, elegantly bound;" and as linguists, they both, especially Helen, excelled.

But neither was a female Crichton—they were both well informed and well educated—natural enough to think with pleasure of balls, parties, or dress—and ready to accept any share of admiration, the world, in its goodness, might bestow.

Neither were they such novices to that world as girls in their station too commonly are. Independently of their occasional long visits home, when, if they did not see much society, what they did mix in was good, they were often at Lady Grantham's, where Reginald West and the two Vernons were frequent guests; and, as Constance reported, they had spent one whole and very gay month with Lady Sinclair during her stay in town; so that we hope it is proved that our pets are not exactly of the bread-and-butter school.

Mrs. Loftus had, for some years, by the successful termination of the lawsuit in her favor, been in circumstances which rendered her independent of pupils; but she did so love these sweet sisters that she never would part with them till they were claimed by their mother.

Caroline Vernon, who, wishing to share some of the advantages of being near town, had spent nearly a year with them, returned also, accompanied by Fanny Loftus, who was to be married so soon as Charles had every thing prepared to receive her as his bride.

The Priory was so extensive in its internal arrangements as always to have room for any number of guests likely, in reason, to accept its hospitalities; and a charming set of rooms, terminating at the angle of the conservatory which completed Mrs. Templeton's own apartments, was fitted up for her daughters.

Though the happiest visits the girls paid to the Priory were those when their father was absent, Mrs. Templeton knew too well what was right, to think or even to wish to estrange them from him; but so little interest did the Colonel show, that more than once, when his daughters had been summoned home for the express purpose of being with him, he would go away at an hour's notice, and perhaps not return till they had departed.

But when they did meet, he was invariably kind to them—generally indulgent and generous—he would praise their beauty, and predict that they would be duchesses; but here all stopped.

To Helen this conduct was painful—she would look sad and weep—to Constance it seemed contemptuous, and her eyes would sparkle and her fair brow contract, till, catching sight of the gentle, beautiful mother, she would rush to her, press her in her arms, and stamp her small foot or clench her little hand as if in defiance of some assailant, invisible to all eyes but her own.

And where is Gretchen, that brave, true-hearted German nurse? It had originally been arranged, when the children left home, that she should remain with her "Lieblinge," her darlings, for a short time only; but that short time had extended to within the two last years of their residence with Mrs. Loftus; and then she married one of her own countrymen, a watchmaker, who, with her savings, and the help of her attached mistress, was soon placed in easy and prosperous circumstances.

But curiosity is still unsatisfied; "What now, thou peeper and pryer into what does not concern thee?" "Where is Lord Hurstwood, do pray tell us?" He is at St. Petersburgh, where matters of state claim his attention and presence. His father, a selfish man, who disliked to have a son at hand to chronicle all his luxurious indulgences, or murmur at his ceaseless extravagance, at a very early age had, with Brutus-like fortitude, laid that son on the altar of his country—a species of patriotism not so uncommon as the careless observer thinks; he had banished him to foreign parts; had made him secretary, attaché, chargé-d-affaires, or any thing—that paid! He had exiled him, and made him an alien to suit his own purpose, and he died at a great age, without being soothed in his last moments by the voice of any one he loved; and he was buried without any one who loved him weeping over his coffin; for, as already related, his son did not return till some time after his death.

Strong and conflicting were the opinions pronounced upon him by his fair neighbors. Mrs. Vernon, with her accustomed freedom, called him too Chesterfieldian to please her; but that was equivocal, and might signify too elegant in manner, or too lax in principle. Mrs. Forrester was delighted with his aristocratic air and noble assurance, another ambiguous term. Mrs. Templeton thought his manner very pleasing and his conversation interesting, but she rather disliked the expression of his face, though that face was really fine and dignified; while Lady Dallar, to whom he had paid great attention, wondered how it was that such a man had remained so long unmarried.

But their liege lords said nothing, beyond hoping that, when he came again, if he meant to remain, he would bring a Lady Hurstwood with him.

And now the day dawns which is to bring to the mother's loving embrace her wished-for treasures, Mrs. Vernon having undertaken to escort them with Caroline. She and Mrs. Dawson, who almost idolized her lady, walked through their rooms, to give the finishing touches to what, the previous day, had been pronounced perfect.

A light tap—"come in," and Ruth, a young person who had been in Mrs. Dawson's training as their maid, entered with a basket of flowers.

"Saunders, my lady, sent these for the young ladies."

"Thank you, Ruth, and tell Saunders I am obliged to him for remembering their love of bouquets. Can you think of any thing else, Dawson?" she inquired.

"Really, madam, that seems impossible," was the reply; "nothing can be more elegant and comfortable; their dressing-rooms are exactly alike, and the favorite color everywhere; and then this beautiful bed-room and the French beds so pretty; and how pleased they will be to see your sweet face—pardon my boldness—looking at them directly they open their innocent eyes—" This was said in allusion to a copy of Mrs. Templeton's portrait, belonging to Lord Grantham, and which had been taken at his request before she married. This copy occupied the pier between the windows of her daughters' bed-room.

And now, Dawson having left her, again she looked round, and preparing to arrange the flowers in the luxuriously furnished sitting-room, she paused before a half-length portrait of Colonel Templeton. The original, a splendid full-length, size of life, was painted for the uncle who brought him up, a short time before his death, and when his nephew, about five-and-twenty, was in all the pride of his remarkable beauty. It now hung in the dining-room of the Priory.

She looked intently at the gay, smiling face—long and intently, till her gaze became hard and stern—she looked at it, as if, in imagination, she had summoned that handsome delinquent before, the bar of justice, to answer for the desolation he had wrought, and to listen to the recapitulation of her wrongs. She told of the love she had given, freely, unreservedly—said how it had been insulted, flung back, and destroyed; she numbered up the weary, lonely, sorrowful years she had passed; recalled the indignity and cruelty with which she had been treated; then she sank on her knees, and fervently prayed that her children, her innocent girls, might be saved from the consequences of her great mistake!

Mrs. Templeton rarely wept; but now tears fell fast, and when she rose, she was calmer.

CHAPTER XVIII.

"Well did Antiquitie a god thee deeme,
That over mortal minds has so great might,
To order them as best to thee doth seeme,
And all their actions to direct aright."

SPENSER.

"Oh, mamma! and are these indeed our rooms?" exclaimed Helen; look, Constance, at these lovely hangings—blue and white muslin—our colors—what a dear mamma you are!"

"And here, Helen, is a portrait of papa—how handsome he is!—and oh! Nelly, Nelly, look at the blessed angel that is ever watching us, even while we sleep—it is the very type of her love and care for us," continued Constance; and she rushed toward her mother, the old look of defiance in her countenance, and the attitude so suggestive of protection—though both seemed at this moment quite uncalled for.

"Dear mamma!" said Helen, kissing her cheek, "that is worth all the rest."

"Why, girls, you are as beautiful as Houris," said their father, when he met them, for the first time since their return, at dinner; "though, hang me! if I am quite sure which is Helen and which Constance."

"I am Constance," said she, advancing before the more timid Helen; "you will know me, papa, because I am like you, and Helen is so very beautiful."

"Not much difference as regards the witchery," he said, playfully tapping her cheek; "but I see, Helen has dark eyes, like her mother."

"And that is what makes her so beautiful," she replied, unconsciously increasing the resemblance to himself, by the flash and the frown—it was but for a second—still it was enough—he never afterward mistook them.

The first time the sisters left their home after this return, was to officiate as bridesmaids at Fanny's wedding; and a very splendid affair that was.

"Mamma," said Caroline, a few days after their return, "I sadly want your advice."

"Not another wedding," sighed the weary matron—to herself, of course. "What is it, my dear?" she asked aloud; "if I can not advise you, your dear father can."

"But it is a secret, and not for papa's ear."

"Mine is wide open, so begin," said Mrs. Vernon.

"I can not go so direct to my mark as I generally do—for it is not my secret—nor am I sure it is any one's," was the enigmatical rejoinder.

"Now, Carry, you are quite trying, and have no idea how my nerves are suffering—but seriously, my dear, have you any thing to reveal?"

"Yes," said Caroline, desperately; "mamma, I am afraid Mr. West is in love, and," speaking very fast, and looking very flushed, "I believe Helen is also!"

"Caroline!"

"Yes, mamma," nodding her head; "you may well be surprised; I was at first, and felt as if something had stopped my breath—of course you are the only one to whom I have mentioned it."

"You are a dear, good girl, and a great comfort to me," said her mother fondly; "I sometimes think, when I look around me, that I have more than my share of earthly blessings."

"But though I felt bewildered at first," resumed Caroline, too much interested in her discovery to attend to any thing else, "when I came more quietly to reflect on the matter, I laughed at my folly, for thinking there was any thing either alarming or uncommon in it. Fanny is not yet twenty, and she was engaged two years ago to Charles—Helen is nearly eighteen, and Mr. West—I shall no longer venture even to think of him as Reginald—is, I believe, twenty-two; so there is nothing so extraordinary in it, is there?"

"Not exactly extraordinary, my love," answered her mother; "still, like you, the idea makes me feel breathless; and yet—if it should be true—I think we need not dread any opposition. Reginald, for such he must still be to me, is heir not only to the title, but he is the adopted son of Lord Ernest West, who succeeded to the whole of his mother's large property—besides being distantly connected with the Templeton family."

"I am so glad I took courage and mentioned this," said Caroline; "I hesitated, because I fancied it might seem treacherous to read the looks of my friends, and then invent a history of their meaning."

"But I did not know they had very often met—how is this?" remarked Mrs. Vernon.

"They have been a great deal together at Lord Grantham's, where you know Helen and Constance often went, and where Ashley and Mr. West are great favorites."

"True, I quite forgot that," was the reply; while Mrs. Vernon was secretly thankful that her young barrister had not been studying the beauties of nature in Helen's face instead of the beauties of Blackstone in Russia leather.

After a pause, as her mother was too busy with this idea to speak, Caroline asked suddenly—

"Mamma, do you like Mr. West?"

"Much, my dear—his respectful love for his mother, his honorable sentiments and conduct whenever I have had an opportunity of observing him, have quite won my esteem."

"Ashley thinks he is very clever, and has often said it was a pity that he had no better or higher object in life than to wait for government patronage and his uncle's wealth. But then Ashley has such lofty and noble opinions—oh! there is not his equal," she continued, enthusiastically; "I have often looked around when a large party of us boys and girls have met, and I always came to the same conclusion, that Ashley was the handsomest and grandest of the whole set."

"You think him better-looking than Mr. West?" asked the proud mother, glancing at the animated and glowing brunette, the gentle image of this beloved brother, and anticipating with certainty and pleasure the reply.

"Decidedly—though, if Ashley were not my brother, perhaps I should hesitate."

Her mother laughed at this "most exquisite reason," and said, "Some would prefer Hubert Forrester or young Mr. Morton."

"Oh!" was the reply, with a slight gesture of contempt; "they are mere lads"—they were both, however, nearly twenty. "What Mr. Victor may be when he abandons his apologies for mustaches, cuts his hair like a Christian, and dresses like an English gentleman, I pretend not to know."

"You are unmerciful, Carry, and forget that it is our national prejudice which remarks these peculiarities; and, to be candid, I think them very becoming to him."

"Perhaps they are; and as he ranks so high in dear papa's estimation, there must be some sense under those waving masses, dark as the raven's wing. What a contrast to Hubert he is, both in appearance and character; for though my former playmate is as amiable as ever, he never will have the energy and decision of his new friend. But, mamma, what use do you mean to make of my state secret?" inquired Caroline.

"I shall feel bound to tell you directly I have determined; but before doing any thing which can not be undone, I must see the parties together."

"You have, dear mamma, for it was at the wedding that I made my remarks."

"True, child, but I was thinking only of Charles," was the mother's characteristic reply.

"I had a vague fear that if my conjecture proved true it would in some way interfere with dear Mrs. Templeton's pleasure at the return of Helen and Constance; and that is too sad to be quietly anticipated."

"Indeed it is, my love," said Mrs. Vernon; "therefore we will not dwell on the supposition."

"I never think of Mrs. Templeton without a kind of hushed feeling; such as we have in the presence of great suffering or sorrow."

"And no wonder," said her mother, very gravely; "it is the shadow of the skeleton, which so few houses are without, that produces this effect; happy, happy those, where, as with ourselves, it remains buried or almost unknown; and praised be His name who has thus blessed us!"

"Then, mamma, do you mean to say that, at the Priory, it is not so?"

"Alas! my child, I do; there it is visible to the eye of experience in all its hideous, undraped deformity—and startling with its perpetual presence—it is this which casts so sad a cloud over the face of our dear friend; it is this which is heard so often in the touching tones of her voice, which arrests the smile on her lips, and banishes the light of joy from her eyes. Caroline, when she married, she omitted to assure herself that truth and honor were among her husband's possessions. You are old enough, dear child, and discreet enough to hear of these things. And, oh! God grant that when you do love, it may be one you must also respect; or you had better be wedded to your grave!"

An opportunity was, shortly after this conversation, offered to Mrs. Vernon for making her intended observations, as the Colonel gave a large party in honor of his daughters' return. Constance, who was not quite sure that she was to share all Helen's privileges, looked upon this party as a kind of test, and therefore, more earnestly than usual, expressed her hope that she might be present. This happened one morning during breakfast, and while her father was with them, when he, much more promptly than was his custom, replied, "Certainly;" and on her referring to her mother for her sanction, the reply again was, "Certainly, if your papa wishes it."

"And I know he does; do you not, dear papa?" said she, caressingly.

"Do not try and make a fool of me, Constance," was the reply; but though the words were rough, not so the tone; and Constance, who was not easily daunted, replying, "No easy matter to do that," jumped up and kissed his forehead. To her surprise, he fondly returned it, and stroked her hair, saying, "A true Templeton—but mind, I govern."

"Oh! not in all things," was her gay retort.

"Does he, mamma?"

"Of course he does, my love," was the gentle reply.

"And do you not try, Con., my beauty, to dispute my wishes; for, by Jove! if you do, you will be beaten."

"Oh! fie! a gentleman and a soldier, and talk of beating a lady!" she merrily observed; when, looking at her mother, and then at her father, she was suddenly reminded of something which again brought back the look and attitude already more than once mentioned.

"Why, you beautiful imp," said the Colonel, infinitely amused at her boldness; "what do you mean by assuming that striking attitude? You only want a sword and shield to look the very image of a young amazon."

"Really, papa," she replied, laughing and blushing, "I can not explain it. I think," and she immediately became very grave, "I think it is something mysterious and supernatural. A long, very long time ago, when I was quite a wee thing, I had a very remarkable dream."

"Dear Constance," interrupted Helen, "what nonsense you are telling papa."

"Not such nonsense as you think, Nelly; but of that both papa and mamma shall judge, if they will lend me their ears."

"Oh, go on, pray!" said her father, eating his breakfast and glancing at the paper; "it can hardly be more strange or wonderful than to hear a cheerful voice here."

Scoffer! who had banished the cheerful voice, and trampled on the happy heart?

"Proceed, my love," said her mother, making an effort to appear insensible to the sneer.

"It is this," continued Constance, closing her beautiful eyes, as if better to see with those of the mind. "I dreamed that I was playing in some grand place—very grand indeed—and there was some one exceedingly beautiful, singing—and so sweetly—that I put away my doll, and stood at the side of this angel, who seems to have reminded me of mamma; but all at once, I can not explain how—you know how inconsistent dreams are—instead of music there were horrible sounds, and a fierce animal, in red, like flames, flew at the angel, and brandished some weapon to kill her, when, in a moment, I seemed to feel that I had wings, and I darted at this monster, and it disappeared."

There was a dead silence, as if they waited to hear more; and when Constance opened her eyes, she saw Helen with downcast looks and burning cheeks, the very picture of dismay; while Mrs. Templeton, with a calm expression, was collecting a few scattered notes.

Constance gazed with wonder at her sister, and was on the point of making some remark, for her father's face was completely screened by his paper, but a hoarse voice broke the uncomfortable silence by saying, "There, that will do—enough of this stuff;" and again the meal proceeded in quiet, for Constance felt there had been something mal-à-propos in her relation.

The version—or vision—which Constance had just given, though quite correct as to her impression, was only a kind of allegory of a fact—one that was neither mysterious nor supernatural. When a very little child, she was in the grand drawing-room with her mother, who was playing and singing to amuse her, when the Colonel, dressed in hunting costume, entered, and after some violent words—no matter for what—probably his own vile nature inciting him, had, in his unmanly fury, raised his whip, when Constance shrieked and rushed between them. Whether the unexpected appearance of the child, or the courage of the act, made him ashamed of his own cowardly movement, it matters not; but, as she now spoke, the whole scene was before him; that gentle, unresisting wife, and the brave little figure which flew to her protection. Well did he remember it all.

But would he, could he have struck her? he—the man who had sworn solemnly to protect and cherish her? Poor thing! poor thing! God only knows what she had suffered!

* * * * * * * *

"I fear you are not well, dear friend," said Mrs. Templeton, addressing Mrs. Vernon, when the ladies assembled after dinner in the drawing-room.

"My head is not quite comfortable," she replied, with more truth than can usually be said of these convenient head attacks—so often the excuse and alias for ill-temper—but in this case Mrs. Vernon had seen quite enough, when added to Caroline's information, to make her feel anxious—for, reason as she would about the suitableness of the match, she was not easy, and felt that it would be a great relief if she might impart her thoughts to Mrs. Templeton—but all was at present too vague, resting, as her impression did, upon those uncertain things—looks, smiles, and blushes; so that, when she examined her evidence, it amounted absolutely to nothing.

"How handsome they all look," said she to Lady Dallas, whose good temper was ever ready to echo praise.

"Yes, all of them," she replied, with pointed and kind emphasis; "that rich, half Spanish face," indicating Caroline, "contrasts charmingly with the brown curls and blue eyes of its neighbor."

"We require a Paris to assign the apple," said Mrs. Forrester, who was looking in the same direction.

"And, behold! Mr. West very aptly represents him," was the smiling reply of Lady Dallas, for several of the younger gentlemen had soon followed the ladies; "he seems to have no doubt as to which goddess deserves it;" and she pointed to Reginald and Helen, who were conversing at an open window.

"It is a divided allegiance then," pursued Mrs. Forrester, "for his looks are often cast toward the drive leading from Sea-View Cottage. I know he is anxious to see his mother's little carriage. Ah! there it is, I can tell by his smile, and they are going to meet her;" for Mrs. West, whose health had lately visibly declined, now appeared in society only for a short time, and was drawn up in her hand-chaise to the terrace.

"How stately he looks, now he is helping her out—and how gentle—if my sons resemble him," exclaimed Lady Dallas, "I shall not care how soon I grow old; need I?" appealing to Mrs. Forrester.

"Certainly not," she replied; "old age should be the repose and reward of the affectionate parent."

"I have a fancy," remarked Mrs. Vernon, "while acknowledging that every age has its blessings, though every one is not permitted to taste of them all—I fancy that age especially has them in rich abundance—of course, supposing a well-spent, though, perhaps, sorely tried, youth; to age, the past is a book, the contents of which have been thoroughly learned—whose lessons, uttered to the ear of experience, teach nothing so forcibly as the goodness of that providence which doth all things well—while the present, instead of being busied in schemes for the future, which may all end in disappointment, is used in humbly but calmly resting on those promises which fail not."

"Thanks, dear friend," said Mrs. Templeton, the only one whose disciplined feelings enabled her to reply; and then followed a brief silence, which was broken by her saying in a cheerful tone, "But do look at Mrs. West and her escort; Ashley and Hubert will certainly dispute her with Reginald—we shall have lances shivered before long."

"I fear there is sorrow for Reginald written on that fading face," remarked Mrs. Forrester, who had a singular regard for Mrs. West, quite irrespective of her connections.

"And so do I," replied Lady Dallas—she was not quite cured of all marplot habits, or she would have resisted the temptation to add, "but I hope he will find consolation in the fair one now by his side."

"Ah! indeed!" said Mrs. Forrester, now first roused to observe; "I confess you are more clear-sighted than I—but it is what Mrs. Templeton must expect."

"What must she expect?" inquired she, approaching, having left the group for a few minutes to welcome Mrs. West.

"Oh!" said Lady Dallas, "only what mothers, who have beautiful daughters, are generally prepared for—to lose them."

Mrs. Templeton turned pale, and following the direction of her ladyship's eye, saw at once what she meant; but she made no remark.

When her company had gone, and she was alone, she took courage to examine the foundations on which this new and unexpected terror rested—yes, terror—for in her idea, happiness and marriage were by no means either synonymous terms or inseparably connected. Hitherto she had blindly, or at least but partially, looked at the future in reference to her daughters; she must now open her eyes and see it as it really was—with all its possible accidents and perils—with all its certain trials, its insecure and fleeting joys—she asked herself if she had selfishly speculated on retaining her blooming girls by her side; of making them sharers in her dismal and hopeless lot; of desiring them to be dwellers with her, under that shroud-like canopy which excluded both peace and rest? She shuddered as she looked at this gloomy picture; and "oh no!" she exclaimed, "not for this have I watched and prayed so long; the same love that enabled me to send them forth from me before, must give me strength again to bid them depart; and though this separation will not have the hope of reunion, which then consoled me, it will have the hope of securing their happiness."

She then calmly passed in review all she remembered of Reginald's conduct from his youth—his devotion to his mother—his respect and gratitude to his uncle—the successful struggle he had made in yielding his own wishes to those of this relative—his gentle, yet fearless and energetic character—and she felt, that to such a man she could give one of her treasures, as sure as we may be of any thing on earth, that he would value and cherish the gift; and that the respect which such qualities as his were certain to excite in a kindred spirit, was the best guarantee for the continuance of the love which for the first time she suspected Helen felt; and she smiled to observe that, already, she had become so familiar with the idea, that she was hoping it might be true, for of her husband's consent she did not doubt; and thus satisfied on a matter of such deep importance, she retired to rest, after having commended all her dear ones to the care of that Being who never slumbereth nor sleepeth.

CHAPTER XIX.

"There is no life on earth, but being in love!
There are no studies no delights, no business,
No intercourse, or trade of sense, or soul,
But what is love!
B. JONSON.

"WHY, what a sleepless fellow you must be," was Ashley Vernon's morning salutation to Reginald, as the latter hailed his friend from his bed-room window.

"On the contrary, it is because I have slept so well, that I can afford to snuff the early air, and brush off this morning dew. I have come on a twofold errand; first to have a talk with you, and next to change these books," pointing to two of goodly size which he carried.

"What! have you devoured them already? You are more voracious than old Chronos—but you have been at your usual tricks, skimming them."

"If I have," replied Reginald, laughing, "I have all the cream safe at home, in my old common-place book, and some of these days, perhaps, I may churn it, and try to make it into something solid. But I must not stand here alarming your peaceful family—Ah! good-morning, Caroline; if I were a stranger I should infallibly perpetrate a compliment—quote Milton, and talk of Eve—but being the friend of many years, I shall merely say you look quite beautiful."

"And I thank you for remarking so common an occurrence," she replied, gayly, "as I fear it is often left quite unnoticed, till I go to the looking-glass. But what is Ashley loitering at the window for? of course you have come for some breakfast—and how is your dear mother? I thought she seemed quite in spirits last evening."

"My mother I have not seen this morning,—my hours are too early for an invalid; but, like you, I noticed how gay she was. I remember the time when a visit to the Priory used to depress instead of cheer the spirits; but somehow the case is altered now."

"Ah!" said Ashley, thrusting his handsome head out of the window, "now play the hypocrite, and pretend to be ignorant of the reason—but do not expect me to imitate your duplicity—it is because there are angels there now, whose visitings heretofore were short and far between."

Reginald colored crimson, which Ashley, who was still looking at him, observed, and quietly smiled—"I guess what he has come here to talk to me about, with those legal quartos under his arm—I suppose they will open of their own accord at the chapters on matrimony, wives, and marriage settlements"—then, after a thoughtful pause, he added, still to himself, "well, he is a true-hearted, noble fellow, and may be safely trusted with that gentle girl's happiness."

"A penalty, Ashley," said his father, after the usual greetings, as he entered when breakfast was began.

"Here it is, papa," said Caroline; "ready for him in the form of a cold cup of coffee; he has been pursuing his studies so assiduously before his glass, that Time fled by all unheeded."

"Oh! I leave serious literature to Reginald, while I pursue only the beautiful and ornamental," retorted Ashley; "look, sir," addressing his father, and calling his attention to the thick quartos, "at what he has been demolishing."

"Ah, indeed," replied Dr. Vernon; "points your taste that way? why, Reginald, you had better enter with Ashley, and read for the bar."

"There is nothing I should more gladly do, my dear Doctor; but you see I am not my own master. My indulgent uncle leaves me scarcely any thing to desire—certainly nothing that money can procure. I have, at times, hinted my wish to do something for myself; but he silences me by inquiring what he has omitted to do for me. Still, I am not sure, were there not another reason which now prevents me, if I should not venture to urge my wishes more strongly; though, when I have this appointment he talks of, it will perhaps make me busy enough."

"Ask him to give it you at once, my dear young friend," replied the Doctor; "emolument is, to you, of no consequence, but employment is."

"I feel all that very deeply, but I could not now accept any post that carried me from England; my dear mother's health is so delicate"—and a look of intense sorrow came over his brilliant and animated countenance—no one could contradict him, all felt that there was but too much cause for apprehension, when every week made the ravages of illness more and more apparent.

"Now, what have you to say to me?" inquired Ashley, when they were alone; "but to spare you embarrassment, let me guess—it is about Helen—am I right?"

"You are, but how did you make this discovery?" asked Reginald, in a tone of surprise.

"Only by the same tokens which rendered it tolerably evident to all who had eyes."

"Good heavens! you do not mean to say any indiscretion on my part—"

"As to indiscretions," interrupted Ashley, "we will not allude to them. Why, my dear fellow, I heard Lady Dallas remark on it, with her usual tact, to Mrs. Forrester; and to crown all, in the hearing of Mrs. Templeton!"

"Lady Dallas, of all people! how unlucky!" replied Reginald, looking very thoughtful; I must go at once to the Priory and see Mrs. Templeton; but do you really think she remarked any thing? I thought I was so guarded—"

"What she remarked or heard, I know no more, for certain, than what she thought; but disregarding Lady Dallas and her troublesome sharp-sight, what was your intention when you came here this morning?" inquired Ashley.

"To tell you the whole of what has been my thought and wish for a long, long time—and to consult you upon what was best to be done."

"And Mrs. West?"

"Oh! my dear mother heard all last night—we then settled that I ought, at once, to see Lord Ernest, of whose consent I have no doubt, and my mother wished to know your opinion before I set off."

"It coincides with yours; on no account must you go near the Priory till you go armed with your uncle's approbation. And, Reginald, let me make one remark: bring that consent in writing, it is more respectful, and on every account desirable. In short, you must make it rather a matter of importance."

"I then start without delay—yet there is a great temptation to stay. I heard them all arrange to meet here this morning, and—"

"You will do no such thing," said Ashley; "away with you immediately; you a lover! and delay procuring what must enable you to win the prize!—you forget the sooner you go, the sooner you return."

"You are right; but, Ashley, my tried, kind friend—" and Reginald laid his hand affectionately on young Vernon's shoulder, and looked full in his fine face—

"What now?" asked Ashley, with one of his smiles, so frank, so gentle.

"Am I a thoughtless, selfish old fellow, in coming thus to you?" he hesitated, and again fixed a searching gaze on Ashley.

"Be at rest, Reginald," replied the friend, so rightly named tried and kind; "you have no cause for fear or suspicion," and he met his glance steadily. "If I were a clergyman, I would now, at once if it might be, perform the marriage ceremony for you; but not being such, I shall be delighted to give your lovely choice to you whenever you need my services; does this declaration satisfy thee, thou doubter, or art thou going to quarrel, because I do not acknowledge thy lady-love to be peerless?"

"I am satisfied," was the reply, as he warmly shook Ashley's hand; "quite satisfied, quite happy," and he felt as if relieved from the weight of a dozen milestones; "but when I remember that I have loved Helen for years—yes, years—for it began with my deep reverence for her mother, when I was a boy at Eton; I wonder that you do not the same—but now adieu. I shall not write, but bring my tidings with me."

* * * * * * * *

"And, pray, where is that loitering Mr, West, as Caroline has set the fashion of calling him, who for so many years has been Reginald to us all?" asked Constance, as they sat round the Rectory luncheon table.

"I expect he is many miles on his way to Old Court," answered Ashley.

"Indeed!" exclaimed Caroline, glancing at Helen's face, and trying to divert attention from her glowing cheeks and downcast eyes; "he said nothing of this during breakfast."

"I hope Lord Ernest is not ill," said Constance, who seemed influenced by the very spirit of inquiry; "Mrs. West says he is a sad valetudinarian."

"Lord Ernest's life has been one that claims our sincerest sympathy," said Mrs. Vernon; "it has the remembrance of one dreadful loss thrown over it—a loss which to some natures is at once decisive in casting a gloom on all subsequent events."

"And yet," said Helen, "there are many who have trials greater even than his—though that is very terrible—but they do not, on that account, seclude themselves from the world; on the contrary, they mingle in it, and resolutely perform the duties it claims from us all—from the sorrowful as well as from the happy."

"Perhaps," said Caroline, "their circumstances will not allow of inactivity; sometimes the duties are so clamorous, they will not be neglected."

"All duties are clamorous," replied her mother, "if we did not persist in closing our ears to their importunity; and though all can not say, 'at your peril neglect us,' depend upon it, if they are neglected, they will be revenged."

"Still," said Constance, "we must make allowance for difference of character, for bodily health, for early discipline—do you not think so?"

"We may, but the neglected duty will not—at least, so I believe," said Ashley.

"How do you mean?" asked Helen, raising her gentle eyes to his earnest ones.

"I mean, that, in speaking of the vengeance, as my mother rightly calls it, of these ill-used duties, we do not consider, that punishment is as often administered by witholding blessings as by inflicting penalties. Without the impropriety of being personal, let us imagine a man who has neglected some duty—what shall it be?"

"His duty to a dear, self-denying mother," exclaimed Helen, with unusual vehemence.

"Or been treacherous to his friend," suggested Caroline.

"Or to his sister," said Constance with a smile at Helen.

"Very well; in either case he would lose the delight which invariably attends the performance of these duties; while, I may add, he would gain the troubled conscience which most vexatiously refuses to be comforted."

"Yes, yes, I see," said Constance, shaking her beautiful head, and looking very serious; "but, as Ellen says, it must be very dreadful to lose one we especially love, must it not?"

The remark was not addressed to any one in particular, but Ashley spoke.

"It must indeed!" was his grave reply.

* * * * * * * *

Mr. Morton and his son were so uncertain in their movements, and the business of the former so often carried him from the Hermitage, that the Paul Prys of the village had long ceased to trouble themselves about their proceedings; especially as these were often kind, always harmless, and wholly devoid of that soupçon of secrecy or mystery which is necessary to keep curiosity alive.

Colonel Templeton frequently met Victor, during some of the rambles in which the latter indulged; but, as he had hitherto always been alone, there was no excuse for accosting one whose air and manner gave no encouragement to freedom. One day, however, the Colonel was riding in company with Sir William Dallas, when they met Victor, and as the Baronet stopped to speak to him, he and the Colonel exchanged glances; and to the surprise of Sir William, who fancied there was a standing feud between the tenant of the Hermitage and the master of it, he said, "Who is that? is it Mr. Morton's son?" and before the rather slow Sir William could reply, Victor bowed and said very gravely, "I am Victor Morton."

"The son of the gentleman at the Hermitage?"

"The same."

"Then, by George!" said the Colonel. "he has as handsome an heir as any man need desire;" and quite regardless of the young man's cold looks or evident anger, at being treated with so little deference, he said—"Harkye, young sir, give my compliments, Colonel Templeton's compliments to your father, and say I shall be glad to see you whenever he will let you come."

A silent, but rather haughty bow was the only notice Victor took of this patronizing invitation, while, as he turned away, he muttered, "The consent of two must be obtained before I come." But on naming this rencounter to his father, the unexpected reply was, "Well, if he should meet you again, and repeat the invitation, accept it, by all means, if you like."

And they did meet, and the invitation was renewed, for Colonel Templeton was much too careless, and too great a lover of ease, to trouble himself about what never interfered with him or his plans. The original cause of the quarrel had lost its prominence.

It was, therefore, much to Mrs. Templeton's amazement, that they one morning entered the luncheon-room together.

"I have brought a stranger," said the Colonel; "give him a welcome."

"Not quite a stranger," she replied, shaking hands with Victor; "we have met at Sea-View Cottage, where Mr. Victor so often supplies Reginald's place. And as to the welcome, that, I hope, he is sure of."

There was a charm about Victor's manners which all felt, without being quite able to explain in what it consisted. It arose from the freshness and originality of his feelings and opinions, from his frank and prompt, but not intrusive confidence —from the absence of all affectation or studied arts. Quite unconscious that he differed from most other youths of his age, in having a range of ideas peculiar to his foreign residence and education, he was as much more interesting than the made-to-order lads of a mere classical academy, as he was superior to the duelling, smoking, beer-quaffing abominations who now infest every German university town.

Colonel Templeton seemed strangely fascinated with his new acquaintance, and as he himself could still be a most agreeable companion, Victor Morton thought himself in elysium, as he sat chatting with his charming hostess.

"What a glorious place this is!" he exclaimed looking on the noble expanse of lawn and park which gently sloped on one side toward the sparkling brook, and on the other was belted by some majestic trees which threw their deep and refreshing shade over the graceful deer that were seen here and there through the tall stems. "Look at the sun on those gigantic oaks, it has turned them into gold for catching its rays, Why, it is a 'Herzogthum' in itself!" and his looks still lingered on the varied beauties of the scene.

"Yes! here I reign supreme!" laughed the gratified owner.

"That of course you do," was the quiet reply; and he looked at the noble features and commanding figure before him; and then he added, as if à propos to the remark, "And there you are, reminding your vassals of you, when not present," pointing to his portrait.

As they left the table, Victor approached it nearer, for the purpose of examining it more accurately. "It is still very like you," said he; and then, in a simple, naive manner continued, "you must have been very handsome."

"You are quite a courtier," returned the Colonel; "the next time you come, I will show you a few choice specimens of painting, as you appear a lover of art: and do not let it be long before I have the pleasure of seeing you."

"And do you, Madam, echo the Colonel's kind invitation to come again?" asked Victor, respectfully appealing to Mrs. Templeton; "for, without it, I must resist the temptation." And as she quickly set him at rest about her sanction, with a volubility which seemed part of a sensitive and impulsive nature, he turned to Colonel Templeton and said, "Will you be so kind as to give me at once the card which will admit me to Hurstwood Hall? I have heard so much of some foreign paintings which are there, that I am anxious of seeing them."

And the Colonel, who was in excellent temper, really pleased with his young guest, gave him a note to the housekeeper, which would procure him admittance at any time.

These visits were frequently repeated; but Victor found that one of his golden idols had a more than usual alloy of base metal in its composition—which was always evident when it was brought into contact with the other—in plain language, Victor discovered that the Colonel did not treat his wife well—and, as he remarked to himself, "and such a wife!" This notable discovery he imparted to his father, at which, though he showed no surprise. Mr. Morton expressed great disquiet, while Victor declared he was more indignant than he could well express, muttering something about "ceasing his visits to the Priory."

"I must sincerely commend your warmth of feeling, my dear boy," said Mr. Morton; "but the only use you can make of this discovery is to avoid in yourself the indulgence of tempers and passions which you condemn, for you must not be Quixotic enough to make a feud of another's wrongs. I believe that to be always unwise—generally injurious to the one with whom we sympathize; and I should on many accounts be sorry that you ceased to visit the Priory. I think it does you good to be with so charming a person as Mrs. Templeton, irrespective of the advantage you derive from the society you often meet there; and I am truly sorry that we shall be leaving England before the Miss Templetons return from this wedding, which has prevented you from becoming much acquainted with them."

"And so am I, for I suspect that before our return, one, at least, will have been carried off."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, Miss Templeton, and a noble fellow he is who wins, if I do no mistake."

"Mr. West or Mr. Hubert?" asked his father.

Oh! not Hubert, he is a handsome, generous, spoilt only son," said Victor, laughing at this description of himself; "but no—no—he is not for Miss Templeton."

A very few days after this conversation, Victor went to the Priory, to pay his farewell respects previous to his leaving England; and addressing Mrs. Templeton, he alluded to the pleasure his visits there had afforded him, and expressed a hope, that on his return he should not find himself forgotten.

"No fear of that, my fine fellow," said the Colonel, who was always kind and friendly to Victor, even while offending him by his conduct to Mrs. Templeton; "and pray where are you going now?"

"For a few weeks to Germany; I expect afterward to meet my father in Spain."

"In Spain!" repeated the Colonel, with an evident change of countenance.

"Yes, have you any friends there? pray tell me. I should like to know them, and give them news of you and your family."

"Oh! no, I know no one there; but to what part of Spain shall you go?"

"I can not exactly say. We shall go most likely to various parts; perhaps you do not know that my father was a merchant, and has correspondents almost everywhere. One of my sisters, my half-sister, is named Inez, after some Spanish lady."

"Inez! my God!" exclaimed the Colonel, with a start that made his wife look at him with surprise.

"Yes," replied Victor, as if in apology, "the name does sound romantic and odd here, but there it is common enough."

"True, true," muttered the Colonel; but for all that the name seemed still odd to him.

"I am gazing my farewell to this sweet place," said Victor, as he turned from the window; and then looking intently at the Colonel, who stood by his portrait, he asked abruptly, "Were you ever in Spain, sir?"

"No!" boldly replied he; but catching the astonished look of Mrs. Templeton, he quickly added, "Oh! yes, with my regiment, years ago.

"Oh!" remarked Victor, "as long ago as that. And you have not been at Seville since?"

"No—yes—no, certainly," were the stammered and contradictory answers.

"It is very odd," said the youth, as if musing on something not quite clear; "but about two, say three years ago, I saw a gentleman so very like you at Constantina, which is only a few leagues from Seville; the resemblance was remarkable."

"That is extremely probable," said the Colonel, speaking quietly, but as if with difficulty; "I am not the only one like myself. And were you living there at that time?"

"Oh, no, we were merely on a visit to an old friend; my father has a talent for finding and leaving friends everywhere; but I remember that Englishman well—for he was English—though his name I never rightly heard; but old Dolores, one of the servants, drew my attention to him, by sending a very doubtful blessing after him."

Seville! Constantina, Inez, Dolores! why did these names wake a host of recollections in the Colonel's mind? Why was it as if a nest of adders had been suddenly roused to fury in his heart?

* * * * * * * *

Reginald lost no time, after having taken leave of his mother, in reaching Old Court, the name of the estate which Lord Ernest inherited from his mother; it was a charming but secluded place, situated on the borders of Wales, but its quiet and seclusion rendered it all the more valuable to her son, an amiable and kind man, but strong neither in mind or body

Reginald thought his uncle looking unusually ill; and remarked that a nervous restlessness had taken the place of his accustomed apathy and inertness. He, however, listened to Reginald's statement of his case with great kindness; promptly gave his consent, and talked of the arrangements he should make; but expressed a wish that there should be no haste, remarking that both parties were very young.

Reginald thought that the man who was old enough to woo should be considered old enough to wed; but on the other point he satisfied his uncle that there could not be any hurry, for he said his mother's health required both care and change of residence, and that directly this matter, regarding his settlement for life, which was so important to his happiness, should be concluded, he meant to accompany her to Harrowgate, a place strongly recommended by her medical attendant.

He hinted at the propriety of Lord Ernest writing to Colonel Templeton; but this his uncle so decidedly declined doing, and appeared so startled at the mere idea of such an effort, that Reginald could not make up his mind again to allude to it, though he well remembered that Ashley had thought it both important and desirable.

When he retired for the night, accompanied by the old butler, to whom he announced his intention of returning to Seabrooke the next day, that worthy man, who had known Reginald from a boy, smilingly hoped he was not taking a liberty in wishing him joy, for, he added, his Lordship had condescended to inform him of the cause of Mr. Reginald's short visit.

"Thank you, Roberts, thank you, old friend," replied Reginald, "but the battle is not gained, the prize not won yet; to have secured my uncle's consent is but the first, and, perhaps, the easiest step, and you will oblige me by not repeating any information you may receive; for a rejected suitor cuts but a sorry figure."

"Under favor, Mr. Reginald, you can never be either a sorry figure or a rejected suitor," said Robert, looking at the handsome young man before him; and adding, with a smile, "young ladies have eyes. But, sir, did you know that Mrs. Melville is here?"

"No; where is she? But I really have not time to call on her at present; and, indeed I do not see the necessity for her knowing that I have been here, as my affairs can not concern her."

"She will not learn that or any thing else from me," replied Robert, significantly; "but she has been here, on and off, for the last year, and I wonder, sir, you did not know of it. She has taken a cottage near Oswestry, and she and Miss are very much here."

"Well, Roberts, I understand what you mean; but she must see that that is a hopeless scheme, and I suppose she is now legacy hunting. I fear she will always be poor, but a few hundreds given her can not harm any one, and may settle her for life."

"Very true, sir, but I hope you will soon be here again. I think my Lord wants you, and to my mind he is far from being well or comfortable."

"I am truly sorry to have made the same remarks on his health," said Reginald; "you may depend upon my return as soon as possible; and now good-night, Roberts; my uncle has my permission to tell you any good news relating to me." He recalled these last words, the next morning, as he slowly rode from Old Court to meet the mail. "And will there be good news to tell?" asked Reginald. "What if Helen should not love me?" and he felt that the bare thought made him shiver and turn faint; "what if I have been an egregious coxcomb, and have taken it for granted that I have nothing to do but to ask and receive—yet Heaven knows that is not my presumptuous notion, and Helen must know it also. She must have seen how I have waited and watched for every trifling indication that I was not disliked; and she must surely pardon me if I have hoped and prayed that I might be loved, though even she does not yet know for how many years she has shared my love with my dear mother. If I have mistaken what is kindness and gentleness to all for a feeling that is more exclusive, God forgive me; but if so, life has but little brightness left for me." And as he felt more and more the necessity of ascertaining his fate, he urged on his horse, as if by so doing he could hasten the arrival of the mail; it, however, gave him time more calmly to anticipate the future, and he resolved, instead of encouraging gloomy apprehensions, to brace up his courage, and meet in a manly spirit what might be in reserve for him.

And are we to imagine that Reginald's manner, which drew upon him the sharp eyes of Lady Dallas, and caused Mrs. Templeton such deep thought, was unnoticed by Helen? by no means; though to her it was nothing so uncommon as to excite any thing but feelings of pleasure. If Helen had been asked by any one but the one, do you love Reginald West? it is probable she would readily and frankly have answered in the affirmative; and it was not till she heard at the Rectory of his second visit to Old Court, so immediately after their last meeting, that she became conscious there had been more than usual tenderness in his tone and manner, and that from his eloquent eyess he had received fair, speakless messages, which she now, for the first time, though without either astonishment or apprehension, read to mean love! But when a thousand circumstances, light as air, came thronging into her memory, combined with this unexpected absence, Helen began to think more seriously of the influences the last few months had left. During that time, almost every day had brought her and Reginald together; till, following up the examination, she found the days that had not, had never, to her, been so happy. She now saw this state of affairs could not last, and she understood immediately why he had gone to Old Court. And then she asked herself the solemn question, did she love Reginald enough to become his wife—to trust him with her happiness—to share his fate? and her heart emphatically replied that she did.

Happy Helen! to her all seemed now settled, and she could peacefully await his return; for not a doubt of his love darkened the brightness of her trusting affection. And as to distrusting his worth, there was treachery to him in the mere surmise. Oh, no! he would speedily return, and then their happiness would be shared by those they both so truly loved.

"Mother, dear mother, congratulate me," cried Reginald, kissing with extreme tenderness the pale face that was raised on his appearance, after his journey, for he had preferred being his own messenger; "so far all is well; my uncle is most kind, and though I must not say he was enraptured at my request, he promises all I can desire."

"Heaven be praised for that," replied Mrs. West; "and now, dear Reginald, what is the next step? for though it has been very difficult to do so, having seen so much of them all, and received hourly kindness from them, I have faithfully kept your secret."

"I shall go at once to the Priory and learn my fate from the Colonel and Mrs. Templeton, and then, oh! they must, they will consent; then, see Helen, the most important, though the last."

"Then go, my son, and may your affection to your mother be rewarded by your winning the love of that dear girl."

Reginald set off at once, far too much excited to rest till he knew his fate; and he had very nearly reached the last terrace walk, when through the shrubbery he saw a lady's dress fluttering. Though he had decided on first speaking to the Colonel, various impressions which he had received, and many well-known facts he had heard of his character, now made him hesitate about the wisdom of paying him this mark of respect; and resolving to see who this was, and, if Helen, ascertain her sentiments at once, he followed the fluttering drapery, and saw that it did belong to her.

His heart beat and his face flushed as, quickening his pace, he approached, and, as calmly as he could, greeted her; but something in his manner was contagious. She visibly changed countenance, while her agitation deprived her of all self-command, or assuredly her first words would not have been, "I thought you were at Old Court?"

"I have been there, and have but now returned; and oh! Helen," he continued, in a tone of touching entreaty, "if my errand here, at this moment, be but as successful as my mission there was, what will there be left for me to desire? Helen!" he said, gently taking her hand, "I went there to tell my uncle that I love you; he was pleased to hear it, and gave me his blessing. I now come to tell you that I love you—though how deeply, you may, perhaps, never know. Helen! dearest Helen! what will you do?"

"Do the same," she whispered, lifting her loving eyes fearlessly to his beaming face.

And what was his reply? Why, a rapturous kiss on the now drooping lids, and another on the sweet mouth, while he softly said, "Helen! my wife?"

"Yes!" she answered; then, after a pause, which neither cared to break, she said, "But, Reginald, my father!"

"I shall see and speak to him forthwith, and Mrs. Templeton also. I leave you for a short time for that purpose."

And proudly did the young lover traverse the terrace and seek the Colonel, whom he fortunately found at home.

Colonel Templeton expressed much surprise at the object which had led to the interview, for he owned he had never once thought of such a result; he, however, very readily gave his consent, provided Lord Ernest performed his promise with respect to settlements, of which his nephew had not the least doubt; and, in his present flow of good temper, he wished Reginald joy, but he never once asked whether Helen was likely to ratify the contract, nor did he allude to his wife, and under these circumstances, Reginald did not think it necessary to inform him that his daughter's consent had been already obtained. All the Colonel said, was, "There, now go and see where they all are, and then return to me, and let us talk over the matter quietly."

Helen, after Reginald left her, crossed the flower-garden more like a somnambulist than any waking, thinking being. She mechanically ascended the stairs, till, on reaching the corridor, the voice of Constance was heard accompanying the piano, by which Helen knew she was not with her mother.

Quietly passing their own rooms, she stopped at the door of Mrs. Templeton's boudoir, and, tapping, entered. She glided rather than walked toward her mother, who looked at her very anxiously, attracted by her strange manner; then, falling on her knees, she took her hand, saying, "Mamma, give me your blessing."

"Helen! what means this, my love?"

"Reginald loves me, dear mother, and I love him, oh! so much, so much, and so long!" and a flood of tears relieved both herself and Mrs. Templeton, who had begun to feel alarmed, as she had no idea of Reginald's return and visit to the Priory.

"My dear child! my precious Helen! what is it all? tell me, tell your mother!"

"Oh! send for Reginald," she replied; "he is with papa—he will tell you."

"Remain here quietly till I return," said her mother, leading her to the sofa, and then proceeding to Constance, she, in few words, told her suspicions; and before the latter could well recover from her astonishment, they heard the door of the library open and close, when Mrs. Templeton begged her to seek Reginald, and bring him to her boudoir.

"Now, Helen," she said, as she returned and seated herself by her daughter, "Reginald will soon be here. Shall I see him alone, or will you be present?"

"I will be present, and Constance, too—all I love best, come together. Ah! dear Constance," as her sister entered, leaning on Reginald's arm, which she quitted to embrace and caress Helen, while he, approaching her, said, "Helen, your father consents. Dear Mrs. Templeton, will you take me for your son? Constance, may I be your brother?"

"Oh! Reginald, how happy I am!" she replied, though her tears seemed to contradict her words; and perceiving that her mother looked pale, and, as if struggling for words, she said to her, "Dearest mamma! you hear he does not ask you to give him Helen, but to accept him. Will you not, dearest, and let me henceforth have a brother to pet and love?"

"Very readily, indeed, do I accept you, my dear Reginald, as my son, and may we all, as long as we live, remember this hour with gratitude. But, Constance, we must now seek your father and thank him;" and both having affectionately shaken hands with Reginald and congratulated him, they left the two most deeply interested in this case, and turned toward the stair head. But Constance, gently putting her arm round her mother, led her into her own pretty dressing-room, and placing her in an easy chair, she drew a footstool close to it, and sat at her mother's feet in perfect silence.

After a few minutes thus spent, Mrs. Templeton asked, "Constance, what is it?"

"Mamma, I do not think I shall advise you to seek papa; he ought, on this occasion at least, to have sought you; so let me rule this once."

"Be it so," was the assenting reply; for, in truth, when Mrs. Templeton proposed seeking her husband, it was a mere excuse for leaving the room, as she correctly anticipated, that though they might both consent to this marriage, their reasons for so doing would, if examined, be found widely dissimilar. She knew that even on this interesting occasion, as in all other matters, there would not, there could not, be the least sympathy between them; and, therefore, yielding, very readily, to the wish of Constance, they sat and discussed, what to Constance was a most unexpected event, for more than an hour; when Helen entered to say that Reginald wished her to go with him to see his mother.

"Dear Helen!" said Constance, smiling and embracing her, "this will make no difference with our love; it will be as great and as strong as ever:" but there was a tone, a very faint tone, of sadness in her voice.

"Quite, sweet sister! my heart is very large, and has plenty of room when love knocks and introduces a guest. Reginald usurps no one's place, dearest mamma!" and she threw her arms fondly round her mother, who silently pressed her to her heart in a long, loving caress.

Ah! how happy was this first walk taken together by Reginald and his Helen! How delightful the idea that the cherished one by his side loved him—was his—about to be his wife—that he was now taking her to his mother, and with her would receive that mother's blessing.

And how solemn! how fervent! how loving was that blessing, as pronounced by the mother, on him who to her had ever been the first of earthly gifts; on him who had so richly repaid her love; and then, when she turned to that fair girl he had now brought with him, scarcely less tender was the prayer for her—for her who was henceforth to be the light and joy of her son's existence. She knew full well that, as regarded herself, the place that now knew her would soon know her no more; and earnestly did she entreat that they might be both blessed, when they went out and when they came in, and that love from on high might sanctify their union, and be theirs till the end!

CHAPTER XX.

"————How the innocent
As in a gentle slumber, pass away!"
MASSINGER.

"WHEN all the bustle and excitement previous to this wedding, and the wedding itself, are over," said Dr. Vernon, a few months after the engagement had been made public, "I think I shall take the opportunity of having some needful repairs done to the church and the Rectory; my diocesan has given me six months' leave of absence. I shall procure a substitute; and as the school-rooms have lately been put to rights, service can be performed in them."

"But the time for the marriage is not yet fixed," observed Ashley, who had been one of the earliest and warmest in his congratulations to his friend; "and I can not help wishing that Lord Ernest were a little brisker in his movements."

"Hear the gentleman of the long robe condemning delay," cried Caroline, with a laugh; "why, I thought delay was the motto of your profession?"

"Prejudice, my dear sister, or, properly speaking, vulgar ignorance, alone says that," replied Ashley; "the injustice of some, the falsehood of others, the unreasonable expectations of a third, in short, all the follies and vices acting on a litigious spirit, array themselves against speed and progress, and then accuse the law and the lawyers. Who and what make lawsuits? the fraud or avarice of clients, not lawyers; and I will no more suffer them to be abused, because some are knaves, than I would permit the clergy to be branded as hypocritical and grasping, because there may be found Tartuffes and Harpagons among them."

"Well said, Ashley," exclaimed the Doctor; "and I thank you; for there is no profession or trade either which has not its dishonorable members; and if these formed the majority, they would soon destroy it altogether. But while the good and bad are mixed, though the former ever preponderate, let us be merciful, and, above all, by our conduct try to honor that profession to which we respectively belong."

"I see I am expected to cry culpa mia," said Caroline, taking her brother's arm; "and I do most humbly; but this does not hasten Lord Ernest, nor accelerate the preparations for the wedding. I really believe, if dear Mrs. West had her way, it would take place at once; but that, of course, can not be."

"I fear, my dear father," said Ashley, "that Reginald will have to mourn before he rejoices. Lady Dallas, who has recently spent a few days near Harrowgate, speaks of Mrs. West's case as quite hopeless, though she says that Reginald seems strangely blind to the rapid and alarming change."

"Our affections are most deceitful guides," remarked Mrs. Vernon; "sometimes we see, or fancy we see, virtues and excellences which have no existence; at other times, we appear to be bereft of all sense, and can neither see nor hear what the heart shrinks from acknowledging, though it is most glaringly the truth."

* * * * * * *

"Have you heard the report that Lord Hurstwood has returned from St. Petersburgh, loaded with honors?" asked Hubert Forrester of Lady Dallas.

"No! when and where did you hear of it?"

"I called at the Priory this morning to ask after Mrs. West, about whom my mother is much distressed. I there saw Miss Sinclair, who had received the news from one of her correspondents."

"Did she say whether he is expected at the Hall?" inquired her ladyship.

"She said it seemed doubtful; the report is, that he intends to visit his Irish estates first, and the same report goes on to say, he means to repose on his honors, and marry."

"How very odd of him never to have married before;" and thinking of her daughters, Lady Dallas said, "pray how old is he?"

"About seven or eight years younger than the Colonel; perhaps forty-three or five, perhaps not so much," answered Hubert, to whom he seemed quite an ancient.

"Oh! not so very old, after all," said the speculating mamma; and she quickly did a little bit of mental arithmetic to this effect: take fourteen—the age of the eldest daughter—from forty-three, we will say three, for the sake of the argument—how many remains? answer, twenty-nine. There is no disputing figures, they are so obstinate, so always the same; and do the sum as she would, the answer was, twenty-nine! so she decided that there was a difference in age—his lordship was too old; and, turning to Hubert, she asked, what had been the reply to his inquiries after Mrs. West?

"She is very bad—no hope—I only saw Miss Sinclair," he said.

A few days after this conversation, the rumor respecting Lord Hurstwood was confirmed by his appearance, but only for a very brief period.

"Mrs. West's health, I understand, will prevent any party being given at the Priory in honor of his Lordship's return," said Lady Dallas to Mrs. Forrester; "but Sir William has an invitation to a large dinner party, of gentlemen only, at the Hall."

"So has Mr. Forrester and Hubert. Miss Sinclair told me yesterday that the last accounts of Mrs. West, though rather better, are still very distressing; this is a sad interruption to prospects which seemed so bright and happy."

"Of course all talk of the wedding is now stopped; but, in the event of her death, will it be postponed for the whole term of mourning?" inquired Lady Dallas.

"I apprehend not; but my informant is always either Miss Sinclair or Constance, for poor Helen is sadly depressed; and Constance told me that Mrs. West had exacted a promise from her son that the ceremony should take place quietly, as soon after her death as was at all consistent; for he is now quite aware that recovery is hopeless."

Poor Reginald! at length the blow fell—the silver cord was broken—and, one sad and true mourner sat in the darkened rooms of that silent house, feeling all the bitterness of desolation; and for a time he refused to be comforted.

Ashley Vernon—that true friend—left all, and went to him. Helen wrote to him, and her letters at this time were his chief consolation. Mrs. Templeton, Constance, all the kind hearts at the Rectory gave him the full tribute of their sympathy; but while weeping with him for his great loss, his old friend, Dr. Vernon, reminded him that he was not to sorrow as one without hope, and recalled to his memory the many blessings still left to him; one loan, it is true, had been reclaimed, but how many were still left!

CHAPTER XXI.

"When sorrows come, they come not single spies,
But in battalions." Hamlet.

Sea-View Cottage, which, before Mrs. West's death had been occupied by the gentleman who was to supply Dr. Vernon's place during his absence, was now engaged by him for several months; for as it was clear that, at present, there could not be any wedding, the Rector had decided on taking his departure; and preparations were made, about a month after the death of Mrs. West, for the whole family to leave.

They meant first to visit Charles, and then to see other friends, who put forth claims of many years' standing; and as their absence would be for six months, they hoped, on their return, to find that peace had again settled on the hearts that had been so recently and severely pained.

Reginald had paid a hurried and unsatisfactory visit to Old Court, and on leaving it, his uncle insisted so strenuously on his taking a check for a thousand pounds, in order, as he said, to pay any debts—though Mrs. West had never exceeded her income, and Reginald's allowance was really munificent—that he felt quite embarrassed at this new proof of his uncle's generosity.

A fortnight at the Priory did much to restore his over-tried spirit, and then Ashley and he went to make a Highland tour, including Craigalan, to which place they had been most cordially invited. All these arrangements were sad contrasts to the gayety which had been anticipated; but amid the sorrow and desolation which he so keenly felt, Reginald had the inexpressible comfort to find, that Helen, she whom he had chosen as his partner through life—his partner in woe as in weal—was fitted for that duty; it was her sweet voice that spoke of submission, of resignation; it was her assurance that his she was and ever would be, that made his heart open to happiness, and sustained him in his deep distress.

Constance was at first vehement in her expressions of grief; but when she looked at the calm face of her mother, and fancied that it looked sadder and paler than usual, she shuddered, and the thought flashed across her mind, that the destroying angel might lay its icy cold hand on that loved head, and thus rebuke her rebellious spirit; therefore she no more let it be seen that she needed consolation, but administered it to those who had been more sorely tried than herself.

Colonel Templeton had been so indifferent about his daughter's marriage, though when it was alluded to he always expressed his satisfaction, that his insensibility now was nothing remarkable; but the silence and sorrow impressed on all around seemed sometimes to annoy him; and then he went to consult Cooper—almost his shadow—or shut himself up with letters which seemed greatly to interest him—or went to town, where he had business with Mr. Sloper, his lawyer.

Cecilia Grantham, who was still in Italy, wrote to say, that gay or sad, in black or white, Helen's bridesmaid she must and would be, and desired to have timely information of her services being required, so as to settle for her departure.

Laurette, who had been visiting the Westroughs, remained in England for the same purpose, as it was understood Mrs. West's wishes would be respected as to hastening the marriage; but as she had no taste for any thing dismal, she availed herself of Mrs. Forrester's invitation, and made Forest Hill her head-quarters, in preference to the Priory. This arrangement answered a double purpose—first, there was no reason why she should eschew society, because Mrs. West had died; and secondly, she should be in the same house with Hubert Forrester; whom, though younger than herself, and who had hitherto been strangely insensible to the fair Laurette's many attractions, she had resolved to win. That his parents would approve of the match she did not the least doubt; for, in every respect, she came up to the standard they had established as necessary to their daughter-in-law—rich, well-born; connected in Scotland with names of historical note; in England, all her relatives, if not among the nobility, were not far removed from that desirable pale—what more could they look for? She also knew that her manners were such as pleased the proud, fastidious Mrs Forrester—dignified, quiet, elegant—with just as much of accomplishment as prevented her from ever being overlooked—and quite as much information as enabled her always to command attention.

Mr. Forrester had more than once alluded to hereditary friendships; and was pointed in that nicely-balanced manner which, while it avoided marked neglect of any one, showed, toward her, particular attention.

But what said Hubert? who, all unknown to his parents, was the autocrat to whose will—and to whose whims also—they bowed? At present he evinced the most amazing indifference to her society and her talents. Certainly, while she was at the Priory he rode over there every day, but this he continued to do when she left.

But Laurette had not read one of our most clever female writers* in vain; "Propinquity, propinquity, my dear Laurette," said she.

Hubert Forrester was, in truth, a very dangerous young man as companion to any young lady who had a heart to bestow; and this Laurette was not peculiar in discovering. That well-dressed damsel, about whom we have been unpardonably silent, the lovely, modest, retiring, blushing Juliet Mordaunt, on this point entirely coincided in opinion with the haughty, aristocratic Laurette Sinclair; only she had in her artless way improved on her rival's plan. She had not pined in thought—no green and yellow melancholy disputed the place of the lilies and roses on her fair cheeks, and she did tell her love, as plainly as "nods and looks, and wreathed smiles" could—and, will it be believed? but believed or not it is still a truth, that the handsome young heir of all the Forresters, and all the Hargraves to boot, carried on a desperate flirtation with this gentle Juliet. He was at the pretty little residence of Mr. Cooper at early morn, and again at dewy eve; he called there to leave flowers—ah! beware of the thorns! and he called again to fetch flowers—beware lest he carry away all the heartsease, and leave only rue! But as her matronly and prudent mother was cognizant of all this, why make it our business—we will not.

* * * * * * * * *

A few days after Ashley and his sorrowful friend had started for Scotland, and about six weeks after Mrs. West's funeral, a letter arrived at the cottage for Reginald, which the young clergyman sent up immediately to the Priory. It was directed to be forwarded; but having already been more than twice re-addressed, the original post-mark was not very legible. Again it was sent on to Craigalan, with Helen's daily dispatch; but here it awaited the travelers two days, their progress not having been so easy as they had expected.

On their arrival, after receiving a most cordial welcome from the Sinclairs, Reginald seized his letters, the precious ones from Helen claiming precedence—yet, with a lover's jealousy, receiving this homage in private; to him it seemed profanation to open them while any eye might detect the feelings her sentiments of love and truth excited. Having read and carefully laid these aside, the traveled letter had its turn; but no sooner had Reginald made himself acquainted with the contents than, rushing toward Ashley's room, he burst in, with a face as pale as ashes, and, in a voice trembling with anguish, exclaimed—

"All is lost—read that fatal letter, which has been so deplorably delayed."

Ashley did so, and as he read, and comprehended the importance of the tidings it conveyed, he rang the bell repeatedly.

"Post-horses directly—detain our carriage—four horses as quickly as possible," he said.—"Reginald, remain here, while I apprise our host of this news, and of the necessity for our immediate departure."

But Reginald seemed stunned, and Sir Archibald, whose dismay was little less than that expressed by his two young friends, hastily entering, said—

"Command my whole establishment; a carriage-and-four shall be immediately at your service;" and, taking Ashley aside, he whispered, pointing to Reginald, "He must be roused, Mr. Vernon, or he will destroy the faint hope that still remains."

"I see the necessity for exertion," replied Ashley, with a face full of commiseration; and, taking Reginald's hand, he said:

"For Helen's sake, if not your own, rouse yourself, dear Reginald."

"Yes, any thing for Helen's sake—but no longer my Helen—lost, lost to me forever," exclaimed the wretched lover, in tones of agony. "Yet why should I struggle against my fate? Leave me—let me die—since all I love are taken from me;" and he buried his face in his hands.

"You must struggle, because it is not your fate yet," cried Ashley, roused to double energy in this trying emergency. "I tell you, Reginald, it is not too late. Heaven grant that this may be true," he added, in a lower tone, to himself. "Look up, my dear friend, and listen to me; we can reach Old Court in four days, and this warning, in spite of these vexatious delays, may yet have arrived in time. One effort, my dear fellow, and then on without stopping."

"You will allow me to accompany you one stage," said Sir Archibald, kindly. And he did so, and was glad to perceive that the excitement and hurry had slightly influenced Reginald, who began to catch hope from his companions, and was now as eager to push on as Ashley was.

But Sir Archibald showed that his hope was, in reality, very faint indeed, for, as he pressed Ashley's hand at parting, he said:

"Look after all the English papers, and keep them from Mr. West until you have scanned their contents."

* Miss Edgeworth.

But, alas! at Carlisle, Ashley had just left the room to hasten fresh horses, when the landlord, who was not every day honored with guests who traveled in a carriage-and-four, officiously handed Reginald the paper, which he received with much apathy, and, merely glancing at it, laid it down, when a paragraph, headed "Marriage in High Life," arrested his attention. He read one line, and fainted.

"Poor young gentleman!" said the landlady; "he is over-tired; he requires rest instead of four horses." And if he really did need rest, he had it, in one sense, abundantly; for when he next became conscious of any thing but chaos within chaos, of a sort of maddening whirl from which there was no escape, he saw the kind face of Mrs. Vernon by his bedside, but every thing else was quite strange. Happily, she perceived the faint expression of recognition in his heavy eyes, and said:

"Do not speak, dear Reginald; you are among friends, and are much better." She need hardly have prohibited speech, for he was much too feeble to make an effort; and, sighing heavily, he again closed his eyes, and thinking it was very pleasant to die, fell into the first gentle sleep since his illness.

"God be praised!" said Mrs. Vernon, an hour after this, as she still sat watching him; "he is surely much better, at least out of danger, doctor"—as a neat little man glided in—"he has recognized me, I am sure, and we may now hope—may we not?"

"Yes, I think we may," as he removed his eyes from the wan and worn face lying so death-like there; "I trust we may; but the nervous system has received a dreadful shock—I should say that this has been hovering over him for some time."

"I believe you are quite right," replied Mrs. Vernon, thinking that with doctors, as with confessors, there should be no secrets; "this gentleman was engaged to be married, when his mother, whom he fondly loved, died; and some news, which may change the whole of his prospects in a most disastrous way, was suddenly communicated to him, when quite exhausted with fatigue and anxiety."

"Ah! I perceive; a series of adverse circumstances, with love, of course, helping to aggravate them. Well, my dear madam, patience and ease will do wonders. I expect these will now be chiefly in demand; and with such a nurse as you, and such a friend as Mr. Ashley Vernon, they will not fail; and I think I may venture to say, in a few weeks he can be safely moved to the Parsonage."

CHAPTER XXII.

"L'usage ordinaire de la finesse, est la marque d'un petit prit; et il arrive, presque toujours que celui qui s'en sert, ur se couvrir en un endroit, se découvre en un autre."—A ROCHEFOUCAULD.

MRS. MELVILLE, of whom incidental mention as been made, many years ago was a young lady ho lived by her wits, giving that word, not the intellectual definition of Sydney Smith, but using it to imply the exercise of a quality which is composed of intense selfishness, great meanness, and profound cunning. It is useless for any one to remind us that she was poor—for poverty no more justifies conduct such as hers, than it does lying, swindling, or stealing. The trouble she took to cajole, wheedle, and dupe some foolish but untractable victim was much greater than if she had worked hard for a living; while the real intellect which was wasted and degraded in bringing her schemes to perfection would, if honestly exerted, have secured for her a respectable position in society, and gained her the esteem of her associates. Talk of the humiliations of poverty, its toils and its privations! Talk of the watching and disappointment to which talent is often doomed! Why, they are as nothing compared with the self-imposed labor, the self-imposed abasement of a cringing parasite! At length, in an evil hour for the family of her patroness, Rachel Tod was introduced to Miss Dormer, the lady to whom Lord Ernest West was engaged.

Here her talent for intrigue found its proper sphere. She speedily embroiled the lovers, and though a reconciliation took place, the feeble health of Miss Dormer, which, during the estrangement, had suffered greatly, evinced symptoms of decline, which, after many alternations and much patient endurance, terminated in her death.

What had been Miss Tod's object in thus risking the loss of one who was a mere puppet in her hands? Surely it would have been more to her advantage had she, by kindness and sincerity, established a claim to the friendship of one who was so easily influenced through her affections, and of whose generosity she had received so many substantial proofs? As if Miss Dormer's friendship, or the patronage of Lady Ernest West could have satisfied the newly-roused ambition of Rachel Tod! No; she played for a higher stake; she played for Lord Ernest himself, whose vacillating and feeble character was as clearly written on all his acts, to her keen eye, as if he had been one of those preposterous figures who go about incased in advertisements; for even so did he advertise his weakness, his timidity, his irresolution to her.

But before this notable plan was, or could be, perfected—for hesitation and obstinacy are often companions, and Lord Ernest was not easily to be persuaded or even advised—Captain Dormer returned from his cruise, and being good-looking, wealthy, and heir to a baronetcy, appeared to Rachel a much more promising speculation than the dreamy, sentimental, and by no means handsome, Lord; in short, she made a mistake, which people engaged in schemes should never think of committing—she fell in love with the Captain, really and bona fide in love! How could she be so simple! while he only amused himself with her, and read her as plainly as she read Lord Ernest. She therefore entered, con amore, into a sentimental flirtation with the gay sailor, and well for her that she escaped undamaged; but Captain Dormer was expecting his bride-elect from Malta, and was, on this account, more than usually careful of his character; hers was, of course, no concern of his; let her look after it; and so she heard of his engagement and received her own dismissal at the same time.

But death and legacy-hunting are as inseparable in the minds and expectations of this order of dependents as extreme unction and a bequest are in the mind of a Jesuit; and what with presents of jewelry, advances in money, keepsakes, and other little windfalls, she left the Dormers in deep mourning, but with colors flying.

Lord Ernest went abroad, or perhaps, after all, he would not have escaped; for obstinate though he be, a weak-minded man has no chance with a resolute woman; but he was still kept in view, probably on the same principle that induces a thrifty housewife to put aside odds and ends, with the prudent remark, "they may come in handy at some time."

People may relate anecdotes of the dexterity with which pickpockets exercise their trade; they may tell of schools or universities in which pupils graduate till they become first-class men, and senior wranglers in the science or mystery of abstracting and adding; but this is vulgar, bungling work after all; for the police are sometimes sad marplots to these nimble-fingered gentry, and magistrates do sometimes pass a just sentence; but there is a skill which shows itself by never coming into collision with these humdrum castigators of petty larceny—the skill of stealing a ring from your finger, a bracelet from your arm, a chain from your neck, and leaving a strong impression on your mind that somehow you have been persuaded into giving it; and this is the legerdemain which these lady professors practice.

M. Robin, come and take a lesson! M. Houdin, learn how to make a dress, a shawl, or any other elegant trifle, find its way from your neighbor's wardrobe into that of Madame; and so we may go on, usque ad nauseam, and still find exposure and contempt useless, for "the creature's at her dirty work again;" and to it she kept, and persuaded young Mr. Melville, the grandson of her then patroness, to elope with her. But the old lady was revenged; unknown to Mrs. Melville, she possessed the power of thwarting her project, and she exercised it to the full extent. She settled a moderate income on her grandson, which was to cease at his death, and the rest of her large property was distributed among distant relations, with some of whom she had quarreled, and others she had never seen

Thus baffled in her matrimonial speculation, she paid the full penalty—namely, limited means—which, with a husband and child, her utmost ingenuity could not increase by a successful course of visits; and tied to a disappointed man, who upbraided her as the cause of his changed prospects, she may almost be pardoned, if his death, which happened when her daughter was about twelve years old, did not leave her quite disconsolate. It is true, their only ostensible means of living died with him; but even this loss could be endured. She was once more free—once more at liberty to exercise those talents which for so many years had been hidden under a bushel.

She now appeared in the interesting character of a widow, left with a daughter, both wholly unprovided for, and in this character she went from house to house, collecting all sorts of things from all sorts of persons, till she had fairly wearied them; when she fixed upon Lord Ernest as the one who was now to have the chief honor and merit of being her tool—henceforth he would be to her the great nugget—her California—her Australian gold-field.

She first tried the power of her still remaining good looks on him, but in vain; Lord Ernest's life and manner plainly said, "Man delights not me, nor woman either." She then insinuated that he must want some sympathizing friend, one into whose patient ear he could freely pour all his sorrows; and having succeeded in making him unspeakably miserable by her perpetual reference to his past trials, she hoped she had become necessary to his present and future comfort; but she was disappointed and mortified, though not daunted, by finding that he thought his old servant, Roberts, understood what was needful in that respect better than any other person.

Baffled in one plan, her indefatigable industry looked out for something else on which to exercise itself, and propitious fortune sent Reginald—yes, he was the very one she would have chosen for a son-in-law from thousands—the very husband she would have selected from a crowd for her dear Ernesta.

But her dear Ernesta not being very talented—in truth, being very stupid—sadly annoyed and irritated her strong-minded mother—for what can be more aggravating to one who has applied all the energies of a comprehensive and powerful intellect to some grand measure, than to be perpetually hindered by another who is silly enough to have affections and feelings—who is influenced by little touches of nature and truth, always so dreadfully in the way when some extraordinary manœuver is to be executed? Such was the vexatious opposition she now had to overcome; for it happened before the Reginald scheme had been started, that Mrs. Melville, in one of her rash and unusual fits of despair—when the funds were very low indeed—had permitted her daughter to encourage the admiration and attention of a very young man of respectable family and moderate fortune; in short, Mrs. Melville not only let them fall in love, but actually sanctioned it, so far as to have herself been propitious to the young man's suit.

And will it be credited that now, when Ernesta was to change her manner to this hitherto favored admirer, she was both perverse and rebellious? Well might poor Mrs. Melville quote the old song: "Oh, what a plague is an obstinate daughter!" for Ernesta declared that it was useless to direct her attention to Reginald's superiority; she never could, never would acknowledge it; she was insensible to the distinction, "He's but a General, damsel, I'm a King;" and the quarrel threatened to become serious; when Reginald at once, by the indifference of his manner, cooled the anger of Mrs. Melville toward her daughter, but drew it on himself.

Ever kind and courteous, and believing that the society of so old a friend as Mrs. Melville represented herself, would be good for his hypochondriacal uncle, pitying also the destitute state of one who told a harrowing tale of fraud and ill-usage, he prompted Lord Ernest to frequent liberalities, and encouraged her visits to Old Court; but as to being smitten by the charms of the silly Ernesta, alias Charlotte, that would have been impossible.

Now with regard to this alias also thereby hangs a tale, for this led to another cause of just anger which Mrs. Melville felt toward her daughter. During Mr. Melville's lifetime the girl had been called Charlotte—by him frequently Lotte—but lately, to her surprise, she found she had another name, one which she had received to mark the long-standing friendship between her mother and Lord Ernest; she was now, therefore, to be called Ernesta; but, like Glendower's spirits, she often did not come when she was called—oh! she was so stupid, that girl! poor thing! she was only foolish, fat, and fair—very good-natured—rather addicted to sweeties and cakes, and had a sentimental habit of crying when bullied by her mother; and then she presented the unsentimental aspect of a heavy-looking blonde, with red eyes and fiery nose.

Lucky was it for her indolent character that her mother had such a superabundance of energy and determination! "Once more unto the breach, one more," was her cry, and the attack was against the gentle, resistless Lord Ernest. Is there no pity? none. No quarter? none; and Reginald's announced engagement sharpened both her resentment and her weapons. It was now or never; and so skillfully did she commence the war, that wounded, feeble, and wearied as was Lord Ernest, she gained the day. She called his attention to Ernesta's changed looks, evident enough, for she was weeping for her dismissed swain—the girl's stupid inattention to her recent baptismal change her mother ascribed to deep feeling at the sound of a name which reminded her of another; she reproached him for having destroyed the peace of her artless child—appealed to his honor—poured in tears—blew up sighs—threw down the impediments which his Lordship's indifference and indolence cast in her way, and seated her guileless Ernesta on the throne of Old Court! But, oh! the sleepless nights and the weary days it all cost! for, suspecting that Roberts was especially inimical to her measures, she had to be much on her guard, besides having to coax and flatter—to snub and threaten that perverse Ernesta. Many a slap and box on the ear did the lady elect receive from her mother's vigorous hand; but even the effects of these were made serviceable to her plans—and tears, which disfigured the pretty but unmeaning face—the result of recent cuffs—were ascribed to the distress of mind her sensitive Ernesta endured while smarting under the taunts of old friends and acquaintance; for, Mrs. Melville having successfully maneuvered for an invitation to Old Court, had then asserted that the acceptance of his hospitalities had caused the finger of scorn to be pointed at her beloved child.

Wearied and worn out—perplexed yet hesitating—still only half convinced that he was bound in honor to repair, by marriage, the mischief caused by Ernesta's affectionate and susceptible nature—he consented to make her his wife.

He never was quite so weak as to believe himself in love, or so vain as to think Ernesta dangerously in love with him; but he pitied the fancy to which she had yielded. He still intended to do every thing as generously as ever for Reginald; and he forgot that in acknowledging the preposterous claims now made upon him, he was rendering that difficult perhaps impossible. He never thought how cruelly and flagrantly he was violating the sanctity of a promise—imperiling the happiness of others. He was, at present, alive only to the necessity of freeing himself from importunities which had become almost intolerable, and which he was too indolent and timid to break from by energetic measures; and so, with a vague idea of full compensation in some way or another to Reginald, he permitted this arch schemer to triumph, and became, at sixty years of age, the husband of a foolish girl not quite twenty.

Throughout the whole of this transaction Mrs. Melville was conscious that she ran a risk—but, in excuse, it must be alleged that it seemed inevitable. Delay she knew was, to her, not only danger, but ruin; and not doubting her ability to rectify the omission, she left it for the present.

But there had been no settlement for Ernesta of any kind, scarcely a promise of any—and time would not stand still while Mrs. Melville flattered and argued this out of Lord Ernest; this, then, was the risk, and here she felt was the danger.

So well, so secretly, and so briskly had she followed up her advantages, that Roberts knew nothing of the precise direction her maneuvers had taken. It was only a few days before the one fixed for the marriage, that he heard of it. His habitual respect for his lordship could not prevent his expression of astonishment, faintly tinged with disapprobation—he even ventured to inquire if Mr. Reginald knew? and hearing, as he expected, that he did not, suggested the propriety of informing him—to which, and much to his surprise, Lord Ernest made no objection. Perhaps, poor man! he thought Reginald might yet save him.

Therefore it was that the letter had been dispatched by old Roberts, which would have brought Reginald immediately, had it reached him; and this letter it was which caused the hurried departure from Craigalan—still, as we know, Reginald came not. And when the small bridal train returned from the village church, where the ceremony had been unostentatiously performed—Mrs. West's recent death furnishing a reason—Roberts felt, as he told the housekeeper, as if he had received his death-blow.

Not once afterward did Lord Ernest allude to the event, destined to have such effects; and when Roberts mentioned Mr. Reginald, and expressed his wonder at his absence or silence, or ventured a conjecture as to his future prospects, he received no reply. The old housekeeper, in speaking of her master, said he seemed dazed; and certainly, if ever an elderly gentleman had reason, she said, to be dazed at his own state, it was Lord Ernest!

And now was to begin another reign; for, when silly daughters marry, strong-minded mothers-in-law rule, and this she did, in one sense, with less interuption or aid than she quite liked—for, except that Lord Ernest, on her giving indications of intending a complete change in the ministry, very peremptorily, and in the presence of Roberts and the housekeeper, forbade the least interference with their long-established duties and services—no one helped her; and the prohibition was something like tying a man by the feet firmly to a rock, and then bidding him run; for as the authority of Roberts extended over one half the household, and the housekeeper over the other, meddle where she would, Mrs. Melville found she infringed on their prerogative.

Lord Ernest, who seemed to think that he was now exonerated from all further trouble, sunk into a kind of apathetic indolence. Though urged by Mrs. Melville, he refused to write to Reginald—so she did—for him. And a pretty specimen of English blarney that letter was! It arrived while Reginald was in all the horrors of fever and delirium, and was opened by Ashley, who took no further notice of it than to write to Roberts for more correct information, and briefly alluding to the then state of Reginald, and promising to let the attached old man have good tidings, if such were mercifully permitted.

His lordship was equally refractory regarding his brother, with whom he had declined to communicate; again was her eloquent pen in requisition, this time not without a result—for Lord Westrough kept no measures with her—there was no blarney, either English or Irish, in her reply; so she burnt the letter, and put his Lordship's name among a few others, to be remembered—when convenient.

But, oh! climax of perverseness! Lord Ernest refused to summon his solicitor! well, never mind, it is only one effort more, and she made it—only one letter more, and she wrote it; but this time she had better have left it alone; for after a short interview with his client, witnessed only by Roberts and the doctor, who had for years been almost a daily visitor, the lawyer left without replying to her anxious inquiries as to what instructions he had received, or noticing her indirect attempts to learn whether will or settlement was in contemplation. Rather a balk this! and a nice life it was for her young ladyship also—who was snubbed by her mother, neglected by her husband, and waited on by the servants with secret contempt. Of what use was her title? there was no one to be dazzled by it, scarce y any one to call her by it—of what use the large and magnificent house?—she occupied no more room now than in her mother's cheerful little cottage; as to the carriages and horses always at her command, young, strong, active—what did she care for them? and what comparison was there between the solemn grandeur of a solitary drive, or accompanied only by her mother, and the delightful rambles, she still remembered, when at early morn the earth was fresh and gay—when the birds got up a concert in every leafy copse, and where the voice of one she really loved whispered soft nonsense in her charmed ear?

CHAPTER XXIII.

"He comes, the herald of a noisy world,
With spattered boots, strapp'd waist, and frozen locks,
News from all nations lumbering at his back;
. . Perhaps to thousands messengers of grief."
COWPER.

CONSTANCE, who was always fond of being busy, or, as Helen said, of being invested with a little brief authority, had voted herself permanent chairwoman at the breakfast-table, where she and the letter-bag were always found waiting for the other members of the family, Since her engagement and Reginald's absence, Helen also made her appearance with the arrival of the post, eagerly listening for her father's step—for the opening of the bag, when he was at home, was a prerogative which he rather jealously guarded.

"Papa is late this morning," observed Helen, wistfully glancing at the bag.

"I think," remarked Constance, seeing her sister's impatience, "I shall propose to papa that we have two bags now, one for mamma and ourselves, which we may open without his aid; it is really too tantalizing, thus to have unknown wealth in our hands, without being able to look at and enjoy it."

Constance had an additional motive in suggesting this arrangement. Some weeks ago, Colonel Templeton, in turning the key with great impetuosity, and rather a trembling hand, the result no less of impatience than of the last evening's wine, which he had not slept off, broke the key, and in trying to extract the piece left in, the lock was injured.

This Mr. Cooper undertook to have carefully repaired; and after it came back, the first time Constance distributed the contents, which her father often permitted, on handing a letter to her mother, which bore the Grantham post-mark, she fancied the seal looked less clearly defined than those made by her quick but skillful aunt always were. On another occasion, a letter to herself, from Mrs. Charles Vernon, seemed so evidently to have been tampered with, that she determined to keep watch on these matters; for it brought the indignant flush to her very brow, when she thought that information of strictly a family nature should be published, to satisfy the impertinent curiosity of persons from whom she instinctively shrank; especially was she roused at the mere idea, that Reginald's letters to her sister should be profaned by the vulgar prying of the she-captain and her bold daughter, or furnish matter of conversation to those who were wholly unable to appreciate the dignity and purity of natures such as Reginald's—this alone would have been sufficient motive for the request, and she resolved no longer to delay making it.

"Papa," she said, when he appeared, and very deliberately turned the key, "I think I shall set up a little private affair on my own account; that bag," she continued, with a serio-comic expression, "has been inflicting tortures for the last half-hour—the famous bags which Ulysses had are nothing in comparison. I fancy I have heard the gentle voice of Mrs. Charles Vernon crying, like Sterne's starling, 'I can't get out,' while an Italian remonstrance from Cecilia says, 'voi che entrate qui, lasciate ogni speranza.'"

"What are you driving at, Constance; what whim now?" he inquired; and she knew, by the tone, that the moment was propitious; so at once replied:

"I wish you, dear papa, to let me drive over to Seabrooke and purchase a letter-bag, which will be consecrated to female friendship and poetry—to sentimental effusions and accounts of the fashions—to harmless tittle-tattle and stray pieces of news—in short, that will relieve your grave and business-like dispatches from a degrading partnership with our frivolous missives. Only fancy the indignation your lawyer's bulky bill must feel, at being kept for a needless hour in company with a flimsy account for ribbons, lace, and muslins."

"Very well—just as you like—only no tricks, no clandestine doings."

"Never fear me, papa," she replied, her haughty and beautiful eyes fearlessly meeting his; "when I do that, I give you leave to lock me up in the bag with my correspondence, as a punishment;" but her tone was grave, though her words were not.

"Depend upon my doing that, or something like it, with your leave or without," said her father, laughing; for this girl had a strange and unusual power over him—unconsciously to himself, he wished for her good opinion—in her presence he would make an effort to check his unmanly outbreaks when any thing annoyed him, more especially as any conduct of this kind shown toward Mrs. Templeton called forth the expression of her displeasure, by those looks which were too true and eloquent to be mistaken. He was, on her account, more indulgent and generous to them all, for he saw that Constance would not allow of any thing like a demonstration of partiality; and while Mrs. Templeton and Helen were too timid to ask, and especially to remonstrate, Constance did both—often with success, and without in the least infringing on the respect due to the Colonel as her father.

The very same day she ordered a letter-bag, not from Seabrooke, but from London, which was to have a Bramah lock, and when it arrived she herself carried it down to the post-office, and consigned the duplicate key to the master, with an injunction that it should never, except by an order signed by Mrs. Templeton or her daughters, quit his possession. "And I hope," she said, having an object to gain by the remark, "that Robin comes himself in good time to meet the mail."

"Why, yes, miss, he always do; but once or twice Master Cooper's lad have come early like, to fetch Colonel's bag, being as how he was going up direct to the Priory; shall I give him this, miss, if so be he comes first?"

"Certainly," she replied, aloud. "So, so," she said to herself, "I was not wrong in my suspicions, but I think, as regard our letters, I have caught them; and now, if Master Cooper's lad be coming up early like," and she laughed merrily at the idea, "we shall have the benefit of his speed."

She told Mrs. Templeton of her little device, and greatly amused her by imagining the sufferings that her counterplot would inflict on a curiosity which further and careful examination of several envelopes proved, had not let itself burst in ignorance.

We must now, however, take a short walk into the village—but as it is to perform an act of justice, and will not take long, it may be easily pardoned.

There is a gentleman—we have Hamlet's authority for thus calling him—who is represented as being perpetually in mourning; and an ancient and kind remonstrance is current against painting him blacker than he is. Let such clemency be awarded to Cooper, for it is very unfair toward his delicacy of feelings, to suspect him of reading the correspondence of the Priory ladies—why should he?—what would he gain by doing so? nothing—therefore he did not. He read, or fancied he read, all the Colonel's letters, and that sufficied for him.

But not so easily satisfied were the inquiring minds of his sister, we mean Mrs. Captain and the fair Juliet—hence, but with his full connivance, the manufacture of a third key.

"Ah! ah! what is the meaning of this?" asked Mrs. Captain, the day after Constance had established a private bag; "and pray what is this for? two bags for the Priory, and different locks. I wonder what next! but Mrs. Templeton is at the bottom of this scheme;" she had an especial spite against the mistress of the Priory; "but I shall find a way of settling this, and many other accounts with her, one of these days, see if I don't."

"I rather think," interposed Cooper, who, upon the whole, was disposed to defend Mrs. Templeton, whose uncomplaining gentle character had touched him—even him—"I rather think that the lovely Constance is the plotter here."

"I hate that girl even worse than Helen," exclaimed the free and easy Juliet; "and if I catch Hubert Forrester so often accidentally, as he pretends, meeting my young miss at Sea-View Cottage, I'll make him repent it."

"Mind your own conduct, and escape the need of repentance yourself," said Cooper, with a half threat, half sneer; "I can not think what you and your mother mean by running after that young chap, who is only amusing himself at your cost; you had better bait your trap for that scampering foreign fellow, young Morton; he is much more likely to bite than the other."

"I am not so sure of that as you seem to be; but suppose I set my trap for both," was the impudent retort.

"Yes," said Augustus, who was the pest of the whole village, from his sly and mischievous propensities, and who had listened to this conversation from between the folds of the curtain—"yes, only remember that between two stools—" but, before he could finish his elegant proverb, his sister flew at him, and administered in rapid succession sundry cuffs, which were so unmeekly taken, and with so little disposition to offer the other cheek, that, like some of Homer's heroes, the two parties closed in angry fight, and Mrs. Captain, all her warlike tendencies roused at the sight, gave Juliet such a blow on the back of her neck, that the offended ivory showed black-and-blue tokens of anger for several succeeding days. In the midst of this scene, which he viewed with the most philosophical indifference, Cooper and the bags disappeared, as they had already been delayed suspiciously long. But his boy was no longer so early a riser as to precede Robin at the post-office!

One morning Helen, who was deputy key-keeper to Constance, unlocked their bag, and withdrew that letter so dear to her—so dear on account of the writer—that directly it was forced from its envelope, it was pressed again and again to her lips—so sacred in her eyes that in solitude only could it be read and fully enjoyed—so she walked out on the broad terrace, and casting her eyes on the glorious prospect which met them everywhere, "this bridal of the earth and sky," she opened her letter, and eagerly read words of love and confidence, which filled her heart with thankfulness. She there learned how truly she was loved and prized—she there found how much she had it in her power to soothe and comfort—and already her affectionate heart suggested a reply, in which all her love was to be told; and Reginald was to be made still happier, by learning that long ago he had, in her thoughts, symbolized all that was noble and true.

Alas! alas! how we plan and decide for our whole future existence, when, if even the great destroyer be not by our side, events almost as powerful are hastening to change the whole course of our future destiny! That letter, which Helen read, with her speaking and lovely countenance telling of happiness, was the first sent after the travelers had reached Scotland; and at the very moment she put it reverently, fondly, within the folds of her muslin dress, Reginald was journeying with wild haste toward Old Court; but she was spared the knowledge for a brief period only.

"Helen, dear, have you heard from Reginald?" inquired her mother.

"Oh, yes, mamma, and here are a few lines from Ashley addressed to you; but it is evident they are really meant for us all," folding down the postscript, and handing the letter to Mrs. Templeton.

"Ashley is the prince of friends," cried Constance, reading over her mother's shoulder; "he says they are already better for their journey, and on the eve of starting for Craigalan."

"Ashley is one of the kindest and best I ever knew," said Mrs. Templeton, who had had repeated opportunities of understanding the superiority of his character in her constant and intimate intercourse with his family.

"That he is," warmly echoed Constance, "and I sincerely hope he will find a wife who will value him as he deserves.

Her mother glanced at the animated face, but it said nothing that the tongue had not.

"Ah! now there is papa, and the tea and coffee are ready to the moment. Here is a lovely morning, papa," she said; "I give you good-day, and claim your promise of a ride. I hope you have not business there," indicating the letters, "which will rush out and detain you prisoner."

"I do not expect so formidable an arrest," he replied, carelessly opening the bag, and taking out the contents very slowly. "So we will go to Hurstwood, and perhaps Helen will like to accompany us."

"With great pleasure, papa," she quickly replied, excessively gratified at this unwonted mark of attention; "it is just the day for seeing Hurstwood Avenue to perfection."

"Here, dear papa," said Constance, handing him a cup, "taste this coffee before you begin your feast on the news;" but, as he tasted, he undid his papers, and reading a summary of public matters, he pushed away his cup, saying, "Now, Constance, for some of your excellent tea;" when casting his eyes on a paragraph, he struck the table so fiercely as to break a saucer that was near him; and while every one in breathless terror turned their looks toward him, he rudely threw the paper to his wife, and looking thunder at poor Helen, who trembled she scarcely knew why, with a fearful oath, he said, "Read that, madam, and see what your fine favorite is come to;" then, from extreme rage being unable to articulate more, he sat down with clenched hands, every feature swollen and distorted by intense passion.

Helen hastily rose, but not before Mrs. Templeton, having read the fatal lines, had gasped out, "Oh, God, my child!" and following the direction of her mother's eye, she read, or rather devoured, the adjoining paragraph: "Marriage in High Life.—On Thursday last, privately, at the parish church, near Old Court, Lord Ernest West, second son of the late Lord Westrough, and brother of the present Marquis, to Charlotte Ernesta, only child of the late Stephen Melville, Esq., of Canterbury."

But the Colonel by this time had recovered his voice, and while Helen, feeling that some dreadful blow was about to fall, but not comprehending its full weight, clung to Constance, he exclaimed, "A pretty beggar this, to come and ask for one of my daughters—a fellow who has not a shilling—a needy upstart—but"—he continued, as if collecting his energies for some awful denunciation, when Mrs. Templeton, pale as her dress, said, "Stop, Lionel, oh, stop!"

"Stop?" he almost shouted; but Helen, who had at last understood all—all that involved, not the present only, but the future—with a deep sob, fell into her sister's arms, fainting.

"Mamma, help me, help!" cried Constance; and they placed her near the window: "hold her while I fetch water." The father rose and left the room, banging the door violently; they sprinkled her pale face, they opened her collar, and Constance drew away the letter—the last, last happy letter that her sister was ever to receive—for she read all that was to happen in her father's gloomy brow, in his muttered threats; and her heart ached as she anticipated what awaited Helen.

But this was not the time for dwelling on these glimpses of the future; and flying for Dawson, in preference to summoning their own young attendant, by her aid Helen was partially recovered, and laid on her bed, and a messenger dispatched for Mr. Curtis, the doctor. Having waited till he came, and gave his directions, some hours afterward Constance determined to have an interview with her father. She knew that he was alone, for she had seen Cooper canter toward the village, she, therefore, knocked at the library door, and, receiving permission, entered.

The Colonel lifted his head and prepared to speak, but she quickly stopped him by saying, "I thought, papa, you would like to know how poor, dear Helen is, so I have come to say she is asleep. Mr. Curtis wishes her to be kept quiet, and means to call again this evening. This is a very sad circumstance," she continued, gently, and determining most carefully to feel her way, lest any indiscreet step should injure, where she was so anxious and resolved to serve.

"Sad affair, Constance!" exclaimed her father; "it is an infamous piece of trickery—a most dishonorable cheat; but I have, at any rate, given my opinion;" and he pointed to two letters, addressed respectively to Lord Ernest and to Reginald.

Oh! how she longed to withdraw the latter. Oh! how she wished she might plead for gentleness and forbearance toward one so sinned against. But prudence said, "Silence;" patience said, "Wait and see." She knew that Reginald would be so crushed beneath this load of accumulated sorrow and disgrace, that this addition, ungenerous and cruel as it might be, would add but little to his burden; therefore, almost to her father's surprise, she said, alluding to Lord Ernest, by pointing to his name, and without remarking the letter to Reginald, "About him there can be but one opinion; henceforth his name is another word for dishonor; but, oh, papa! how cruel, how base, thus to have played with the happiness of others, and to have destroyed it!"

"Constance," said he, much more gently than she could have ventured to hope for, "you are a sensible girl, and I do not mind talking to you. I confess, when I first saw you enter, I wished you away, for I expected you had come to pester me with sentiment and whimperings, which I detest; but I see your good sense tells you that there must at once be an end to this matter."

"I fear, indeed, there must; for even if you were disposed to waive all considerations, and forget changed situations, I do not see how Reginald could accept your generosity. Poor Reginald!—dear Helen!—they were so happy, and their prospects seemed so bright and fair! I hope, however, papa," she added, "that you fully acquit him of any thing base and false;" and her face kindled, ready for the defense.

"Well, I do not know that I did quite take that view of the matter," said the Colonel, sliding his hand, as if without being conscious, toward the letter directed to Scotland;" but you say truly, he could have nothing to do with this disgraceful proceeding, which injures him materially; besides, it really is not like him; so, upon second thoughts, I shall not send my letter just yet."

Constance felt how gladly she could have thanked and kissed him for saying this; but lest it should seem as if she took it for a concession, which might annoy her father, she again listened to her friend—prudence.

"I am sure mamma and Helen would be much relieved and gratified by a little message from you," she said, and the tears stood in her eyes. "May I say you are very sorry for this sad trouble?"

"Do as you will," for he did not feel comfortable while the joyous beauty of her face was banished; "but, mind, I shall not like to dine alone. I hate weeping and sighing, so say what you will."

"Thank you, dear papa," said she, very gratefully; and, stooping down, she removed his still redundant locks, and kissed his forehead. It was one of her little ways, which strangely affected and pleased her father—so much so, that he often returned the innocent caress. He did it on this occasion.

But Constance did not hasten with eager steps to give this message, though she knew that, scant as it was, it would be welcome; she turned toward the garden, and there, with nothing but nature and her own heart, she held earnest, serious communion.

Constance had long been aware of the state of affairs at home; unlike Helen, who had been gradually concentrating her attention on what related to Reginald, she, "fancy free," had watched events, and carefully drawn her own conclusions. She saw that her mother was unhappy—she slowly discovered that her father's conduct was the cause; and if, at one time, inexperience and loving enthusiasm had allowed her to dream of being the means by which asperities might be smoothed and difficulties removed, subsequent knowledge had awakened her. And now, here was this new, this dreadful trial. How would Helen bear it? and if she sorrowed and refused consolation, oh! how that would add to the burden of her idolized mother. Therefore, Constance felt that to prevent this must be her endeavor—this must be the motive for exertion on her part. She saw that now was the time to prove the sincerity of her love, and solemnly did she devote herself to the task.

It was truly a beautiful thing to see how these young girls ever remembered their mother—in their joys, to share them with her—in their sorrows, hitherto little more than those of childhood, to hide them from her.

After a long and sorrowful vigil spent by Helen's bedside, who had been restless and feverish, though she occasionally dozed, toward the hour of dinner Constance prevailed on her mother to seek rest, if not sleep—promising soon to follow her example; and scarcely had Mrs. Templeton left, when Helen opened her heavy and swollen eyelids. "Constance," said she, and she raised her sad, pale face.

"I am here, dearest, but lie down."

"I will presently," replied Helen; "but I have been awake ever since you prevailed on dear mamma to go, and I have been thinking;" and tears, quiet tears, flowed freely down her cheeks.

Constance, in her heart, thanked God for this proof that Helen was more composed, and said, "But you had better try and sleep again, darling, had you not? Thinking will not suit your poor head just now, will it?"

"No," replied Helen, "nor uncertainty either; and now, dear, you must tell me all that terrible history, that struck me as if for death. I shall be better when it is all clear to me."

And Constance began, and faithfully told her all—not omitting the interview with her father; and, perceiving that Helen was calm and attentive, she told her all she had thought of in the garden.

"I am thankful, very thankful, that papa does justice to one who so truly merits it. Constance, did you take a letter from me?"

"Yes, dearest, here it is." Helen took it, and, kissing it, placed it on her pillow.

"All you have said is wise and good; all your counsel I will try to act up to. Our mother must not grieve, when, by an exertion on our part, we can prevent it. Now leave me—I shall like to be alone for a few hours."

And Constance, darkening the room which the fond mother had made so beautiful for her beloved ones, went to speak peace to her who was scarcely ever absent from her thoughts. Truly was she a ministering angel, that fair girl; for the tidings she brought to Mrs. Templeton were such as she had never ventured to hope for. That Helen should unselfishly determine to wrestle with her grief, was, perhaps, not so strange to one who knew so well what affection could do; but that her husband should so far have yielded to a better influence and to better feelings, as actually to withdraw a letter written while his heart was full of anger and disappointment, because convinced that it would be unjust to send it, that did astonish her.

"And it is to you, my brave pet, we entirely owe this desirable result; it is from the exercise of your good sense so much of this comes," said her mother, fondly embracing Constance; "and richly, this day, have you recompensed me for many and many a lonely year, passed while my children were the joy and delight of a stranger's home."

"Dear mamma, but you felt, you knew that our love was ever with you," said Constance. "Oh, how often we used to laugh, and say, 'How mamma's face must burn, we have been talking so long of her.'"

And then the conversation took another direction, and they spoke of the event which had in one moment dashed aside the hopes of two loving hearts; and Constance learned from her mother many particulars of Lord Ernest and of the Westrough family, till then unknown to her. Thus talking, they passed the time till shortly before dinner, when they were surprised by the entrance of Helen, looking wan and languid, but evidently not so overcome as they had naturally expected she would have been.

She held a folded letter in her hand. "I have come, mamma and Constance," she said, "to convince you that I am not going to increase the painful consequences of this day's sad news, by giving way to any feelings I can possibly overcome. I have thought much and deeply during the last two hours, and the result is in this letter. If papa will permit it to go, I think it will be better for all. Constance, you may tell him the substance of it, which is this. That I have set Reginald—" she faltered at the name, but, as if in punishment for her weakness, repeated it—"I have set Reginald free; but I have not asked to be set free in return—that would be useless; I do not wish it; and to him," she resumed, with kindling looks, "it is, I know, only useful as making him feel that he can go where he likes—do as he likes, without the least restraint, but such as his never-ending love for me may make pleasant to him. I love him, oh, mother! I love him more than ever; so I tell him, but I give him up for a time; and whenever he can claim me, and I know he will some day, then, if I live, I am ready to be his—his wife; but this once I must be permitted to speak my own words, and to utter my own feelings; after this I shall, perhaps, never ask more than one other favor—it will be to have the reply. Can you manage this for me, dear Constance?"

"That I will, dearest sister, in such a cause I can not fail;" and Helen, who had nobly made this effort, looked faint and exhausted, excused herself from appearing at dinner; but Constance prevailed on Mrs. Templeton to descend, remembering that her father had rather made a point of their being present.

The meal passed in more than usual silence; still it was not so formidable as Mrs. Templeton had apprehended; and when the dessert was placed, and the servants dismissed, at a signal from her daughter she rose and walked out, as if to fetch some flowers.

"Papa," began Constance, "you were so very kind this morning, that I venture to prefer a petition, which arises partly out of the conversation we then held, and which I repeated to Helen—who at once saw your reasons"—not quite exact, dear Constance, but let it pass—"so, papa, she has decided to set Reginald free."

"Set him free!" loudly began the Colonel.

"Pray, papa, let me finish before you condemn; but, very naturally, she wishes her letter to go at once"—she did not think it necessary to say, unread—"and this is the favor."

"Oh! if that is all, send it—but remember, it must be the only one; but send it, it will save me the trouble of writing another letter myself;" thus giving her to understand that the offensive communication would be suppressed.

"Thanks—a thousand thanks," she said aloud; and very fervently to herself, she added, "and thanks, indeed, tenfold, that that terrible epistle has been destroyed."

So Helen's letter went, and she was, to all pearance, wonderfully calm.

"But the face may be ting'd with a warm, sunny smile Though the cold heart to ruin runs darkly the while."

CHAPTER XXIV.

"They grew in beauty side by side,
They fill'd one house with glee."
MRS. HEMANS.

THE news, of course, quickly spread through the house, and thence equally, of course, over the village, that Mr. West was a ruined man—that his prospects were blighted, and his marriage with Miss Templeton broken off!

By the more intimate friends of both parties the news was listened to with the kindest expressions of condolence; and while truly sympathizing with Reginald on this blow to his love and his hopes, every one felt that his affliction would be rendered more poignant by the reflections which must be cast on Lord Ernest's want of honor and justice.

"What a dreadful disappointment for him," said Lady Dallas, her eyes actually overflowing, as her kindness pictured his distress.

"Sad, indeed," replied Mrs. Forrester. "I little thought I could so soon refer to the loss of my dear friend, his mother, with such resignation; but I now see she is spared this, and is, indeed, taken from the evil to come."

"Of course," remarked Laurette, "Mr. West must see the propriety—indeed, the necessity, of writing to free Helen—and painful as it may be, I hope that he will take the lead."

"I am quite sure that Reginald will do all that is honorable, though his heart should break in the effort," said Mrs. Forrester, decidedly; "and like you, my dear Laurette, I hope he will do so promptly."

But several days passed without any letter, and those whose friendship gave them a claim to information, looked disappointed and anxious. At last, letters came from Lady Sinclair to the Priory, and to her daughter; to the latter she gave a detailed account of all she knew, expressing her strong desire to learn more, and especially all the particulars Laurette could send respecting the Templetons, about whom she and Sir Archibald were most anxious

Her Ladyship's letter to the Priory was by the same post which also brought a few lines from Ashley Vernon, cautiously informing them of Reginald's illness, and promising daily reports. Then it was that poor Helen felt there might be a trial in store for her too dreadful even to be thought of.

Outwardly calm as she had been for the last few days, who may tell all the agony of that bruised young heart—resigned as she had seemed—who knew through what an ordeal, in silence and in tears, she had passed, before she had attained it—and now—oh! it was too bitter a sorrow to be possible! Was she never, never again to hear that loved voice? never again to see that dear face? must he, indeed, pass away, and she not have the sad consolation of watching by his side? Poor Helen! poor girl! and her heart was heavy with its sorrow.

Neither her mother, nor Constance, during this agonizing suspense, attempted to comfort her; they could not bid her hope; they felt that she needed that support which nothing earthly can give; and oh! the prolonged agony, when, day after day, letters came from Ashley, from his mother and sister, all repeating the same fearful tale—Reginald lingering between life and death. Helen at last gave way; it seemed as if she had no longer either hope, or care, or object in life.

At last, blessed tidings! are they true? there is hope! and when the next day they were confirmed, and a letter, such a letter! came to Helen from Dr. Vernon, though she still wept, they were no longer the tears of despair.

One morning, about a week after this news, which daily became more and more certain, when Colonel Templeton came down to breakfast, he was astonished to see the two letter-bags lying on the table before his chair, and the little key, which Constance rather ostentatiously carried attached to her watch-chain, on the top of that belonging to her.

"What is this for?" he inquired of Constance, who was the only other occupant of the room.

"When you gave me leave to have that bag, papa," replied she, "we all little thought of the cloud that was gathering over our heads. I then laughingly promised you never to let it be the medium of any thing clandestine; to myself I solemnly said, it shall never be the means of weakening my father's confidence in me; till this morning, I never knew the strength of temptation, or the extent of my own weakness;" she rose, and opening the bag, drew forth a letter addressed to Helen. The writing was much changed, evidently formed by a feeble hand, for the characters were uneven and tremulous; but still, post-mark, seal, all proclaimed that it was from Reginald.

"This," proceeded Constance gravely, and firmly retaining the letter, "will either be given to Helen or destroyed!" she did not add, "no one else shall read it, nor shall it be insultingly returned;" but that was evident in her tone and look. "Papa, which is it to be?"

He looked up at the young ingenuous face, a slight expression of entreaty was mixed with a tolerably large portion of decision, and gave even more than usual dignity to the perfect features.

"Constance," said he, after a pause, during which he had steadily looked at her, "you are a brave girl, and what is more, you are a noble one. There," he continued, pushing away both bag and key, "henceforth it is yours, and yours only; so never fear losing my confidence: I must be a demon to distrust you. But why are you always sent on these matters? Why does not Helen come forward herself? Upon my soul, I am sorry for this affair, I am indeed; and she ought to be quite sure that it is so."

"Helen is not very strong or very well, and she has been sadly tried," said Constance; "besides, I think she is—" she hesitated to say, "afraid of you"—but he did—"you think, you know, she is afraid of me—say it at once;" and he half strangled a sigh.

"Helen never was strong as I, papa; but I still feel quite sure that on all important occasions she has strength of mind and principle which will carry her safely through, where I might, perhaps, fail; and I am sure she will be very grateful for your indulgence," looking at the letter, "as well as for your expressions of sympathy; but are there no means by which?"—she colored and stopped, for her father's brow grew dark.

"Constance, I tell you there are none; you do not know exactly how I am circumstanced; perhaps—well—some day I may let you see how I am hampered—but never mind that now. I must look at my own dispatches."

He did so, and held a letter which he had read more than once, for a few minutes in his hand, as if undecided what to do; at length, he threw it over to Constance, saying, with some emotion, "Upon my life this is too bad—by heavens! he is too fine a fellow to be thus sacrificed to this imbecile old rascal; read it, read it."

As she had suspected, the letter was from Reginald, written directly he could hold a pen; it was, of course, short, but the tears fell fast down the face of Constance as she read the quiet resignation with which he yielded to his fate—no word of reproach or complaint. On the contrary, he thanked Colonel Templeton for his forbearance in not having upbraided him for being the cause, though the innocent one, of the distress which, he was too candid to conceal, he was sure had fallen on Helen. He also accepted the Colonel's silence as an assurance, which was very precious to him, that he cast no shadow of doubt on the integrity and honor of his, Reginald's, conduct.

Glancing at her father, to read his consent to her retaining this letter, she secured it in her bag, and then seeing that he was at leisure, she said, "I was thinking, papa, that if Helen and mamma could go away for a short time—if you will let me take care of you, I will do my best to make you comfortable—their absence, under all the circumstances, might be a good plan."

"The very thing, though it never struck me till you proposed it—but you must all march off together. I shall take that opportunity of running up to town. At present, however, none of us can leave, for Lord Hurstwood is expected; and as we could not receive him when he was last here, we must now have a grand affair in his honor. Afterward, you shall all go to the Granthams, your mother says they have long wanted you; will that do, you dictatorial, hectoring little puss?"

"Very well, indeed, papa, and now I shall leave you."

Armed with letters, which, while they wounded, would bring healing and peace, Constance hastened to Helen, who was breakfasting with her mother; and having dismissed her, to read and weep, as she was sure to do, over such letters, Constance astonished her mother with an account of all she had done in reference to their intended visit. It was precisely the plan Mrs. Templeton most desired. To escape for a time from all the recollections of the Priory—even from friendly sympathies, much as she valued these last, would have been a boon gratefully accepted—but when she found that she was again to visit the scenes of her early days—that beautiful Grantham, which had been the paradise of her youth, and from which she had been exiled ever since her marriage—it seemed almost too happy to be true.

With her brother and his wife she had always maintained the most friendly correspondence; and though they kindled with indignation when they thought how her happiness had been wrecked—the system from which she had never departed, effectually prevented all interference—therefore, externally, all looked well; for Colonel Templeton was always included in the many and pressing entreaties to visit them—Grantham, after many years of alienation, having again come into his lordship's possession.

CHAPTER XXV.

"Sweet when the winter of disease is past,
And the glad spring of health returns at last;
On a loved cheek, long bloomless, to behold
Its first faint tint, the trembling rose unfold."

DR. BROWN.

In the mean time, terrible were the days, the weeks of suspense, which harassed Reginald's devoted friends in the north. Though his medical attendant was correct in saying all danger was over, and, at last, gave permission to remove him to Charles Vernon's comfortable parsonage, only they who have watched the alternations of returning health, the hopes which a breath of air may dash to the ground, the appearance of amendment which some unknown cause proves to have been false, only they who have gone through this, can understand what anxiety there was, and how difficult it was not occasionally to despair.

At length, symptoms of decided and permanent amendment appeared, and again he was welcomed by them, almost as one from the tomb. But though health gradually returned, where were the hopes which had rendered life one long blessing? they had departed like the singing-birds of the season—and would come no more!

Directly he was able to read his letters, he asked for them. Ashley had previously seen all that had arrived, those, of course, excepted, which had come from the Priory. Two, one from Mrs. Templeton, and another from Constance, Reginald put into Ashley's hands for him to read; and as he received them back, he said, "Terrible enough to be separated from such hearts as those, what, then, must it be?"—but he could not proceed, and pointed with a look of despair at Helen's.

Lord Westrough wrote to him very kindly, and in another letter to Ashley, expressed his hope that when Reginald was sufficiently recovered, he would prevail on him to spend some time at their house near town, politely adding, that if Ashley would accompany his friend, it would increase the pleasure. His Lordship also hinted, that he would use all his influence to procure him some appointment, when he ascertained what would best suit him. But at the word appointment, Ashley, who was happily alone, almost uttered a very strong expression—very strong, indeed—let us hope that the recording angel was as merciful to him as to Uncle Toby, in similar circumstances.

Mr. Morton also wrote to Dr. Vernon, expressing an earnest and friendly desire to learn the exact state of Reginald's affairs, so far as the latter would honor him by his confidence, frankly placing any sum of money at his immediate disposal, which could help to carry out his intentions, when he was able to form any.

But after the letter from Mrs. Melville, which Ashley told Reginald he had destroyed, there was no information from that quarter, except a brief note of respectful inquiry from old Roberts, who wrote evidently in great anxiety and alarm on Reginald's account, and whose hints and insinuations were so extraordinary, that some interference appeared needed; at any rate, it seemed desirable to ascertain what foundation these strange allusions rested on.

"Will you object to my visiting Old Court?" asked Ashley of Reginald, when they had one day been talking of the singular event which had had so wide and fatal an influence. "I am not sure that you are justified in thus keeping aloof. Lord Westrough will not move, and it really seems to me a mistake thus tamely to permit this artful woman to triumph."

"So far as I am concerned," replied Reginald, "I very decidedly object to any step being taken, lest my motives should be misconstrued. A gulf is open between me and Old Court, but I have no right to let my scruples interfere and prevent what you and the Doctor think proper; it is horrible to fancy to what extremes such a woman may carry her machinations, if she thinks there is no one to protect her victim;" and it was, therefore, decided that Ashley should go, and, if possible, see Lord Ernest, and learn from him his real wishes and situation; and to this he was, by Reginald, strictly limited.

To follow Ashley, and tell what then and there befell, will not greatly fatigue the pen of the historian; for, except seeing Old Court and Roberts, who was excessively distressed and nervous, Ashley saw no more. He was civilly, but positively, refused an interview with Lord Ernest, on the plea of indisposition. It was said that his Lordship himself sent this message; but many things are said which are not all true. And when Roberts next attended his Lord, and alluded to Mr. Vernon's visit, he was convinced that he had not known of it, or had been over-persuaded to decline seeing him, his only remark being, "Never mind now—never mind now!"

Though his mission to Old Court had been so fruitless, Ashley was not much surprised, and still glad that the attempt had been made. His next journey was to Seabrooke, to which place these unforeseen events had made Dr. Vernon desirous of returning. But church reparations, like church improvements, are slow in progress, and those going on at Seabrooke maintained this character. Therefore, having made what attempts and arrangements he could to hasten progress, especially at the Rectory, whose state seemed hopeless for at least some months, Ashley, who appeared to have forgotten his own affairs in his zealous and untiring interest in those of his friend, accepted Mr. Morton's invitation to make a home of the Hermitage, and proceeded to the Priory.

Alas! how was all changed there, since that memorable evening when Reginald's manner had betrayed his secret! How was his kind and manly heart wrung, to perceive that the shade of melancholy had so greatly deepened on the brow of Mrs. Templeton, while the lovely face of Helen was mournful in the extreme! Still, how delighted they all were to see him—how they clustered round him—how eagerly they listened to his words; and though tears flowed abundantly at his recital, he felt quite sure that his arrival had given them comfort.

When he left, charged with messages of love from them all, Constance said she would accompany him to the first lodge; and frankly linking her arm in his, as if he had been a beloved brother, she entered more fully than could be done during their agitated interview, into accounts of her mother and Helen, chiefly expatiating on her dear, sweet Helen's unselfish triumph over this great blow, though still feeling it so deeply. She said that she was sure her sister perpetually cherished the hope of fulfilling her engagement with Reginald, and she charged him to impress this on his friend, so as to rouse him from an apathy which, to her, Ashley owned he feared was not the result of bodily weakness only, but a listless, paralyzing influence, arising from a hopeless state of mind, and which would, if indulged, be fatal to the future.

"And you," said Ashley, as they were parting, "is there no word of yourself?"

"I?" she replied, "oh! I only wish I could, by sharing Helen's sorrow, diminish its burden to her! As it is, I have only the sorrows of others, and it sometimes appears to me that I have no right to be so spared."

"Heaven grant that it may ever be thus!" he replied, fixing his splendid eyes on her animated but pale face. "And our neighbors," he continued, "how are they? I am sure they have not failed you at this time."

"Indeed, they have been every thing most kind; Lady Dallas has quite forgotten all her own troubles"—and here she gave a little smile, which reminded him that once, either in lip, in eye, or dimple, a smile ever lurked—"she has sent little Minnie to amuse us, and in all things has been so sympathizing. Mr. Victor also daily brings kind inquiries from his father, who, according to his account, has quite lost his heart to dear mamma."

"And the Forresters?" he asked as an excuse for lingering.

"Very kind; Laurette is still there, and—Mr. Hubert often comes to inquire." Why did she hesitate and blush? why did that pang at the heart, which he had often felt, pain so very much just now? But Constance felt this sudden silence embarrassing, and her quick ear catching the approach of a horse, she held out her hand, and hastily said, "Farewell now—remember, we are to see you again before you leave."

He slightly touched that fair hand, but instead of going the direct road leading to the Hermitage, he proceeded toward the horseman. It was Hubert Forrester—but Ashley knew this before.

"Ah! Vernon, my dear fellow!" said Hubert, "how delighted I am to see you; why, when did you come among us?"

"Only yesterday evening."

"And where are you quartered? not at the Rectory, I am sure, where every thing must smell of paint, and taste of bricks and mortar. Have you swung your hammock among the trees, or pitched your tent on the lawn?"

"Neither; I am at the Hermitage. Victor has gone to Forest Hill to bid you to a quartette luncheon, for I was anxious to see you, knowing you would like to have news of Reginald; but I have no time to spare at this moment, and perhaps you are not quite at leisure.

"Thanks," said Hubert. "I shall be there almost as soon as you; but I have now a little message from my mother to Constance—to Mrs. Templeton—so adieu till we meet."

Ashley did not hasten his return; something had made him feel spiritless and weary; but he, however, preceded Hubert by nearly an hour—and still luncheon waited for the loitering guest—and when he did enter, flushed with heat, and his handsome countenance radiant with happiness, Ashley thought him one of the most glorious-looking beings he had ever beheld; and then, by some strange association of ideas, not easily fathomed, Constance presented herself to his mind, and he stifled a sigh.

"And now, tell me all you can about poor Reginald," said Hubert; "how scandalously he has been used. By Jove! that old uncle of his deserves to be executed. What could such an owl as that want with a wife, and she a mere girl? it would be a charity to go and run off with her—and no bad idea that."

"Nor one at all unlikely to be unsuccessful if you attempted it," thought Ashley; and forthwith he proceeded to tell many particulars relating to Reginald, which he knew he was at liberty to do, and which Hubert, kind, generous, and impulsive, listened to with the greatest interest.

"And what will Mr. West do?" inquired Victor, whose admiration of Mrs. Templeton had been extended to her daughters, now that he had had an opportunity of becoming better acquainted with them. "I hope he will become rich, and then marry Miss Templeton."

"She is not at all the girl to make such a romance," said Hubert, "or, upon my honor, I should say nothing would be better than for her to elope with him."

"Nonsense, Forrester," said Ashley; "besides, how could he maintain her? at least at present; he has nothing but kind friends," glancing at Mr. Morton; "and Colonel Templeton is quite the man to disinherit her, if she took such a step. No, no, on every account that has not my sanction."

"Nor mine either," said Mr. Morton; "few circumstances can justify that scandal."

"Very fine talking, you grave and reverend seigniors," said Hubert, with sparkling eyes; "but I know, if I loved a beautiful girl, and she loved me, and any dragon said nay, I would carry her off without a scruple."

"And work for her and yourself?" asked Ashley drily.

"Why, that is a sort of codicil to my will and intention that I have not provided for. I am not fond of much work, and very fond of much pleasure; but if—" he paused and colored.

"Happily," remarked Mr. Morton, "you run little danger of being put to the proof in either case—the elopement or the hard work; if you can make sure of the lady," he added significantly, "there is no fear of a dragon or any other fabulous monster interfering to say nay."

Ashley at this moment felt the room so close that he rose and opened the window, and addressing Victor, said, "How much better you see the Priory from this point than you used to do—or have I forgotten?"

"Oh, no, you are quite right, for the Colonel has been thinning the woods—and it is a real advantage to us, as it gives such a pretty peep."

"I hear there was quite a row about that cutting," remarked Hubert; "it was done at the instigation of that fellow Cooper, who is a bad one."

"So are all who belong to him," interrupted Mr. Morton, with a meaning look, which Hubert either did not or would not notice; for he went on saying—

"It seems Cooper had marked right and left, without much reference to either age or girth; luckily for him, before the men had cut very long, down came a message from the Colonel stopping progress, and he furious with the agent for the mischief he had already caused."

"But," observed Ashley, "this sounds very contradictory; to my knowledge, the trees have been marked for a long time—for I remember my father saying, he was not quite clear as to the propriety of such indiscriminate felling—so the Colonel must have known it."

"And Cooper protests that he had the Colonel's authority and order—if he had, I suppose it was some after-dinner order, for all has been countermanded, and men set to work to plant and repair, as much as possible, this, as well as some former injudicious clearings.

CHAPTER XXVI.

"So the bargain was struck; with the little god laden,
She joyfully flew to her shrine in the grove.
'Farewell,' said the sculptor; 'you're not the first maiden
Who came but for Friendship, and took away Love.'"
MOORE.

AFTER Hubert's departure with Victor, Mr. Morton and Ashley held a long and interesting conversation regarding Reginald; in the course of which, Mr. Morton evinced a good sense and knowledge of business, quite equal to the generosity and kindness of his offers. He spoke of Mrs. Templeton and Helen with the deepest respect, and, knowing the long standing friendship which subsisted between them and all Ashley's family, delicately hinted at the frequency of Hubert Forrester's visits to the Priory; to which, he said, Lady Dallas had more than once alluded; and finished rather a long speech, in which he had no interruption from Ashley, by fervently expressing his hope that, if rumor spoke truly, the course of true love might flow smooth for the fair Constance.

But perceiving, at length, that this subject had no interest for Ashley, who had been very busy adding up some figures on a piece of paper, he turned the conversation to the state of repairs at the Rectory, which Ashley found he must again visit that same day: therefore suiting his dinner-hour to his young friend's engagements, Mr. Morton left him.

Very slowly indeed did Ashley walk toward the church, and when he reached one particular spot, whence there was a most beautiful view of the Priory, its immediate grounds and park, he sat down. Long, long did he sit there, lost in thought; and very grave, nay, sad, was the expression which was impressed on his countenance when he rose, and sighing deeply, prepared for his return to the Hermitage. Ah! he had lost so much time idling up in the churchyard, that he could not fulfill his promise of again seeing Mrs. Templeton; and as he went away early the next morning, he left a note of apology for his omission, and took leave of Mr. Morton, with an increased consciousness of that gentleman's worth.

Now what is all this about Hubert Forrester's visits to the Priory? is it not possible for him to ride over there with "little messages from his mother to Constance—to Mrs. Templeton," without rumor detecting some other motive? Rumor has, in general, so bad a character for veracity, that when she is true, it would be cruel not to own it—and so when she said that the gay young heir of the Forresters was as much attracted by the sweet face of Constance, as by the sympathy he truly felt for her sister, the faithful historian is bound to admit it was a fact.

And what says Constance? is the next inquiry—one not so easily answered.

Shortly before Mrs. West's removal to Harrowgate, and when Hubert had just returned from a continental tour he had made with young Morton from some quarter, and by some means which she could not distinctly trace, Constance had received a vague impression that Hubert was attached to Laurette. Now, it could not be that this whisper had emanated from Laurette herself; no delicately-minded lady speaks of such things till the gentleman puts them beyond a doubt—above all, no lady so proud and reserved as Laurette. Nor had she spoken—she had merely insinuated, and this so dexterously, that while every word had the exact effect she intended, it was difficult to remember who had spoken them; and Constance, not caring about the truth or falsehood of the report, gave herself no trouble to investigate it, while Hubert's frequent visits to the Priory seemed only a confirmation.

But when Laurette left for Forest Hill, and still Hubert came daily, and almost always alone, Constance thought it very kind of him. Gradually, however, the daily visitor began to be expected? she was disappointed if he did not come at the usual hour, which she now particularly marked, and during which she did not like to be absent; his anxious inquiries after Helen ought to be answered by one of the family, and as her mother was very much with Helen, who did not usually see visitors, who but Constance could receive him?

Perhaps, had all gone smoothly and happily with Helen's engagement, Hubert would never have made the impression on the imagination of Constance which he now did. At least, he would never have had the opportunity this gave him of being a kind of consoler, a sort of confidant to her—rather dangerous characters, when the heart is unoccupied and the imagination strong—when the consoler is eminently handsome, and the consoled affectionate and enthusiastic.

Constance was naturally gay, fond of society, and possessed herself the most delightful companionable qualities, in a mind richly stored with varied information, and in a fancy of peculiar delicacy and vivacity.

All around her now was sad, gloomy, almost stern; and though we have seen how she shared and lessened the sorrows of her loved ones, there was no sense in proving her sympathy by seeking sadness and rejecting pleasure; no reason why she should close her eyes to the sun, because it did not shine on Helen. In short, before she was aware of it, the joyous, handsome vision, all undimmed by care, or darkened by the world's frown, which daily met her, became to her indispensable.

His voice was almost the only cheerful one she heard: his, almost the only smile that greeted her. He alone, in his gay ignorance of their real position, talked of happiness to Helen and her mother, or ventured to predict that the future would richly compensate for the trials of the present. And then, he was so noble in his proud bearing, yet so graceful; so gentle, so tender in his care and solicitude; so animated and eloquent in his predictions of bright days and cloudless skies!

Constance, like most girls of cultivated and poetic feelings, was an ardent admirer of beauty in every thing. Harmony of form, tone, or color was always necessary to her enjoyment; which was always diminished when discord or deformity presented itself. And she had but to look at Hubert, or to listen to him, and eye and ear alike found pleasure. And so, as many a girl not eighteen has done, she fell in love with him, convinced by all those tokens, intelligible only to the initiated, that this love was fully returned; and it was; Hubert loved Constance, as he believed none had ever loved before—the creed to which every lover subscribes—and this he would have told her over and over again, but he had already spoken to his father, whose consent had been conditionally and very reluctantly given.

First, Mr. Forrester insisted that nothing should be said till they understood each other's characters and tastes better. Needless cause for silence and delay, thought the son, who was fully persuaded that on these points, they were thoroughly informed. Secondly, he argued that, under present circumstances, there was a kind of impropriety in such an avowal. While one sister was mourning the violent dissolution of her engagement, it seemed, to the stately old gentleman, indelicate in the other to be forming one. Finally, and he might have said chiefly, he never had liked, never could like Colonel Templeton; and some proceedings of that worthy officer's having lately reached Mr. Forrester's ears, this dislike had arisen almost to contempt; so he negotiated for delay, and trusted to accidents; for, as to interfering by a positive prohibition, that never entered his mind, where Hubert was concerned; and as the son knew this, he the more readily acquiesced in his father's suggestions. Therefore, so far as silence of the tongue went, not a word was spoken; and still Constance was quite easy and contented; and, upon the whole, rather respected the delicacy which restrained Hubert from speaking till Helen's first grief should have calmed into regret.

But Hubert had another motive in submitting to delay; he hoped that during the interval Laurette would return to Scotland; for, without being exposed to the charge of vanity, he had seen that she was not only the favorite of his parents, but that she aspired to be his favorite also. In his estimation, however, she was by no means likely to dispute the palm successfully with Constance. She was, at least, three years older than he, a seniority fatal to her views on a romantic young man of his age; she was too elaborate, too artificial in feeling and manner, without possessing the beauty of face and figure which had peculiar charms for him

In spite, however, of the silence which was observed, an instinct that rarely errs when directed by love, warned her of what was going on. Laurette knew his secret—ay, as well as if she had accompanied him in every one of his daily visits, and seen every look he bestowed on her cousin. Her plan was therefore changed, and a new one arranged, for she was bent on conquest. She did love Hubert, and this gave energy and power to her schemes While Mr. and Mrs. Forrester kept silent, she carefully avoided all that might invite confidence; but by artful lamentations about poor Helen, and the injurious effect her disappointment might have on her sister's prospects, she led the minds of her hearers into the train of thought she wished, and left them to work it out alone. Their pride was awakened, they hardly knew why or how—let them find it out, if possible—and, in order to make them sensible of her value, at this critical moment she accepted an invitation to Lady Westrough's, after which she was to return to the Priory and finish her series of English visits by going to Forest Hill.

Laurette hated Scotland, and would go anywhere rather than to Craigalan; even her pride, which might have been gratified by the princely establishment at home, was offended by the exclusive homage rendered to the young heir; and as all her early associations had been formed during the long absence of Lady Sinclair, perhaps it was only natural that she should cling to those who had been the friends of her childhood, and to that country where all she most cared for resided.

CHAPTER XXVII.

"Das schwere Herz wird nicht durch Worte leicht."—German Proverb.

Reginald, meanwhile, had fully recovered his health, and the first thing now was to decide for the future. For that purpose, a consultation was held with his friends, the Vernons.

As regarded pecuniary means, he was almost destitute, except what remained of the sum which Lord Ernest had so strangely, as it seemed at the time, forced upon him. Sea-View Cottage, to his great surprise, he found his mother had purchased, at least for a long term; for after the conversation between herself and Reginald, which has been related, she began to lay by, and the hundred pounds sent for some ornament, were solemnly set apart as the first fruit of her resolve.

Pretty, but small, with merely enough garden round it to shut out passing gazers, the sum needed for the purchase was but trifling; for it belonged to Mr. Forrester, who put little more than a nominal value on the place, when he learned her wishes.

This being neatly furnished, would probably always command a tenant; but the rent would not support Reginald, and pay the expenses of his professional studies. Lord Westrough had frankly declared his inability to help him, except in using his government influence, and to this influence Ashley hated him to resort; besides, unless this visionary appointment were held irrespective of party politics, who could say how long that to which his Lordship belonged would remain in office? Ashley said they were by no means as firm as a rock, and then all would have to begin again; just so much time lost.

"Reginald, do not irritate me by refusing to share, as far as you want, what I do not; there is all that money which was left me by my godfather, and which my generous father has allowed to accumulate, till it is a fortune. Let us enjoy it together; you are to me as my brother," said the noble Ashley; "my father and mother love you like a son."

"And Carry like another dear brother," said she, giving him her hand, which he pressed with deep emotion; "now, as a son, what should you do when a father advises?"

"Take his advice, and his help also," replied Reginald, in a husky voice, fairly overcome by their love and kindness.

"Right, my son Reginald," said the Doctor; "now we can go on better, and see our way more clearly. What are your own ideas and wishes?"

"To earn my living honorably, and as speedily as may be. Had I been permitted to have exerted myself years ago, I should by this time have been free and independent, instead of just going to school. Older than Ashley, I am fit only to be his pupil; for his profession will, if it can be managed, be mine. I like the exercise of intellect which it gives. I like the demand it makes upon the attention. I like its facts, dry though they be; its research, its quaintness, its associations with the past, connecting it so intimately with the present; these all amuse my fancy, though that word may sound inappropriate; but then, when I think of the time, all this is visionary."

"It need not be; three years soon pass away, and it seems to me this may be arranged even more easily than any other plan; what say you, Ashley?" turning to his son.

"It is already done, my dear father; while Reginald was talking, I settled it all; he is exactly the man to suit Mr. Turner; and we shall yet be distinguished characters, and have a niche in the temple of fame."

"Yes," said Caroline, "and both of you may help to swell the aristocratic ranks of merry England, which, judging from the supply it receives from your profession, would be 'fine by degrees and beautifully less,' were you too grand to accept its honors."

"If that is your amende honorable for some former high-treason speech," said Ashley, kissing his sister, "you have paid the debt, and with interest."

And it was settled that the friends should proceed to London, where Ashley was to give the benefit of his experience. Reginald wrote a long letter to Mr. Morton, informing him of the decision to which he had come, expressed his gratitude for kindness received and intended; promising, that if he needed his help, he would ask for it as frankly as it had been offered; and concluded by hoping when they met in London, he would find that time had been profitably spent.

The arrangements for Reginald were soon perfected through the zealous efforts of the Doctor and his son, and no time was lost in setting off, for Ashley, now that his services were no longer required by the side of a sick bed, avowed his anxiety to renew his legal studies, and read hard, so as to overtake interrupted time.

They were to meet daily at the chambers of the same gentleman; but great as he owned the temptation was, Reginald overruled Ashley's proposal, that they should lodge together. He frankly owned his reasons; he could not, he ought not, to live at an expense which, though quite suitable for Ashley with his means, would be absurd for him, already so deeply indebted to to the whole family. Mrs. Vernon came to his support, and entirely approved of his decision, in spite of her son's argument, that they should both actually save by clubbing their expenses; and she further proceeded to say, that Reginald, whose health still required care, should seek some comfortable lodging, removed from the smoke of London, yet within walking distance; and had arranged for him thus far, when she suddenly remembered, that in one of the letters she had received from Mrs. Templeton during Reginald's illness, she had mentioned her former nurse, Gretchen, as one whose services would be most valuable should he much longer require unremitting attention; she had therefore inclosed Gretchen, or rather Madame Stopsel's address, at Hampstead, where she let a part of what, in her former letters to her former mistress, she described as a very pretty cottage.

Mrs. Vernon read this letter, and copied the address, advising them, before they fixed on any other place, to see what accommodation Madame Stopsel offered; and she added, her knowledge of Gretchen made her certain that, as regarded care and kindness, Reginald would be better off in her simple abode, than amid all the luxuries of Mivart's hotel.

On reaching town, Ashley insisted on Reginald's remaining his guest for a short time; merely, as he said, to take off the chill of the place, and the worse chill of solitude; and in a few days they walked out to see Gretchen, having previously had an interview with her husband, from whom they learned, that if they were satisfied with what she could offer, she could receive one as a lodger.

Reginald was pleased to find that he should here breathe a purer air than that of the great Babylon, and on arriving at the cottage was charmed with the combination of neatness and comfort that every thing presented.

Under the pretense of making Mr. West rest, while she showed Mr. Vernon the view, she led the latter into the garden; and as she had heard only a very disjointed account of all relating to her sweet lady and dear child, as she affectionately called Helen, Ashley, knowing how justly she was valued by those she had so faithfully served, gave her as detailed a history of what had occurred as time would admit of, while her tears and exclamations of sorrow frequently interrupted the narrative.

"Never fear for Mr. Reginald," was her assurance, as they returned to the house; "I shall cherish him for Miss Helen's sake, let alone old acquaintance at Sea Cottage. Ah! sir, what days they were, when you were all little creatures—long before he came; and Miss Constance, the laughing darling, well do I remember the sorrow her sweet baby eyes opened on. And pray, sir, come often, it will do you both good."

And often enough he did come, though it is doubtful what good it did him, to hear tales without end, first of Helen, then of Constance—chiefly, it must be confessed, of the latter—for he made her comprehend, that, as there was not the faintest hope of the engagement ever being renewed, it was better not to remind Mr. West of his loss by naming Helen.

Reginald found the life he now led so congenial to his tastes, so healthy to both mind and body, that, had it not been for one corroding care, "one fatal remembrance," he would have called this the brightest, as well as the most profitable, period of his life. He was working for independence; and, by the blessing of Providence, he felt sure that he should attain it. There was every inducement to urge him on; the expectations of his valued friends must be realized, his debt, his pecuniary debt, must be repaid, and this could be done only by unwearying perseverance; and if, sometimes, he allowed himself the sad indulgence of thinking, that years hence, when, perhaps, both were old, if they chanced to meet, she should not have to be ashamed of him, this was an additional incentive to exertion.

He, therefore, courageously looked his real position in the face; he saw its difficulties; he saw also the means of overcoming them; and finding, by experience, that occupation was in every case his best friend, in allowing no leisure for unhealthy and useless regrets, he sought employment on this account, as well as for emolument; and having been introduced to a publisher who was able to appreciate his literary acquirements, busied himself in exercising his really rich imagination in light literature, after the dry and severe labor of his adopted profession had been performed.

Ashley, who had a jealous horror of any patronizing interference, rather encouraged Reginald in declining, at least at present, the very kind invitations sent by Lord Westrough, though he saw the value of preserving his friendship; but he took every opportunity of introducing his friend to several whom he valued for their worth and intelligence, and whose acquaintance was likely to be beneficial to Reginald in the course of his future career; so that, though constantly and usefully occupied, his life was neither monotonous nor solitary.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

"Courts are unquestionably the seats of good breeding, and must necessarily be so; otherwise they would be the seats of violence and desolation."—World.

Mrs. Templeton, after the conversation with Constance, which had reference to their visit to Grantham, wrote immediately to propose it; in answer to which, a most cordial welcome had been promised; and anxiously did she await the period when the travellers would set them at liberty.

But, unfortunately, Lord Hurstwood's arrival was delayed; and till he had been received and fêted, they knew there was no chance of their moving. Besides, the Colonel himself had lately been strange and moody, so that even Constance lost her accustomed freedom of manner in his presence; and a violent misunderstanding between him and Cooper, relating to some blunder about felling timber, had in no way tended to make matters more agreeable—and, as if for a climax to these uncertainties, without any previous hint of his intentions, he one day gave notice that he was going to London, where he should probably remain a week.

Under all these adverse circumstances, Mrs. Templeton felt it wrong to keep her brother and his wife, day after day, in a state of suspense, which might perhaps interfere with other plans. She therefore proposed to the girls that the visit should, for this time, be relinquished.

Had Constance spoken with her usual frankness, she would have given a glad assent to this; for the Priory had a daily visitant who rendered it the delectable land to her—but remembering that her original object in proposing the change, had been the benefit which her mother and sister were likely to gain from it, she preferred leaving the decision to them. Helen had, at first, embraced the plan, because it had seemed to please her mother; as to herself, she was altogether indifferent about place or change—the one who, to her, would have made a paradise in the desert was away, and what cared she more for Grantham than Seabrooke?

Therefore Mrs. Templeton stated her difficulties, and declined the invitation, though it was with a pang; but she was glad she had so decided, when Lady Grantham wrote to say, that as Cecil had not lately been very well, they should go to the Pyrenees for baths. Henry, his wife, and Cecilia, were, during their absence, to occupy Grantham; but that the latter would like to visit the Priory before settling at home, as she so greatly wished to see them all after her long absence in Italy. Her ladyship concluded with affectionate inquiries after Helen, strongly advising Mrs. Templeton to let her travel with them, as she was sure change of scene was desirable.

"Oh, dear mamma! I can not leave you and Constance," exclaimed Helen, in alarm. "I am much better here with you, than anywhere else without you—you are all to me now," she added sadly.

"Then, my love, I shall not again mention it—except to thank your aunt for thinking of you."

"And, mamma, how glad I shall be to see Cecilia," said Constance; "she is so right-minded and kind."

"So she is," replied Mrs. Templeton; "even her occasional want of, what shall I say? not refinement—"

"Gentleness," suggested Helen.

"Yes, gentleness, is pardoned—in her evident wish to oblige—besides, she is so free from artifice."

"And not artifice alone—but art or artificialness," observed Constance, "if there be such a word; I prefer her rather decided and brusque manner, to Laurette's correct but cold elegance—even Cecilia's figure, and her commanding style, are, to me, more pleasing than Laurette's finished grace and slender form."

"And what a help she will be to us, mamma, when that formidable Lord Hurstwood comes," said Helen. "Cecilia would not care for a roomful of kings or emperors."

"Nor, in one sense, do I," cried Constance, lifting her graceful head; "all I should care for, if a really great king came here, would be not to incur his censure—merely because the esteem of the good is always valuable. I do not think rank, however elevated, would deprive me of my self-possession; but what sort of a man is Lord Hurstwood, mamma, that his coming excites so much interest—you have often seen him?"

"No, not very often, my dear. When we first came here, his father, the late lord, was living; he died a few years ago. I then first saw his present lordship, who soon left for St. Petersburg, where, I hear, he much distinguished himself in the management of some difficult and important political question. He is now expected from Ireland, where he has large property, and it is said that he means to remain in England."

"Ah, mamma," said Constance, laughing, "how cunningly you think you have evaded my other question—what sort of a man is he?"

"How do you mean, my child?"

"You shall not escape, you maneuvering mother; first, is he handsome?"

"He most likely was."

"Was—ah! that means, I suppose, that he is so no longer, and that he is old."

"He is some years younger than your papa, I imagine—forty-seven or eight."

"But then papa is so handsome—to me he never looks old," said Constance, musing; "if he resembled his portrait, I think there never could have been a finer-looking man."

Mrs. Templeton very calmly replied—"And it is an excellent likeness—but I have seen faces which I think much finer"—here a deep sigh from Helen almost startled her. Mrs Templeton felt sad, for she knew her child's thoughts were of Reginald—though her own allusion included Ashley Vernon—but, as if she had not remarked Helen's interruption, she proceeded to say, "for instance, Hubert Forrester."

Ah, Mrs. Templeton! you are bent on playing at cross purposes, for Constance nearly let her watch fall, and was so intent on fastening it safely that she was silent, and it was Helen who returned to the charge.

"Then, mamma, we are to infer that you do not like Lord Hurstwood—Constance, mamma is in the trap at last—and there I shall keep her till she fully and truly replies."

"My dears," said Mrs. Templeton, pleased to see her sad Helen making an effort to be cheerful, "I can not reply by a yes or a no—so you must allow me to arrange my materials and separate good from indifferent and bad. I think Lord Hurstwood, in one sense, a man of very polished manners—those manners which a person of the least taste and refinement can hardly fail to acquire who frequents the best society—I was told that he long and sincerely mourned the loss of an only sister who died when on the eve of marriage."

"Well," slowly remarked Constance, "though not much in his favor, all this is not much against him—and my knowledge of the world tells me," and she laughed at her ignorance, "that this is ot to be despised—but go on with your analysis."

"I do not think, if he were to marry, his wife eed be unhappy—though one with very strong ffections would feel disappointed. I believe, also, hat a sensible, totally unromantic woman might e very happy with him—but that he is selfish, nd rather heartless, I fear is true—and nicely eighed, his Lordship is, by me, found wanting. What say you, Helen?"

"I, mamma! he is precisely one of that species hich I particularly dislike," was her decided eply. "But when will the dear Vernons return?" he asked, no longer caring to discuss his Lordhip's character.

"Oh, not for two months, so my last letter ays," answered her mother; "they have been inited to Craigalan, but probably only the Doctor nd Caroline will accept—as Mrs. Vernon wishes o remain with Charles and his family."

"Is Mr. Victor Morton invited to meet Lord Iurstwood?" said Helen.

"Certainly, he is your papa's great favorite; nd were it not for the awkward misunderstandng which attended his father's possession of the lermitage, and his very stiff reserve since, I am ure he would be included also. However, he eems much pleased at his son's popularity."

"Mamma, I think I have discovered a secret bout Mr. Victor," said Helen; "by accident I ound out that he wears the miniature of a lady round his neck!"

"Which means," said her mother, "that he is n love, or that you think so—which?"

"You are right—what else can it be?"

"Well, as he always seems very merry and light-hearted—though that is a wrong description of one who is supposed to have lost his heart—I conclude it is a satisfactory exchange; and thinking him true, and his father kind and sensible, I wish him happiness."

"I believe," said Constance, "Helen is mistaken—it is a miniature of his mother, so says Carry. Mr. Morton is a merchant, is he not?"

"Yes, or rather he was, for I have met him so often at the Rectory, that we are quite confidential and friendly, and chat about his affairs freely. Then he is so generous and manly in all his opinions and deeds, besides standing high in the Doctor's esteem, that I hope Victor may fulfill all his wishes—only I think a few years' more experience would be desirable before forming an attachment, if Helen's idea be correct."

Constance blushed painfully; he and Hubert were so nearly of the same age, that this remark was as applicable to one as the other. Happily for her, the conversation again turned on Cecilia's expected visit, and terminated without any more of those "words at random spoken," which are often so embarrassing.

And Cecilia at length arrived, amazingly improved by her foreign residence, and yet without having lost any of that sincerity which was so very refreshing, or that courageous love of truth on which those who knew her so safely reposed.

"What a splendid specimen of English beauty and foreign ease Miss Grantham is!" said Lady Dallas to Mrs. Forrester after Cecilia had duly renewed her acquaintance with her Seabrooke friends. "Sir William calls her Juno the majestic."

"Yes," replied Mrs. Forrester, "she is very handsome, but rather too demonstrative for my taste. I own to admiring the elegant rather than the magnificent—and certainly, in the former, Miss Sinclair excels."

"Oh! certainly," acquiesced her Ladyship; "but they are so different, we hardly ever think of comparing them. But what says our oracle, Mr. Hubert? his opinion is of consequence to the young ladies."

"Oh! Hubert," rather stiffly said Mrs. Forrester; "Hubert would never admire any one so ready to take the lead as Miss Grantham. He prefers the quiet and retiring—he has not lost his taste for an English blush."

"Ah! and no one blushes more beautifully than that sweet girl Constance Templeton," was the rejoinder of the blundering visitor, never imagining Mrs. Forrester's speech had reference to Laurette, who hardly ever changed countenance under any circumstances. "It is truly delightful to watch the color deepen and fade on her eloquent face—so perfectly feminine and graceful as she is; and yet how bravely she bore up under their late trial, and sustained the spirits of both her mother and sister."

"It has indeed been a sad disappointment," observed Mrs. Forrester, "sad to all; for these events often leave an uncomfortable cloud on the prospects of a whole family."

Happily, her figure of speech was cloudy also, and by no means clear to Lady Dallas, who would never have imagined how sorrow to one member of a family could involve disgrace to the rest; and probably thinking that the lady of Forest Hill was only more rhetorical than usual, she still went on pitying Helen, unconscious that she was thus injuring Constance. But Laurette's insinuation had not been lost on Mrs. Forrester, who soon felt its effects; for the more she realized it, the less did she like the idea of Hubert's marrying one whose sister had been disappointed and pitied. And yet Mrs. Forrester was kind!

CHAPTER XXIX.

"I'm the strangest person in the whole world; for what care I for money? I write for reputation."—The Rehearsal.

REGINALD was one day emerging from the Temple, deeply plunged in thought about some legal difficulty, when a gentleman, whom he had not noticed, but whom he nearly ran against, exclaimed, "Eyes right, young Chancellor, or there will be an action for assault and battery"—his quick sight having detected some papers which the other carried—and then, as Reginald stopped to make an apology, he shouted, "West, Reggy West! or my name is not Charles Stacey."

"Good heavens, Stacey! You here? how glad I am to see you!"

"And how glad I am to hear you say so," replied the new comer; "but for God's sake! do not lose sight of me in this English Cimmerium, or, like Reputation, you will never see me again. I am going to transact a little business at a banker's near here; come with me, and then I will drive you home. My horse is too aristocratic to leap Temple Bar, so I have left him on the other side. Now, no excuse, I am deaf to it," as Reginald began with, "I am afraid—"

"You had better go quietly," said he named Stacey, "or I will call the police, and vow you have run away from your lodging without paying the rent—and a good joke that would be, too;" and he laughed heartily at the idea.

Nothing loth, Reginald yielded to this violent detention, only he wished to inform Ashley of it, as he had promised to meet him in the course of an hour at his chambers. But his companion would not set him free even for this purpose, so the check was cashed, and away they rattled, till they came to a very pretty villa, near Kensington, where Reginald was introduced to a very pretty little woman, as "my friend Reginald West," and Reginald West was told "this is my little wife."

"And now you are here, you must stay and dine," said Mr Stacey; but this Reginald positively declined, alleging a previous engagement to Ashley, at which name the other again shouted with pleasure; and, learning the address of each, and being pacified with a promise that the next day but one they would both dine with him, Reginald was suffered to depart.

Charles Stacey was a college acquaintance of both Ashley and Reginald. He entered shortly after the former did, and being a young man of extraordinary genius and most amiable manners, he soon won, not only their admiration, but their interest.

By birth he was by no means their equal; but where there are agreeable, companionable qualities, and nothing in the conduct or sentiments ungentlemanly and offensive, frank and open-hearted youth does not generally care for pedigree. His mother was a widow, and he her only child; but the nobleman, whose Irish agent her husband had been, and who had discharged his sometimes unpleasant duties to the benefit and satisfaction of all parties, promised to look after this fatherless boy, and had faithfully kept his promise. Stacey, having been well educated, was sent to college preparatory to his taking orders as there was a small living in his patron's gift which was destined for him. And after being thus provided for, he was given to understand that he must take care of his future fortune himself.

This provision, though perhaps more than he would have obtained had his father lived, was one very little admired by young Stacey! his ambition or imagination had pictured a something, though he might have been puzzled to say what; but a finale to his academical career very different from a quiet, modest country living, with its scanty income, its incessant and abundant labor. His first impression was that he was a very ill-used person: he forgot that his education, though excellent, had been economically procured at a large, but not public school; that nothing had ever been said or done by his noble protector to justify the notion that he meant to educate him as his own sons were, though during the holidays, and on other occasions, he associated freely with them; this permission, though kindly intended, was perhaps a mistake, tending to encourage unfounded pretensions; nor was it the only one. The young man's own wishes had never been consulted as regarded his future destination; had they been, his disinclination and unfitness for clerical duties would have been discovered, and something more congenial to his tastes and talents might have been offered to him.

To his mother he hesitated not to avow his dislike to the path marked out for him; but she was a silly, vain woman, who, though she thought her clever Charles fit for any thing, and nothing too good for him, had distant and indistinct visions of church dignitaries, prebends' stalls, lawn sleeves, and perhaps, in her ignorance and folly, even of the pope's triple crown; so she talked about the gentility of the church till in her mind gentility stood next to, if not in the place of, godliness; and drawing largely on fable and fairy land, she so filled Charles's imaginative brain with a fashionable congregation listening with rapt attention to his eloquence, and young ladies in love with the handsome clergyman, that these dreams jostled and drove away common sense and her homely progeny, and had the field all to themselves.

And so behold the future "conquering hero" in canonicals, at Cambridge, where, preparatory to his becoming the pet of the congregation, he became the pet of the combination-rooms. Instead of stealing young hearts away by sentimental sermons and good looks, he said and wrote good things, and gave a welcome to the enemy which steals men's brains; his witticisms were quoted and circulated far and wide, but the heads of the university forgot him, or passed him unnoticed; his bon mot would set the table in a roar, but his neglect of lectures and chapel made tutors look grave; in short, he was the life of his party—but, he was rusticated!

Ashley, who was more constantly at Cambridge than Reginald, had often remonstrated, but in vain—he had threatened to withdraw his friendship, equally in vain; the threat he himself found too difficult for performance, for Stacey was one of those troublesome persons called, "no one's enemy but his own;" though where either the truth or the appropriateness of the designation lies, it seems difficult to discover, for the man who is his own enemy, is, directly or indirectly, the enemy of all who have any dealings or association with him.

Stacey, however, left Cambridge generally regretted—those who condemned his conduct lamented this waste of talent and opportunity, while his thoughtless associates bewailed his departure as an irreparable loss—for who was now to supply the place of this prince of good fellows? He left also, indebted to almost every one who had money to lend, though, in justice to him, it must be said that he was aghast when he became aware of the amount of his liabilities—but again he rallied, for when his disgrace fell upon him like a thunderbolt, "Never mind, old fellow! we will see after you," was said and meant by many of his noble and wealthy particulars; and some kept their word.

And thus did his clerical prospects close in, these he did not much regret or lament—he had long ago discovered, that over-crowded congregations are disagreeable in more senses than one, and that girls who weep over their prayer-books, invariably have colds and red noses—but then, this news killed his mother, and to her he was tenderly attached; we do not mean, that on hearing of his disgrace she dropped down dead, but she never recovered from the effects of the shock, was never again happy or well, and shortly afterward died."

CHAPTER XXX.

"I remarked with what justice of distribution he directed his talk to a wide circle—he amused the timid, softened the supercilious, and opened the reserved."—Dr. Johnson.

How often do we say, speaking of pain, "it was as bad as it could be,"—or of sorrow, "I could not have gone through more."

The day after Cecilia's arrival, Constance was so much indisposed with a violent cold, that Mr. Curtis condemned her to remain a prisoner in her room. "No such terrible fate after all," as he smilingly remarked, glancing at the numerous accessories of comfort and luxury by which she was surrounded.

It was while she was still an invalid, and before Colonel Templeton had returned from his unexpected visit to London, that Lord Hurstwood's arrival at the hall was announced, and the day after the report he presented himself at the Priory. Mrs. Templeton expressed her regret at her husband's absence, who was expected that same evening. His Lordship, however, seemed to bear the disappointment very philosophically, discussing, with his usual grace, various topics with Mrs. Templeton, Helen, and Cecilia, to whom he was now for the first time introduced. Laurette was most provokingly away; she had gone to look after her domestic pet at Forest Hill, whom, after all, she did not see, and on her return had the mortification to learn, that she had missed the introduction to Lord Hurstwood, for Laurette was a thorough coquette; perhaps also she meant to try the old game of playing off the Peer against the Squire.

Lord Hurstwood had remained some time, indeed, rather a long time for a call, when he suddenly remembered he had a very important affair about which he wished for the Colonel's opinion, and whose absence he seemed to find so inconvenient, that Mrs. Templeton, though scarcely sure that she was doing what her husband would approve of, invited him to luncheon the next day; an invitation which was promptly accepted.

As he had led his family to expect, the Colonel arrived the same evening; but either his business in town had not proceeded to his wishes, or he was tired or bilious, for he brought with him a temper, which, had not the presence of his nieces in a great degree restrained, would in some shape or other have been displayed to his wife and daughter more offensively than it was. Even the arrival of Cecilia failed to chase away the foul fiend; and complaining of the absence of Constance fatigue, any thing which furnished the semblance of an excuse for his manner, he was not seen by any of them after they left the dining-room.

"My uncle is amiable," said Laurette, sarcastically; "I hope it is edifying to be with him when he is in these moods; for I confess to feeling it a slight discipline."

"I must own that I do not think him improved either in manner or appearance," returned Cecilia; "but he looks evidently fatigued and harassed this evening; he most likely feels annoyed at Lord Ernest's unjustifiable behavior. Poor Helen! how admirably she acts. Were she and Reginald West much attached? I was in Italy during the greater part of their engagement, and therefore know but little of the particulars."

"They were very much attached," answered Laurette, "it was quite a love affair; and I should not wonder if Helen, in her romance, has decided already to renounce lovers and matrimony forever."

"That comes of having what is called une grande passion," remarked her companion; "happily, we are both too old for such a catastrophe—which, I believe, never can happen after twenty—and as sentiment was never my forte, if I ever should marry—rather an unlikely event, being 'a tocherless lass wi' a lang pedigree'—I shall be contented to receive and give a very moderate portion of love."

"Perhaps you would not object to a little aversion just to begin with," said Laurette, laughing; "but I agree with you, that at our age a marriage de convenance is the most sensible arrangement."

Had she forgotten Hubert while she said this? by no means; it was the bitter consciousness of her real feelings, and the dread she now had of their being discovered, which induced her to adopt this bantering tone; she had begun to fear that she was wrong in having permitted Hubert to suspect the truth; and was doubly careful to hide from all others.

The next day was a sort of review, preparatory to the grand field day, when all was to be stately and magnificent. Colonel Templeton, who was anxious to be on friendly terms with his noble neighbor, and much gratified to find that the overtures toward intimacy emanated first from the Hall, played the gay and courteous host to perfection; and as to his Lordship, if he had been pronounced "really very agreeable" during his morning call, his manners and conversation at luncheon were delightful—so graceful and chivalrous in his attentions to the young ladies—so respectful to Mrs. Templeton, that Helen looked at him with eyes full of gratitude—so full, that he noticed again and again the look and the eyes too, and perfectly remembered both, even after he had left her presence—and then his conversation—so perfect in the selection of subjects sure to interest, proving him both the well-read man and the accomplished courtier; Cecilia and he played admirably into each other's hands, capping anecdotes of foreign courts and customs, that never once allowed the conversation to flag.

Unfortunately, Laurette was not in her usual spirits; she complained of a headache, that convenient malady; but the truth is, she was mortified to find herself a nonentity where she meant to have been conspicuous. Though remarkably well-informed, endowed with a ready wit and graceful flow of language, she knew nothing, by experience, of foreign life, and had no personal associations with continental celebrities, and was, therefore, condemned to be a listener where she had anticipated trophies as a talker; and afforded, by her ill-concealed indifference, a marked contrast to the silent but evidently gratified attention of Helen,

Though it must have been clearly shown that Seabrooke Priory was famous neither for domestic happiness nor public gayety, on such occasions as that now about to take place, it evinced no deficiency of splendor or perfect appointment; and as Colonel Templeton glanced along and around his table, he felt that even Hurstwood Hall could not outshine the wealth and beauty which he had assembled to do honor to his lordly neighbor.

Mrs. Templeton's graceful loveliness was still conspicuous; and being desirous of supplying any deficiency of animation in Helen, with her very becoming attire, she tried to put on cheerful looks, and succeeded so well, that even her husband was pleased as well as surprised.

True to her promise, Helen, though certainly not gay, was by no means ostentatiously sad; and with her cousins, each very attractive in her own peculiar manner, assisted her mother most efficiently to receive their numerous guests.

Constance, to her infinite disappointment, was still invisible beyond her own room—indeed, by order of Mr. Curtis, Helen was banished from their joint sleeping apartment into her dressing-room, adjoining the conservatory; "Precaution," as the village Galen oracularly observed, "being better than cure; and Miss Constance had symptoms of fever and sore throat, which, though at present trifling, required care and attention."

Lord Hurstwood, whose popularity was still in the ascendant, won more golden opinions, when, in the course of the evening, he proposed to call a council of ladies, in order to arrange a déjeuner at the Hall, the grounds of which were now in all their bloom and beauty. When this proposal was received with smiling approbation by the fair hearers, he remarked, that such a bachelor establishment as his could not expect to be honored with the presence of gentle visitants until some lady would assume the temporary hostess, and be there to receive them; and addressing Mrs. Templeton, he ventured to hope that she would fill the office, in default of a permanent occupant—and Lady Dallas with her usual look of meaning, declared, that as he said these words, his eye fell very distinctly on the unconscious Helen; who certainly, so far as grace and beauty went, was very likely to attract him—a professed admirer of loveliness; since it was unanimously agreed that rarely had she looked more captivating; her white dress of rich materials was relieved by no color save that of a few natural flowers, and her graceful head and perfect features were seen to advantage by the classical style in which the splendid dark hair was arranged, while her intellect and feeling which gave grace to her movements and music to her voice were eminently visible in her varying countenance.

Cecilia Grantham looked queen-like in her rather strange foreign fashion, which, however, became her admirably; and though Laurette perhaps made a little mistake in wearing a kind of half Spanish costume, it nevertheless suited her dark beauty and elegant little figure better than might have been expected.

Of course, where all the principal families of the neighborhood were assembled, there would be the Forresters; and though Mrs. Forrester admitted to herself that as Lord Hurstwood had arranged his party at the Priory, he could not have avoided nominating Mrs. Templeton deputy-queen, she yet thought that distinction should have fallen on her, as due both to her age and the length of her residence in the county.

Mr. Forrester, also, was not quite at ease. Hubert had been so pre-occupied, so dull, so unlike himself, that his father could not but ascribe the change to the absence of Constance; and began to fear that her influence on his son's happiness was stronger than he had anticipated. He had also remarked that Colonel Templeton indulged very freely in wine—that he and Lord Hurstwood had talked a great deal with a foreign gentleman, who had accompanied a neighboring family, of gaming and gaming-houses abroad, during which he had evinced an intimate acquaintance with the mysteries of the said places, which greatly shocked the aristocratic prejudices of Mr. Forrester—a man whom pride alone would have kept from any amusement in which sharpers and swindlers were almost sure to be his associates; even had not his habits and tastes been opposed to speculation and risk. In short, he never had liked the Colonel. They differed in all essentials, and many hints which he had collected from various quarters acquired strength from this conversation, and reminded him of the exceedingly doubtful character of the party by whom the Colonel was accompanied some years ago, on his return from the Continent, so that he left the Priory with all his prejudices arrayed more violently than ever against Hubert's suit.

CHAPTER XXXI

"Ye gods! what crime had my poor father done,
That you should make a poet of his son?"
VANBRUGH.

We left Reginald in his humble but peaceful retreat at Hampstead gradually learning what was meant by the words labor and study. Happily his acquaintance with the difficulties which attended his choice did not daunt nor deter him from steadily pursuing it. Happily, also, as novelty wore off, indifference did not succeed; but he went on day by day finding his views of life and its responsibilities clearer, more enlarged—his self-knowledge imperceptibly leading him to a self-reliance he would formerly have thought almost presumptuous—but which he now saw was quite compatible with the conviction that there was still much to learn.

As he realized the fact, that henceforth he must take rank among the sons of labor, and work for a living, the charm which was at first thrown over the notion of independence did not dissolve.

He not only found his energies respond cheerfully to the calls for exertion, and furnish a supply of industry equal to the toil and need—but he found that he was really happier—better able to bear his trials and losses with resignation, than when condemned to inactivity and the ennui of unemployed leisure. He was now making a successful struggle, and this assurance gave him dignity in his own eyes; he was laboring for independence, and the thought cheered him in his daily task.

It is true he never forgot that she whom he still tenderly loved was separated from him forever. It is true he acutely felt the great change and blight that had fallen on his own once brilliant prospects. But the remembrance was not one of constant and unmitigated bitterness. Life had still its duties for him to perform, and in the faithful discharge of them he trusted to find a fitting recompense.

His new course of study at first entirely occupied him; but when he had, by the help of the gentleman with whom he placed himself, arranged that, and judiciously apportioned his time, he found there was still enough leisure for social purposes, and the pursuit of that literary occupation which he hoped would prove remunerative, and relieve him from pecuniary dependence on friends whose generosity was exceeded only by their kindness and delicacy.

Having related to Ashley his unexpected meeting with Charles Stacey, and the engagement he had conditionally accepted for both of them, it was agreed that Ashley should write and confirm the acceptance; and at the time appointed they made their appearance at the villa, the elegant exterior of which was only in keeping with the style and comfort of the internal arrangements.

They were the only guests, Stacey saying he anticipated too much pleasure in talking over old times to have their confidential chat restrained by the presence of a less intimate friend. Rumor had informed him of Reginald's changed fortune, but there was still much of which he was ignorant, and which he felt a kind interest to learn; while, as Stacey's spoke in the wheel of fortune seemed now uppermost, his guests felt much curiosity to hear how he had fared since they had all parted at Cambridge.

Mrs. Stacey joined them at an elegant dinner, but apologized for the necessity of leaving them to take their coffee alone—she was engaged to a soirée at her friend Lady De Vere's, and expected her Ladyship's carriage very shortly to fetch her.

"And so you two industrious fellows are going to graduate at Westminster Hall?" said Stacey, when they were alone; "well, success attend you, you deserve it, for having the courage to make the attempt. I tried it after I left Cambridge. A solemn old fellow, who was, however, very kind and generous, recommended it, but I soon found the life would never suit me."

"Why not?" asked Ashley, anxious to learn what time had made of this "no man's enemy but his own."

"Why, my dear fellow, the atmosphere of chambers did not agree with my constitution. The dust and rust of legal antiquities and curiosities would have been fatal to my genius. My fancy turned every deed into a deed of horror; and, to my imagination, parchment, 'parchment was and nothing more,' when, in a lucky moment, I met Lord Charlton, who was so shocked at the inroads eating mutton had made on my health, that he carried me off to spend Christmas at the Duke's in the north, where there was a house full of company, all, as the puffers of oil and cheap coats say, 'the élite and haut-volé' Well, such a glorious time as we had of it! Tableaux vivans, private theatricals, balls, flirtations, 'such rousing of the owls in a night-catch,' for, I promise you, my mellifluous voice was at a premium—and, to crown all, it was discovered that I had a tolerable gift for improvising! so I leave you to imagine how I was courted and fêted!"

"And, after all this banqueting at Olympus, this feasting on nectar and ambrosia," inquired Reginald, "how did your genius condescend to fold its wings and brood over the earthly matters of the law?"

"Oh! it was rebellious, absolutely contumacious!" was the gay reply; "flatly refused to soil its plumage by contact with such dirty literature. And when I called on my good old quiz" —(this good old quiz had paid the fees and promised all reasonable help)—"to tell him jurisprudence was not my element, he drily retorted, 'Nor any other prudence, I believe,' but congratulated me on having so soon made the discovery, as it would save him any further waste of money. Cool that—was it not?"

"Very," answered Ashley, almost as drily as the good old quiz might have done.

Stacey continued, "My mother's little fortune" (her fortune, poor old woman! it consisted of a few hundreds, saved by a self-denial that would have been laudable, had it been for a better purpose than to minister to her son's extravagance)—"had already been spent; in fact, it took wings and flew away, during a short visit I paid to Paris directly I left Alma Mater; but, luckily, I had been introduced to a bookseller by his friend, my crusty old master; to him I now went—for the exchequer was low—in short, was empty. I knocked off a few songs as a specimen —they pleased him, he paid me, and really paid well, liberally—took me to his country-house—and, by Jove! you should see the style in which some of these shop-keeping fellows live. I was inspired by green fields and clear sky, and, presto! there was soon a pretty little volume ready for the discerning public. My fortune was made; why should I, with a mine in my head, bury myself in gloom and seclusion? besides, rank, beauty, elegance, which almost fought for the prize—my unworthy self—were much more to my taste than blue bags, wigs and gowns, and all the atrocious masquerade of bench and bar. My dainty muse, my delicate Egeria, likes them not; while there is scarcely a coroneted album in the land, that has not some gossamer contribution from me, inspired by the fashion and grace which fill England's noble saloons."

"Ah!" said Ashley, with a comic emphasis, which greatly amused Reginald, who believed he read what was passing in his mind—as to the value of such inspiring sources. "But you have not told us your love episode, and it is treason to Mrs. Stacey to omit that."

"It is soon said," replied Stacey; "I have lately married a nice little wife, and—me voilà."

"And a very comfortable sight you present," remarked Reginald; "may you go on and prosper, and your shadow never be less."

"No fear of that, my dear fellow," said Stacey; "but your forbearance has made me detestably egotistical, and so dismiss we this subject; it is now your turn to relate your adventures, therefore imitate me, and give them in full."

He had heard a good deal of what Reginald briefly related—and listened with that kindness which was one of his characteristics, for kind he was, and generous also—so, without any allusion to Helen, Reginald told of his present pursuits, hopes, and wishes—but when he said he was employing his leisure in attempts at miscellaneous authorship, Stacey eagerly exclaimed, "I know a man whom you will suit, and who will exactly suit you—can you meet me to-morrow at the Institution? I have no other way in which I can show my friendly interest; and it must be to-morrow, as the next day Susan and I leave home to assist at a few theatrical amusements at Roehampton; and when these will be over, and all the invitations to which they are sure to lead, neither I nor the genius of gayety can say—can you come?"

Reginald promised to be punctual, and Stacey repeated, "I will introduce you to the very man to further your project."

In this autobiography, as in every other, a few chasms need filling up; the brilliant coloring of the self painted artist requires a little toning down, and the elaborate and profuse embroidery with which the common texture of the material is concealed must be carefully removed. At no time is it so difficult to keep strictly to truth as when we are the heroes or heroines of our own story—and Charles Stacey, a poet, a man of imagination and fancy, was very little likely to steer clear of this rock a-head to all biographers, who are sure to tell too little or too much—for instance, he did not tell that twice he had been arrested; on the first occasion a few "good-hearted fellows" subscribed their superfluous cash and set him free; but the next time, he was obliged to mortgage his brain before he was liberated—his publisher freed him from one sort of imprisonment to inclose him in another; and the genius that pined away at the companionship of rusty and dusty legal records, that spurned all rule and all law, sold itself, pawned itself, haggled about pounds, shillings, and pence, and, for a term, became that horror of intellect—that bane to talent—that mental degradation—a bookseller's hack!

Stacey was happily rescued from the claws of the harpy who flourished and grew fat on human brain, and furnished his country-house luxuriously from the life-springs of genius; and found a steady, just, and liberal friend in the gentleman to whom—free from all petty rivalry—he was going to introduce Reginald. He also omitted to say that his wife, a guileless, but rather weak little body, was Lady De Vere's protégée; the word is by no means synonymous with friend, an explanation not so needless as many think. Her Ladyship had permitted her to give a concert at Rochampton, to which she, as hostess, had an unlimited supply of tickets for self and friends, besides acquiring, without any cost, the character of being a liberal patroness of art. There Stacey first met her; they sang together, and, by the display of their varied talents, charmed the noble company, by the greater part of whom they were probably forgotten the next day; and after a few weeks' acquaintance, married on the strength of their sweet voices, and for the same cause were continually in demand at one aristocratic réunion or another, where they willingly went, under the delusion that they were guests, while the truth is, they were only assistants gratis!

All this time, and while they were leading this butterfly life, Stacey's poem, which had been announced as "shortly to appear," had reached only a few hundred lines—he himself was in debt, and his little wife's wedding finery began to look very shabby by daylight, while she was without the means of supplying the deficiencies. This he did not mention; but his memory must have been very bad, or he would not have forgotten to tell his friends, when they congratulated him on being the owner of a villa so elegantly furnished, that it and its contents were only hired!

"And what think you of our friend Charles?" asked Reginald of Ashley, as they returned to town.

"I think all I have heard and seen is both unsatisfactory and painful, except his frank offer to you; and that proves there is some good stuff in him still," was the reply. "Why, my dear Reggy, it is easy to see through the flimsy life he is leading; and, unless he soon becomes conscious of the rottenness of all on which he seems so confidentially to lean, he must fall. Good God! to think that a man with a pair of hands and a well-informed mind, can allow himself to be juggled and cheated as he is, astonishes me; and because he is admitted to the society of lords and ladies, how he can be so blind to their meanness, as well as his own, is incomprehensible.

"But, my dear fellow, do you intend to say, that a man of inferior birth or fortune can not be received by the most lofty and most wealthy without forfeiting his independence and self-respect?"

"By no means—nobility, with intellect, will always be the first to seek and honor the latter wherever it is found allied to real worth—but it is the degradation of patronage—the paralyzing efforts of familiarity without respect, which I so detest. It is useless for Stacey to say or think, 'I am their equal; nay, in learning, in talent, in genius, their superior;' for he is throwing himself away among those who, having little or none of these qualities, do not value them in him. On the contrary, they are contented to take his tinsel instead of his gold—his excitement instead of his inspiration. But he must come and see us, and discover, that plodders as we are, we are honored with the companionship, and friendship, too, of the leading minds of the day."

"And no bad exchange for the introduction which he has so kindly promised me," said Reginald.

This promise Stacey redeemed at the appointed time, and it led to results most valuable to Reginald, who felt his mind and power of application strengthen, as he judiciously exerted and worked them both.

CHAPTER XXXII.

"But you are no such man; you are rather point device in your accoutrements, as loving yourself, than securing the love of any other."—As You Like It.

THE signal for gayety which Lord Hurstwood's arrival had given, was promptly responded to by the county families; and after the fête at the Hall which was on a scale of unusual magnificence, party vied with party in receiving and doing honor to the noble giver of so sumptuous an entertainment.

It was very mortifying that at the moment when Seabrooke had an unusual fit of hilarity, and when visiting and pleasure seemed the order of the day, Constance Templeton was excluded from all participation in these festivities. It is true she was no longer confined to her room, but it was thought more prudent to keep her at home, safe from the fatigue and excitement of large parties and crowded rooms.

When, at length, these extraordinary dissipations were over, Cecilia returned to Grantham; and Laurette, loving dove, hovering round the nest which contained her treasure, accepted an invitation to the Grange; and Seabrooke once more resumed its quiet but still friendly intercourse.

During the whole of this season of gayety, in which Constance had taken no part, there was a frequent, nay, a constant visitor to the Priory—one whose presence to the convalescent more than compensated for the privation.

It seemed as if is were fated that Hubert Forrester should be associated in her mind with the character of consoler in all periods of sorrow, or sickness, or loneliness; for though both her mother and Helen had offered to give up any engagement which took them from her, Constance would not hear of the proposal—and this most affectionately and truly on her sister's account; who seemed so much better for the exertion these parties exacted, that Constance unselfishly insisted on her attending them, though this involved the absence of Mrs. Templeton, without whose chaperonage she could not have gone. Sometimes Constance thought that she ought to tell her mother of all that was passing in her heart—and felt that it would be a great comfort to do so—but she was checked by the reflection, that, till Hubert spoke, she could not, with propriety, be the one to break the silence. Had her mother been less engrossed with Helen, less solicitous to support and spare her, she surely must have noticed much that was passing; but there was no one whose vigilance could supply her want of observation.

The Forresters had decided in keeping their own counsel—the fancy might die away. Laurette ignored the matter from the same motive, and a hope that such would be the case; and though that Argus of the neighborhood, Lady Dallas, had during one of their conversations alluded to Hubert's evident admiration of Constance, her cousin denied the charge, and silenced if she did not convince her Ladyship, by assuring her that such a report, if it reached the ears of the parents on either side, would be extremely injurious—and might lead to great mischief.

It happened that one day Lord Hurstwood and the Colonel were riding through the woods belonging the latter, when his Lordship, pointing to some trees, remarked, "You cut very young here, do you not?"

"Cooper, my agent, marks very young trees," was the reply—"but these will not fall yet: indeed, he involved me, or rather himself, in a scrape about several hundred he cut on the Hermitage side—it almost ended in a quarrel between us—happily I interfered in time to save these, though they still bear tokens of the dangers they ran; they are now safe for several years, though I wish they were not—for in consequence of some extensive improvements I have been making, I should be glad to turn my wood into gold."

"This is a splendid property," said the Peer; "and it must richly repay you for any outlay you may make—I do not know of a more compact and beautiful place anywhere."

"So my daughters will one day find it," replied the owner; "but with both of them to introduce, and very likely soon to portion, I do not find my expensive outlay come back quite fast enough." Expensive and extensive as he represented both outlay and improvements, he very wisely abstained from pointing out either—and, indeed, his Lordship must have been blessed with extraordinary power of vision, to have seen what was only imaginary. He, therefore, replied with much gallantry, "I should think with such daughters, though I have seen very little of the younger, and especially with this noble estate to divide between them eventually, you need not be saving and screwing for portions; and I take this opportunity of saying, what I have for some time meditated doing, that if you will grant me the elder, I shall consider her quite gift enough without so many thousands down—for, on my honor, I never saw a more lovely creature anywhere."

Almost speechless with amazement, the Colonel had, however, too much presence of mind to show it, lest it would seem as if the offer were such as he had no right to expect; he therefore merely replied with a laugh, "Oh! win her by all means, my Lord, you have my consent;" and then remembering, that when his Lordship's offer became known in the county, the history of Helen's recent engagement would be told him, with Heaven knows how many historical embellishments, he determined to be beforehand with gossip, and to make the first impression; and added carelessly, as if the affair had been one of mere nursery folly—"I ought to tell you, that Helen is rather romantic, and there was a notion of affection between her and young Mr. West; play-companions they were, almost from the cradle—but the folly of Lord Ernest completely extinguished that faint spark."

"Oh! I think nothing of these childish absurdities," was the composed reply of this man so well read in foreign courts; "I have lived too long among continental manners to attach the least importance to these passagères fancies—and upon the whole, either custom or conviction leads me also to prefer the foreign plan of letting experienced relatives conduct the whole of these negotiations; in this, I have no doubt you agree with me."

Of course he did, and would have been very glad had his daughters been educated on this system of passive obedience and non-resistance, as it would have prevented much of the trouble and inconvenience which his prophetic mind foresaw would attend his proceedings.

"Dine, then, with me, tête-à-tête, to-morrow," said Lord Hurstwood. "when we will quietly discuss the matter—but consider me pledged. I am old enough—or," correcting himself with a laugh, "fatigued enough with public life to abandon foreign service; it was quite my intention, on my return, to marry, and this fair Helen decides alike my choice and my plans; so au revoir," and they separated.

Very slowly indeed did the Colonel ride toward home, thinking over the unexpected offer which had just been made. To do him justice, it was a result for which he had never speculated or schemed. He had felt for Helen, and his sympathy had been increased by the uncomplaining dignity with which she had borne her sorrow; and though her successful efforts to appear cheerful had really gratified him, he had never so wholly misunderstood her character as to fancy she ceased to remember and mourn; and if the thought of her marrying ever crossed his mind, it had always been as at some distant period, when time had done its usual work, in destroying the poetry of youth and replacing it with the prose of age. Perhaps Lord Hurstwood, of all whom he knew, would have been the least likely to have presented himself as a probable future son-in-law; but the idea having been started, he pursued it keenly—becoming more and more pleased with it, and more and more resolved not to be disappointed.

But he had much to do before this successful result could be attained. Much that would cause pain, sorrow, difficulty, and—who knew?—perhaps opposition. None of these anticipations and reflections moved him—except, indeed, the difficulty of deciding upon his plan. Should he try conciliation—work by kindness? or should he at once clear away all obstacles, by striking terror into the gentle heart he meant to use as a stepping-stone to his own designs? Yes, thus it should be—this was the shortest and surest way—and yet there was a dim outline of one figure standing boldly in his way, and not to be driven thence by threats or menaces; it was the vision of a figure of great beauty, with resolute brow, with uplifted and advanced hand, in an attitude equally defiant and protecting—making an actual movement, he tried to wave it away, and passed his hand over his eyes to shut it out, so that he might think of all the advantages this alliance offered.

No fortune required, at least at present—that suited him admirably—one daughter placed in such a position as would, perhaps, enable her to raise her sister to a similar eminence. His name united with that of Lord Hurstwood, whose rank, wealth, and political reputation were known throughout the civilized world. And was all this to be relinquished by yielding to the fancies of a romantic girl—preposterous! Like Pharaoh, he hardened his heart. It was too good to be rejected or thrown away for a whim—too attractive a picture to be washed away by a few tears; and he vowed a deep vow that it should not. Again, the beautiful face, with a frown on its brow and its bright but threatening eyes, was faintly visible. But setting spurs to his horse he rode quickly on.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

"I'll have it dispatched,
And suddenly, my lord, that I may say—
My honorable, my right honorable daughter."
MASSINGER.

CONSTANCE having been out riding, and overtired herself, by her mother's advice remained quietly in her room, therefore Mrs. Templeton and Helen were the Colonel's only companions at dinner.

When they rose to leave after desert, he, who had been quaffing glass after glass, rather more quickly than was even his wont, called out, not very gently,

"Stop! I have some rare news to tell Helen."

Little expecting the thunder-bolt that was ready to fall, they both obeyed; and the Colonel, replenishing his glass, said, "I have been riding with Lord Hurstwood, and I can tell you, Helen, he has a discerning eye—he admires you prodigiously."

"Me, papa!" said Helen, wholly unconscious of what was to follow—not so her mother—her sensitive love divined all—her apprehensive heart anticipated the storm; and faint and giddy, she rested her arm on the table.

"Yes, you—you hypocritical little monkey, looking as if you did not know this."

Still, not comprehending how her knowledge or ignorance of this unimportant fact could signify, she smiled and said nothing—but her father, slightly provoked at receiving no help from exclamation or protestation, proceeded very speedily to enlighten her, by adding, though his voice slightly faltered, "He admires you so much that he has commissioned me to offer you his hand."

"This, and to me!" said Helen, with a kindling look.

"Ah! you may well be surprised," said he wily father, seizing this advantage, and feigning not to understand all that the tone and look very plainly said; "it is an honor which does not fall to every one—this laying coronet and title at the feet of a little girl, and you may well look proud of the distinction."

"Papa," began Helen—she paused, for his face looked unpropitious—encouraging herself, however, as she became aware of the necessity, she continued, "Papa, I must still suppose you jest."

"Jest!" he repeated, striking the table fiercely; "you may be as amused as you please with the jest, for I promise you that it will prove a reality"—then, seeing that she still looked bewildered, he resumed; "Listen, girl—attend to me, Helen," as she drew nearer to her mother; "this marriage pleases and suits me—and," with a dreadful imprecation, he added, "it shall take place!"

"Mamma, mamma, did you hear?—what does it all mean?—what is it?" she inquired, turning her blanched face toward her father.

"It means," he sternly replied, "that I have promised you shall marry Lord Hurstwood, and this promise I will keep."

In speechless terror poor Helen looked at her mother, who now first spoke.

"Lionel," she said, "this can not be; think of all that it involves."

"Madam," he replied, "it will be, and I have thought of all that it involves—it involves honor, wealth, station, power—it frees me from difficulties, and it pleases me that my daughter should be Lady Hurstwood—and now, instead of encouraging her in insensate and useless resistance, I advise you to let your daughter benefit by your experience, and learn from you the folly of attempting to frustrate my will;" and he rose, and before Helen, who tried to stop him, could find strength enough to do so, he rudely waved her away, and left the room.

"Oh, mamma," said the miserable girl, sinking at her feet and sobbing on her lap; "oh, mamma, is it true—must I learn this dreadful lesson from you, and must you teach it? Speak, mother," she urged, as Mrs Templeton, faint and suffocating, could hardly breathe. At last she said, "God knows whether it must be so, but if it must, I feel that my heart will break in performing the task."

"If? oh, mamma, you said if—is there, then, any hope?"

"Alas! my precious child, I dare not say there is—still—Helen," she suddenly exclaimed; "have you courage? can you be true to yourself?" and then tenderly caressing her trembling hands, she mournfully added, "but what will this avail?"

"I do not understand you," said Helen with a look of tearless despair; "only tell me what I can do, I will try any thing to escape this dreadful fate."

"And I scarcely understand my own meaning," replied her mother; "we can neither of us reason or think to much purpose at present. Constance must be told—but not to-night, she is still very delicate—but early to-morrow we will see her, and take counsel together."

"Then, for her sake, dearest mamma, I will make an effort; but she must know all very soon; she is my only hope now that you have none—but surely, surely," she added, with a fresh burst of sorrow, "this must pass away like some frightful dream; I can not be asked to consent to any thing so monstrous."

"Listen to me, my dear child; all that can be done to avert so terrible a doom shall be tried, in spite of a voice that whispers it is hopeless; control yourself for this evening, before your sister; she has great energy and courage, qualities which, I fear, my poor girl, we both are deficient in—and we know no effort she can make will be wanting."

And so, by seeking Constance late and leaving her early, Helen succeeded in not exciting her suspicion or curiosity; while Mrs. Templeton, who had remained the whole time with them, by a powerful effort, continued to talk as usual on indifferent subjects, and took leave of her for the night when Helen did.

The latter was seated listlessly before her dressing-table when her mother entered the room, which, since Constance had been threatened with fever and sore throat, had been her bed-room. She bent down to kiss the poor girl, who raised her tearful eyes to her face, as if seeking consolation in her looks, but she could not read it there.

"I have just remembered that you are ignorant of a trifling alteration I had made, but which has hitherto been useless; to-night my anxiety for you will find it serviceable, but you must know of it, or my unexpected presence might alarm you. Look here, Helen"—and going toward a pier glass let into the wall, she removed two ornaments, and then showed her that the panel was a door which opened to the conservatory at right-angles with the door of her own apartments. Helen looked astonished, and Mrs. Templeton proceeded to explain.

"When you and Constance were coming home—and I need not tell you how I thought of that time, hoping, as I did, for so much happiness from your dear society—I fancied I never could be too near to my treasures, whom I longed, as it were, to hide in my bosom; and it one day struck me that I should like a means of communication by which we could at all times meet quietly and freely; I therefore had this door made. At that time I had no idea of concealment, and, of course, it is known to many of the workmen then busy in performing my orders. But as your father was away, and, besides, rarely visits our domains, I am sure he knows not of it. I do not by any means depend on your maid Ruth; Dawson has hinted very unpleasant things to her disadvantage, and I had intended her dismissal; but Constance's illness, and various other events, have caused me to delay. She knows nothing of this; the rooms were finished and furnished before she came; see how the opening is masked;" and she showed Helen how a common blind on the other side effectually hid the opening. Helen looked surprised at the simple ingenuity of the contrivance. This duplicate key of my conservatory door will enable you to find me without crossing the corridor."

"Thanks, dear mamma; though I can not exactly see the advantage of this arrangement."

"I fully intend to use it to-night, my love, for I shall keep anxious vigils till you are at rest, or comfort you with my presence I shall come this way to avoid the risk of disturbing Constance, and to-morrow I shall be able to see you as early as I like. And now, darling, let me leave you with something like a hope that you will seek and find repose. Let no morbid indulgence incapacitate you for exertion and thought;" and yielding to her mother's wishes, Helen went to bed, where, two hours afterward, her mother found her asleep; and though the flushed cheek and troubled brow spoke not of calm or happy slumber, Mrs. Templeton knelt in thankfulness for this brief respite from the consciousness of what, her boding heart said, was to be the great trial of her child's life.

It was Helen's turn, the following morning, to avail herself of this newly-discovered means of entering her mother's rooms; and Mrs. Templeton, after an almost sleepless night, was, at an early hour, thoroughly aroused by her entrance. She assisted her mother to dress, and they then talked with more composure on Helen's part than Mrs. Templeton had ventured to expect, of the whole matter. Still, nothing that seemed likely to prove successful in averting the evil presented itself, and Helen sat with clasped hands and pale cheeks while her mother warned her against saying or looking any thing that might rouse her her father to passion, or even anger. At length, hoping to find Constance awake, and recovered from her fatigue, her mother entered her room, and was cheered to find her not only dressed, but declaring herself quite strong and well—both would be needed when informed of the extraordinary scene which had taken place the previous day. And when Constance did hear of this fresh trial which awaited them all—for in every thing she rejoiced and sorrowed with her mother and sister—she seemed as if unable to believe it. She could not, at first, by any effort realize it. What! while Helen's heart was still still filled with love for Reginald, ask her to wed another! What! threaten her, constrain her to utter vows which her affection refused to ratify! Monstrous! impossible! and Constance paced backward and forward, uttering vehement protests against it.

"Helen," she suddenly said, "we must seek papa. Suppose he should take your silence as a proof of acquiescence. Mamma, we must all go down to breakfast. Helen must not absent herself—she must try to be firm."

"Constance," interrupted Helen, "I have not courage to encounter my father."

"But you must summon it," cried her impetuous sister; "think what is at stake, Helen, not only your happiness—almost your honor—but the happiness, the peace of poor, noble Reginald."

"Oh! sister, sister, name him not, I implore you," said Helen, bursting into a passion of tears.

"I name him—but it is to rouse you," replied Constance. "Heaven knows it is done neither unkindly nor heedlessly; but you are still stunned—still unable to think, or you would see as clearly as I do, that your fate is greatly in your own power. Refuse—but be firm, or you are lost."

Helen fixed her large dark eyes on her sister; a deep glow overspread her face, but was quickly succeeded by a deadly pallor, as she felt how impossible it was that she could imitate her resolution.

"My glorious girl!" said her mother, gazing on her animated beauty, and catching courage, almost hope, from her dauntless bearing and words; "yes, you are right. Helen, this is something of my meaning, when I said you must be true to yourself. I, I your mother, say, here you ought not to yield; Constance and I will precede you."

"Oh! no, dear mamma; oh! Constance, do not desert me—I never can enter alone. Go you first, we will quickly follow." But when she entered the room it was empty.

Constance, however, took her post, and was making breakfast when the Colonel entered. She glanced at him, but saw no signs of relenting in that gloomy face, a gloom which the perusal of his letters did not tend to dispel; and, after the usual greetings, all was silence till he abruptly said, "I dine at the Hall to-day; I shall inform his Lordship that I have an obedient daughter."

"Oh! father, have pity on me!" exclaimed Helen, feeling that this was perhaps a crisis; "think what I have so lately suffered, in silently bearing the great trial that has fallen to my lot. Do not, oh! do not make my life intolerable, by urging me to a step I never can consent to—never ought to consent to."

"Helen!" he said, quietly, but not the less did his words stifle all hope. "Helen, this folly and opposition are useless—it must, it shall be."

"Oh! papa, be merciful; mother, entreat for me!" turning to Mrs. Templeton, who was weeping. Alas! what would avail her entreaties with that selfish man—and her tears flowed more abundantly. "Constance"—and she raised her sorrowful eyes to her sister—"plead for me;" but Constance stood silent and firm by her mother. "Papa does love you, and, perhaps—" but she could say no more, for sobs came thick and fast and stopped her utterance.

And did he not love her then, that gentle, unoffending girl? He looked sternly at her, and then at her mother, and slightly shuddered. Constance saw the look and the movement. What did they express?—pity?—oh, no.

"Dear mamma, take Helen away," she said, for she perceived that the latter was only injuring her cause by her evident distress and terror; and as Mrs. Templeton complied, leading away the passive girl, and closing the door, Constance, without the least sign of trepidation, though evidently much affected, advanced toward her father, and said, "Papa, I have but this morning heard of this strange, distressing proposal. I am not going to suppose it any thing but a horrible fact, still I can not imagine that Lord Hurstwood—that any man with the feelings of a gentleman—would condescend to accept an unwilling bride—no true-hearted man could think of inflicting so much cruelty on another who has scarcely the power to resist; therefore, this can proceed no further."

"You have more sense than any girl I ever met with," said the Colonel, "but in this case you are quite wrong. Lord Hurstwood knows of Helen's folly, and is yet willing to marry her—so that argument falls to the ground."

"Then he must be a degraded and dishonorable man," replied Constance, without the least passion, but with strong contempt both in manner and expression. "Still, his being regardless of his honor is not to make Helen forget hers; and she can not marry one man while loving another."

"'Pon my soul, Constance, if you go on so, I shall believe you as great a fool as the others"—a polite and manly way of classing his wife and daughter. "Ask your mother what comes of love matches—love matches, indeed," he repeated, with a sneer.

"I can not ask mamma about any thing which would, when known, weaken my respect for either of my parents," replied Constance, with a spirit and dignity which so pleased her father that he said, rather more gently,

"Why make all this opposition, when in the end she must yield, for I will not—she will be obliged to see that it is her duty."

"But she must not yield; she never can so misconceive what is her duty. Listen for one moment to me, papa," she said, rendered desperate by her secret terror, "listen to me indulgently—it is the cause of my dear sister I am advocating. Her duty to you is, never to marry without your consent—your duty to her—yes, I repeat it—your duty to her is, never to compel her to take a solemn oath which she can not keep. Helen has tacitly promised to give up Reginald, not because he is unworthy, but because he is poor, and you object; and nothing would induce her to break this promise, unless—" she slightly hesitated

"Unless what?" thundered her father.

"Unless," she said, looking at him with her proud eyes, "unless you make her, by trying to compel her to marry this—this—man." She uttered these words slowly, and as if sounds could not fully express the depth of her abhorrence and scorn.

"Enough of this," he said, rising; "Constance, you forget yourself;" and she felt that, perhaps, her zeal was hurrying her too far—so she made no reply, and they separated; he to prepare for his visit to Hurstwood, for he was wholly unmoved at any thing that had been said; and she to destroy all hope Helen might have encouraged from her mediation.

"Have you done any thing for me?" cried Helen, eagerly, as Constance joined her and her mother.

"Alas! no, dearest—still I do not mean to give up; but go you and take a quiet turn in the garden, and let mamma and me consider what is the safest and best course to pursue."

"Constance," said Mrs. Templeton, when they were alone, "do you despair?"

"I do, mamma, unless Helen be strong enough to assert her rights; were it me, nothing—nothing should tempt or terrify me into compliance. But dear Helen has lately been so overwhelmed with sorrows, 'they so tread each other's heel,' that she is bowed down with them; and to think that at this time, when they are so greatly wanted, the Vernons should be away, every thing seems against us. Can not Ashley be sent to?"

"No! no! not Ashley, he can do nothing here," replied Mrs. Templeton, quickly rising as if a thought had suddenly struck her; "and you fear, then, that we can not depend on Helen's courage?"

"I fear we can not!"

"Then, my darling, leave me now, and seek Helen, she needs comfort and support. I think it very likely that Mr. Victor may call this morning, as he talks of soon leaving for the Levant; if you meet him, send him to me, and desire the servants to do the same."

"I fear," thought Mrs. Templeton, "that Constance is right regarding Helen, and I so distrust my own judgment in a matter which so deeply affects my feelings, that I tremble lest I should be misled;" and she sat for some time in deep reflection.

It was, as Constance had observed, particularly unfortunate that the Vernons should be away at this juncture—their friendship, their judgment, would have been now invaluable. The gentleman who supplied the Doctor's place, though a most amiable young man, was not to be thought of as his substitute on this occasion—the Granthams were away, and, for a variety of reasons, Mrs. Templeton shrunk from consulting either Mr. Forrester or Sir William Dallas—not from any doubt of their kindness, but she felt she could not make them comprehend her views of the case. It was when Constance proposed Ashley, the idea flashed across her mind, that in Mr. Morton she should find the help she needed. She was convinced of his integrity and honor—his kindness also was evident in all his proceedings, and she knew that his warmest sympathy would immediately be roused, when he understood how deeply this matter affected Reginald. To him, therefore, she determined to apply—to state the whole case, and frankly submit to his judgment her desperate alternative; and, having arrived at this conclusion, she prepared the following note to him, which she hoped to be able to send by Victor, now almost a daily visitor.

"Mrs. Templeton takes the liberty of requesting an interview with Mr. Morton, at the Hermitage, this afternoon at five o'clock. She depends upon his usual kindness for pardoning this intrusion."

This done, she felt that one step was taken—and hoping that it had been in the right direction, she quietly awaited Victor's arrival, and trusted that his father's answer would signify that he could see her—for as the Colonel would be absent at the Hall, it was an opportunity not to be neglected—besides, time might be most valuable, as it was impossible to conjecture what would be the result of this dinner at Hurstwood.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

"I entertain the offer of this match,
With purpose to confirm it presently.
I have already named it to my daughter."
TOURNEUR.

"AND what says my sweet lady to my suit?" inquired the Peer of the Colonel, when they were relieved from the presence of servants.

"Oh!" replied he gayly, and as if relating a capital joke; "she gave herself airs, treated Mrs. Templeton and me to a few tragedy-queen graces, and angrily refused to hear of any thing so shocking—it is clear that she means to make you enact the Amadis, and put on armor before you win the prize."

"Volontiers," cried his Lordship, filling his glass; "let us drink success to the attack; and very beautiful doubtless the fair cruelty looked, while playing the persecuted princess."

"She will probably give you an opportunity of judging of that," laughed her father, well pleased to see how his bait was taken.

"Then that, perhaps, I may have the pleasure of doing to-morrow."

"Pardon me, no. The truth is, that Mrs. Templeton, who is rather romantic, has imbued her daughters with a few exploded sentimentalities, and all together, they raise such a chorus against your Lordship for having employed an ambassador on this tender occasion, though the unworthy papa performs that office; instead of ourself coming in full dress, coach-and-six, outriders, and such tom-foolery, that Helen, who has a pretty little pouting temper, is in the angry heroics, and till this quiets down, which it will do in a day or two, my counsel is, to let the young lady expect you a little while before you appear."

"But suppose she should mistake this absence for indifference? I should be sorry—"

"Not at all—not at all likely—it will only prove to her that you are not disposed to encourage her romance."

"As you will then," coolly replied his Lordship, carefully preparing his fruit, with most unlover-like solicitude, for himself; "but as I can not have an audience to-morrow, I fear I must postpone that pleasure till I return from town, where I have business the day after, which may detain me. In the mean time, I rely upon your good offices, for I shall hate much courting, as you in England call it; and I should also wish to have the marriage celebrated with as little delay as possible. Has she been presented?"

"No, it was postponed in order that her sister might accompany her."

"Tant mieux! then I shall have the pleasure of knowing that the most beautiful débutante of the season is my wife. My relative, the Duchess of Isleford, shall do me the service of being chaperone. Mrs. Templeton will, I hope, be satisfied with introducing her other lovely daughter—we can not allow her to monopolize. Apropos, I was looking over some gew-gaws last night, and sent off a box of these toys to Storr's to be reset. I shall now delay this till I can consult him in person—and I hope, by the time I return, to find Mrs. Templeton and her daughters disposed to judge me leniently, and to pardon my foreign method of wooing."

A conversation then ensued relating to settlements and such matters, and the Colonel, charmed with the success of his schemes and hints, and from the liberal intentions of Lord Hurstwood more than ever bent on carrying his point, passed a very pleasant evening with his well-bred son-in-law elect; and parted from him the next morning, with smiling predictions of success, short lovemakings, and a speedy marriage.

He might well venture to foretell all this; for he returned to the Priory, his heart stealed to all entreaty—armed from head to heel in iron, so that no assailable point should be found—he was more invulnerable than Achilles—for with remorseless hand he himself had cast all feeling into the petrifying Styx; and he rode home, resolved to crush all obstacles to his wishes, while he availed himself of every thing likely to facilitate them. With this view he determined to take advantage, not only of Helen's gentleness and timidity, but of her affection, which he knew was strong and uncalculating; this, joined to her utter ignorance of all relating to the details of business, he thought he could direct in his own favor; and for this purpose, before he proceeded to extremities, he very ingeniously arranged a little drama, in which he was to sustain the principal part, that of the parent appealing to the daughter; in other words, the villain of the piece, whose difficulties were to be removed by the misery and degradation of his child.

In the mean time Mrs. Templeton's little plan had encountered no obstacles. Victor came, took the note, and the following reply quickly reached her: "Mr. Morton will be happy to see Mrs. Templeton at the hour indicated."

She therefore set out with Helen, and drove to the Hermitage; and bidding her return and call for her in an hour, she was conducted by Morton to what he smilingly called his state apartment—for though externally the Hermitage was much in the same state as when occupied by Johnson, it had undergone great changes and improvements within. The furniture was elegant, apparently a collection from distant countries, both curious and costly; but though at another time it would have attracted Mrs. Templeton's attention, from its novelty and rarity, at this moment she scarcely remarked any difference or felt any interest beyond satisfaction at the sight of Mr. Morton, on whose aid she so fully relied.

"I shall not waste time in conjecturing your surprise at my note or conduct," said she, directly they were both seated, "they are the result of my firm belief in your kindness and honor. I know, also, that you are much interested for many who are very dear to me, and in my sad and lonely need I come to you no less for their sake than my own"—she paused, as if making an effort, while Mr. Morton sat silent, but evincing by his look and attitude the most respectful sympathy—she then quickly resumed: "My daughter Helen, as you know, was engaged to Mr. West, the rest also you know; but though engagements may be broken off, love will not be bid hence; the memory of former associations can not depart at the first command. You will think there must be extraordinary circumstances when a mother speaks calmly, voluntarily, of her daughter still loving where there seems not the least hope of union. But Lord Hurstwood now seeks her in marriage, and Colonel Templeton has promised to further his suit."

"How! when so lately he consented to her marriage with another, and while she yet sorrows for his loss?" burst forth Mr. Morton indignantly.

"Wonder not, but listen to my plan, to my remedy, inspired only by despair, and to be used only in the last extremity. With my consent, Helen shall never be forced into so dreadful a fate—but my open opposition will avail nothing, perhaps would only provoke harsher measures—I do not even expect the mercy of delay. I have but one other step to take, before acting very decidedly—it is to appeal to Lord Hurstwood himself."

"Right," said Mr. Morton; "report, which describes him as a thorough man of the world, describes him also as a gentleman."

"Yes, to that character I make my appeal. I have already prepared a letter, and must be guided by the events of the next few days; should my letter have no effect, and he still should persist, then, Mr. Morton, my hope is in you."

"And it shall not fail," he exclaimed with energy. "I solemnly promise to further your wishes, and aid you to the utmost: say on."

"Then," she said, and her lips were pale and trembling, while her voice shook with emotion, "Reginald West must come and fetch her away; yes, he must condescend to steal away my darling girl; and her unhappy mother must not only connive at, but arrange the elopement—think, think what it must be when this is the only alternative."

"Mrs. Templeton," cried Mr. Morton with vehemence, "I honor you—I place myself entirely at your command; you have but to say what you wish, and it shall be done."

"Then you do not condemn my scheme, you do not think me imprudent and rash to have imagined it—though if you did, I should still act, for I am resolved to save my child."

"Condemn! good heavens, condemn! when you are snatching your innocent child from a fate worse than death; marriage with one when the heart is devoted to another! the infamy of such proceedings, no matter by what sophistry they are made to appear sublime and heroic, fills me with disgust, and heart and soul shall I joyfully help you to save her. Of course, the first thing, when the crisis seems near, will be to summon Mr. West. Various circumstances prevent my offering to convey her to him; some day you shall know them."

"There is no one who can act for me but you and Reginald; the Vernons and my brother, to whom in this emergency I should, for the first time, have applied, are all far away."

"And Miss Templeton, herself," inquired he; "will her resistance be useless?"

"Alas! it would, even if I could depend on her maintaining it; but she is so gentle, so unused to contention, and from recent trials so unequal to it, that, if left to herself, her fate would be sealed; no—all was well examined before I became hopeless and desperate."

"I see, and you have no alternative but to adhere to your plan."

"I fear not; therefore directly you again hear from me, summon him; but let all be done with the utmost caution—one false move and all is lost;" and her voice sank to a whisper, as she added, "were my agency suspected, not only would my separation from my children be certain—very certain—but my liberty would be scarcely secure. Now, adieu, and accept my most grateful thanks."

When Helen returned, she was surprised to see the excited and troubled glance of Mr. Morton, as he bent his eyes with almost painful pertinacity on her face, while respectfully taking leave of her mother, whose thoughtful mood continued unbroken during their drive home.

"The villain! the cowardly villain!" said Mr. Morton, aloud, as he traversed his garden; "and those sweet creatures are his victims; but unless Providence sees it best to frustrate me, I will save this gentle girl.

Meanwhile, Constance, whose daily vision had been sadly interrupted during her indisposition, met Hubert to-day with such evident pleasure, though she soon relapsed into sadness, that had he not felt bound by his promise to his father, he must have declared his love during this interview. As it was, his manner was so tender, there could be no doubt of the nature of his feelings, as gently taking her hand, and bending his fine eyes on her distressed countenance, he said:

"Dear Constance, what is the matter?—no bad news of Reginald West, I trust?" and she, quite overtasked by her grief, and overcome by the sympathy in the look and tone, burst into tears, and could only reply by shaking her head.

"Nay—nay, tears! this is too sad, this must not be; confide in me as one—" he paused for a word, "as one who has known you from childhood—come, tell your old friend and true knight what it is?"

"Nothing from poor Reginald," she replied more calmly, soothed by the irresistible charm of his manner, "but dreadful news for him. Lord Hurstwood has proposed to Helen, and—but I do not know that I ought to tell this."

"Surely to me you may tell any thing—Helen has not accepted him?"

"Oh, no!" she cried, now roused to defend her sister from what she thought almost a reflection on her delicacy. "Oh, Hubert! how could you imagine such an indignity of Helen?"

"Merely to account for your grief, which seemed hardly justified by the simple fact of a proposal, that," he continued, smiling, "most young ladies would consider an honor, proceeding from one so distinguished."

"Ah! but you have not heard all—only think, Hubert, only think," she repeated, clasping her hands, "papa says it shall take place. Oh! I know it will kill Helen;" and again a violent flood of tears burst forth.

"This begins to be indeed serious, I fear," said young Forrester, gravely, for he, as well as all who knew Colonel Templeton, set him down as a domestic tyrant; "may no one interfere, Constance?"

"No one," she sadly answered, "even I lose courage and hope—but, of course, you will not mention this—though, soon perhaps—" she could not finish—the terrible idea of the whole county discussing Helen's prospects was too much.

"Certainly I shall not name it while you enjoin silence; but might not my father—" and then remembering his father's avowed dislike of the Colonel, he also stopped. "Where are Mrs. Templeton and Helen?"

"Out in the phaeton; mamma thought a drive would do them both good—and hark! I hear the ponies; mamma, I know, will like to see you, so wait for her; but Helen, I think will prefer being alone."

And she hastened to inform her mother of Hubert's visit, while he remained to ponder on the startling news she had just communicated, and the more he thought of all it involved, the more did he feel sure that while it would fill the hearts of Mrs. Templeton and Constance with sorrow, it would blight to the very root the happiness of Helen.

The next day passed with all that heavy dread which suspense ever brings; and yet not one word from Colonel Templeton by which his wife and daughters could guess his intentions.

"Had he relented?" asked Helen.

To which Mrs. Templeton replied by a mournful shake of her head—for she knew he had not—and the agony of doubt began to tell on Helen's looks, and in her languid movements, when Mrs. Templeton accidentally learned that Lord Hurstwood had left the Hall. After consulting her oracle, Constance, she decided on telling Helen of it; it was better that she should at once know this was was only a lull, in order that she might be prepared for the storm when it burst, for such her mother's experience convinced her would be the case.

And so the weary hours dragged their slow length along, till a few days before that on which Colonel Templeton expected his Lordship's return; when, as the sisters were in their pretty sitting-room, Constance reading to Helen, the latter, who was reclining on the sofa, started, and said:

"That is papa's step; oh! sister, he is coming here—do not leave me, I entreat you," and almost before she finished speaking, he entered; for the time had now come when his little drama was ready for performance: he had learned his part perfectly; the scenery was well painted, and he hoped the traps would be quite hidden, and work effectually.

"Helen," he said, almost kindly, "I want to speak with you—Constance, go to your mother;" and with a foreboding heart, Helen heard her close the door.

"You seem so averse to this proposal, and so insensible to the honor done you," he began, "that were I like some fathers, I might punish you by humoring your folly—but as I am not altogether disinterested in this case, I shall state my chief inducement for favoring Lord Hurstwood, and appeal to your better feelings and your sense of duty for withdrawing your refusal. You probably know, or at least have a right to expect, that at my death this handsome property will descend to you and Constance. Well, in order to render it as complete as any thing the county can boast of, and also to be remembered when I am no more, by the improvements I have effected for my heiresses, I have lately laid out very large sums of money in clearing and altering—some of this money I have borrowed, and, to be frank with you, I have anticipated my income, cramped myself for the benefit of my children, and am at this moment sorely pressed for payment—indeed, I shall be held disgraced if I do not fulfill my engagement, which I really can not, unless assisted. Lord Hurstwood is the only one who will come forward and advance to any amount, and save me from some measure of dishonor—but then you must consent to marry him—will you do this for your father, and spare your mother all the anxiety which must follow when she becomes aware of the truth?"

Ah, poor Helen! he has you in his toils, the well-oiled trap-door silently gapes for you—had the arch-liar been able or forced to speak the truth, he would have said, that the best thing for him would be, that his memory should die with himself—had he stated the result of his clearings, he would have named a handsome sum put into his hands, at the expense of hundreds of young trees, and to the injury of the estate for many years—money which was soon dissipated in gambling and its attendant vices. He, to affect to shrink from disgrace and dishonor! why, they were epithets affixed to his name by those who knew him, as familiar as household words.

"Speak, Helen, what will my daughter do?"

"Oh, papa," she replied, with tearless eyes, but in an agonized tone, "take my life freely, but do not sell me—ask any thing but this."

"Of course," he retorted, beginning to feel irritated that she did not at once comply; "your life is useless to me, so you offer it—there is but one request I make, therefore you promise all but that.

"Is there then no other way?" she asked, greatly terrified even at her own terror, and slightly moved.

"None—but I give you three days for reflection, and will do my best to hinder Lord Hurstwood from coming; in the mean time, and if you consent, I promise also to postpone the marriage as long as I can.

To Helen this concession seemed a boon beyond all expectation. "Papa," she said, "I am not very well nor very strong—perhaps I do not see my path quite clearly at present—but if my happiness would be the only sacrifice, I think I could freely make it for you—only—but my head swims," and she fainted.

He laid her on the sofa, and so death-like did she look in her young beauty, that for a moment his cruel resolve faltered; but muttering "She soon will recover," he entered Mrs. Templeton's room, and told her that Helen was not well; but when Constance attempted to follow her, he held her forcibly back, saying, while his brow was stern and lowering:

"Folly enough there already—you stay—and mark me, if I find you influence Helen against my firm determination, tremble at the consequences."

She looked at him till even his angry eyes fell; but she uttered not a word; and as he descended the grand staircase, he heard her voice asking at Helen's door, "How is she, dear mamma?" and then it closed, and when she and her mother, a few hours after, entered the dining-room, Helen slept.

"Ah, there is Mr. Victor come to luncheon; though I am always glad to see him, how I wish it had been Ashley or any of those dear Vernons," exclaimed Constance.

"I echo your wish most truly," replied her mother, who was, however, thankful to see a messenger from the Hermitage now a daily event: for Mrs. Templeton found her beautiful vision in Victor Morton, and this day she was especially glad to see him. She had learned all from Helen; and though she herself was convinced that what her husband had so plausibly represented was a cunningly devised fable, she was by no means sure she had proved this to Helen, who indeed seemed so completely subdued and wretched, that Mrs. Templeton was dreadfully alarmed both for her health and reason. She began to fear that, tried as the poor thing had been, she would become a passive victim to her father's wiles, and she resolved no longer to hesitate about attempting her plan—time was now precious, and Helen must not be lost through her vacillation.

Her letter to Lord Hurstwood, though sent more than a week ago, with orders to be forwarded, had received no reply—so from that quarter she had no hope of assistance. Had she known that the worthy Cooper had played postman, she might still have paused. A personal appeal would have been hazarded, and all might have been changed—but now hours and minutes were flying by, while she was inactive; so she at once passed the Rubicon, by giving Victor a packet she had previously prepared, which contained the following lines to Mr. Morton and a letter to Reginald: "The die is cast—forward the inclosed express to Reginald—it is to summon him to us, and without delay, or all will be lost. Any suggestions your kindness and experience may offer, as to how he can come and where remain, act upon, and believe us all deeply your debtors."

To Reginald she wrote thus: "Read my letter to the end before you presume to judge me. Reginald! events have very recently occurred which have increased our difficulties and sorrow a hundred-fold. Unless you step in to save her, Helen is lost—lost to happiness as well as to you. You must not delay an hour after you read this, or she who loves you only will be given to another. Her miserable mother implores you to come—to come clandestinely, and take her away. Think how imminent must be her danger—how fearful her peril, when I—I, whose only pride was my children—whose only joy was their presence, entreat you not to desert us in this bitter extremity. And, oh, Reginald, my son, if I am wrong—but surely you can not think so—let not my error be visited on my guiltless, persecuted girl."

CHAPTER XXXV.

"And, by my word, the bonny bird
In danger shall not tarry." CAMPBELL.

MR. MORTON, leaving instructions with his servants, on whose discretion he could fully depend, started without delay for Reginald's abode carrying this precious document with him. He had pretty accurately guessed what would be required of him, and had prepared all accordingly. He had money, and he knew how to spend it, for others as well as himself; four horses met him at the various stages, and the same were ordered for his return—and thus, traveling all night, the better to conceal his movements, by six the next morning he reached the small cottage occupied by Reginald.

And now, as he drew near to the garden-gate, the horrible fear, suppose he should be away or ill, arose in his mind, which had previously been busy with many other thoughts. "Thank Heaven!" he cried aloud, as attracted by the unusual appearance of a carriage-and-four, Reginald, ever an early riser, and now busily engaged in preparing a paper for his publisher, looked over the blind. Seeing that the new arrival was Mr. Morton, his tried and valued friend, he hastened out, exclaiming, "In the name of all that is unexpected, tell me what brings you here, and in such post-haste style?"

"I came because my horses would come," was the cheerful reply, for he was anxious to state his real object without alarming Reginald, who still looked as if he had been an invalid; "but will your cottage afford a cup of coffee?"

"Come in at once and see," was his answer.

"First let me give my orders to the postillions," which were, to secure four fresh horses, and in ten minutes' time to have them ready for starting—he then followed Reginald; and as quickly as possible, Gretchen, who prided herself on the excellence of her coffee, had a comfortable meal prepared, and having supplied Mr. Morton's need, for he had taken scarcely any refreshment since he left home, Reginald proceeded to question his guest about Scabrooke, though the name perpetually hovering on his lips was left unpronounced.

"I heard from Mrs. Templeton yesterday," said Mr. Morton, taking the plunge.

"I hope she—that all of them are well"—and he stopped with a sigh.

"Yes, pretty well—Miss Constance has, I hear, been rather an invalid. Victor is almost a daily guest there, or at Forest Hill, and brings news of the whole parish. The truth is, I have a little commission from Mrs. Templeton, but without your help, I shall not be able to succeed."

"In all things command me freely—what can I do?" he asked, with a quivering lip and beating heart.

"It is to accompany me back to the Hermitage, and"—but Reginald impetuously interrupted him, exclaiming—

"There is something the matter with Helen—tell me—tell me—but, for mercy's sake! do not say she is ill."

"She is not," replied Mr. Morton with emphasis; "but she is ill at ease—there is talk of a marriage—stop," he added gravely, indeed sternly, for Reginald's looks became wild, as he made a passionate movement—"stop, Mr. West, listen to me, and do not by any mistimed vehemence frustrate what her friends have arranged—you are summoned by her mother to save her—to carry her away—to marry her—do you now understand? but you do not"—for he perceived that Reginald by no means comprehended the extremity of the case—he, therefore, proceeded more plainly—"unless you can resolve to do this, she will be given to Lord Hurstwood, without delay or pity—do you refuse?"

"Refuse! Great God, no—refuse!" and he started up, "why do we lose a moment?—sweet, dear Helen—refuse to take you to my heart as my cherished wife! thus called for, I would hasten from the other side of the globe—what may be going on even now—why delay when time is so precious?"

"It is precious, but we have enough for our purpose—and since my arrival, another idea has presented itself. Your good landlady is, I know, the attached nurse of this poor young lady; now the step we are deliberately about to take, requires very strong reasons to render it justifiable, and any thing we can do to lessen its impropriety, ought not to be neglected. She must, therefore, accompany us, and return with you and this sweet girl—for your marriage must be delayed till the requisite measures have been taken—is that a good amendment?"

"Good!" said Reginald, wringing his hand, "it does you honor; and I know she will go if possible—so that must be ascertained directly."

But Mr. Morton, seeing that he scarcely knew what he did or said, advised him to pack a few needful things, while he consulted Madame Stöpsell, whose husband willingly yielded his consent, she was ready for her short absence almost as soon as Reginald. Stöpsel was told to have all ready for Helen, as Gretchen would not suppose failure, and he was also to inform Mr. Vernon of what had occurred; and again they sped back, reaching a small village, a few miles from Seabrooke, toward the dusk of the evening, when Reginald took care not to be recognized, and reached the Hermitage quietly and unnoticed in Mr. Morton's carriage, which was awaiting them.

Vain would be the attempt to describe Reginald's horror, indignation, and grief on learning the mere outlines of this attempt on Helen's happiness—the particulars of which Mr. Morton did not know. Till he found himself thus suddenly threatened with her loss, he had not been conscious that hope still lingered in his heart—had not been aware that this had insensibly given him courage and patience; he now felt, that were any fatal event to deprive him of her—life would lose all its attractions, and that he would thankfully close his eyes on it, and die.

Again and again did he peruse Mrs Templeton's letter of entreaty; and again and again did he to himself, and aloud, promise that she should never, never repent of her confidence in him.

"Can nothing be done immediately?" he inquired, as soon as they reached the Hermitage.

"Nothing," replied his host; "very early tomorrow, Victor will see Mrs Templeton; he will probably breakfast there, for he is of necessity partly in our confidence, but he has been well trained to discretion, so fear not him. Let us act in all things rationally, so as to diminish the chances of failure. We now need refreshment and rest; we must take both. To-morrow night will decide all—and, like wise generals, we must be cool and on the alert, to meet and defeat whatever may impede us. Miss Templeton will, of course, remain with her nurse till you are married—you must go elsewhere."

"I ought to be transported with joy at this most unexpected fulfillment of my dearest wish; and yet there are two causes which oppress me to agony," said Reginald, and he looked melancholy and dispirited. "First, this sweet, injured innocent is driven to take a step by both of us equally condemned, alike opposed to our feelings of propriety. And then, when this precious gift is mine—mine to love and cherish, and retain while life lasts—think you, Mr. Morton, I am not painfully reminded that she gives herself to a beggar—to one who is himself living on the generosity of others? To work for her, Heaven knows! would be one continual pleasure, could I do so with success—but—" He stopped and hid his face in his hands.

"When you have real troubles to contend with, Mr. West, and especially when you need all your presence of mind and resolution to rescue her you love from misery, it seems scarcely wise to conjure up ideal trials, or by dwelling on them to incapacitate yourself for unusual exertion. Permit me to conclude," said Mr. Morton, seriously, as Reginald attempted to speak, "you love this young lady?"

"More than life, more than life," murmured the poor fellow; disregarding the interruption, his friend continued—

"She loves you—a frightful danger menaces her. You alone can save her. Not only that, you alone can make her happy. Young gentleman, this, then, is not the time to listen to the suggestions of a foolish pride. You are now called upon to stifle every selfish consideration, and cast aside all these artificial impediments. In short, my dear friend," said he, kindly, and approaching Reginald, "you are to take this book, and use the contents whenever they are wanted to add to her comfort."

Reginald was completely overcome with this delicacy and kindness; he tried to speak, but could not, and repeatedly pressed the generous hands that came thus loaded.

"Come, come," said Mr. Morton, himself much affected, but assuming a cheerful manner—"old as I am, I would give a thousand pounds readily, eagerly, to save her loving heart from the least pang—but you have the privilege of protecting her from all. And now we understand each other, so good-night."

Whether Mr. Morton slept well, we pause not to ask—certainly Reginald did not.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

"She is won! we are gone, over bank, bush, and scaur."
SCOTT.

VICTOR breakfasted at the Priory, not a little wondering at the brisk correspondence which had suddenly sprung up between the lady there and his father. For, though he knew that it was caused by some fresh trial to Helen, in which Mr. West was deeply concerned, he little suspected what the dénouement was likely to be.

The note he brought from Mrs. Templeton was to this effect: The Colonel was going to the Hall, to fix the next day for Lord Hurstwood's visit, and Helen's acceptance of him would follow, but he would return to dinner. Mrs. Templeton would have an interview with Reginald, before twelve, at the Hermitage.

The intervening time was passed by the two gentlemen in settling their plan of operation, which would be submitted to Mrs. Templeton, for the underlined words in her note proved that she expected no respite or change.

Punctual to the time, she arrived, and terrible was her emotion on first seeing Reginald. But she soon became composed, at least in appearance, and requested that Mr. Morton would favor them with his presence; for, deeply interested as his friendship had made him in this transaction, his experience and calmness would materially aid in avoiding all danger of disappointment.

Their plan was this: Mr. Morton and Gretchen were to remain at the gate leading to the private garden. She knew both the spot, and the trick of opening the spring, should that be found shut. Reginald was to enter by the upper conservatory at eleven, and there take Helen from her mother's hands. "And, oh! Reginald," said that sad but tearless mother, "cherish my child—never by look or thought reproach her for this act, of which she yet knows nothing; but remember the alternative, and thank God for permitting these means of rescue! Promise me this, and I shall trust you."

"I swear by all man holds sacred, that I will be her loving, gentle husband to the end of our days!" and a sensation of joy filled his heart, and shone out in his pale face, as he thought that the being he loved so devotedly, and, till lately, so hopelessly, would be his own.

Quite satisfied now that the matter had proceeded thus far without obstacle, that she had remained firm to her purpose, and most grateful for the delicate thought and feeling that had secured the motherly attendance of her faithful Gretchen, with whom she held a short conference, Mrs. Templeton, in comparative peace, returned to the Priory.

"And now for Helen," thought the anxious mother, so completely roused by the danger of her darling, that she seemed scarcely to fear even her husband. She cared for nothing but the safety of Helen; and to secure that, was prepared to brave every thing. All else was, for the moment, indifferent to her: and gratified with her success hitherto, she, with almost cheerful looks, joined her daughters at luncheon.

Constance was surprised at her mother's manner, for knowing the cause of her father's absence, she was half wild with apprehension, as to the effect the proceedings of the next day would have on Helen's destiny.

As to poor Helen herself, she seemed to have sunk into an apathy that was more alarming to her sister than the most violent demonstrations of grief; from the vehemence of the latter some resistance might be expected—but what hope was there, when she seemed unable to offer any opposition?

Oh! how long did the day seem to Mrs. Templeton! how impatiently did she sigh for the hour which should remove one of her idols from all danger of injury.

At length came dinner-time; at first, the meal seemed to pass as usual. Constance had lost all that sparkling vivacity which brought sunshine among them—and all were now silent and gloomy. Mrs. Templeton sat lost in her own thoughts and anxieties; Helen, as if unconscious of every thing—even the servants, who were partly cognizant of what was pending, moved about with more of the solemnity of waiters at a funeral, than with that brisk and smiling alacrity which generally characterized them.

Under all these circumstances, it was perhaps to be expected that Colonel Templeton, when alone with them, should draw their attention to the present time, and to their actual position, which he did by remarking with a sneer,

"We are a most lively set, quite an agreeable family party. I only hope Lord Hurstwood may not find our spirits too overpowering when he lunches here to-morrow."

Helen mournfully turned her face toward him, and sighed deeply, but did not speak. Constance felt the color mount to her brow, and courageously said,

"I hope, papa—"

But what she hoped, none ever knew, as he rudely interrupted her by saying—

"I have neither the inclination to listen to disobedient speeches, nor to have my will disputed by my ill-directed daughters; this evening I shall hold some conversation with you," looking at Helen, who, however, now gave no signs of attention.

"Not this evening, I entreat of you, Lionel," petitioned Mrs. Templeton; for her heart seemed to die within her, as she glanced from the statue-like countenance of Helen, to the angry one of her husband, and thence to the decanters by which he was surrounded.

"Well, to-morrow, then, and directly after breakfast; I have a little information to give her regarding Lord Hurstwood's munificent intentions and plans, which will tell greatly in his favor."

Since the conversation he had held with her, when he made up a sentimental fable, artfully appealing to her feelings, he had carefully avoided the subject. His policy was, to take her silence as consent, and to hurry her into a promise just before his Lordship's arrival, so as to leave her no alternative but to ratify it, in the presence of the latter; to-morrow would, therefore, suit him better.

Constance fondly put her arm round her sister, and Mrs. Templeton rising without making any comment on her husband's speech, they all left the room; the Colonel soothing his irritation, as well as he could, with his wine, which daily seemed to become his most favorite solace.

"We are all looking weary," remarked Mrs. Templeton, as she dismissed the tea-equipage; her pulses telling her that the hour—the important hour—was fast approaching. "I have lately had wretched nights, and so has poor Helen; we shall be obliged, I fear, to leave you very early to your own resources, Constance—and do not let Ruth disturb your sister; when you dismiss her, let her go to bed."

Helen languidly rose to bid them good night, and left the room. They exchanged looks, and were silent for a few moments, when Constance said—

"Is she to be lost without one more effort?"

"No, dear child, while there is the least chance, we will not relinquish the task, we must both make one more trial in her behalf; but it is cruel as well as useless, under the idea of sympathy, for us to harass her to-night; so kiss me, darling, and early as it is, take my blessing and wishes that you may find rest."

"You must let me be your physician for once, dear mamma, and I shall take upon me to prescribe one of Mr. Curtis's infallible draughts—you may safely take it, as I know of what it is composed. I think it will send you to sleep—to-morrow," she said with a shudder, "we shall need all our strength, both of mind and body."

Constance had a little plan of her own, which this early separation greatly facilitated. She had resolved to write to her father, since he would not permit her to speak; and she meant so to plead for poor Helen, that he must relent—she intended so to entreat, that he could not refuse; and encouraging herself to hope all from her affectionate eloquence, she the more readily allowed Helen to retire without trying to comfort her.

Mrs. Templeton, who generally dispensed with personal service, and rang whenever she required it, entered her boudoir and locked the door, to feel safe from all intrusion; she thence passed to the conservatory, and opened the one already described as leading to Helen's present sleeping apartment.

It seemed to her, as if every thing she heard and saw tended to deepen her resolve, and give her strength to carry it out; and when she looked at Helen, what a sight for a loving mother met her anxious eyes! She sat on a low chair, leaning her head on the back, her arms hanging by her side—her eyes were open, but she appeared unconscious of every thing; even her mother's entrance, by the concealed opening, failed to rouse her.

Mrs. Templeton approached, and gently laid her hand on her head; a slight shudder alone gave indication of sensibility.

"Helen, Helen!" cried her mother, really terrified—still Helen took no notice.

"Merciful Heaven! what new trial awaits me," she ejaculated, kneeling by her daughter, chafing and caressing her cold hands.

"Mother, grieve not," slowly broke from her pale lips, but the voice sounded strange and hollow—"it is good to die."

"Talk not thus, my darling," cried her mother, laying her head on her bosom, and removing the glossy hair which hung heavy on her brow—then, believing that she required some powerful stimulus to enable her to shake off this frightful apathy, she added, with a deliberate purpose very abruptly—"I bring hope, my child—do you hear me?—I bring hope and rescue"

"Rescue!" she said, now slightly moved; "rescue, and hope?" she repeated.

"Yes, both, if you will but rouse yourself to assist me"

"I can do any thing to escape this fate," she replied, quite able to listen, and with a look of intelligence in her eyes; "but how can so great a blessing be gained?"

"With Reginald's help," said her mother slowly, "all could be gained."

She started—she almost screamed.

"Hush!" whispered Mrs. Templeton, having now to lay the spirit she had evoked; "yes, Reginald—he is at hand—will soon be here to save you, to take you away; rouse yourself thoroughly, and listen to me, and try to understand me." As she said these words, oh, blessed sight! Helen burst into tears and wept abundantly, nor did her mother try to check her; but when her sobs became fainter she proceeded to say, as calmly as she could, "You have known enough of me to be sure that I should never even countenance, much less assist in or advise any thing that would reflect on my children's reputation." Helen was silent, but evidently attending to every word; and thus encouraged, her mother went on. "Our duties sometimes seem to clash. I say seem, for I much doubt whether they ever do; it may be that some feeling, half revealed, or only half understood, inclines us to one or the other; or because we really and honestly do not comprehend all the word duty involves. Now I firmly believe it to be my duty to save you from this contemplated marriage."

"Dearest, best mamma," murmured Helen, kissing her. And seeing the success of her rather lengthy exordium, on which she had purposely dwelt, in order to fix Helen's thoughts, she proceeded more rapidly: "In short, I never will consent to it. While you were left unmolested, I never should have thought of such an opposition to your father's will as to have sanctioned your marriage with Reginald, much as I love and respect him; but now I command it. And—hush! do not speak—and this night, in company with our faithful Gretchen, he will take you away, and, directly the law permits, marry you, which, however, can not be before the expiration of three weeks."

Breathless with astonishment at all she heard—almost giddy from the rapidity with which she had been raised from the depths of despair and been told to hope, Helen gazed at her mother for a minute before she could find words; and then, while her face, lately so ghastly pale, became crimson from some hidden thought, she said—

"Elope! oh! mother, must I encounter that disgrace?"

"Yes, elope, or what word you please, Helen; either submit to that, or consent to marry Lord Hurstwood."

"And Reginald, oh! what will he think of me?" and again she wept.

"He will think that you are an ill-used, helpless girl, whom he is bound, by any method that is not disgraceful, to serve—and this is the only one—he will also think that your sorrows and misfortunes bind him, by every motive, to protect, love, and honor you. Yes, Helen, honor you; for where is her purity who gives her hand where her heart can not accompany it? where her truth who swears to love, when she has already none to give?"

"Dear mamma!" said Helen—and again a faint tinge colored her cheeks—"then you give me to Reginald, freely, cheerfully."

"Yes; freely, cheerfully, gratefully. And now, lose no time! look out your darkest wrapper; give me a few things you will immediately require; for," looking at her watch, "the time draws near."

Helen trembled so violently that her mother was forced to do every thing for her; she herself was firm and self-possessed. But even while fearing lest Helen's nerves and courage should fail them at the extremity, she remarked a light in the eyes, and a movement about the countenance, which showed that the name of Reginald had not lost its talismanic influence.

When all was ready she took her mother's hand, and, kneeling kissed it reverently, saying, "Bless you, mother, for all you have done for me. And, oh! God grant that this last crowning act may not involve you in greater sorrow! if I thought it, I have courage to face every thing."

"Fear not for me," replied Mrs. Templeton; "I am sure that in acting thus I do my duty; but now, wait here courageously alone, one minute," as she heard several clocks tell the hour; and, going into the conservatory, she opened the garden entrance just in time to admit Reginald.

He was very pale, but he looked resolved and stern.

"Where is she?" he whispered.

"Here," was the hushed reply, for Helen had glided out from her room the moment she heard his step.

He lifted his hat for a moment, and the shaded light fell full on his pale face and glittering eyes. Helen also mechanically raised her vail—and once more they looked in each other's faces—both so young, so beautiful! both so worn, so sad!

"Helen!"

"Reginald."

"Dear Helen!" opening his arms, and she fell on his bosom. He pressed her convulsively to his heart, and looking at her said, in a low but solemn voice, "mine!" then, again raising his hat, he added, with deep reverence, "mine, whom I swear to protect and cherish; and, as I deal by you, so may God deal with me!"

"Amen!" said Mrs. Templeton, deeply touched. "Kneel, my children, and may the blessing from on high be with you now and forever. Reginald, I trust you with something more precious than life, but I have neither doubt nor fear. Take this," giving him a small packet; "consult with Mr. Morton about the contents. Now, kiss me, my son—kiss me, my daughter, and, farewell!" She also gave him the small bag she had filled Helen's wardrobe, watched them till they were lost in the gloom and windings of the shrubbery, and locked the door.

Then, and not till then, did a reaction take place. She had strength to place her lamp safely on the table, and then she must have fainted; for when she recovered it was nearly one o'clock.

She bathed her face and hands in cold water, and approaching her dressing-table to prepare for bed, saw a vial and slip of paper; on the latter was written: "This is one of the draughts Mr. Curtis sent me—it will be of use, dearest mother, and send you to sleep—take it, and good-night. C. F. T." And, after Mrs. Templeton had undressed, she swallowed the draught, simply because she had not the power to reflect, or the strength to dispute even a written order; and soon after, over-tasked and exhausted nature sank into a repose which lasted for many hours.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

"Prythee, speak;
How many score of miles may we well ride
'Twixt hour and hour?" Cymbeline.

Mr. Stöpsel, though requested to communicate with Mr. Vernon, when he went to business, with true German indifference to such orders, interpreted the command in his own way.

He first visited his shop, to see that all there was right; and finding that he must go into the city, determined to call in the Temple as he returned. But it was nearly one o'clock when he had executed his errand; and during the whole of the morning Ashley had been expecting to see his friend.

As hour after hour passed, and he did not appear, Ashley became rather uneasy, for Reginald was always so punctual, that he feared he was ill, his health being still occasionally delicate.

Twelve boomed out St. Paul's; twelve was echoed by the giants of St. Dunstan's, and repeated soprano, contralto, and basso from the numerous clocks all around—half past—still no Reginald, still no note or messenger

Ashley could wait no longer—but leaving a message, in case they should pass each other on the road, he set off to see after him. Arrived at the cottage, he was much relieved to hear that Mr West was well, but out. In reply to his further questions, Mr. West, the servant said, with a slight increase of dignity in the flutter of her cap-ribbons, had that very morning, before seven o'clock, gone off with four horses!

"Four horses?"

"Yes, sir, four—and my missus."

"Speak plainly," said Ashley, rather angrily.

But the ribbons this time waved, indeed, it may more properly be said, tossed with insulted majesty.

"Well, sir, I can not speak more plainer—four horses, my missus, and a strange gentleman."

Hopeless of extracting information, he next asked, but more gently—"And left no message for me?"

"Not as I know of, sir."

"Nor said when he should return?"

"No, sir—but missus did—his room is to be clean turned out, and got ready for a lady, and they are to bring her to-night."

"Well," said Ashley, half aloud, "then patience and wait." And his handsome face resumed its usual expression of serenity, so that the offended ribbons no more vibrated with anger; and the wearer told her confidant, the young lady who did the work next door—in genteel parlance, the general servant—that, "not 'aving an 'art as 'ard as hiern, them fine eyes of his'n made sad avick of it."

While Ashley was thus philosophically summoning patience, and resigning himself to ignorance and his fate Madame Stöpsel's German servant made her appearance, and from her he received a confirmation of all the other had said, with the important additions that her master had a message for him, and that the stranger had left a card.

Silently denouncing the stupidity which ribbons, and cap too, covered up, Ashley rushed into the sitting-room, and seized Mr. Morton's card, on which he had written in French: "Expect them to-morrow morning—Miss Templeton returns with them—a letter will tell you more."

"Helen here! Good heavens! what can it mean? A letter—ah! that will explain, and it probably now lies on my table"—for Mr Morton, who had not forgotten any thing, had, even while traveling, scrawled a few lines of explanation to Ashley, which he posted at the nearest place he passed.

Jumping into the cab, Ashley was whirled back to town, and had the mortification of hearing that Mr. Stöpsel had called during his absence; but there lay the precious letter which was to unravel the mystery; for though of necessity short, Mr. Morton gave him all the information that was most important. A note, with little more than a few incoherent words from Reginald lay by its side, adding little to his knowledge, but a great deal to his amazement.

As he read, Ashley became almost dizzy with wonder. Helen flying from her father's house, and at her mother's command, and with Reginald! was a picture he could hardly believe real—but real it most assuredly was.

And now what could he do to help them? for as to attending to business, that was impossible—no, he would dedicate himself and his time to their service—and how could he best show his zeal?

First, he would endeavor to see Mr. Stöpsel, and learn, if possible, something more precise. So, fairly yielding to his impulse, off he set once more, to do, he knew not exactly what, except that he was resolved to be at Hampstead to meet the travelers on their arrival.

He then remembered that Reginald must give up his lodgings to Helen, and, of course, remain his guest; so back he went to settle for his accommodation, and once more en route for Stöpsel. From him he learned little that he particularly cared for, beyond the information contained in Mr. Morton's letter, except that Gretchen had left strict injunctions for every thing to be done and arranged, that could tend to make her dear young lady comfortable.

"Is there any thing wanting?" asked Ashley, visions of furniture and upholstery floating before his "mind's eye"—but Stöpsel assured him that every thing was already very good and complete, and that he could not imagine any addition needful.

But, delighted with this thought, which promised him occupation for the remainder of the day, Ashley for the second time started for the Cottage, and was charmed to find various deficiencies which he should be so happy to supply; therefore, a luxurious lounging chair for the sitting-room, with a pretty work-table, and some elegant chimney ornaments, being all he could detect as wanting, or indeed find room for there, he began his voyage of discovery in the bedroom. It looked very cheerful and very pretty—capital for a young bachelor; but where were all the appliances and comforts which its future fair occupant had been used to? and how could he tell what these ought to be? Decidedly, however, he could improve the appearance of the toilette-table—and so he did, with several costly trifles, which the man who supplied the other articles was so obliging as to suggest; and when this was done, vexed that there were no further improvements to make—like Alexander, when he wept that there were no more worlds to conquer—Ashley sighed to think how he should now pass the time, before he could expect his truant friend.

To the sitting-room he again descended; and

> "Satan finds some mischief still > For idle hands to do."

he began to arrange Reginald's writing-table, when an unfinished sentence, partly illegible, owing to a large blot, which had fallen from a pen hastily thrown down, arrested his attention. He guessed directly how it was; Reginald must have been writing when interrupted by Mr. Morton's arrival—and he was right—it was part of a review which he was preparing for a forthcoming number, and which, in the hurry of his departure, he had left exactly as when he hastened out to welcome his friend.

"This sheet is precious," said he, indulging in a little bit of sentiment—and he was in the act of withdrawing it, when she of the ribbons entered—"Lawk, sir! pray, pray don't touch that—none of us, not even missus, dares to meddle with Mr. West's table."

Respecting her scruples, he laid it down; determined, however, no printer's devil should ever defile it with black hands, and already fancying he saw it framed and preserved by Helen, as a family relic, connected with the great romantic incident of her life and Reginald's.

Still there were many wearisome hours to pass. "Oh! he would have dinner, he really needed refreshment"—and Mr. Stöpsel returning from his daily duties, Ashley was enabled to have a chop and a glass of wine.

He was ignorant of the time when Reginald would start from Seabrooke, even if all went right, and now a doubt of that came to his rescue; yes, it really was a relief to be uneasy—hitherto he had imagined success certain, and that idea had become familiar and monotonous—this less comfortable supposition excited and roused him.

The philosophical landlord advised him to go to bed and permit himself some repose—he himself intended to follow his own advice—and Mr. Vernon could be called at four—three—any hour he liked; the stranger gentleman did not arrive till six the previous morning.

No, he thanked him—he would be found expecting them with his eyes open—the consequence of which was, that, spite of strong resolution and still stronger coffee, aided by a volume of German diablerie,—the lounging chair, consecrated to Helen's use, spread its arms and tempted him, about four o'clock, to sit down for a wink—merely a wink; and at eight, when they arrived, he was sound asleep, and only awoke to be aware of the bustle made in receiving them.

He sprang up, and was out in the garden in a moment—yes, there they are—there is Helen; Heavens, how changed! there is Reginald, pale, but beaming and cheerful; and there is Gretchen, like every German woman, cramming "Ja, ja," with all sorts of intonations, into her conversation with her husband; her kind, round face looking as if she had just risen, or, more properly, just awoke—which was nearly the truth, for she had slept soundly for many hours.

So wholly unexpected, so very wonderful and sudden, had been the change in Helen's destiny, that it was not surprising if she failed to realize it immediately. She felt like one in a dream; nor was it till she beheld Reginald, and heard his voice, that she was quite convinced that what had passed between her and her mother was a certainty. Perhaps, indeed, she scarcely comprehended the whole truth, till she found herself alone with him, the cool night air blowing fresh and reviving on her feverish cheeks, and gently rustling among the trees in the shrubbery.

With every sense sharpened by terror, she heard the key turn in the door of the conservatory, though they were several paces from it; and the thought then arose, that it was, perhaps, the signal of perpetual exile from her home—from her mother—from her sister; and she half turned round, as if to retrace her steps—when memory whispered "to-morrow!" and the thought of what then awaited her made her no longer hesitate. Trembling, so as to be scarcely able to stand, she tottered, rather than walked, spite of the encircling and sustaining arm of Reginald, who did not venture to address to her one word of encouragement, even in a whisper, so greatly did he dread lest any imprudence should deprive him of his recently recovered treasure.

"All safe," was softly uttered by each party as they met; and then, as quickly as they could, they made for the Hermitage, to which they were obliged to walk; and though, under ordinary circumstances, the distance would not be thought great, all felt they had never before found it so far. On their arrival, the black servant alone awaited them; for Mr. Morton never needlessly extended his confidence; if people found out any thing, he could not hinder it; but he did not help them to the discovery. Refreshments were spread, and some were also ready packed. The carriage and horses they would find at the village already named, where a person, greatly bound to Mr. Morton, settled this part of the business; a heavy bribe, and one still heavier, being promised, if all went right, secured silence and punctuality.

"I shall drive you," said Mr. Morton, who had entered with extraordinary zeal and kindness into the matter, "and see you safely on the road to London. Have the banns published directly," he whispered to Reginald, "and send copies to that anxious mother the instant the ceremony is performed;—use the contents of the pocket-book, and another, also freely. And now, dear Miss Templeton, we may not linger."

Helen silently entered the carriage; her companions followed, and they speedily reached the spot where the post-carriage waited.

"Let me have early and constant tidings; God bless you, Miss Templeton; and you, too, my brave boy. Take care of that," directing Gretchen's attention to the basket; "you must not stop for refreshments, so it will be very useful."

They step from one conveyance to the other, the door closes, and they are off, as fast as their fresh and impatient steeds can go.

All was so well planned, and all so well succeeded, that they met with not the least delay. Helen wept incessantly and silently for some time; she then nestled closer to Reginald, and slept heavily and motionless till nearly four; and when she awoke, she felt refreshed, and free from headache. Reginald fondly kissed her brow, and on her inquiring if he had not also slept, he smiled, and protested that he was ashamed to say he feared he had. She then entreated him to try and obtain more rest, while she kept watch—but this was impossible; so they agreed to talk, but gently, so as not to awaken Gretchen; for those who had just met after having been, as they thought, parted forever, were not likely to be at a loss for subjects of deep and engrossing interest. Thus passed the remaining hours, till, as has been related, they arrived at the cottage, when they were met by Ashley, who was thoroughly awake in a moment. He rushed forward, and met Reginald with Helen hanging on his arm, to whom he was saying, "Welcome, dear one, to our home;" and shaking him warmly by the hand, and drawing Helen's disengaged arm through his, he said:

"Welcome! welcome! both of you—all of you—how glad I am you have come—what an age it seems since I have been expecting you—every thing is ready for Helen. I propose that Madame Stopsel at once see her safe in her room—we will then have breakfast, for which all is prepared—and by that time we shall be quieted down, and fit for business—Mr. Stopsel's room is at your service, Reginald, for the present; but I have arranged all for you, with me, in town."

Glad enough was Helen to lay her weary limbs on the comfortable bed, and after she had taken some breakfast, she slept—this time, the sweet, blessed sleep that refreshes both mind and body; and when, toward noon, she awoke, it was with a feeling of security from trial and sorrow, such as she had long been deprived of.

At length Madame Stopsel entered to assist her to dress, and Helen was quite astonished at the glow of pleasure with which she heard that the gentlemen would both return to dinner by five o'clock—she, who had lately been so very miserable as to have thought future happiness impossible; and though she sighed when she reflected on her very peculiar position, and could scarcely keep back her tears, when she remembered the recent scene of her parting with her mother, all, all seemed endurable, except the fate from which she had fled.

"Ah! Miss Helen," said Gretchen, as she was looking for some toilet adjunct which all Ashley's care and ingenuity had failed to supply, "you will miss all your grand things here, though how Mr. Vernon remembered half he has, surprises me. He has been up here, they tell me, routing about, and settling the things as well as he could, and very well that is—look at those beautiful bottles, and those candlesticks—a noble creature he is, and always was."

"Dear Gretchen," replied Helen, kissing her on both her plump cheeks, a mode of salutation Gretchen particularly affected, "what signify grandeur and pomp where there is not peace? Were it not for the absence of my dearest mother and sister, much less than I find here would suffice for my happiness—so never again allude to such trifles."

While Helen had slept, Reginald gave his friend an account of all that had lately happened at the Priory, for Helen had furnished him with the details.

"Think what a villain he must be," said Ashley, vehemently; "for though he is to be your father-in-law—I must say it—to act so as to compel such a woman as his wife to decide on this measure—"

"But, surely," rejoined Reginald, jealous at this implied censure on his two idols, "you do not blame it?"

"Blame it, my dear fellow! that would be an unmanly thing; I only meant to say that he must have tyrannized and persecuted to the utmost, or she would never have done what I have repeatedly heard her censure, unless there were some such desperate causes as those which drove her on. My firm belief is, that any mother is justified in saving her daughter from the degradation that menaced Helen; while no girl of delicacy could ever consent to it, if she properly understood what real delicacy means. Unfortunately, the disgrace and dishonor are so jumbled up with sentimental nonsense, of sacrifice, and heroism, and all that jargon, that no wonder many a miserable girl is bewildered. Reginald, duties are never antagonistic—it is impious to think so," concluded Ashley, echoing almost the words of Mrs. Templeton to Helen.

"Why, Ashley, you are warm on the subject; one would think you held a brief for some of these gentle victims."

"Am I?" he asked smiling: "but now about your marriage—before we go to town we must have that settled. Here, I trust, your sweet bride is safe—no chance, I should think, of tracing her."

Reginald looked disturbed. "God forbid!—still I shall be anxious and wretched till we are secure from molestation and danger—and though you wish me to share your lodgings, I think I must settle near here, where I am sure to be perpetually hovering."

"How do you communicate with Mrs. Templeton?"

"I have arranged nothing—time was wanting—at present, through Mr. Morton—and I shall avail myself of this channel immediately—and look here, Ashley, what he insisted on my borrowing—using, was his generous word." But, suddenly remembering the packet Mrs. Templeton had given him, when they parted, and which he may be pardoned for having forgotten till now; "let us see what this is, and about which I ought to have consulted Mr. Morton."

It was opened, and contained several papers; the first had the address of a solicitor, well known to Ashley as a most respectable man; to whom Reginald was referred for any information he might require beyond that Mrs. Templeton gave. She told him of the manner in which five thousand pounds had been settled; that, as interest had accumulated, it also, from time to time, had been invested—so that, except several hundreds which she had received on various occasions, when she had not thought it right to apply other money to her purposes—it had remained untouched—the interest of the original sum she now wished to secure to him and Helen—the accumulated interest to be still at her command. How business-like, how cautious she had grown, since the luckless day when she had given herself to Lionel Templeton, and cast her splendid fortune at his feet!

"And so, after all, you have run away with an heiress, you lucky fellow," cried Ashley, gayly; "but you look as if you hardly knew how to welcome this unexpected wealth."

"You are right. I had intended using Mr. Morton's offer only in case of need, and had been pleasing myself with the idea of working for Helen—of letting no one share this precious privilege."

"And so now, because she will have many comforts, without the pain of seeing you worn to a thread in procuring them, you are discontented. Upon my word, you romantic fellows are hard to please."

Reginald smiled at Ashley's Mentor-like lecture, but owned that he deserved it; and, leaving strict injunctions with Gretchen, which she was sure to observe, to let no one enter the house who was not well known to her, they proceeded to arrange about the marriage, Ashley slily remarking, that Miss Lydia Languish would pronounce this "no elopement after all," it was so business-like and methodical; and then, with a look of irresistible humor in his handsome eyes, he reminded Reginald of the basket of provisions they had, by Mr. Morton's orders, snugly stowed in the carriage, and their three formal and tidy little carpet-bags, which followed them as they descended, so thoughtful and cosy, till, struck with the anti-pathos which had mingled with their romance, almost to the utter destruction of the latter, they both laughed heartily:—"From the sublime to the ridiculous there is but one step."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

"But who the chieftain's rage can tell,
When, sought from lowest dungeon's cell,
To highest tower the castle round,
No Lady Edith there was found?"
Lord of the Isles.

While Mrs. Templeton and Helen were having the agitating conversation already related, Constance sat down to compose her letter of letters, which was to be so irresistible. But before she commenced her task, she quitted her room to take the medicine to her mother, and not finding her, she left it, with the few lines found by it.

Her letter was at length finished, and almost to her satisfaction. This done, she went to bed; and while Helen, with faltering steps, was quitting her home, Constance slept.

The next morning when she tapped at Helen's door and received no answer, hoping her sister was asleep, she descended to the breakfast-room. The letter was in her bosom, ready to be given to her father, when she judged the favorable moment had arrived. He was much later than usual; and, glancing, as he entered, at the vacant place, remarked, "Alone?"

"Yes," she replied; "Helen is asleep, I did not open her door to disturb her; and as I played physician to mamma last night, I was not likely to rouse her, and destroy the effects of my prescription. And papa," she continued, in a changed and faltering voice, "as this is the last appeal I shall ever make in behalf of Helen, I have written it—my courage fails when I attempt to speak, and I thought, perhaps, you would not reject it on one perusal only."

She took it from the folds of her dress, and placed it by him; as she did so, the mournful expression of her naturally bright and beaming young face struck him—its sad beauty smote on his heart—for he felt he had brought the cloud which shadowed its radiance. He, however, read the letter, but without any visible emotion, and quietly placing it in his breast-pocket, continued his breakfast in silence.

Constance felt sick and faint, as she beheld her last hope so remorselessly destroyed, when suddenly voices were heard in the hall, and the door was hastily opened by Mrs Dawson, closely followed by Ruth—both looking pale and frightened. The Colonel glanced up astonished; but before he could speak, Dawson, in a trembling voice, said, "Ruth has just informed me, sir, that Miss Templeton is not in her room, nor has she even slept there!"

Constance clasped her hands, and wildly shrieking, "The pond! the waterfall!" was darting from the room, when her father forcibly restrained her,

"Stay!" he shouted, in a voice of thunder, while every evil passion looked out of those expressive eyes; "speak, wench!" seizing and almost shaking the terrified Ruth; "what else is gone?"

"I do not know, I am not sure," she quivered forth; "but several things—bonnet, carriage-cloak—"

He needed no more—it was plain—Helen had fled! and he was perhaps baffled! And uttering a dreadful oath, he dashed up the stairs, closely followed by Constance, who had directly read his suspicion, and dreaded, she scarcely knew what.

He almost burst in the panels of the door that led to their bed-room, in his wild impatience making for the most evident entrance, and swept through the apartments like a raging hurricane—but he found nothing except confirmation of his fears. He then, with hasty strides, approached his wife's sleeping-room; but Constance, brave, loving Constance, at once herself when danger menaced that worshiped mother—and unerring instinct told her it now did—had preceded him; and as he entered, the demon in both face and heart, he was arrested by the sight he beheld.

Constance, like some bright and holy angel, stood by her mother's bedside—the old look, the old attitude, only more decided and defiant than ever—with one hand, she warned him to stand aloof, while with the other, she seemed to shelter her sleeping mother from harm—it was as though she possessed some power more than human, for he stopped as if petrified. She softly said, "Hush!" and changing her position, pointed to the object she was guarding with such vigilant jealousy.

Mrs. Templeton, having been almost worn out with anxiety, and soothed by the draught she had taken, in blessed ignorance of her danger, was sleeping as peacefully as an infant—to the fond eyes that now guarded her, she looked unusually lovely, for the habitual melancholy of her expression was changed to one of perfect contentment—while the cheeks, generally too pale, were tinged with a delicate glow, the evidence, perhaps, of incipient fever. "Mother, how beautiful thou art!" burst from the lips of Constance, as she knelt and kissed the small hand which lay on the quilt—and when she arose and looked round, her father had gone!

But short time was there for the indulgence of tender or grateful thoughts, as his voice was heard raging high and loud in the hall; and pausing fervently to thank God for this especial protection of her mother, she closed the door, and hastened to inquire if any thing fresh had been discovered.

There was nothing—but orders were given to various individuals to institute the most rigorous search, and frequently to report progress; while the Colonel ordered out horses, to commence the pursuit of the fugitives, the moment he had the least clue to their destination.

London never entered his mind, though he was pretty sure that, by some means, Reginald had carried her off—and here his habitual selfishness and indifference about others stood in his way. Since his separation from Helen, Reginald—his means and his plans—had scarcely ever been thought of—never inquired after—and thus he was completely ignorant of much that would, probably, have guided his search successfully.

Half-an-hour, an hour, still no trace; when, impatient of further delay, and vowing the most signal vengeance, he sent for Constance.

"I believe you knew nothing of this—there, there, do not pester me with heroics—I believe neither you nor your mother do—for, by heavens! if I suspected either of you—well, never mind—I am unable to think. You, however, must write a note, and send it express, directly I am gone, to Hurstwood. Put off his Lordship's visit—he is expected here—tell him the truth, or invent any lie you choose—I care not;" and he set out on his fruitless errand.

Constance did not feel herself bound to tell the truth, nor did she condescend to a falsehood; she merely wrote, "That circumstances induced Colonel Templeton to request that his Lordship would postpone his visit till the Colonel could wait on him."

Letters and notes were, it seemed, not destined to go safely from the Priory to the Hall—the groom, in his zeal to deliver his missive without delay, rode so furiously that his horse fell and was hurt, when about half-way; and the man, having to walk the rest of the distance, arrived after Lord Hurstwood had set out.

And here occurs one of those miscalled trifles, on which so many results hang—we might pause and moralize a little, and perhaps we ought, only the reader would be sure to skip the page—we might refer to the celebrated cup of tea, to show our historical learning; we might quote Pope, to show the extent of our poetical reading—we shall not do any of these things, which are often done, only to fill up the page—but merely observe, that, had his Lordship received the note, not only would he have kept clear of the Priory on this day—but on hearing of the flight of his intended bride, he might have been too much mortified ever to have called again, and then—ah! let us not anticipate, but regularly and soberly go on.

Soon after eleven, Dawson entered Mrs. Templeton's room, and found her only just awake; but looking so refreshed, that the kind housekeeper almost hated herself for being the messenger of such news as he had to impart.

"You have slept late, madam," she remarked, "but I hope you feel the better for it."

"Much better, thank you," was the reply; and the sound of the first voice she had heard since the important event of the previous night brought the whole scene before her, and reminded her of the necessity of caution.

"Miss Constance was my doctor," pointing to the phial, "and her remedy has been really very successful."

"Then you heard nothing extraordinary last night?" asked Dawson.

"I must have slept the moment I went to bed," was the evasive reply; "but I shall soon rise, and then have a cup of tea."

Now, though quite against all precedent and rule, that the housekeeper, in a family of their rank, should condescend even to recognize her lady, except when receiving her daily orders—such was not the arrangement here

Mrs. Templeton, before the permanent arrival of her daughters, had been much annoyed by the misconduct or fine-ladyisms of her waiting-maids, who really had little else to do than to be tiresome, owing to her very independent habits. She had, therefore, engaged a young woman for her children, and readily accepted the voluntary offer of Dawson, to attend her for the trifling services she required, instead of adding to her trouble, by having to keep order between two lady's-maids.

There was a bond between the mistress and this kind woman which nothing could sever; it had sprung up at their first meeting, and had grown stronger every year. Sweetness, sorrow, patience, and benevolence on one side—on the other, attachment, fidelity, sympathy.

"The Colonel has gone off in a hurry this morning, madam."

"Has he!" she neither asked why nor where.

"Miss Templeton has gone also," pursued Mrs. Dawson, with a quickened pulse; but no remark or start, as she expected—and then, no longer able to bear this irritating insensibility on the part of her mistress, she added, "and, God forgive me! but I hope he will not overtake her."

Still no reply, and thoroughly exasperated, she said, sharply, "Madam, Miss Templeton is gone—she has run away, and no one knows where."

Expecting that her lady would now be sure to faint or scream, she was almost frightened at her silence, and looked fixedly at her. Their eyes met—she read it all at a glance, as if in a book; and stooping down, she respectfully pressed her hand, and said stoutly, as if to assure her, "The rack should not get it from me."

"Thank you, old friend," was the reply; and the bond between them was stronger than ever. "Tell Miss Constance that you have informed me—nothing more."

Constance, meanwhile, had been harassing herself almost to a fever; dreading—yet longing for—the moment when she should meet her mother; and when Dawson informed her that her lady had asked for her, she added:

"And, Miss Constance, my mistress knows, and wishes you not to speak of it—at least, not yet."

So with downcast eyes and mortified looks, Constance met her mother; and hiding her face on her bosom burst into an agony of tears.

"We must talk of this another time," said Mrs. Templeton, with what, to Constance appeared unheard-of composure; "I have given orders to have Lord Hurstwood admitted, so it will not do to give way now; he must not be dismissed, to hear of this from public report."

"I have happily put off his visit, by papa's orders," said Constance; so you will be spared that trial—but, oh! if the dear Vernons had but been here now, instead of waiting till next month."

"Let us be thankful, my love, to have them then," replied her mother; and Constance wondered more and more that she said nothing about Helen; till thinking that she, like herself, felt implicated in a proceeding so at variance with her ideas of propriety, she became more reconciled to the implied wish of keeping silence, and readily permitted it to be an interdicted subject; especially as, though mortified that Helen's conduct should be publicly canvassed and censured, she could not be consistent with her well-known opinions, now one she loved had braved them, by truly and heartily blaming what her sister had done.

She obtained her mother's permission to write to Cecilia Grantham, and entreat her to come immediately to them; remarking that there was no one, not excepting Caroline Vernon, whose society would do them both so much good—an opinion to which Mrs. Templeton very cordially assented

CHAPTER XXXIX.

"Duncan Grey cam here to woo—
Ha! ha! the wooing o't." BURNS.

To Mrs Templeton's surprise, after wha Constance had told her, about one o'clock, Lor Hurstwood was announced—the orders for his ad mittance not having been countermanded, as she had ceased to expect him.

After the usual exchange of greetings, and a few unimportant remarks, she began to suspect some mistake, and that, after all, she should have the pain and embarrassment of herself telling him what had occurred.

"I fear," she said, "that a messenger, sent express by the Colonel's orders, had not reached the Hall before you left."

"Assuredly not; I left rather early, having come round by Forest Hill; but I hope nothing painful or unpleasant was the cause of such haste."

"Painful to ourselves only, I hope," was the reply; "though the news will be unpleasant, I fear, to your Lordship. Miss Templeton, who, from various circumstances, was averse to overtures of marriage from any quarter, having failed to convince Colonel Templeton that she has a right to be consulted—has decided upon using this right—she left us last night."

Believing that he had received her letter, one which she fancied no man of refined feeling would have withstood, and without deigning the common courtesy of a reply, except by persisting in a suit which she had plainly told him was distressing, she spoke with an asperity and pride quite unlike her usual graceful gentleness.

But she had met with more than her match, as the Peer, quite cool and collected, said, without the least pique of manner, but a soupçon of a sneer in his eye—the single word:

"Eloped?"

"That, I fear, is the proper term," she replied, and wincing, as he intended she should.

"Egad! a girl of spirit," was the courtier's spoken remark, and he actually smiled. "A deuced good thing it was before, instead of after," was the unspoken thought, as he remembered Lord Ogleby, and smiled again.

"I grieve," began poor Mrs. Templeton, for she felt that her meditated attack, like Pyrrhus' elephants, had been turned on herself; but the man who, during his diplomatic career, had been used to turning tables, and such political jugglery—to borrow a modern phrase—promptly took the initiative, and said, with a well got-up look of sympathy, "I deeply grieve on your account, my dear madam, to hear this—as, from whatever cause, prudential, romantic, or heroic, such a step is sure to give rise to unpleasant remarks, ill-natured censure, or—"

"Pardon me, my Lord," interrupted Mrs. Templeton, provoked at the dexterity with which he had seized his advantage, and indignant at the use he seemed disposed to make of it; "pardon me, if I remind you, that all these inconveniences you are so carefully enumerating, would have been avoided, had you noticed, as I fully expected you would, the letter I judged it due to you to send."

"To me! I, in my turn, must ask pardon, but I have never had the honor of receiving any letter from you."

"I greatly regret this—since its loss has been the cause of my judging your Lordship unjustly. I can now only repeat, that, knowing my daughter wished to decline any offer of marriage, and entering into her feelings, though her father could not, I wrote, informing your Lordship of this disinclination, trusting both to your delicacy and honor as to the course you would take; had you received this, oh, how much suffering would have been spared us"

"I sincerely deplore the unlucky chance that prevented it from reaching me; and I beg you to believe, that I deeply sympathize with you and your family in this unpleasant occurrence." He was sincere, and she felt it—indeed, she began to think he had not been by any means well-used in this transaction, and, woman-like, she was half disposed to comfort him; therefore when he concluded by saying, "May I do myself the honor of sending and calling to inquire after you?" her reply was quite cordial. "The Colonel will, I am sure, feel flattered by this proof of your friendship; to all of us your Lordship will ever be a welcome guest"—so he bowed respectfully on her extended hand, and departed.

"I think I managed pretty well there," was his remark to himself, as he rode away; "it will not do for me to wear the willow—and yet, she is a beautiful creature—very like her mother—the same outline, so delicate and graceful; the same gentle, dark eyes—and so she thinks she has blinded mine!—but I see it all—she approves of this flight, that I will swear to; nay, more, she knew of it, perhaps arranged it. After all, these women beat us out and out—they are politicians and intriguers in the cradle. Bah! what care I how fair she be—but she is very beautiful;" and he rode more thoughtfully home, memory recalling a face which, in his young days, had seemed to him even fairer, and something like a sigh arose.

But shaking off this unfamiliar mood, and dismissing these painful visions of the past—he decided on the line of conduct to be pursued, so as to spare his vanity and his pride. Happily, the whole affair had been begun and terminated within so short a space of time, that he hoped his own share in the performance remained unknown—or so imperfectly, as to render any explanation he chose to give readily believed. It would not do, therefore, to cut the Priory all at once—no—he would let them down very gently, and then leave the neighborhood for a period, perhaps negotiate an alliance with some young lady, if any such there were, who had no invincible objections to marriage from any quarter; and he smiled, as he quoted Mrs. Templeton's words. Yes—that would be the least embarrassing, the most dignified and satisfactory conduct to pursue; and having thus settled the question to his liking, he was once more himself; and so effectual had been the indurating effects of his worldly and courtly career, that meeting the fair Juliet, who profited by the use of her mother's pony chaise to drive beyond the limits of the village, he entered into a half lively, half sentimental chat with that blooming nymph, which ended in a gallant invitation to her, to come and give her opinion of the beauty of some rare exotics he had in the hot-houses at the Hall, an invitation which was at first coyly refused, but finally accepted.

Now, Lord Hurstwood was neither a villain nor a wretch; those who expect he will turn out a Henry the Eighth or a Blue Beard, a Charles the Second or a Rochester, or any other demon in a modern dress, are destined to be disappointed. He was not even a very bad man; though this avowal may be fatal to his claims on our interest.

It is true he had been dissipated, for he began his courtly career while a mere youth, when profligacy and intemperance were royal favorites; and as a well-trained courtier, of course, they became his also; so he intrigued, he drank, he gambled, and fell in and out of debt, according to his ill-luck or his father's generosity; and, like many of his compeers, bade fair to lead a short life, though not quite sure that it had really been a merry one; when, at last, after much hesitation, and postponing the final scene of the farce as long as possible, fat old kings did die and their fat old mistresses died also—the nation cried, "Le Roi est mort," and some, who interpreted literally that crafty quibble, that kings can not do wrong, put on black; the courtiers shouted, "Vive le Roi," and dressed themselves out for a coronation.

At any rate, a new reign began; vice no longer stared virtue out of countenance; was no longer so fashionable as to be praised, admired, imitated like a Parisian nouveauté—perhaps, indeed, there was quite as much of it; but, whether from policy or police, matters not, it discreetly kept out of sight—or when it did appear, was no longer, like some antique statue, in a state of nudity, but put on comfortable and decent covering.

It was no longer thought a most exquisite witticism to run in debt, cheat the wine-merchant, and become more gloriously drunk than ever at his expense, perhaps his ruin—the discovery had been made, that, take quant. suff. of impudence, ditto meanness; and any one could repeat this true swindler's wit,—princes no longer bequeathed their debts to admiring posterity, with a modest codicil recommending prompt payment; nor did great men leave mementoes of their peccadilloes as legacies to a grateful country, to be maintained and provided for at the said country's expense. A change had come o'er the spirit of the nation's dream; and, happily, it was for the better.

CHAPTER XL.

"There's beggary in the Love that can be reckoned."
Antony and Cleopatra.

It happened that the morning after Helen's flight, Cooper had been detained by business connected with his duties, till an unusually late hour, at the Grange; and when he arrived at the Priory, all was such bustle and excitement, such astonishment and dismay, that no one seemed able to give a coherent account of what had happened. From Ruth he obtained the best information, but even she could not tell much; and he was very closely cross-examining her, when he heard the sound of the Colonel's voice, giving his orders, with all that want of judgment which extreme passion generally evinces, and hastened to him.

At the moment of Cooper's appearance, Colonel Templeton was threatening, not only Constance, but every member of the family, with his most direful vengeance, if any communication should be attempted between them and the fugitive, whom he denounced in language so wildly fierce, as to justify Cooper in reminding him of his daughter's presence. But this interference in no way tended to allay the storm, though it drew it into another quarter, namely, on himself, with such unprovoked violence, that the agent, who had fully intended to have offered his services, which might have been extremely useful, with an offended air kept silent, and quickly withdrew.

"And what think you of this news?" he asked Mrs. Captain, to whom he had related the scene which he had just witnessed, and a few particulars of its cause, that he had subsequently collected—"what is to be made of this?"

"Why, it is to bring grist to my mill," she boldly replied, "as every thing else that happens up there shall, while I have influence and wit to turn it to profit—there is now one less in my way. And what says the proud, pale mother at this stolen march in her prim beauty—but perhaps my dignified madam knew of it."

"Ridiculous," said Cooper; "as if such a thing would be at all likely: why, I hear she is ill, and keeps her bed—though the Colonel has been raging and roaring through the house like a tempest. By George! if she had any hand in it, and he knew it, I believe he would murder her."

"And serve her right, a poor, tame-spirited creature. If he dared to use me as he does her, I would fire the house over his head—I hate her for her meanness."

"Come, come," said Cooper, with a sneer, "this is rather too bad—do you suppose she would put up with it and remain, if it were not for those girls?"

"Ah! I will make the place too hot to hold that other scornful minx. I have not forgotten her impudence about the letter-bag—oh! her letters, truly, must be kept sacred—and no one may look at them, it seems."

"Not inside, and without permission," he retorted, seemingly bent on provoking his martial relative; "and egad! I think she was right—what was it to you and Juliet who wrote to her, or what they wrote about?"

"It signified much, if I could find out any thing to help my purpose. What do you suppose I have come down here for? burying myself alive in this detestably dull place, and among these old-fashioned fools, who are beginning to fancy themselves too good for us—I tell you I will stick at nothing; and if that pretty Jemmy Jessamy, that darling Hubert Forrester, thinks to escape me, he is mistaken—I will stop his philandering at the Priory."

"Now, Maria, you are too absurd; your other schemes are wild enough, but this is preposterous. I tell you it is as hopeless for you to think of inducing him to marry Juliet as if you had fixed on the Rector as a son-in-law;" and he laughed heartily at the idea of the Doctor, in his canonicals and shovel hat, making love to that fair impudence.

"You leave me to manage these matters my own way. Why, there is that sly little Miss Sinclair playing into my hand, while trying for the odd trick herself. But what is going on at the Hermitage?"

"Nothing, except that Mr. Morton seems disposed to purchase Bridgend. I begin to think he took the Hermitage merely to be on the spot if any property he fancied offered itself; for I know there is nothing of a house, beyond large farms, on his Norfolk estate, good as it is; and I think you must be mistaken as to his ever having seen us on the Continent. Why should he be silent if he had?"

"Very true; still, I do not think I am wrong. However, he does not interest us; for that German boy of his was too deep, and young Forrester is a better catch. I suppose Ruth will be here today?"

"No, she has nothing to tell. I saw her for a few minutes, and it is better to avoid exciting suspicion by keeping quiet."

"She is a poor tool," observed Mrs. Captain, "and perhaps will plague us after all; but where do you think this wandering damsel is?"

"Of course with young West—most likely on the borders by this time, and the Colonel in hot chase; but if all is as well arranged as the beginning, he will have his ride for nothing—and serve him right for snarling at me as he did."

"He was a hot-headed fool for that; for I will venture to say you could have suggested something better than he will imagine."

"Yes, and for my own satisfaction, if he should return unsuccessful, I shall apply myself to the task." And he did so; and proceeding with more coolness and method than his principal, through a skilful emissary, he traced Reginald from one step to another, till he found him at Ashley's; thence to his modest lodgings, where, a few days before the marriage, he discovered Helen; and then held council with Mrs. Captain as to what use they should make of their knowledge. Happily, so convinced were these hateful confidantes, that not only was Mrs. Templeton guiltless of having aided in her daughter's departure, but that she was deeply wounded at the remarks to which it exposed her, that they determined to keep this discovery to themselves, at least for the present, so as to prevent the Colonel's interference, who would, and they knew it well, have torn Helen away even from the altar; and thus their malice was made a means of furthering Mrs. Templeton's designs, while they thought only of more deeply annoying and injuring her.

But to return to Constance, whom we left sad and anxious. When she heard that Lord Hurstwood was with her mother, and this in spite of her note, the safe delivery of which she had never doubted, she began to fear some new catastrophe, though what she could not well imagine, it being difficult to fancy any thing worse than the scene they had lately passed through; so, finishing her letter to Cecilia, she, with that ingenuity in self-torturing, not uncommon when the nerves are over-excited and the heart ill at ease, began to torment herself with conjectures about the effect this fresh disaster would have on Hubert and his opinions. She then wandered into Helen's room, the bright thought flashing across her mind, "Perhaps there I shall find some indication of her intentions, which may tend to tranquilize us, some message, some farewell." But there was none. She examined the drawers, still with the same ill success; only she noticed that a few articles of dress seemed to have been hastily removed, while the others were left in great disorder. Smoothing and arranging these, she locked away every loose or stray object she could find, and then again descended, in the eager hope that Hubert might have arrived—but he had not. Wandering about, unhappy, lonely, and with a slight feeling of being neglected, she entered the garden; but to-day, in vain did its rare beauty meet her eyes—in vain did the loveliness of nature call her to admire it—she, almost an enthusiastic worshiper of its glories and its infinite variety of attractions, to-day felt them not. Suddenly and hastily she ascended the steps that led to her mother's conservatory, and rushed to a particular plant of Indian origin, under the broad leaves of which they all three had been in the habit of leaving little notes, containing information of their movements, which they did not choose to leave as verbal messages—still the same result—there was nothing to repay the search. And she was diligently employed at the foot of these same steps, trying to ascertain whether the impression of a small foot could have been just made by herself, and whether it was in the right direction, when she caught sight of Hubert in the distance.

"Yes, it is he—certainly it is," as he drew nearer; "how would he meet her?—did he know?—or had he come because he was still ignorant of this last trial?—if he knew, would he think that Helen's flight reflected on her?" And as he approached, she was thankful to perceive that his look and tone were as kind—nay, why conceal the truth?—as loving as ever. Poor Constance! has it come to this, that thou art grateful to see kindness, or, if thou wilt, love still on that countenance, in thy eyes so glorious? Alas! such was the case, and the bright color rose to her beautiful cheeks when the thought came—"Perhaps he does not yet know of the blight that has settled on us all;" and she felt ready to weep; for this was no prudery or affectation—no morbid sentiment or overstrained notion. Constance really felt as if she were lowered in general estimation.

His first words proved his ignorance, and she felt she must have the task of telling him.

"Well, dear Constance," for seeing that she looked so very sad, he was, unconsciously, more tender than ever, "How is Helen? and what is to be done?"

"Alas! Hubert, then you know not of the blow that has struck us almost to the earth. Last night—" She stopped, but he looked so anxious, she continued hurriedly, "Last night she left us!"

"Good God! fled! where?—with whom? This is distressing news."

"We do not know—it is so unexpected, so overwhelming. Papa is gone in pursuit. Lord Hurstwood is now with mamma;" and she burst into tears.

"Nay, dear Constance, do not give way thus." He took her hand, which she did not withdraw. How he longed to tell her all—to tell her that he loved her—he fancied—it was not vanity, he was above that weakness—he fancied he should then leave her less sorrowful; but, to his honor be it said, he remembered his promise, and was still silent, though inwardly vowing this silence should not last. "Constance," he proceeded, "tell me, can I—can we—be of any use? You know you may command me in any way; but how does your mother bear this?" for he began to fear for his resolution, if he did not change the subject; and while her grief made this more difficult, his chivalry whispered that it should not be taken advantage of.

"Dear mamma has so much to try her, that she bears up wonderfully under this, though, of course, she feels it dreadfully; but I almost doubt whether she has yet realized the full extent of this last catastrophe. I have just sent for Cecilia Grantham, for there is a look of feverish excitement about mamma which makes me uneasy; and now this interview with Lord Hurstwood, and the suspense till papa returns, may be too much for her—and I dread so much being alone."

"Then you have no idea where Helen is?"

"Yes, I have a strong conviction that she is with Reginald West; in short, that he assisted her flight. Only think, Hubert, what she must have suffered and dreaded, to have been forced into a step so repugnant to her principles."

"Poor girl! she must indeed—not that I blame her; no one, knowing all the circumstances, could; and I wish I had permission to publish these at once. Do you still refuse to grant it? It must be as you will, then. But I shall not now wait to see Mrs. Templeton, who would, probably, rather be alone;" and somewhat abruptly he departed, leaving Constance with much to think of, and scarcely understanding whether she was comforted or not by this interview.

If Constance thought that Hubert's hasty departure had any connection with the tidings he had just heard, in one sense she did him injustice; it was not because this fresh sorrow made him feel less for her, but because he so deeply sympathized with her grief, that he resolved to have the right of sharing it, and trying by every means in his power to lessen its poignancy.

He was now determined to bring matters to a termination; therefore, directly he reached home, he sought an interview with his father, nor did he leave him till his consent was given—with great reluctance, however—that he might plead his suit with Constance, his father promising to accompany him at the same time to see the Colonel. Conditions were, however, affixed to this concession, that nothing should be done till they had news of Helen's marriage, and that she was safely and honorably provided for; it was useless for Hubert to entreat on this point; his father insisted with firmness quite unusual when his son's wishes interfered, but Mr. Forrester's objections were increased ten-fold by this escapade of Helen's; and Mrs. Forrester, spite of her unbounded love for her son, could hardly yield to his entreaties, and give her consent on any terms.

In this mood they met at dinner, at which Laurette, using her privilege of being almost l'enfant de la famille, joined them without invitation—for by this time the news had reached, not only to the Grange, but had spread through the whole village—though, as Lord Hurstwood had calculated, no one but Hubert knew how much his proposals had brought about this crisis.

Laurette's quick intelligence soon put her au fait as regarded the thoughts and feelings of her three companions. Hubert had already proposed to Constance, without waiting for his father's sanction; or was about to do so with it—either supposition readily accounted for the looks and manners of them all—and in any case she would try and contribute her usual offering of a few drops of gall—if one did not swallow them, another would.

"I should not have ventured to show myself anywhere but here," she remarked, à propos to nothing, and affecting deep concern and distress, skillfully mingled with a little reproachful look, as if she felt ill-used, and another smaller look of humiliation; "but though not one to parade what I can not but feel as reflected disgrace—for I do not forget that she is my cousin—I knew among such kind friends I should still receive a cordial welcome."

"Why should you or any one else doubt that?" retorted Hubert, much irritated. "Helen's act is her own, and reflects on no one else, even if it do on her, poor girl! which I am not the least disposed to admit."

"Hubert!" interposed his mother, solemnly, "we can not excuse this, so we will not discuss it—at least, just now—though, as to Laurette, I do not see how the censure can extend to her."

"Nor to anybody else," persisted Hubert, looking as a spoiled only son can sometimes look, and thinking Laurette perfectly detestable.

"Now for arrow the second," thought that clever markswoman, carefully examining her quiver for the longest and sharpest, that should, if possible, like a skewer, run them all through.

"This will make Constance a fine prize," said she carelessly, "and bring swarms of hitherto undecided swains to her feet. Nothing like les beaux yeux de sa cassette for that. I am much mistaken if uncle Lionel do not make her sole heiress—she was always his favorite."

Hubert and his father exchanged glances. The arrow must have passed right through him, for he suddenly started, and became crimson to the very brow. It also found its way sure enough to the stately old father, who looked indignant and offended. Nor did the mother wholly escape a slight scratch, quite enough, though, to bring tears to her eyes.

"Well done; it has hit the white," said the amiable Laurette to herself. "It will be too late for the Priory to-day, even for me to be admitted; but to-morrow, like the slaughtering sparrow so famous in nursery poetry, I will go with my bow and arrow, and practice a little archery there also."

"Hubert," inquired his father, after she had gone, "did you notice Miss Sinclair's remark?"

"Yes," said Hubert, angrily, adding very disrespectfully, "and I wish she had been at Jericho before she thought of making it here. But no once could ever suppose me influenced by so paltry a motive;" and then suddenly remembering that if he had had his own way, and been allowed to propose to Constance when he first wished, this imputation could never, by any possibility, have been attached to him, he poured out such a torrent of reproaches on himself for having been obedient, and on his father for having required it, that Mr. Forrester was effectually silenced; and his mother, not knowing of this outbreak, having ventured to hint that Constance was compromised by Helen's proceedings, he defended her so vehemently, mixed with such severe reproaches on his mother for her unwomanly cruelty, that she burst into an agony of tears; a result so unusual, that Hubert was at length moved to ask pardon, kiss and be friends, and concluded by again promising to delay further proceedings for a short time.

After a fruitless search, Colonel Templeton returned, and learned that his wife was ill in bed. Mr. Curtis said it was a nervous attack; and he was right, for many days elapsed before she was able to leave her room.

His arrival was quickly followed by that of Cecilia, who, with a promptness which ever accompanies sincerity, had, immediately on the receipt of her cousin's letter, started off for the Priory, leaving Grantham, at that time the very focus of gayety, for the house of mourning—Constance having informed her of their distress—and urged this as a motive for her coming which she knew would not be disregarded.

Mrs. Templeton had kept up an appearance of composure during her interview with Lord Hurstwood, and till she heard that the fugitives had reached London; and then, knowing that weeks must elapse before she could be quite at ease, she fairly gave way; and her illness being attributed by the Colonel to her sorrow and anxiety, was mercifully the means of averting all suspicion from her.

Under these circumstances, the presence of Cecilia was a general advantage. Her uncle heard from her that Lord Hurstwood had seen Mrs Templeton; and though the particulars of this interview never transpired, he was gratified to find that all communication between the two families was not quite broken off. He spoke to her of Helen, of his still unsuccessful search—in all this she indulged him; but when he began to utter threats or invectives she invariably signified her disapproval, or left the room. She did not unwisely defend Helen in all she had done—she rather sought to excuse her, and to win him to pardon her; but here she failed. Gradually, however, her influence prevailed so far, that he resumed his usual pursuits, no longer harassing them by outbursts of anger and fury.

One morning, when he entered the breakfast-room, he found Constance so deeply absorbed in reading a letter, that she did not notice his entrance.

"From whom is that?" he asked, with a look of suspicion.

"From my aunt Sinclair," replied she, not noticing his manner or tone.

"Let me see it," he said, rudely; "I shall permit no underhand doings with you."

Coloring violently, Constance quickly handed him the letter, while Cecilia gazed at him with astonishment so evident, in eyes which her mother had properly called fine, that it was impossible to mistake her thoughts.

"Prevention is better than cure, so says Curtis," he remarked, with an awkward attempt at a laugh, and too much ashamed even to glance at the letter; "but if Constance is to have her private letter-bag, it must be on parol."

"I refuse to keep it on those terms," said Constance; "if any letters came which contained news from those I love, I should read them. I therefore give up my bag."

"Uncle," said Cecilia, "I need not remind you that I rarely interfere in what does not strictly concern me—but this does—and I appeal to you, as a gentleman, if this is quite consistent with that character. There are many circumstances connected with an event, which I am sure we all regret, that I trust will eventually plead in behalf of those concerned; and it is an error to suppose one mistake can root out the love of years."

"You have said more than any other would have ventured to say," he replied; "you have alluded to one who is an alien and an outcast—one who—"

"I am sorry to hear there is so little courage, then," she said, quickly, seeing to what he was tending; "but, without her being put on parol, I know you do not mean to meddle with a lady's letter-bag;" and thus the matter ended, Constance being wisely deaf to the pride that whispered, "refuse the amnesty," because she really shrank, with something like horror, from the idea of having her letters once more at the mercy of the agent's unscrupulous family.

She had not spoken the whole of this time, but she looked steadily at her father when he began denouncing Helen; and it is remarkable that from that hour she rarely addressed him as father, never by the more childlike epithet of "dear papa," which had often fallen like music on his ear—nor did she ever again press her innocent lips, with the caress he so much loved, on his brow. Always respectful, she was never again fond.

CHAPTER XLI.

"——— the pure, open, prosperous love,
That pledg'd on earth, and seal'd above,
Grows in the world's approving eyes."
Lalla Rookh.

Firm to his original purpose, that nothing in his manner should show how mortified he really was, at the desperate alternative Helen had adopted, rather than marry him, in the course of a few days Lord Hurstwood again presented himself at the Priory, and found that no tidings had been received of the runaway, nor yet from the Colonel, though the return of the latter was hourly expected.

This he learned from Cecilia, as well as that her aunt was so ill as not to be able to leave her room. This news afforded him a pretext for another visit; and from one cause or another, again and again did he come—at first, to the great, and scarcely concealed, annoyance of Constance; but as he was always courteous, and his intentions apparently were both kind and respectful, she gradually unbent, and received him graciously—and this the more easily, as her mother had told her of the fate of her letter to the Hall, a fact which she had ascertained through the cautious inquiries of Dawson.

Thus cleared from what had seemed the most objectionable and least pardonable proceedings, Constance judged him more favorably—and began to think that it was nothing so extraordinary that he should admire Helen—and admiring, that he should then desire to win her.

Laurette, the arrant coquette, was constantly at the Priory at those times when she knew he was most likely to be there.

He had had one interview with the Colonel, during which, as had been his arranged line of policy, he gave, instead of receiving, sympathy; and recollecting the few hints that had escaped from Mrs Templeton, by which he plainly saw that it had been the Colonel's intention to make him his dupe, and not finding it suitable to his dignity to resent this openly, he lost no opportunity of uttering words which, to one not cognizant of the truth, seemed to have no special meaning, but which yet made the Colonel smart, as it stung by a cloud of musquitoes, and induced him inwardly to resolve that, if his Lordship did him the honor to call, he should not often find him at home to receive him.

But the absence of the master of the mansion was borne with sufficient philosophy by the gallant noble; when one, perhaps all the graces, as he mentally called them, received him—at least, with extreme politeness, if not pleasure. He was, in short, delighted with the success of his endeavors to remove any unfavorable suspicions his matrimonial contretemps had excited—charmed also at the friendly mode of calling, which he had established—above all, the notion of still playing the amiable to three such damsels, was any thing but disagreeable to a man of his tastes and habits. Another reason, also, often drew him there, which would have deeply wounded the self-love of Laurette, could she but have suspected it; he was excessively amused at her little tricks—her pretty maneuvers, through which he saw as plainly, as if she had been a raw young attaché sent by his opponent to tell some political lie—diverted him extremely; for, in fact, her utter ignorance of his character was perpetually betraying her into some amusing absurdity; and I seemingly bent on blundering her part, she affected a little air of sentiment, as if she took him for one who was struggling to hide a wounded heart, and needed the balm of sympathy to effect his cure—she covertly offered him condolence and pity, both in tone and looks—and all this to him, who was doing his utmost to prove, to all who knew the real state of affairs, that he cared as little for the loss of his mistress as for his glove or cane.

Cecilia, above all these petty arts, and quite free from design of any kind, had, perhaps, never appeared to greater advantage. Poor Mrs. Templeton, whose nerves had been, as it were, laid bare by late events, was the only one who, loving her truly, did not hail her appearance; but to one suffering as she was, from bodily weakness, and the greatest suspense and anxiety of mind, Cecilia's presence was, in every sense, too much. Her dignified, but, perhaps, rather decided, step—her musical and well-toned, but rather loud, voice; the rustle of her rich and ample silks; the demonstrative manner in which she placed and replaced any thing about the invalid, sometimes made her aunt shrink; but then her kind and bright face, her sensible remarks, her unflagging spirits, were such valuable counterweights, especially to Constance, who, from some feeling she had not tried to comprehend, was never more than friendly with Laurette, that when, in the course of a week, Mrs. Templeton admitted the young people to her boudoir, and occasionally accompanied them in a walk or drive, she felt that Cecilia's presence was as bright and cheering as sunshine.

One day, very shortly after her recovery, Mrs. Templeton, being alone with Constance, said:

"While I was suffering so severely from my nervous attack, I deliberately refrained from alluding to the painful circumstance which has lately occurred. I might, perhaps, have spared you much, as your distressed looks and manner have not been unnoticed—but I really feared my own weakness. I have heard both of and from Helen—she is quite safe—in honorable security—and we shall soon, and frequently, by some means, which you must not seek to know, hear more."

"Dear mamma, how your words relieve me," said Constance, only kept from vehement demonstrations of joy by the fear of agitating her mother. "One question—and Heaven be praised, first, for what I already know—is she with Reginald?—are they married?"

"Not yet, to both your questions; and now no more—though I see a whole volume of inquiries on your face; when I have any thing certain to communicate, be assured you shall hear it."

"And you are well enough to dine with us, are you not, dearest?"

"I hope so; and to-morrow we will all go and look at the Rectory, both within and without, and pass judgment on Mr. Merton's taste, which, I hear, has been at work there."

"Ashley must be very busy," remarked Constance, "to delegate so much to our venerable Hermit; but I suppose he will find time to run away from his duties, at least to meet the dear Rectorites—how I long to see them all."

"So do I, dear child, though we must not grudge the Doctor this almost unexampled absence—the first of any length I have ever known him take. Have the Forresters called or sent lately? I have a very kind note from Lady Dallas, which Laurette brought yesterday."

"Oh, yes, they have sent every day," said Constance, coloring, and very hastily adjusting her her mother's collar, but certainly not improving it.

"Very well; and now, dear, I am tired—send Dawson."

The day at length came when Mrs. Templeton expected to have all her fears and anxieties put to rest, by receiving information of Helen's marriage; she had been so much excited the previous evening, that Mr. Curtis, at the earnest request of Constance and Cecilia, had been again summoned. Mrs. Templeton patiently resigned herself to composing draughts, solitude, quiet, and the usual remedies; though she well knew that neither peace nor quiet would be her lot till the important packet arrived she had so much wished for. "Canst thou minister to a mind diseased?" she might have asked of her kind Esculapius—"canst thou compose the mind of the mother, who knows that this day, unsustained by a mother's presence, unaccompanied by a father's blessing, her beloved child will pronounce the vows that bind her to another?"

And the next morning, having insisted on rising to breakfast, in spite of entreaties that she would remain quiet, when the bag was opened, it was with a feeling of faintness that she took from Constance a letter of unusual dimensions. She opened it; "Heaven be thanked!" was her half-uttered exclamation, as she unfolded a paper before breaking the seal of a letter which accompanied it. "Constance, pass this to your papa; it is the certificate of Helen's marriage."

"Dear aunt," said Cecilia, tears in her eyes, and she kissed her—but she had too much tact to say more while her uncle was present.

With a cry of joy Constance seized the precious document, and laid it before her father. He was opening a letter, from which fluttered a paper of similar appearance—he glanced at it—and his brow grew dark as midnight; with a muttered curse he collected both documents and the letter, and without deigning further to read the contents, he held them in the flame of a taper, generally placed at his side for the convenience of sealing letters or notes, and though his hand shook with passion, he persevered till they were consumed.

"Uncle," said Cecilia, her face in a glow, and her eyes sparkling with indignation.

But not a word from Constance.

"They are but copies," said Mrs. Templeton, her pale face flushing to the very brow, as she rose and left the room, carrying her letters with her. They were from both her children, as she fondly termed them; and when Constance, after a while, entered, she gave them to her to read, and sat with her arm round her remaining treasure, while the tears of the latter fell like rain, and blinded her so, that she could scarcely see words of love and tenderness—expressions of regret at separation from them, and hopes of happiness, in the full confidence, the lovely writer felt, that Reginald would never make her repent the course she had pursued. She then turned to Reginald's letter. "Ah, mamma," said she, "let us no longer sorrow, but rather rejoice; it is far better as it is;" and tenderly embracing her mother, she went to tell Cecilia of this termination to their present anxiety.

How happy was her meeting with Hubert, to whom, without reserve, she told of these dear letters; and though he left her after a very brief interview, so deeply did she love her sister, that the thought of her and her new duties made it delightful to be alone.

Hubert hastened back to Forest Hill, eager to be the first to carry the news of Helen's marriage, and claim from his father the fulfillment of his promise, and that, immediately. Having convinced him that any change in his sentiments was utterly impossible, he obtained his consent to accompany him on the morrow to the Priory; for, though far from using the exact words, Mr. Forrester began to think that, if it must be done, "then 'twere well it were done quickly;" and, accordingly, the next morning's sun shone on the stately figure of the father and the handsome one of the son as they set forth to determine the fate of the latter.

Constance was in the act of descending the grand staircase, when she heard the voice of Mr. Forrester inquiring for the Colonel, and requesting the servant to inform him, that he had ridden over purposely to see him.

Divining the cause of his visit, she flew back into her now lonely apartments, and almost breathless sank into a chair. As she thus sat, striving to regain composure, she heard the rich voice of Hubert singing a few bars of a trio which they had both, months ago, practiced with Helen Weil did she remember that evening the only cloud then resting on them being the illness of Mrs. West. Heavy and dark enough did that then seem—but how rapidly had it increased, both in size and density—till, lately, it had blackened their whole horizon.

Mrs. West was now dead—Reginald was stripped of all his brilliant expectations, and was toiling for his bread—and Helen, her dear, her beautiful sister, was forced to become a fugitive, and an alien from her father's house.

She hid her face in her hands, as if she would shut out the sad pictures which memory presented, when again the voice she loved came floating upward in a gay refrain: she listened, till the cheerful sounds were accepted as tokens of happier days; and knowing for whom Hubert lingered on the terrace, she descended to meet him.

"Ah! dear Constance!" was his cheerful greeting, "how delighted I am to see you; I was half afraid you would be hid somewhere till my father"—he paused—"in short," he said, looking unusually grave and earnest, "I must learn the truth from your own dear self. Am I mistaken?—have I been giving you my love, my idolatry in vain?—have I been cherishing a blessed hope which can not be realized?—Constance, you know that I love you, but you can not know how much—can you give me hope—love, in return?"

"Oh! Hubert, how ungrateful you must think me, if you doubt," was the whispered reply.

"It is not gratitude I ask for," he quickly said, "it is love—your love, dear Constance."

"And is that all?" she asked, with a smile, which he thought was that of an angel, giving him her hand.

"All! dearest; what more can I wish for? and with this precious hand you give it, do you not?" so drawing her toward him, he pressed the kiss of affiance on her blushing cheek.

"My father is with the Colonel," he said, after a pause, full of deep emotion to both; "but, Constance, one condition he insists on, in spite of my entreaty and opposition. In a short time, Victor Morton will leave for the Mediterrancan; he has long wished me to accompany him; and though he is the king of traveling companions, I need not tell you, I could not think of it—nor why. Well, my father consents to our engagement, if I win you; and I have, have I not? Of course, also supposing neither the Colonel nor Mrs. Templeton disapprove; but he will make me set off on this rambling expedition—what think you, dear one?"

"Do not mistake me, dear Hubert," replied Constance, "if I say I at once see the propriety of this plan. Time alone can soften the effects of our last misfortune; and when we meet after this parting, perhaps Providence will so have ordered it, that our troubles may be lessened; so let us try and think that this is for the best, though sadly shall I miss my kind and daily consoler—when do you think of leaving?"

"I believe Victor starts in the course of six weeks; but there are many things to be done for us before I go. Hargraves must be looked after, and a thousand other matters settled—but here are our respected fathers, both looking any thing but dreadful."

They did not, however, look very cheerful; and Constance, trembling very much as her father drew near, and feeling that if the scene were prolonged she should faint, sat down.

"Mr. Forrester has been asking me to give you to his son, Constance, and I have consented," was all he said.

But Mr. Forrester, looking at the beautiful girl who was thus coolly disposed of without, as it seemed, being allowed any voice in the matter, could not help adding, with that old-fashioned chivalry, which agreed so well with his proud and reserved manners:

"Which consent, we venture to hope you will make my son—will make us happy by confirming."

But she could not speak, for her father's want of courtesy, not to say kindness, had deeply wounded her; and Hubert, seeing she was much overcome, and willing to terminate the interview and set her free, added, with a gratified smile, "I hope Constance will not prove inexorable;" and while she escaped, shook hands with the Colonel, and warmly thanked him, as well as his father.

"I have informed Colonel Templeton of your proposed absence, in the reasonableness of which he entirely concurs."

"And Mrs. Templeton?" asked Hubert.

"Mrs. Templeton is far from well," replied her husband; "to-morrow, perhaps, she may see you."

But though to the father, who was still very indifferent about the whole matter, this was a sufficient reason for not urging an interview, not so to the son. He left his father at the Rectory, and rode back, requesting by note to see Mrs. Templeton, if only for a few minutes.

Directly she left the gentlemen, Constance hastened to her mother, whom she found in her boudoir, writing.

"Mamma," she said, kneeling by her side, no uncommon attitude, "Mr. Forrester is here, and Hubert:" she paused, but the smile and the blush spoke volumes—and her mother, looking at the lovely face raised so fondly to her, read that the hour was come, when she must give away this treasure also. Still, it was so wholly unexpected—the gift asked for, was, to her, so inexpressibly dear, so exceedingly valued, that for a minute she was silent—perhaps, also, some thought or fancy of her own had to be banished—but it was impossible to see a shade of anxiety steal over that sweet countenance, and not hasten to remove it. So she said, very tenderly but calmly, "And they have come to ask for my Constance, and she says, yes—is it so?"

"Yes," she faintly echoed; "and, mother, bless me."

"I do, my child—I always have—and the blessing has returned a hundred-fold into my own bosom, in both my children; yes, both—and you love this gay and handsome Hubert."

"Ah! mamma, you think him handsome; no wonder, then, that the foolish Constance does."

"Not foolish, if she love him for qualities without which there can be no reasonable hope of happiness—but like me, in this also, she loves him because he is true and honorable."

"Dear mother, how good you are—how well you know how to make me quite happy. I sometimes felt as if I must be almost wicked to have joy in my heart while all of us have lately been so wretched; and let me say this now, that you can not think how greatly I wished to tell you all I fancied—but I could not very well, could I?"

"Not very well, certainly, till Hubert took the first step, unless you had doubted the return of your affection—and then, my pet, you know you must have avoided him."

"But that was not the case—and so—but we shall not part very soon, dear mamma;" but before she related why, the little note was put into Mrs. Templeton's hands, and much gratified at the kind and delicate feeling it evinced, she ordered Mr. Hubert to be immediately summoned.

Constance was still by her mother's side, when on Hubert's entrance, with a smile, put out her hand; he kissed it, and with the hands of mother and daughter tenderly clasped in his, stooped his graceful figure.

"God bless you, children," said the mother solemnly. "Hubert, you have won her love—value and respect the gift, as you hope for happiness. You are both young—very young—therefore, I am glad you have an opportunity offered you for understanding more clearly what such an engagement as yours really means. Murmur not at a short delay—let it be a period of useful probation; and, under all and every circumstance be true to yourselves, be true to each other. Now go—and, Hubert, tell Mrs. Forrester what an invalid I am—but that I shall, I hope, be equal to receiving her to-morrow."

Ah! how proud and gay he was as he rode along: and how he almost succeeded in convincing Mr. Forrester that he had done a very good and very meritorious day's work—almost, not quite; for all that gentleman's prejudices against the Colonel had been strengthened during their strictly business-like interview.

The master of Seabrooke had testified nothing like a due sense of the dignity of the family into which his daughter was to be received. The Colonel talked of nobility—Mr. Forrester of ancestry. The Colonel dwelt on the fortune his daughter would eventually possess—Mr. Forrester of the Hargrave estate Hubert would at once have assigned to him; and though the value of the Seabrooke property was ostentatiously paraded as the Colonel evaded any precise reply as to the sum he would immediately lay down, Mr. Forrester felt sure that he was embarrassed as regarded ready money, a conviction which gained strength when he remembered how often report had said that immense sums had been lost at play, both in London and abroad.

However, by insisting on Hubert's absence time was gained. Hargraves, also, required repairs and alterations, which he should not feel bound to hurry on; and though it would be doing injustice both to Mr. and Mrs. Forrester to insinuate that they hoped or even anticipated any material alteration from time, when their own and their son's honor were equally concerned in the proceeding, they were glad that Hubert was so far reasonable as to have yielded.

Laurette was duly informed the next day. Mrs. Forrester called at the Grange, after an interview with Mrs. Templeton and Constance, during which she saw and heard so much to admire in both, and believed there were so many causes to excite sympathy, that the good old lady was nearly reconciled to the idea of having so sweet a creature for Hubert's wife—and decided that she was really worthy of him.

And what thought Laurette of this news? to her by no means unexpected—fervently as she had hoped some chapter of accidents would at least have postponed the dénouement. Laurette's real thoughts were not always "for daws to peck at;" and, on this occasion, she kept them to herself.

But she tendered her congratulations very warmly, and wrote to Craigalan, expressing her earnest wish that her father and mother would make an effort, and visit town. She had suddenly discovered that it was very long since they had all met at the Priory—where she was sure their presence would now be so serviceable, as well as agreeable—dwelt on the claims of other old friends, and concluded by saying, that, if they made the first move southward, they would probably persuade her uncle Lionel to take her aunt and Constance to return the visit; a change which she suggested would be of much benefit, after all they had lately gone through.

She then called at the Priory, kissed Constance with an affectionate smile, and remarked, that while she and her mother were so unhappy about Helen, this little interlude of proposals and acceptance must be doubly valuable—it was so calculated to concentrate their thoughts on affairs at home—and then left her cousin, with cheeks tingling at her implied sensibility, to act the part of comforter to her aunt, to whom she accidentally remarked—"I am sure the feeling that Hubert is pledged in a serious engagement, anywhere among their own circle, must be a great relief to both his parents, who have been greatly annoyed at his folly in calling so perpetually on that disreputable person, Mrs. Mordaunt, and her equally objectionable daughter;" and though she had not the gratifying assurance that the arrow had touched the mark, it had—and, spite of the unconcern with which Mrs. Templeton had appeared to hear this innuendo, many a painful hour did its rankling cause that fond and anxious mother.

CHAPTER XLII.

"Amaryllis I did woo,
And I courted Phillis too." WITHERS.

"'Tis well to be off with the old love,
Before you are on with the new."

THE day at last came which was to bring back the Vernons. Constance and Cecilia were at the Rectory long before the hour appointed for their arrival—flying from room to room to see that all was in order, and ever detecting something that required arranging. They had come accompanied by a servant, loaded with flowers from the Priory, which Cecilia declared was literally "sweets to the sweet," as the Rectory garden was one scene of beauty—for knives and scissors had been doing sharp duty in cutting away all that was faded or unsightly.

The house was filled with the perfume of its fragrant ornaments, and Constance, having just declared all perfect, had risen to give a more graceful effect to a vase of choice exotics, when the bells pealed forth their rustic music, and the sounds of welcome from many voices, in a loud huzza from the parishioners, who had assembled to greet their pastor, reached the quiet drawing-room.

She paused in her arrangement, and sat down, looking very pale. Since she had last seen them, how much had happened! But there was short time for sorrowful retrospection; the sound of wheels, a rush, a cry, and they are all kissing and embracing as if scarcely knowing what they did—all, for the Doctor was, for a minute, as much overcome as any of them.

"And your mother, Constance, where is she?"

"Coming—she, or rather we, feared the bustle and first excitement for her—but the bells were to be her signal—and lo! here she is."

She bore the meeting admirably—was perhaps more calm than Mrs. Vernon; and though many painful feelings agitated each individual, gratitude and pleasure were certainly predominant.

When alone with Constance, Caroline wept bitterly as she listened to a hasty outline of what had passed—for no letters could tell what five minutes' conversation did—and they then speedily rejoined the rest of the party, when it was arranged that they should part for this day, and leave the travelers to settle and rest themselves; and that Mrs. Templeton should spend an hour there the next, with the Doctor and his wife, while the carriage took back Caroline to the Priory, there to meet Laurette, and pass the day with them.

Meantime, the visits of Lord Hurstwood to the Priory were, in one sense, any thing but angelic—that is to say, they were neither few nor far between; on the contrary, they were long and frequent.

Thus it happened, that calling there one day, rather earlier than usual, he was informed that the young ladies were in the drawing-room conservatory, whither he proceeded unannounced, the servant having left him to seek his mistress. His entrance was quite unobserved by the cousins—the room in which he stood being darkened by blinds, while they sat in the full light of their floral apartment—and certainly he may be pardoned for pausing to look at the picture they presented.

Constance, in her simple white dress, relieved by one bow of her favorite color, blue, her rich brown hair wound round her well-shaped head, and her sweet face peeping through her thick glossy curls, was seated on a low divan, profusely scattered with cut flowers, which she was arranging. Laurette, fashionably, but most becomingly dressed, had her somewhat dark style of beauty skillfully brought out by a pink bonnet, remarkable for the absence of any thing like showy trimming, while her standing position gave her an opportunity of assuming one of those graceful attitudes which had lost all appearance of being studied from having become quite habitual.

Cecilia sat with a half opened book in her hand, from which she seemed to have been reading; an animated reply, which she was making to Laurette, displayed to singular advantage all the dignity of her manner and the irresistible charm of her mouth and smile.

"I maintain," she was saying. "that there is not the least resemblance between the case of this sentimental heroine here," indicating the book, "and our dear Helen. This girl runs away with a worthless lover, after having had proofs of his baseness—Helen did nothing of the kind."

"Certainly not," said Laurette, with a sneer, little conscious who was approaching so slowly—for his Lordship was seized with sudden cramp—"she ran away to escape 'the dandy of sixty, who bows with a grace.'"

"What a caustic little devil it is!" was the listener's thought. "Hang it! I am not quite forty-eight."

"But had she not loved Reginald, who is a noble and a true gentleman," replied Cecilia, "that objection would not have excused her with every one. Most girls would consider an offer from one of his rank and station an honor—and depend upon it, Laurette, there will be as much scheming among mothers, ay, and among daughters too, to secure him, as among courtiers to get the vacant ribbon."

"What a complexion that girl has, and what a shape," muttered the peer; and having recovered from his cramp, which still prevented his moving in double quick time, he gently retraced his steps, but not before he heard Laurette, with a mocking laugh, say—"Shepherds, have you seen my love?" and protesting by all that was spiteful, that the little dark vixen would die an old maid, he made his way through the hall to the door of the conservatory which faced the park.

He smiled as he gracefully saluted the ladies, and thought of the "dandy of sixty;" but, true to his courtier training, he was careful not to show the least trace of pique in his manner to Laurette, except, that when she began to play her airs of patronizing sympathy, he replied in so gay and jesting a tone as to throw back the ridicule on her

This time, as he returned to Hurstwood, he was so absorbed in thought as not to remark whom he passed on the road; such, at least, we must suppose was the case, as so polite a nobleman would never remorselessly have cut a pretty acquaintance like Miss Juliet, who "happened" to be driving the way that led to the Hall; indeed, as she had more than once remarked to Lord Hurstwood, it was something extraordinary this should so often "happen;" to which he would gallantly rejoin some nonsense about attraction and sympathy.

He now, however, passed her so quickly, that she scarcely heard the hoofs on the soft turf, before his horse was far a-head, throwing the dust in her face, as plentifully as his master had previously thrown it in her eyes; the groom respectfully touched his hat—but that was for my lord; he grinned—and that was for the lady. Juliet was ready to cry from rage and mortification—she did not, however, but went home, and did what was more often the case—she was saucy to her mother instead; conduct which that sensible matron was not likely to permit; insolence followed violent reprimand and the result was one of those outbreaks nicknamed, by some who had heard them more than once, on account of their noise, "the Coopers at work."

A few days after this, Laurette and Constance had set out to the Rectory; Mrs Templeton and Cecilia were to follow. In her stately way, the latter was pacing the terrace, when Lord Hurstwood appeared from the garden wing, and as she was walking from him, he had full time to remark the well-proportioned and springy figure, which was surmounted by a head and bust fit model for a Juno.

"Hymen, I invoke thee," said he, raising his hat, and still retaining it in his hand, as the figure turned and showed the pleasant face belonging to it.

"Good-morning, my lord," she said, in return to his silent bow; "Mrs. Templeton will, I believe, be here immediately"

"I hope not before my object in coming, so soon after my visit of yesterday, is stated; and were it not presumptuous to hope for a very great happiness, I should venture to add, not, I hope, before my object is gained."

"So successful a statesman as we all know your Lordship to be, should never anticipate failure. I have read it somewhere, that half the secret of success is, to believe it certain."

"I wish I could listen to you, Miss Grantham, as worshipers of old did to their oracles—with implicit faith in their predictions—but this I have not the vanity to do; in any event, however, you will decide my fate. May I therefore crave the honor of your attention for a few minutes?"

Cecilia bowed, slightly agitated.

"With me the age of romance is passed—I am nearly forty-eight"—he said this to let her know he was not sixty, and to spare her the trouble of consulting the peerage; "domestic life, and the happiness it brings, have been long enough neglected for my public duties; but till I saw you, I never saw any one with whom I felt sure I should find it. If I should be so highly favored as to have obtained the least interest in your good opinion, my dearest wish will be gained. Pardon me, also, if I seem presuming, or too eager to secure so great a boon; but if you can make me happy by at once replying favorably to my request, I entreat you to do so. If I ask too much, or am too precipitate or hasty, condescend to consider what I have said."

"Lord Hurstwood," answered Cecilia, now thoroughly herself, "I am said to be frank, almost to rashness; and perhaps," she continued, smiling, "you, like a true politician, will turn this confession to your advantage—be it so. I trust implicitly to your honor;"—he bowed, well pleased at this exordium—"but before I decide, I should prefer that you, as well as myself, see Lord and Lady Grantham, who have but just returned to England; on which account my visit here will terminate in two days."

"Then," he said, bowing on her hand, which she readily held out, in three days' time I shall have the honor of seeing Lord and Lady Grantham, and of again meeting you under their roof; till then, thus the affair remains; I now take my leave, and carrying with me your permission to hope."

"Nay, that is your own addition."

"Then ratify it with your own gracious and sweet consent—so that it may not be my invention; you will also permit me to communicate with you by letter, should I have forgotten any minor detail, while wholly engrossed with thoughts of securing the crowning blessing of life."

To this she readily consented, and he was taking his leave, when he said, "But here is Mrs. Templeton; I will merely bid her good-morning, and adieu. Our next meeting will, I trust, be a happy one at Grantham."

And he departed, quite reconciled to the English method of wooing—and quoting the poet's advice:

"Therefore all hearts in love use their own tongue;
Let every eye negotiate for itself,
And trust no agent."

The following day, as might have been expected, brought a note from the Hall; to obtain some trifling information was the ostensible reason; the real one was to have an answer from Cecilia; but as she has already decided on accepting him, there was no need for any little finessing—it, however, gave her the opportunity of saying that her parents were the first to whom she should mention his wishes; her love and respect for her aunt, being subordinate to her strong feeling of affection toward them.

Mrs Templeton's interview with the Doctor and Mrs. Vernon was, at first, painful and exciting; for though they had received full accounts, by almost the last post from Ashley, and were able to inform her of many things which were not mentioned by either Reginald or Helen, yet the history of the sad train of events which had led to this most unexpected result revealed much which displayed the tyranny and hardness of the Colonel more evidently than ever. But enough was learned to fully exonerate both Mrs. Templeton and Helen, in Mrs Vernon's opinion; even the good Doctor went so far as to say, that, much as he wished they had been at hand, to comfort and sustain her during this season of perplexity and trouble, he was very glad that his absence had saved him from the difficulty of being obliged to decide, where, he feared, his feelings and his his sense of duty might have been at variance.

She also informed them of the engagement between Hubert and Constance, as well as of the contemplated departure of the former; and though they both congratulated her in the most friendly manner, it was evident they thought this temporary separation a wise arrangement; especially the Doctor, who remarked that Hubert, whose generous and affectionate nature none who knew him could deny, had hitherto had very little opportunity of knowing much of himself or of the world; and though he went on his long tour with one not older than himself, still Victor Morton was years his senior in experience; was used to traveling about in the most independent manner, and possessed such valuable introductions, that great advantage might be derived from this plan.

"And when is Ashley coming, Caroline?" asked Constance, as they sat chatting together. "How I long to see him—for I am not fully in mamma's confidence yet—she merely tells me briefly, Helen is well, or, as she said lately, Helen is married—but there is so much wanting—not that I for a moment wish to learn what she thinks it best to conceal; but there are so many gaps, which I could honorably ask Ashley to fill up."

"We expect him very shortly," replied his sister; indeed, I think papa and mamma are disappointed that he is not here to receive us—but you know with him friendship is a very absorbing feeling; and while he can serve Reginald and Helen, he will not leave them, even for us—whom he can only please, not assist."

"What a lover he will make," remarked Constance, smiling and then blushing.

"Yes," said Caroline, gravely; "with him it will be once and forever."

"But, suppose—though even the supposition is very shocking—but suppose the lady should die?"

"He will still love her memory more than any other living creature; 'to live with them is far less sweet than to remember thee.'"

"But if unworthy?" persisted Constance.

"Ah! that is supposing an impossible case. My brother," she said, rather proudly, "never can love anything unworthy—he seems intuitively to avoid all such."

"You are quite right there, dear Carry—and this has always made me feel, that the friendship of Ashley conferred more honor than rank or station." And in their exalted estimate of one who richly merited their praises, neither of these beautiful girls seemed ever to have thought it possible that Ashley might suffer from a third cause—that of loving without meeting a return.

After Mrs. Templeton and Constance left, Caroline sat down to write to this beloved brother. She told him first of their disappointment at not seeing him—sent him news of the Priory, and of the village generally; and as she was closing her letter, Mrs. Vernon entered.

"To Ashley, dear?" she asked, looking at the letter.

"Yes, mamma."

"Did Constance tell you anything of Hubert?"

"Nothing, and I really forgot to ask of him—though I suppose she knows of the scheme Victor mentioned last night. But I have told Ashley how wonderfully the traveled young hermit is improved—really, if he goes on so, he has a chance of becoming celebrated."

"Then, my dear, you must tell Ashley, who can scarcely yet know it, that when the wanderers return, Hubert's engagement to Constance will be ratified, and they will be married." How surprised you look!"

"I am a great simpleton to be perpetually surprised at these love affairs. I hope I shall have fair warning when my turn comes—if ever it do—but dear mamma, I am surprised still—though I have heard of it for these last two minutes."

"And yet there is nothing very extaordinary," was her mother's quiet remark.

"No—certainly not," was the rather hesitating reply and manner. "I see Constance can keep her secrets."

"No, my love, she can not—for she particularly requested her mother to inform us of the fact, and without any delay—are you pacified?"

"Oh! mamma—I am sure I respect her feelings too much to be otherwise—but," and she looked full at her mother, "Hubert is not my choice for Constance."

"Indeed! and why? or on whom would your perfect approval have fallen?"

"On no one I know—but Hubert Forrester, amiable and charming as he is, has not, and I fear never will have, the deep yet lofty feelings which she is so eminently calculated to appreciate."

"Well, my dear, I can not contradict you—for the truth is, this is exactly my opinion—but time and intelligent society may greatly improve a nature so honorable as that of Hubert."

Therefore this piece of news was added in a postscript, without remark or comment. But it did not seem greatly to have interested Ashley, as he never noticed it in his reply, which contained a long account of himself and his friends, but merely expressed his regret at not being able to leave town just then.

CHAPTER XLIII

"There's a bliss beyond all that the minstrel has told,
Where two that are link'd in one heavenly tie,
With heart never changing, a brow never cold,
Love on through all ill, and love on till they die!"
MOORE.

HELEN has been left a long time to recover from the fatigue of her rapid journey; so long, that if she had had nothing to do but to examine her new abode and all it contained, she must have wearied of the task.

But such was not the case—in truth, she was so much occupied in realizing the change in her prospects, which had been so unexpectedly effected, that days glided into weeks before she succeeded.

She sometimes felt as if she had been suddenly cast on some strange and uninhabited island—so hushed and quiet did all appear; so entirely was she removed from her late agitating associations—so completely had her more familiar apprehensions given place to others, and entirely new ones—still, with all this there were tranquillity and peace—and she felt how gracious the change was.

But these thoughts and feelings occupied her only when she was alone. When Reginald and Ashley came in the evening, sometimes remaining to tea, at which Mrs. Stopsel always made one of the party, it was then as if some beneficent genius had transformed her desert into something very delightful—a kind of real happy valley—where she could hear the voice best loved, and see the face so dear. "My dear, dear mother, my sweet sister, oh that you were here!" was on these occasions the only desire that arose in her heart.

Almost every day did she, and very often Reginald, through Mr. Morton, write to this mother, who had made so great an effort for their sakes; and frequent were the short replies sent through the same channel; or if he were absent, they were posted by Mrs. Templeton—so well had she learned out of the book of old experience. And when these precious tokens came, how bitterly did Helen sometimes weep—though not for worlds would she have had Reginald know of her tears—but the very means by which their correspondence was carried on, seemed perpetually to remind her of what she had been forced to do—and she would ask, "Why had she been so harshly, so unjustly treated, that the only escape from what, to her, would have been real ignominy, was to brave what many would condemn most severely?"

She might have married a man she did not love, one indeed, whose character, though not exactly bad, possessed no quality with which she could sympathize—she might have done this, even while loving another, and the world would have called her a sensible girl, who had not weakly yielded to a romantic attachment. Now, though hallowed by her mother's sanction, her marriage would be called—odious words—a run-away match.

But here again the good genius would appear, and his arguments were so conclusive when he named Reginald, that she dried her eyes, and met him with a smile.

It is astonishing how discontented and fastidious Ashley had lately become—the rooms which he had pronounced so comfortable, while Reginald was the sole occupant, were, in his eyes, strangely altered—for scarcely a day passed without some exchange or addition—and he was now racking his brain with some architectural contrivance, which would enable him to introduce a piano into their rather limited quarters; when Gretchen and he had a long conference together one evening, which suddenly put a stop to all further changes.

Helen received a small part of her wardrobe soon after her departure—the remainder, with many useful articles from the Priory, which strictly belonged to her, were forwarded after her marriage. Mrs. Templeton, aided by Dawson, had effected this transmission—there was neither leave asked nor concealment affected—but they were packed and sent; whether the Colonel knew it or not, did not transpire—perhaps to have interfered with this, now that all interference with his daughter was useless, would have been a petty spite, of which even he was incapable.

A few days before that appointed for their marriage, "Helen," said Reginald, when they were alone, an unusual event, "where shall we go, dearest, to spend the first week of our honeymoon?"

"Must we go anywhere away?" she asked.

"Not must, but I have arranged for a week's holiday—I can not spare a longer time."

"Then, dear Reginald, let us go to that pretty village near Hastings, on the coast—I remember driving to it once with Mrs. Loftus, when we were all there for change of air."

"Be it so—and we will start from the church-door. Helen," he said, after a pause, "if I have said but little of the circumstances into which very peculiar events have forced us, it is because I feel them too deeply to trust myself with any allusion; and because I also feared to do or say any thing that might agitate or distress you—you have understood this?"

"As well as if you had repeatedly spoken, Reginald—I am quite reconciled to all that has happened—why should I hesitate to say it? for without it, I never should have been your happy wife."

"Now blessings on your dear head," replied he, much touched at this mark of confidence and affection, "for that sweet avowal. Ah! Helen, if health and life be granted, how joyfully shall I labor to show my gratitude for what you will be to me—and, after all, we are not so poor as many—for your mother's gift supplies all that we shall actually spend, and my generous friends will not hear me, when I talk of relinquishing their aid toward my legal expenses."

"With our kind Gretchen to teach me, I shall soon learn to play Madame L'Econome, so as to astonish you."

"That you do already—so you may safely remain stationary in your excellence, for I can not love or admire you more, do what you will."

"We shall see," she replied.

Mr. Turner, the eminent lawyer with whom Ashley and Reginald read, had necessarily learned much of the latter's history; and as time made him better acquainted with the worth of the two friends, his interest in their welfare increased, so much so, that he seized every opportunity for giving them all the advantages his talents and position afforded.

Considering him, as he had every right to do, a sincere friend, Reginald had frankly informed him of the novel circumstances in which Helen's claim had placed him.

"Well, then, your first step will be to marry this young lady?"

"Of course—directly I can."

"Do you think she would like to receive any of your friends, who have not the pleasure of yet knowing her, before that event takes place? If so, my sister—I never had time to fall in love and marry, I was too busy elbowing my way through life—but my sister, as fine a specimen of an old maid as ever was—but you are acquainted with her—worth a whole zenana of silly wives—will have great pleasure in calling on her."

"Those who visit you are not likely to overlook Miss Turner. As to Ashley, I believe he is half in love with her."

"No—you don't say so—the sly dog—and if he were to offer, depend upon it he would be accepted—so I must look sharp after my housekeeper."

"I strongly advise it—but though I thank you for your kindness, at present, Miss Templeton shrinks from all society; but when we return—for I mean to steal a week—we shall feel very much gratified at any attention Miss Turner may show us."

"And who gives this pretty thing away? for pretty of course she is?"

Reginald smiled. "Ashley claims that privilege."

"Very well; and now that you have won her, my young friend, be kind and gentle to her; they are tender and loving creatures, and God help them when man does not."

It is the morning of Helen's wedding-day, and there she sits in her room, looking so beautiful, and waiting the arrival of Reginald and Ashley. There is the carriage with them, and Gretchen, half smiles, half tears, enters in her appropriate, but unostentatious, dress of gray silk, Reginald's gift.

"Are they come?" said Helen.

"Yes, my darling, and I am here to fetch you down."

Calmly Helen followed her, and on entering the parlor, gave a hand to each of them; and then taking Reginald's arm, advanced toward the carriage, followed by Ashley and Gretchen.

"Do you remember," asked Ashley of Reginald, "one day, when I threatened to give you Helen, to remove some of your odd notions?"

"Yes," was the reply; "but though very differently placed then, was I half so happy?"

The ceremony is over—they leave their tried friends at the church-door, so it had been arranged. "My wife," said Reginald, tenderly embracing Helen. "My dear, dear husband," was the quiet reply.

"And now Mrs. Stopsel," said Ashley, when after a silent walk they reached the cottage, "we have not a moment to lose, if we would succeed in carrying out our little surprise. I fear we must limit ourselves to white-washing and papering, but with some simple furniture in good taste I am sure every one will pronounce the idea a good one." But in order that we may give an opinion, it is necessary to explain.

The cottage occupied by Stopsel and his wife was one of those suburban villas, as the advertising sheet phrases it—cottage is the proper term—with which the environs of London abound; it stood detached in its own small garden, with rooms on each side of the entrance. On one side was Gretchen's parlor, behind that her kitchen; on the other side was a tolerably sized room, looking back and front; above these were the same number of bed-rooms, with a tiny dressing-room over the tiny hall.

The original proprietor had probably possessed that luxury of ambitious London tradesmen, a one-horse chaise, for there was accommodation for both. The last occupant had been an artist—of course the stable and chaise-house, as such, were useless to him; but he had turned the latter into a painting-room, lighted from the roof, and though the change was done economically, the result was a very snug and cosy studio—but the access was from the garden, and during the time the Stopsels had lived there, it was used entirely as a lumber-room.

On this Ashley had cast eyes of desire; a door could so easily be opened from the present large sitting-room into it—and though this would make a sort of passage-way of the former, so much would be gained by the addition of another apartment, that that objection had but little weight.

This, therefore, was to be dedicated to Helen and her piano—and as Ashley spent money as if he had found Fortunatus' purse, when cleaned, papered, and furnished, it looked so pretty as to bid fair to become a great favorite.

And so Ashley's whim was indulged, and when the absentees returned, he was richly repaid by the unqualified admiration they expressed.

"This, dear Helen," said Ashley, "is my cadeau de mariage; and this," saluting her, "is my reward."

"Oh, Reginald, oh, Ashley," she replied, turning her sweet face from one to the other, "how rich we are in the best of treasures—dear husband and dear brother, in gaining one I have gained both."

And how eloquent was her next letter to her mother, when, speaking of her happiness, alloyed only by separation from her and Constance, she dwelt in glowing terms on Ashley's kindness, Ashley's generosity; till Mrs. Templeton, who read the letter to Constance, remarked, "Ashley, almost as often as Reginald."

CHAPTER XLIV.

"Le ciel dont nous voyons que l'ordre est tout puissant,
Pour différens emplois nous fabrique en naissant;
Et tout esprit n'est pas composé d'une étoffe,
Qui se trouve taillée à faire un philosophe.
Le mien est fait, ma sœur, pour aller terre à terre."
MOLIÈRE.

"And it is then true that you have accepted Lord Hurstwood?" said her mother, when Cecilia told her of his offer.

"Yes, mamma, and I hope neither you nor papa will see cause to reject him."

"You know but little of his character or temper, Cecilia," said her mother, looking unusually grave; "and I own I have been accustomed to rank him among those who are rather lax in their principles on many subjects."

"I have no doubt but that, while he was young, he was led by the fashion; but when we were in Italy, the theater of his early diplomatic career, he was always spoken of with respect—certainly not as free from all vice—but as one whose conduct had never given rise to any one of those terrible scandals which disgrace the lives of many of his cotemporaries. As to his temper, I sincerely believe that to be excellent—for he was much at the Priory, and there were many occasions when, I must say, I think uncle Lionel rather tried it."

"Well, my dear, you have plenty of sense, and have a right to judge for yourself in this matter. In point of rank and wealth this is beyond our utmost ambition; and if you think you can be happy, you have our consent and blessing."

"I have no doubt of being happy as Lord Hurstwood's wife," she replied, confidently, "though many would not feel so secure. I am not romantic—he is amiable; for, with respect to Helen, I think he was shamefully ill-used. I am no longer in my first youth—charming sixteen is now seen from a distant point of view," continued she, laughing; "and to tell you the truth, dear mamma, I have lately thought a good deal about my future prospects. Were I not the Honorable Miss Grantham, it would be very different, for I have sufficient sense and moderation to reduce my wants to my means; and, as a poor man's child, could live on very scanty ones, or work in order to increase them; but a poor nobleman's daughter is so different—the shackles of rank interfere with free dom of action, turn which way you will; and I should not like to eke out a slender income, by annually visiting from one relative or friend to another, till I become a new kind of income-tax."

"That is true, Cecilia; and though Henry has acted most generously, and never forgets either you or his brothers—for Alfred still needs help—his own family have claims upon him."

"Henry is a real nobleman," was the sister's energetic reply. "You sigh, dear mamma, but I assure you, without cause; I am neither a victim nor a sacrifice. Think how much better off I am than many girls in my station. I by no means dislike Lord Hurstwood—on the contrary, I believe I could very easily love him; and when I think how often I have seen you look grave and careful, when any extraordinary expense has been needful, surely you must be glad to know that this, at least, will not be my trial."

"Indeed, my dear, I certainly do not wish you to have the anxieties I have had; they have sometimes, perhaps, made me over-bold in asking favors for my children; and your affectionate and energetic character will find a more suitable sphere of action among family claims than in single blessedness; still there is your aunt Lucy, of a noble family like yourself, and yet unmarried."

"The cases are not similar; aunt Lucy has fortune enough to live quite independently, indeed, to spare for others, as we have good reason to know; and then, from the fact, that she has refused several excellent offers, preferring to remain faithful to the memory of her gallant lover, she has become a sort of romance, such as I never could become. Now I firmly intend to do my duty by Lord Hurstwood, and make him as happy as I can. I am grateful to him, and I shall let him see it."

"You are right, my dear," said her mother, stifling a sigh, "happy you must make any one you live with; and such gratitude as yours is no bad substitute for love."

And when Lord Hurstwood came, he was very soon most favorably impressed with all he saw in the family of his bride-elect, and in his turn was equally well received. Under such circumstances his suit prospered; the preparations for the wedding were hastened as much as possible; and in less than two months after her quiet marriage, Helen read an account of her cousin's splendid nuptials, in the paper, with a paragraph especially dedicated to description and millinery—among the list of company were the names of the two chief bridesmaids, Miss Sinclair and Miss Templeton, relatives, so the paper said, of the beautiful bride.

Mrs. Templeton, with Constance and Laurette, remained for a week at Grantham after the wedding. Lord and Lady Hurstwood went to a small property his Lordship had in Wales; and they meant, on their return to the Hall, to give a series of parties.

In order to be ready for a full share in these, by being somewhere at Seabrooke, Laurette took this opportunity of spending the interval with the Westroughs. It was further settled, that they should all travel north when Hubert departed, for she had made such a point of the Templetons visiting Scotland, that she obtained her uncle's consent, and silenced her aunt's objections by insisting so much on the benefit they would all derive, that, at last, Mrs. Templeton was induced to think it her duty to give Constance an opportunity of seeing a little more of society before she married.

This visit to Grantham, the first she had made for years, had much gratified Mrs. Templeton; and coming as it did, when her health had been so shaken by recent trials, its beneficial effects went far to strengthen the arguments Laurette brought forward, and reconciled her to a further journey. Besides, the bustle and excitement of Cecilia's marriage, which forced her thoughts into a fresh and cheerful channel, were of permanent advantage.

Lady Grantham, who, in the midst of so much to claim her exclusive attention, never forgot others, learned from her sister-in-law many particulars that deeply affected and interested her, and though, of course, the part Lord Hurstwood had had in the affair was lightly and delicately alluded to; and though there was no confidence respecting the steps she herself had taken in Helen's flight, this was so evident to her Ladyship, that, when she subsequently fulfilled her mise to see Helen, she frankly alluded to it.

Lord Granthan offered his services as mediator ween Colonel Templeton and the young couple; at his sister declined, for the same reasons which had induced her to refuse Doctor Vernon's interference—namely, her conviction that it would be useless, and might be injurious. At present, she could correspond with Helen—she could also, through Mrs. Vernon, who sometimes took a peep at Ashley and London, have those personal reports which she so pined to verify with her own eyes; but fierce and vehement as had been her husband's denunciations against any who presumed to disobey his prohibition, he had been contented with apparent submission; and with a levity which characterized him, had probably ceased to remember or care for the chasm which his violence had made in their small circle. Therefore his wife said, "Let me not risk what I have in trying to obtain more. Helen is happy, and I am learning to be resigned."

The return of the Lord and Lady to Hurstwood was preparatory to a series of such gayeties as had not enlivened the neighborhood for years. Lady Dallas said she was ready to cry because Ada, her eldest daughter, was not old enough to share in them - but apparently she reconsidered the matter, and enjoyed herself enough for both.

The hall was filled with noble and fashionable guests, ready to join in any scheme of pleasure and amusement, and amiable to extract both out of all that was offered.

Nothing could exceed the polished courtesy of his Lordship—nothing disturbed or ruffled the sweet temper of her Ladyship or banished her charming smile—they both seemed as happy as their best friends could desire; and their popularity lost nothing by the frank condescension of their manner.

The Forresters, careless of wealth or new titles, were worshipers of old nobility; and as the Hurstwood name had become, from first to last, antique enough even for them, a feeble ray of this splendor fell on Constance; and the cousin of Lady Hurstwood was allowed to hide the sister of the run-away Helen.

Hubert had made various excuses for delaying his departure, to which Mr. Morton had kindly yielded; but when he saw that indulgence led only to further delay, he said that either Hubert must accompany Victor at once. or the latter must sail without him. This, and Victor's profound remark, that the sooner he left the sooner he would return, decided the matter; and a few months after their engagement, Hubert and Constance parted—but not before arrangements had been made for a regular correspondence—at which Mr. Morton laughed, dryly remarking, that in addition to the uncertainty of winds and waves, must be added that of scarcely knowing their own destination till they reached it—for Victor's object was not entirely pleasure—he was intrusted with some important commissions from Mr. Morton, with which his mercantile career would terminate.

Cecilia very much wished that Constance would spend a short time with her after Hubert's departure, for as the Hall was now thinned of its late gay and festive throng, she could devote herself more exclusively to her amusement; but she never could be persuaded to leave her mother, though the latter seconded Cecilia's kind invitation. "I will come over as soon as you like, for the day," said she; "but I can not leave mamma to the care of any one else—not even the kind Rectorites."

Claiming, therefore, this promise, Cecilia one day drove out to fetch her, and on their return noticed, at one of the lodge-gates, a small pony-chaise. Supposing, if she supposed at all about what did not concern her, that it belonged to some one there on business, she passed on, and about five minutes' drive brought within their view the figure of some one, very smartly dressed, walking in the direction of the flower-garden.

"Who is that," asked Cecilia, "who seems to know the place better than the regulations?"

But Constance, who did not recognize the gay shawl and tasty bonnet, shook her head.

"It is Miss Mordaunt, my Lady," said the groom, in reply to her Ladyship's look.

"Ride on then." was the order, given very coolly, "and inform her that this is private property, and show her the warning against intruders, as you see her out."

Juliet, it was really she whose artless simplicity had exposed her to this rebuff, heard the order with burning indignation; and her face became crimson as she also heard the quick canter of the groom hastening to obey.

"Beg pardon, Miss, but this is private property," said he, civilly.

And there being no alternative but for her to retrace her steps, she turned to do so, swelling with mortification and rage; and thus saw who was the companion of the Lady Paramount, and the witness of her humiliation. If she could have cast Constance under the wheels of her cousin's elegant equipage, or under those of her own little vehicle, it was evident that she would have done it with the pleasure or indifference of a Tullia, so malignant was the glance she darted—as, closely followed by the groom, she swept by.

Wholly indifferent to her love or hate, Lady Hurstwood, without vouchsafing the least remark, calmly drove on—not so the gentle Juliet. The pretty pony, a great favorite with Mrs. Captain, was made to feel the young lady's woes, by sundry lashes and switches, till lashed and switched beyond even a pony's endurance, he flew along so as to leave no cause for urging; and Juliet, now rising to lash out the fury she had lashed in, and to beat him into a sober pace, was jerked out—and while the lad who was with her fell into some soft mud, and escaped with a whole skin but torn habiliments. she not only spoiled her gay attire, but for a long time her pretty face, which had an ugly wound on the cheek, was obliged to be eclipsed by a profusion of ringlets—too profuse to be becoming.

Nor was this all; for while her tender mother was busy plastering up the wound and bathing the bruises, she, who had learned from her muddy servant what had happened, seized the opportunity of administering a little healing to the mind and feelings which were evidently ill disposed and out of order; or this model young lady would never have exposed herself to an ignominious ejectment as a trespasser; but, like medicine invariably, this was so unpalatable, that the patient was refractory, and refused to swallow it quietly; and was then threatened, like a naughty child, with her uncle's displeasure—which proved no empty threat, but a very unpleasant reality, so that for some time the agent's abode was not wholly tenanted by peace and love—for while mother and daughter, "like sweet belles jangling out of tune," carried on their wordy warfare, "fell discord reigned, and fury dire."

Juliet, who, by some process of ratiocination peculiar to those who are pupils of the green-eyed monster, considered Constance as the cause of this disgrace, secretly vowed to visit all these mishaps on her unconscious head. She had always hated her with a vindictive and peculiar hatred; and now this rival—yes, such was her insane presumption—though partly Hubert's fault—this successful rival, who had witnessed the insult, should pay dearly for all she now suffered.

Self-willed and daring, however, as she was, Juliet would hardly have ventured on such a proceeding as that of intruding on the Hurstwood grounds, had she not heard that the noble owners had gone to spend the day at some distance—for she had both sense and pride enough to avoid his Lordship after the unceremonious stop he had put to their floricultural meetings—and it was by the invitation of the head gardener's son, who gave her the information, that she had taken this occasion to go for some flowers and fruit which he had also promised her. But Lord Hurstwood had gone alone—her Ladyship, as we see, went to the Priory for Constance.

Nor was this the only indignity the roving habits of those young scions of the Mordaunt family brought on themselves.

Augustus, whose education was carried on in France, had returned to Seabrooke for a long holiday. He had always been greatly disliked, on account of his impudent air of assumption, his mischievous propensities, and many other habits, the result of his mother's foolish indulgence.

Gradually Mrs. Captain's original popularity faded away, and there were now very few in the village who cared to be on terms of intimacy with her. But as she often had very fine friends from London, whom she visited in return, this, she did not pine about. Augustus soon found out his sister's secrets, among others, her clandestine and frequent drives to the Hall; and threatening to tell his mother of this, and slyly alluding to Hubert also, she fell into his power, which, as was to be expected, he used like a tyrant. He made her introduce him to the Hall, meaning the lodges and garden, and once there, he was soon intimate with the stable-yard and its inhabitants, horses, dogs, men, and boys.

One of the men had promised to give him a capital little terrier, and Augustus was frequently there to watch and overlook the education of the little animal; but when the family returned, he received a hint to make himself scarce.

Now as the sisters three ordained, a few days after Juliet's expulsion, which she had entreated her mother not to mention to him, he was lounging along the Hurstwood private drive, whistling, with his hands in his pockets, in rather a low, raffish style, and making his way toward the stables, when the trot of horses' feet warned him that he had chosen an unfavorable time for attending the quadruped school. He turned his head and saw her Ladyship's little park phaeton advancing at a smart pace, and turning a corner, which would bring him in full sight. Quick as thought, he darted under a wide-spreading tree; but my lady's eyes were as quick as his feet—she had seen him through a sudden opening; and really thinking he was some mischievous boy who had come after the birds, which she had given strict orders to have unmolested, she drove to the spot, where the supposed delinquent fancied himself safely concealed, and handing her whip to the servant who attended her desired him to make the offender feel her verbal commands, as he had not attended to the painted ones

The man who related this and the former scene, in which he had also taken part, to his fellow-servants and a few chance listeners, declared "he was ready to burst with inside laughter to see her Ladyship handling the ribbons so coolly and cleverly, while he turned out the agent's fine-gentleman nephew, who ran like lightning, when he cracked the whip, just," he said, with a knowing wink, and laying his finger along his nose, "to obey my lady;" but some knew better—and that he was not sorry to pay an installment of a grudge he owed the agent for by-gone favors.

Be this as it may, Augustus took to his heels, inwardly vowing he would never be so caught again; while still all-unconscious that she had offered a fresh affront to the Mordaunt escutcheon, Lady Hurstwood drove about park and country, looking so handsome and so happy, that many who had shaken their heads when they heard of the projected marriage, were now among the loudest to declare they had always thought she was just the wife to suit his Lordship, and he the husband to suit her.

CHAPTER XLV.

"Why, how now, Madam Flirt?
If you must thus chatter,
And are for flinging dirt,
Let's try who bes can spatter,
Madam Flirt?"
Beggar's Opera.

Now Mrs. Sims kept the little haberdashery shop at Seabrooke, whence emanated almost all the finery and fashion worn by those of the feminine gender in the village who ranked below the "county families." Mrs. Curtis, the doctor's wife, for instance, was a constant customer; all the substantial and wealthy farmers' wives patronized her wares; and as she was also mother to the only dressmaker the place boasted of, she was a person who thought she had a right to hold up her head with the best.

Her younger daughter, Betsey, helped in the shop, as well as in the work-room. Ann, or as she thought proper to be called since her visit to London, for the purpose of being "finished off," Miss Aunie, presided over the millinery and gown department, and altogether they were an industrious and very respectable family.

There was always a kind of deferential manner observed by them toward the housekeepers and ladies' maids of the "families" and their guests; for the patronage of these prime ministers was well worth securing—as it frequently gave them the honor of a visit from the ladies themselves; while Mrs. and Miss Vernon and the Priory young ladies, who often spent money there, were cited by the whole family as "your real nobility—none of your uppish sort, who are afraid of being civil to those of a lower rank than themselves."

When first Mrs. Captain Mordaunt and all her grand silks and fashions appeared, she created as much commotion and sensation in this little village sphere as the discovery of a new planet among savants, and as her aim was to become popular, so it was her cue to be affable, gracious, condescending, and chatty. She occasionally showed Ann Sims her dresses and finery, before she permitted the profane eyes of the public to have that pleasure; all the wealth of Juliet's wardrobe was also spread out before her admiring gaze; and in return, the latter, who, though well supplied with money, never had any to spare, would often have a ribbon or neckerchief a real bargain, now and then, indeed, a present.

Gradually the intimacy increased—and when it reached the zenith, like other more movable things, gradually it declined.

Mrs. Sims, it is true, kept up an appearance of civility, quoting a proverb to the butcher's wife, her great crony, about "holding a candle to somebody—" the rest was lost in nods and winks, which the butcher's wife seemed fully to comprehend. But she no longer allowed Betsey to walk about with Juliet, nor Ann to take tea so often with Mrs. Captain; adroitly freeing herself from the dilemma, by saying, her girls had their honest living to gain, and must not be spoiled by associating with those who were different from them; all which excuses were graciously accepted, and the little equivoque interpreted as a compliment—till, after a long absence, Mrs. Captain found, on her return with Juliet, that her popularity had suffered—her influence was on the wane—she was no longer booked to win on the favorite—in short, people looked askance.

Various causes had combined to produce this effect—rumors of a very unfavorable character were rife; and Colonel Templeton's frequent visits had become the talk of all—the agent was disliked for his conduct about the farms, and other acts of petty tyranny and insolence. Augustus, who had been spending his holidays there, was the very head and front of all the low mischief that took place. Juliet angled too openly for Victor or Hubert, and was pronounced a bold, confident minx by all prudent mothers, in the hearing of their daughters; and above all, and to crown all, Mrs. Captain, just before her departure, had had some very fine friends, very fine indeed, staying with her, and she had neither called on any one with them, nor invited any one to call on them; though they went driving about, day after day, who but they? So coolness grew to silent contempt, and that at length burst into speaking impertinence—the tongue is truly an unruly member, especially a woman's—and looks and tossings of the head spoke with an eloquence peculiar to themselves; and there wanted now but one move to cry "checkmate," and open a breach that could never be closed—it was the few last grains which broke the camel's back—the rose-leaf which made the cup run over; and when things are thus over-ripe, the gentlest zephyr shakes them down.

So it happened, that when Mrs. Captain entered the little shop, about a week after Augustus had fled from the crack of the whip, Mrs. Sims, at first, hardly recognized her!

"Oh! Mrs. Mordaunt," she said, at length, looking over her spectacles, but still not rising—but that might be because Betsey was at her post, and it would be needless for two to wait on one customer. "And what can we possibly show you?" a slight emphasis, in a very dry tone.

Now all this was remarkably ungrateful of Mrs. Sims, for Mrs. Captain had come for some common calico, which she knew she should find there as cheap and good as in any great town—besides, she began to feel that the loss of her popularity was not an affair to be pooh-poohed as if she had mislaid an old glove—and she determined to see what she could do so as to regain it—at any rate, in part. For this purpose she had arranged a round of shoppings which should bring her into contact with many of her former worshipers, whom she resolved, by wheedling or bullying, by flattering or frightening, to bring back to the old faith.

She therefore had, in a most amiable mood, entered the shop of her once most bigoted convert, Mrs. Sims. But, alas! how little encouragement does virtue receive! a melancholy truth, as she was destined to experience; for, justly provoked at this unbecoming behavior in a paltry village shopkeeper—she cast her good intentions to the winds and took her revenge instead.

"I dare say I have come on a hopeless errand," she said with a scornful smile, while her large bright eyes looked disdainfully around, "for I was silly enough to think I might, by chance, match this ribbon," daintily touching the strings of her fashionable bonnet.

"Betsey," said her mother, coloring, and speaking sharply, "hand down those ribbons Juliet was pulling about the other day, though she could not afford to buy any."

"Do you mean Miss Mordaunt?" asked Mrs. Captain, with assumed indifference and calmness.

"Yes, I mean your girl, your daughter, I suppose, Juliet?"

"You are more free than welcome," was the dignified rebuke; "the day, I think, is long long enough for Miss Juliet Mordaunt."

"I do not know that it is, unless I choose to think so as well," was the tart reply; "at any rate, Lord Hurstwood's grooms do not think so."

"Woman, are you mad?" cried the incensed half of the defunct hero, her black eyes glaring.

"No," replied Mrs. Sims, half closing hers, pursing up her mouth, and nodding her head with short and quick nods, like some China Joss in a passion—"neither mad nor bad;" and she then tossed her head back, and drew her breath with a significant "hem!" as much as to say, "rhyme for you now, presently, if you provoke me, you shall have reason;" and, almost restored to her usual good temper by the discovery of this latent talent for poetry, which surprised her as much as M. Jourdain was, when he found he had unknowingly been talking prose all his life, she repeated: "Neither mad nor bad—nor my daughters either. Thank goodness! I run no risk of the ducking-stool, nor my girls of being horsewhipped out of the Hall grounds, as your fine miss was one day—and your nest-stealing boy the next."

"Now this passes patience," began Mrs. Captain; but Mrs. Sims, to use her own expression when relating the scene, was up, both figuratively and literally, as, walking from behind the counter, the better to confront her antagonist, she said, "It had not need—for you will want a pretty large stock of that same commodity, Mrs. What's-your-name, before you and yours have run out your rigs—look after your brazen baggage at home, and stop her from looking after all the men, from the young 'squire of the Hill, to the horse-boy at the Hall—look after that rogue in the shell, your impudent varlet of a son. Ask what is thought of you and your master, and you will need plenty of paticnce—patience, indeed"—the very word was suggestive of her own waste of this virtue—"and I tell you what, get out of my honest, decent place directly, and never show your impudent face here to an honest man's honest widow and her decent girls, or I'll send for the beadle to turn you out."

It would be impossible for words to convey a just idea of the rage which literally made Mrs. Captain speechless during this long and remorseless harangue; she pressed with such unconscious, but uncontrollable violence on the top of a small glass case, which contained some choice specimens of the trade, that she crushed it right through, severely wounding her hand. Then, roused by the pain to recollection, and the use of her tongue, and bursting with passion, she glared at the fiery little shopkeeper, and shaking her fist, said, with a look that would have struck her down, could looks ever do so—"Bitterly shall you rue this insolence, you detestable, trumpery old woman! I'll have my foot on your neck yet;" and she banged the door with such fury, that the meek little bell, which rarely emitted more than a very humble tinkle, was so terrified at its own unusual clamor, that it shook for more than five minutes after the fierce assault it had sustained; during which time the roused Amazon had hastened home, and vented her fury on all who approached, and especially on Juliet, whom she considered the chief cause of this audacious attack.

CHAPTER XLVI.

"The blackest ink of Fate was sure my lot,
And when she writ my name, she made a blot."
The Rehearsal.

How truly might Helen tell her mother that there was but one cloud in her bright sky, and that was, that they never met.

How industrious was this sweet young wife about her small domain—how eager to become acquainted with all the mysteries of housekeeping—how anxious to arrange every thing for Reginald's comfort—dear Reginald! how was it possible to do too much for him? She only feared he never could understand how deeply, how devotedly she loved him. And then the pretty little air of independence with which she transacted her affairs, and the look of experience she tried to assume while supplying the household wants—sometimes, spite of herself, obliged to refer to Gretchen—and above all, the demure matronly sternness she would affect, when she allowed herself the pleasure of walking out alone, to meet that husband so beloved, when he returned home: and the handsome face, with its deep loving eyes that then met her, and richly repaid her all, with a look and smile that told of undiminished affection.

Ah! mother! ah! Constance! all this was a loss to you.

Ashley was their frequent guest—indeed, he said he was so happy when with them, that they must turn him out when he came too often.

"Too often, brother Ashley!" said Helen; "what do you take us for, that you talk such nonsense?"

"Not such nonsense as Reginald was talking as he came hither; but of this, Helen, you shall be judge. You need not look ready to challenge me," he continued, as Reginald made a gesture of impatience; "this then it is. He has received an invitation from Mr. Lester, the publisher, to meet a few literary men at dinner, and meditates a refusal, because you can not accompany him."

"It is rather difficult, dear Helen," said Reginald, "to make all this quite clear to you—but Ashley is too precipitate in saying I meditated a refusal; I merely hesitated till I could consult you."

"If you hesitated because you doubted my cheerful acquiescence in any plan you think right, hesitate no longer. I am the wife of a professional and literary man," she said, with a look of pride exceedingly becoming, so thought Reginald; "and it would be as absurd for me to think of going with you to every dinner-party, as to go with you to Westminster Hall or the printing-office. No, dear husband, let me help, not mar, your prospects."

"Help, you most assuredly do," was his reply, "and therefore I shall go."

True to his promise, Mr. Turner expressed a wish to his sister that she would call on Mrs. West, a wish she lost no time in gratifying: and on her return gave him such an account of the vision of beauty she had seen, that he laughingly told this to Reginald, and requested permission to pay his respects to this fair prize also—a permission the proud husband readily gave; and as the discerning old gentleman was as much pleased with her intelligence, as his sister with her beauty, a most friendly succession of calls followed; and though Helen, on many accounts, declined entering much into society, she was pleased to have secured so sensible an acquaintance as Miss Turner proved to be.

The Westroughs, who had made common cause with Reginald, when Lord Ernest's marriage had so suddenly blighted his prospects, were particularly friendly.

When parliamentary duties required his Lordship to be near London, they resided at Hendon, on account of the delicate health of Lady Westrough and one of her daughters. The latter, good-tempered girls, often drove over to fetch Helen to spend the morning at their pretty villa, whence she always returned loaded with fruit and flowers.

The youngest was the invalid; the second, with whom, at one time, it was hoped Reginald might be smitten, was now engaged to a middle-aged but wealthy Baronet; the eldest, Lady Louisa, rumor said, had been slighted by one who had professed love—she was thirty; but, spite of her age and disappointment, was cheerful and amiable, and especially disposed to show Helen any attentions the latter might find agreeable.

"I have had a visit from Stacey," said Ashley, one day, to Reginald, when the latter returned from an interview with Mr. Lester.

"And what has the man of genius been doing all this time?"

"You remember my telling you that I called at Kensington a few weeks after we dined with him—but he had not returned from his noble friend's house. As it is too far to go merely for the ceremony of leaving a card, I wrote to say I should be glad to know when he returned, as I had a few friends to whom I should like to introduce him; but as my note remained unanswered, I concluded they were still away—indeed, your affairs so claimed attention, that I rarely thought of him. This morning he called; they have changed their residence, and have temporary lodgings near Portman Square. But I can not help fearing that all is not right with him. Stacey never asked me to call—seemed dreadfully out of spirits, and when I asked after Mrs. Stacey, he replied, 'Oh, poor Susan is not very well;' altogether, I do not like the look of it."

"What is to be done?" asked Reginald.

"I hardly know; he, however, promised to call or write when they were settled; but I have a suspicion, which makes me uncomfortable about the gay, thoughtless fellow."

"I shall see Lester again before I go home," said Reginald; "of course I shall not inquire; but he may say something, as I know Stacey owes him several articles for his magazine, and the conclusion of a poem began months ago. Stacey has had the money, but how or when Lester will have the rhyme is another and doubtful matter; and I know he is rather irritated at having so often to apologize to the public for a delay in the conclusion of more than one contribution."

Ashley was quite right in his suspicions—Stacey and his wife paid a round of visits to one fashionable mansion after another, till both felt the necessity of returning to replenish their purse and renew their finery; though how this was to be done, neither of them well knew; and on reaching the villa the difficulty was rather alarmingly increased, for they found a man in possession, and another ready for Stacey, who was, in a summary manner, conveyed to the lock-up house, till the debt for which he was arrested should be paid.

The landlord had written several letters demanding payment of the rent, of which now nearly three months was due; these Stacey said he had never received, though it was difficult to convince a man of regular business habits that such was the truth. Probably they had been forwarded; but the movements of the Staceys were so uncertain, that even that was doubtful. There was little in the villa that did not already belong to the landlord—tradesmen all round now rose en masse; the livery-stable keeper was furious, and poor Mrs. Stacey, terrified and weeping, accompanied her husband, till some other shelter could be provided.

He wrote to some of his friends who were in town—to this appeal some, once more, responded; a compromise was effected, a second floor engaged, and the rent paid in advance. They had been there a fortnight, and Stacey was now really busy and in earnest; having already propitiated the justly angry publisher by completing one of the unfinished articles.

Such, in substance, was Mr. Lester's report, which he felt it no breach of confidence to make to Reginald; but he did not then know that Mrs. Stacey, ill and frightened at the new scene of life in which she had to sustain a sad part, had been confined that very day, and so unexpectedly, that she and her infant were but very scantily supplied with what both so much needed.

This additional information Ashley learned the next morning from Stacey, who, really fond of his wife, came to him in a state bordering on distraction. Ashley, always prompt in kindness, placed a check in Stacey's hand, went to Mr. Turner, and briefly saying that Miss Turner's help was now sadly needed, asked permission to apply to her in this emergency.

"Go to her yourself; I have hardly time to speak to you just now," he replied, scarcely raising his eyes from a paper he was reading.

And Ashley did go; and before night another room—it was but an attic—was prepared, a nurse engaged, and several other comforts supplied, "till," as Miss Turner said, "they could see their way."

Stacey, poor fellow, worked unremittingly; and though he said, with tears in his eyes, that sorrow and anxiety left no room for wit, he proved that the two former—unwelcome guests though they be in a man's bosom—could spur and stimulate him to some purpose; and that if they bullied and hectored so as to scare wit and humor, they were rare magnets in attracting industry and perseverance.

Lester, when he saw the results, swore a round oath that it was a shame talent and genius, which could delight the literary and intellectual, should be wasted upon empty-headed, though noble fools; and he expressed an earnest hope that Stacey had at length discovered his real strength, and the best way of rendering it profitable.

When Helen heard this sad history, she immediately offered her services, which were accepted, but limited by Miss Turner to such help as her skillful needle afforded, in preparing articles of clothing for the mother and babe.

"My dear Mrs. West, your presence can do no good at this moment; besides," she continued, "this is one of those cases in which we are in great danger of allowing our benevolence to frustrate its own designs—this is one of the dilemmas of genius—more difficult to manage than a case of lunacy. I have heard the whole from Mr. Vernon, and we agree admirably as to what is our wisest course. Just now," with emphasis, "Mr. Stacey has a lucid interval, and it is astonishing what he has done. Have you read his little poem, 'On my First-born,' and the exquisite manner in which he works out his motto, 'Born to sorrow, as the sparks fly upward?'"

"I have," replied Helen, tears springing to her eyes as she remembered it well; "it speaks many a mournful and many a healthy truth, expressed with a terseness and vigor which alike banish all morbid sentiment, though imagination and grace are evident in every line. Surely, from a mind capable of what he has lately done, we may hope for great things still."

"I wish I had a little more of that animating feeling, as regards the stability and perseverance of this gifted author," said Miss Turner; "but—well, we must wait patiently. Two such friends as Mr. West and Mr. Vernon are, to him, worth the whole army of the aristocracy. Not that I have any disrespectful prejudice against nobility; on the contrary, it contains names which I highly esteem. What I mean is, that, unfortunately, Mr. Stacey's acquaintance with title and rank will, I fear, always exercise an injurious influence over him; he has too much vanity, and too little pride and self-respect to be safely trusted among merely noble associates. In language, he is self-sufficient and self-reliant; not so in action. He has not enough moral independence; so that were he to mingle with the most learned and sensible of those who adorn our peerage, he would be trying to convert them into patrons and bestowers of that place and fame which he should resolve to owe only to himself. But while I have been haranguing, you have been making up a most useful parcel, for which I thank you in the name of those who can not."

CHAPTER XLVII.

"He has brought with him such an inclination to talebearing, that he disturbs both himself and all the neighborhood."—Spectator.

STACEY honorably kept his promise, and worked bravely at his duties, till his wife was so far recovered as to bear removing to more comfortable quarters. Helen proposed that a small house near theirs should be prepared as their residence; and after discussing the matter with Miss Turner, it was agreed that Stacey should come and look at it. The rent was very moderate, and one respectable servant, with a young girl for the baby, could easily do all that their scanty means required. He came, and was delighted with the sweet air and lovely prospect; and well he might be, poor fellow, after having for weeks been the occupant of a London attic, which had been both bedroom and study. A quarter's rent was paid in advance, and all was to be ready for wife and baby in the course of the next day. This Helen undertook to see after.

"Good heavens!" said he to Ashley, when they left her, scarcely, even in her presence, able to restrain his enthusiastic admiration, "what a miracle of beauty Mrs. West is! She shall be my Muse, my Inspiration; when I am dull and stupid I shall merely go 'and gaze upon her beauty, nothing more.' Her eyes will serve me instead of a Pegasus, to set the streams of Hippocrene flowing in murmurs sweet, graceful, and pure as herself. I hear," he added after a pause, "that she has a sister—do they resemble each other?"

"Only in being both beautiful—some give the preference to Miss Templeton," replied Ashley, briefly; and, changing the subject, he said, "Do not let Mrs. Stacey delay her removal after the morning, as Mrs. West intimated she would be there to receive her."

And when, in accordance with this injunction, they arrived early, there was Helen to meet them; and she had so decked and arrayed the little parlor, and received them so sweetly, that the poor mother, still weak, had a violent fit of weeping, which she, however, declared had done her a great deal of good.

Something, at any rate, had done good, both to her and her delicate nursling, for in the course of a few weeks they looked quite bright and healthy; and again the stimulus of vanity being given to her husband, aided by a few pinches from necessity, he worked on so steadily and successfully as to encourage his friends to hope, not only that he would easily weather this storm, but that he would never risk encountering such another.

About this time Ashley announced his intention of going to Seabrooke; they had been expecting him so long and so often, he would no longer defer giving himself this pleasure.

"Oh, Ashley," said Helen, when she heard of this, "just to fix on this time, when mamma and Constance are at Craigalan. Why did you not go before?"

"Because I could not," he replied; "and because, as they are away, the stronger reason that I should go, and, by my humble presence, try in some degree to compensate for their absence."

And, to the great joy of all at the Rectory, he remained there several weeks, during which time he heard from various quarters many things which gave him ample materials for thought. Indeed, the very day after his arrival, as he went to call on the families with whom he was intimate, a heavy shower of news fell on him.

During breakfast, he had heard from his father that the Priory estate had been cleared of every bit of timber that could be cut, and that lately the Colonel, it was whispered, had been borrowing largely, for which, if true, the Doctor said, he must be paying dear, on account of the tenure by which he held the property. Cooper was universally disliked; and from expressions which Mr. Morton had repeatedly let fall or openly used, there was no doubt but that the whole family were disreputable people.

Caroline added, it was the talk of the village that Juliet and the boy had, by order of Lady Hurstwood, been threatened with a horsewhipping if again found trespassing about the Hall; and though she did not believe in the report of the threat, she knew from Constance that her cousin had sent her groom to see the girl safe out at the lodge.

Lady Dallas told him, as a great secret, that it was hinted very broadly, Hubert Forrester and the young beauty at the agent's were very friendly!

"Impossible," cried Ashley, his handsome face wearing a look not usually seen there—"engaged to—to another—it is impossible!"

"Perhaps it is," she said, and then went on to prove that it was not, by adding, "I only know that Mr. Victor Morton expressed a strong wish that Forrester would start before mischief came of delay; but for further particulars I must refer you to Caroline, to whom, of course, he would be more communicative than to any one else."

Pretty pickings there for one day's work—and yet they are not all.

He called at Forest Hill, where he was as cordially received as he was at their town residence, whenever Mr. Forrester felt it necessary to be there, during the session of Parliament; but here he found insinuations, rather than assertions, against Colonel Templeton. Mr. Forrester also, in the course of conversation, intimated that he disliked early marriages; in this he was consistent, for he had waited till he was forty before he found his Eve; and he now declared that, much as he and Mrs. Forrester felt at parting from Hubert, they had become quite reconciled to the separation, as it gave him an opportunity of seeing life before he settled at Hargraves.

And when, with his wallet full of these scraps, Ashley returned to the Rectory, he resolved to arrange his fragments, and see what his mother and Caroline could add thereto.

First, he had a very particular motive, but of this he said nothing, to learn all he could that related to Hubert's conduct with regard to Juliet; he owned that he could not believe half that he heard, still there was enough left for suspicion; and this justified him in desiring to know, if possible, the truth; and he related the contributiou Lady Dallas had given.

Caroline blushed violently as her brother repeated the inuendo—and when his look expressed surprise at her emotion, she drew nearer to him, and putting his arm around her, laid her head on his shoulder.

"Presently," said she; "and now, mamma, tell him what Mr. Morton said."

"He told us," said Mrs. Vernon, "that soon after his son's second and final return from Germany, Cooper had, on several occasions, met him, and under some pretext or another—at one time to show him a foreign curiosity, at another to ask him to translate a German letter—had invited him to his house, where he was introduced to Mrs. Captain Mordaunt and her daughter. That something, Mr. Morton did not say what, induced Victor to mention this to his father. The result was, that, by his advice, he ceased to call at Cooper's. In short, Ashley, to quote Mr. Morton's words, there seems, no doubt, a scheme was on foot to entrap Victor, his father's reputed fortune being the temptation, and the son's open, but fearless and frank manners, giving hope of success. What I am now going to add is little more than surmise. Failing in this plot, probably Hubert was the next to be tried."

"Nothing venture, nothing have," said Ashley.

"Exactly so; and here they seemed more likely of success, from the character of their intended prey. Hubert has absolutely no knowledge of life or the world. All he has seen of either was during his short tour in Germany with Victor, and his equally short residence at Oxford. You know that he is gay to giddiness—sweet tempered—and easily duped—and, I fear, both vain and irresolute."

"Ah, Constance!" burst from Ashley's lips.

But his mother, without remarking it, proceeded: "Let us, however, be just; I believe that since his engagement to Constance, he has rarely been to Cooper's, though this girl has constantly been contriving to meet him; she is now at Paris with her mother—at least, so it is said."

There was a long pause; at last Ashley said calmly, and Heaven knows what it cost him to do so, "I can not excuse Hubert, even assuming that this conduct has no deeper meaning than we are disposed to give it—still it is much to know that lately he has become aware of what is due to propriety and honor; but, mother, do the Forresters really approve of this engagement?"

"I hardly know how to reply; but from various observations I have been almost forced to make, I fancy not; Mr. Forrester has never been cordial with the Colonel, and has been sadly prejudiced against them all, since poor dear Helen left home."

"Helen," said Ashley, and now he really gave way to his feelings; "Helen, poor, persecuted girl! why, if Reginald had been away, or ill, or by any means unable to have saved her, I myself would have snatched her from Lord Hurstwood rather than have permitted such a cruel deed."

"And married her yourself, my son?"

"No, mother," he replied; and the tone and the look forbade all further jesting.

"And now, what is this about our dear Carry?" and the brother's voice this time was gentle and musical, and the noble face wore a touching expression, it looked so fond and tender.

"Ah, Ashley," said his sister, "can not you guess?"

"Well, I will try—the young hermit has fallen in love, and taught our sister to do the same."

"Yes," she said, "and papa and mamma have given their consent; and, Ashley, you give yours also, do you not?"

"Right willingly; only we shall not like to have you carried all over the world with this good-looking rover—or settled away from us on the Norfolk property."

"It will not be either," said Mrs. Vernon, "and that assurance removes the only difficulty. Mr. Morton means them to remain here, not at the Hermitage, so you need not laugh at the idea of three making a crowd; but he thinks of buying Bridgend, which is not many miles off, and there they will be fixed—but not yet—Victor will be away at least two years."

"Then this induced my father to urge me so strongly to come down without delay?"

"It did—a very long letter from Mr. Morton will explain all to you; last night he could not enter on the subject, and to-day, at Caroline's request, it was to have been delayed till evening; but now you know the great fact, Caroline will like to tell you the particulars."

"No, mamma, I should much prefer that you would."

"Very well, my dear; only instead of Ashley having a story of the true orthodox size, in three volumes, he will have a very slender pamphlet. But to commence. Not very long before Victor left for his present voyage, both the Doctor and myself fancied, that unless Caroline felt something more than kindness and friendship for him, his departure could not be too much hastened; but as this drew near, we became a little anxious about her. Do not interrupt me, my dear, your dignity is safe in my hands. At length Hubert and Victor set off, accompanied by Mr. Morton. A week ago, a long letter arrived from the latter, dated Lisbon; in it he formerly requests us to sanction his son's addresses to our daughter. Victor, it seems, could no longer keep his secret; he began to fear all manner of dangers, and in a letter, inclosed in his father's, he tells us all we before suspected—and tells it so well, that I believe—is it not so, Caroline?—we shall all consent."

"But why not propose before he left?"

"Because he heard us, as well as his father, express ourselves very strongly against long engagements, after we had been talking of Hubert and Constance, when I said I was sorry one so young as she, and who knew so little of society, should enter it so shackled. I wonder when we shall be cured of making rash speeches, for behold me, voluntarily, in precisely the situation I deprecated."

"Caroline," said Ashley, "I am very much pleased with the brother-in-law you destine to give me; and so I shall write and tell him."

"Dear Ashley, how kind you always are; but I shall soon be coming to see you in London. Mamma will take me to Mr. Morton's sister-in-law and his two daughters, and we are promising ourselves the great delight of often meeting Helen, and Mrs. Loftus, who has just returned from visiting Charles and Fanny."

"That will be charming, indeed," said he; and then he began to give them a full account of Reginald and Helen, their sayings and doings, of which his hearers could not have too much.

"Does my father visit much at Hurstwood?" asked Ashley, turning the conversation.

"Yes," replied his mother, smiling at the significance of his tone, "and so must his son Ashley. Nothing can be more kind and polite than they are, and Mrs. Templeton has so completely exonerated Lord Hurstwood, as to make him appear to have been more sinned against than sinning—at least, it is evident that is the view she wishes her friends to take; and I own that I should regret having an opinion that obliged us to refuse their friendly overtures. Cecilia is much too excellent for us to be comfortable in the belief that she has married one we could not tolerate."

"I much more than tolerate Lord Hurstwood," said Caroline; "he is both so gentle and gentlemanlike to his wife—and I believe the wildest wish she could imagine would be gratified with pleasure and eagerness—I think she is more charming than ever."

"To-morrow, then, we will ride over, and you shall introduce me."

This was done, and Ashley saw nothing to controvert his sister's opinion. An early day was then fixed for them to come over and lunch, and when this was settled, Lady Hurstwood said, "My dear Lord, I am going to walk with Mr. Vernon to my new flower-garden—the chaise shall follow us, and then he can drive me to your ingenious device in rock work. Caroline, take care of his Lordship, who, in return, will show you some beautiful intaglios and mosaics he collected when in Italy."

And then, arm-in-arm with Ashley, she gayly led him to her beautiful garden, and made him tell her all that the time would allow her to hear about Helen, for whom she expressed the most affectionate interest.

"I know," she said, when he had concluded, "that my aunt Ellinor corresponds with her, but still, Mr. Vernon, how dreadful never to have met for so many months."

"It is sad," he replied, "but Mrs. Templeton values too greatly what she calls this connived-at exchange of letters, to provoke a prohibition by grasping after more; so we must leave it to time."

"I anticipate some favorable result from Constance's marriage, who might make the reconciliation a condition—what think you?"

But he seemed not to have heard her, and remarked, that he had had no idea the views from the Hall grounds were so extensive and beautiful.

A dinner party at Hurstwood gave him a still more favorable impression of his noble host, and convinced him that in choosing her Ladyship to wear the rejected coronet he had done wisely; and had he asked either of them a question, usually so dangerous, as to whether they could confirm this opinion, both would have replied in the affirmative.

Cecilia's good sense, her truth of character and word, became daily more valuable and refreshing to one whose life had been spent in the petty and paltry intrigues of continental courts;—whose mind had been taught to move through the sinuositics of diplomatic labyrinths, and who had been accustomed to see the whole drama of state-craft performed by complex machinery, secret springs, hidden agencies, and masked actors. He was charmed with her frank, confiding nature—he was proud of his handsome and dignified wife. Nor any the less so, for having won her easily—it spoke well for his powers of conquest—while his boundless generosity and indulgence, which at first won her ready gratitude, at length awoke her love.

And Ashley, when he left Seabrooke, and was once more stirring his tea in the little cottage, drew from his store various stray scraps of news which made them all glad—among the rest, the picture he drew of Cecilia and her future was commented on with real pleasure.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

"Il est aussi facile de se tromper soi-même sans s'en apercevoir qu'il est difficile de tromper les autres sans qu'ils s'en aperçoivent."—La Rochefoucauld.

While the Templetons were in Scotland, where every day brought some fresh scheme of pleasure and amusement, an event occurred which openly drew the attention of Reginald to a subject that often secretly occupied his thoughts—namely, Old Court.

For months it had given no more sign of life or movement than if it had been Tadmor in the Desert. Occasionally the Westroughs named it to Helen with no very respectful or friendly tone; for Lady Anne, the bride-elect, considered herself defrauded and swindled out of five thousand pounds, which her uncle Ernest had always promised to any of his nieces on their marriage. "Now," she said, "the harpies who reign there will take care to intercept all such acceptable waifs."

Reginald had written to announce his marriage—but no reply was sent—not even a line from old Roberts.

And now, behold! when conjecture had grown weary and curiosity faded away, on returning from a London shopping expedition with one of her daughters, Lady Westrough was astonished to find cards, "Lady Ernest West," "Mrs. Melville," and the direction in a fashionable quarter of the metropolis.

"What is the meaning of this?" she asked, and learned from Lady Ella, the invalid, that two ladies had called, and hearing that she was at home, had sent their cards, and asked if they could have the pleasure of seeing her. This, on the plea of ill health, she had declined; they then left cards for Lord and Lady Westrough, and having inquired when her Ladyship was usually at home, had driven away.

"I am always out." was her Ladyship's command to the servant, as she pointed to the cards, "when these people call;" which they did a few days after.

All this was duly reported to Helen when they next met, embellished with various piquant remarks, which none but vexed ladies can make; she begged for a card to show Reginald, not, as she laughingly remarked, that he might call and pay their debts, but because she thought he ought to inquire whether Lord Ernest were with them.

Reginald, after naming this to Ashley, thought himself justified in making some inquiries in the neighborhood of the ladies' residence, and learned that, except servants, Lady Ernest and her mother were alone. He conjectured that her Ladyship had come to town for medical advice, as she was near her confinement.

"There is some scheme on foot here," said Ashley; "I do not like this arrangement; let me name it to Mr. Turner, and hear what he says."

"If not troubling him, I should be very glad of his opinion."

"No trouble; I am sure he will like it."

And the next day Ashley said, "I am always intruding my affairs on you, sir."

"Your friends' affairs you mean; which of them now?"

"Mr. West's."

"Ah! indeed—what of him? and how can I help?"

"It is a long story," said Ashley.

"Then begin at once, while I have leisure to listen," said Mr. Turner.

Thereupon Ashley entered into the particulars of Reginald's expectations, till he came to the arrival of Mrs. Melville and her daughter in London.

When he concluded, Mr Turner remarked: "It may be all right—previous circumstances, however, will justify you in acting as if it were not; at least, till you are convinced to the contrary. Will Mr. West leave it to us? for I expect, if we take him to our councils, he will be refractory—what say you?"

"I think you are right, so I shall venture at once to banish him."

"Very well—we must send down directly to Old Court. I know the very man—next, we must learn who is the medical man—and what sort of an establishment there is with the ladies in town—here again I can help you;" and almost as he spoke he had written two short notes, sealed and directed them

"I am to dine to-day with the chief justice," said Mr. Turner; "will you breakfast with me to-morrow at eight precisely?"

"I will be punctual."

"Very well—now I am busy."

At eight, Ashley was in Bedford Square, seated at a well-spread breakfast-table, the pleasant figure of Miss Turner presiding, whose eyes were fixed on her brother's face, as he conversed earnestly with Ashley.

"Is Mr. Tebbat here?" he asked of a servant, whom the bell had just summoned; "if so, send him up directly."

"Now, Mr. Tebbat, here are your instructions," said Mr. Turner to a person who had very quietly entered, and remained standing. Ashley was puzzled as he looked at the man, and felt that, had he been desired to describe him, it could have been only by negatives—no phrase suggested itself so appropriate as this: "he seems to be not anything."

"You will not, on any account, be tempted to exceed them," pursued the lawyer; "there is quite scope enough for your ingenuity."

The negative took the paper and rapidly glanced it over.

"Do you understand?"

"Quite, sir;" but he was no longer a catalogue of negatives; both voice and eye were, very decidedly and distinctly, affirmative.

"Then put the paper in that book, where there is money, and lose no time—good-morning."

"Has Styles been here this morning, John?"

"Yes, sir, he said he would walk round the Square, when I told him you were engaged; but I think that is his knock; will you see him now, sir?"

"Bring him up at once;" and enter Mr. Styles, a dapper, neat little man, with a roguish pair of black eyes, and a pleasant little smile; altogether, a little fellow who looked as if for sixpence he would make love to half the housemaids, or cooks either, in the Square—one of those winking, smirking, hat-on-one-side men, who are regular incendiaries among the combustible hearts of the aforesaid species.

"I wish to have these questions answered," said Mr. Turner; and the bright eyes of this Antinous of the area and nursery ran over the list before you could say Jack Robinson.

"Very good, sir; give me a few evenings, I can hardly do it in less."

"Oh, you may have a week, if it will amuse you more."

"Very good, sir," laughing, and showing a fine set of teeth.

"I always breakfast about this time, so you are sure to find me."

"Very good, sir. I wish you good-morning, sir!" with a bow, which included them all; and, with something like grace, he withdrew, but not before his bright eyes had taken a daguerreotype of Ashley.

"He was an actor," said Mr. Turner, in reply to his young friend's look; "so he is now, when he can find an engagement."

"I suppose the Lothario of the piece," observed Ashley.

"Most likely; he is not a bad fellow—but he is vain and quarrelsome, and that keeps him poor. He will sit up half the night to copy old Grey's atrocious hieroglyphics, and then spend the money on a gay waistcoat."

"And the other?"

"Oh, not so good!—but he owes me a debt for help in need, and is grateful when he is not drunk; even then he is trustworthy."

Both agents succeeded marvelously well, because each kept to his usual character—one as a lounging, idle rambler, the other as lover to the lady's-maid and two house-maids. The cook, an old stager, let with the house, knew nothing of her employers worth learning, and was not, therefore, left like Ariadne, or Dido, or any other of the fair deceived, to bewail the false words of the false man

The report of Tebbat was to this effect: He went, as ordered, to Old Court, and, of course, took up his quarters at the public-house. He then began his inquiries, and learned that Lord Ernest had remained much as when we last peeped at him; even the news of Reginald's marriage had failed to disturb the monotony of his existence. If, however, Reginald had not informed Roberts of this important event, it is very unlikely his uncle would ever have heard of it, as the letter to him had never come to hand—that is, to his hand; it had probably been lost, through that dreadfully careless medium, the post-office. But Roberts fetched all his little correspondence himself from the small public, and secured the delivery; and there it was that Tebbat became acquainted with him. His Lordship drove out for about an hour every day, and sometimes saw his own doctor—sometimes the clergyman dined with him; but that was all the variety. Now it must be admitted that this dull and dreary life was most aggravating to a young person like her Ladyship, and a woman like her mother, whose talents so eminently fitted her for an active and bustling, if not a useful, position in society; and when Mrs. Melville hinted to her noble son-in-law that Ernesta required medical watching, he said, "Send for Edwards;" and when she slightly turned up her nose at Edwards, he said, "Send for any one you like;" but there was no one within sending-distance whom she did like, for this was not her aim.

In short—but this she did not tell him—Ernesta had been rebellious; she had threatened to kill herself—to run away—any thing but endure this horrible style of living; and her mother had only been able to pacify her by promising a visit to town, where she proposed that she should be confined; after which it would be a round of gayety, parties, and dress.

When Lord Ernest was made to understand that his wife and wife's mother wished to go to London, he readily gave his consent; but when, for the sake of appearances, she hinted that he should accompany them, it was another matter. He would not go without Old Court; but they could not take Old Court—ergo, he could not go; they must leave him—and they did.

Mrs. Melville had many reasons for indulging her daughter in this visit to London. She could not be blind to the fact, that the poor girl was looking wretchedly ill; it was of the utmost importance to the furtherance of her plans that her expected grandchild should be strong and healthy: she hated Old Court, as a residence, as much as Ernesta; she also intended to try if she could not, by a coup de main, beat down the reserves and prejudices of the Westrough family and their connections, as well as beat up the quarters of former patronesses and benefactors, some of whom, she had good reason to know, would never withstand the combined force of title, a handsome equipage, and a fashionable residence.

But the Westroughs presented such an impenetrable front, that she could not break through it—the connections had either a title, a carriage, or a fashionable house of their own, so hers were of no avail; and thus discomfited and driven from the main body, she fell back on her old allies.

And here her plan seemed more promising for success. Like Sancho, she fancied she had at last attained her government—is there a Dr. Snatch-away at every court?—Wait.

Among the odds and ends picked up by those sharp-sighted, industrious chiffoniers, Messrs. Tebbat and Styles, there was one stray atom upon which both pounced, as if well worth throwing into their basket.

At the small public where Tebbat fixed himself, as he said, for the purpose of angling, though the trout-stream was miles away, a young man had frequently taken lodgings for weeks together; perhaps said the landlady, from whom, in the course of gossip, he learned this, he was an artist, though she had never seen any of his drawings—or a poacher; at any rate, as she very sagaciously observed, he must be something—and he seemed to have a particular admiration for Old Court. He had first appeared when Mrs. Melville and her daughter went there, and had been in the neighborhood very often since the marriage of the latter.

Here Styles stepped forth with a piece he had found, and dove-tailing it with the last, it assumed a sort of shape. From the lady's-maid he learned that this was a poor relative whom her lady often helped with small sums of money, unknown to the old one—a classic soubriquet by which Mrs. Melville was designated. He was now in town, waiting for some appointment Lady Ernest was to obtain for him, through the influence of her powerful relations.

And is that the nurse?" asked Styles, alluding to a woman in an interesting state, who was domesticated at the hired house.

"Yes, she expects to be confined shortly before my lady, and is to take the young heir"—(heir, of course, said the inquisitive little man to himself) —"from its birth—her own baby will be brought up by hand, out of the house."

"And the other nurse, where is she?"

"Lor, what does it matter to you?"

"Oh, nothing, I was only thinking when we are married—" a gentle squeeze, and a smart slap in the face for his impudence, administered by her fair hand, was the reply.

And the next day, meeting the upper housemaid "quite promiscus," by appointment, he escorted her on her errand, and suddenly discovering that he was by no means well, asked who attended at her house, remarking, "Of course, he is one of the nobs, a regular big-wig?"

"Indeed he is no such thing," she replied, with a disdainful toss of her floral head; "for a more sneaking, mean little fellow I never saw, and no one seems to know where he comes from."

"Oh, indeed! then I suppose he does not come often?"

"Oh yes he does, every other day, as punctually at one as luncheon does—but I did not come here to be bothered about such as him, with his dirty wristbands and shabby hat;" and Styles, finding he was not likely to gain more useful knowledge at present, soon found means to take the monkey off the back of his Dulcinea, and said—"Now I must, though reluctantly, say farewell—but first tell me when we are to go to the play together?"

"Oh, when you come to fetch me," she replied coquettishly, and hurrying round the corner.

And exactly at one was Mr. Styles on the lookout, nor did he cease to look till he watched the sneaking, mean little fellow in—and out too—nor was he satisfied with his gaze till he had the pleasure of seeing him safe to a shabby little place on the skirts of London, and ascertained that he was the man who answered to the name on the surgery door.

Tebbat added to his previous information, that Roberts seemed quite ignorant any one had meetings with the young lady. He, however, complained bitterly of the discomfort Mrs. Melville had introduced into their peaceful household; and, without ceremony, called her "artful old jade," whenever he mentioned her.

"And what do you make of this?" asked Mr. Turner of Reginald, when with Ashley's help he had arranged all his information.

"I fear," was his reply, "that Mrs. Melville merits Roberts' ungallant designation."

"That I think is pretty clear, and we must watch her, or we shall, perhaps, have more sons and heirs than Providence intended."

Subsequent discoveries and confessions proved that a scheme, somewhat to that effect, had been concocted by the wily mother, who knew that the birth of an heir could alone secure her sway, and probably make such a change in all the arrangements at Old Court as would help to reconcile the refractory Ernesta to her fate.

Accident, however, frustrated all—"the best-laid schemes o' men and mice gang aft agley."

Mrs. Melville, who had succeeded in part of her design, that of dazzling some of her former patronesses, but who was prevented, by her daughter's state of health, from making much display at her handsome house, in compensation for this was never weary of exhibiting her elegant equipage, and in her turn assuming airs of protection and patronage, would frequently call in state and style on her old acquaintance, and condescendingly offer them a seat in the well-appointed carriage.

She was one day indulging this benevolent feeling, and conveying a lady to Kensington, when a sudden scream from the latter caused her to turn her head, and she beheld a riderless horse dashing furiously toward them.

The coachman, who would have been quite equal to this emergency had he been left to himself, distracted by the screams of the lady, and the contradictory orders of Mrs. Melville, lashed one of his horses, a spirited animal, which reared, as she was standing, and threw her across the carriage.

Ernesta, who had sat pale and motionless, alarmed at this, fainted; and when all danger from the runaway horse was long over, she was hastily driven to the first doctor's for aid, and scarcely had she so far recovered as to reach home, than she gave birth to a little girl, who breathed for a few hours only; while the young mother lay for weeks in a most alarming state, and two months elapsed before she could be removed to Old Court, where her husband still obstinately persisted in remaining, in spite of Mrs. Melville's earnest entreaties that he would join them.

Instead of attending to this, he wrote to his lawyer to see that all they needed was abundantly supplied, to pay all the bills, and when Lady Ernest was able to travel, to arrange for her return home.

News of this disaster, and all its concomitants, was brought by Styles, who added, that a new actor had appeared on the scene. This was one of those foul blots on an honorable profession, who never find any job too dirty for their unwashed consciences, or too dishonorable for their callous feelings.

And now Mr. Turner himself interfered. He called on the respectable gentleman who acted for Lord Ernest, and told him what he actually knew, what he also suspected—but he was very plainly told nothing could be done till his Lordship was roused to action—only it was well to watch the enemy, and by threats terrify her from plunging deeper into intrigue and danger; and acting upon this, Mr Turner, in the character of friend to the heir-at-law, wrote to inform her that her machinations were all known to Lord Ernest's family—her plot with the pettifogger, as well as that with the quack. But in relating his interview with Mr. Manning to Ashley, Mr. Turner remarked—"I suspect that I did not tell him much news—and more, that he has by some means got this Jezebel in his power."

So, back went Mrs. Melville, fully resolved that the next heir should be born at Old Court But Ernesta was long before she recovered either health or spirits, while the sight of her mother seemed to fill her with dread as well as dislike; so that she often asked the ancient housekeeper to remain with her, when she peevishly refused admittance to her mother.

CHAPTER XLIX.

"The chains of earth's immurement
Fell from Ianthe's spirit;
They shrank and brake like bandages of straw
Beneath a waken'd giant's strength.
She knew her glorious change." SHELLEY.

AND now the London season approaches, and the papers announce a drawing-room, the first that has been held since Cecilia's marriage; and Lord and Lady Hurstwood arrive to take possession of their town-house, which has been refurnished, with all the splendor becoming their rank and wealth.

And very busy they both are about this drawing-room—for if my lady holds a committee of taste with the court milliner, my lord does the same with the jeweler; and very important he seems to think the subject, judging from his regardless-of-expense orders.

And eminently successful did the result of his consultations prove, when his bride was presented, by his stately relative, the Dowager Duchess of Isleford—for Lady Hurstwood's diamonds were pronounced unrivaled both for taste and value.

Nor was there much difference of opinion about the fair wearer, who was voted the great star of this courtly performance, to the infinite satisfaction of her lord.

"I can tell you, you had a loss," said a brother officer to Captain Mortimer; "the drawing-room was superb."

"So every one says; but I was detained on business at the Horse Guards—not that I care much about these things," said he, yawning, and affecting a blasé air; "one pretty much resembles another. But they all report that Lady Hurstwood, or Lady Hurstwood's diamonds, outheroded Herod."

"It was both—upon my soul, I never saw a finer or more dignified woman. Old Hurst has jockeyed famously to have won this prize."

"Halt, there!" said a fine-looking, middle-aged man, who was of the party. "What do you lads mean by old? Why, a fellow is not of age till he is thirty, nor does he come to years of discretion till ten years later. Hurstwood is my junior, and I am only fifty."

"Juvenility is a matter of fancy," replied the first speaker, with a laugh. "Sydney Staples seems to like a long figure in years, as well as in fortune—he already complains that he sold himself a dead bargain."

"Like him; but some one told me that a royal academician is regularly engaged and paid to keep Mrs. Syd's countenance in repair."

"She is right to put a good face on her marriage," was the retort; "if she could paint out Sydney's debts as well as her wrinkles, she might take out a patent. I am sorry to use such a word, but it was absolutely disgusting to see this made-up old Sycorax daubed like some hideous figure-head on a Dutch craft."

"Still, she is to be pitied," said Lord Hurstwood's senior. "Sydney Staples has neither principle nor mercy—and he will soon run through her vast property."

"Well, that is her concern—she married him for his rank and good looks, which will last longer than her money. But what is this Mother Bunch tale about Templeton's little girl! do you know, Morty?"

"Oh! yes—old Hurst—well, then, young Hurst, it seems, went prowling about the country for a wife, and saw this little creature, whereupon he came, saying, 'fee, faw, fum,' and the poor child, with her pinafore at her eyes, and her mouth full of bread-and-butter—these girls are everlastingly eating it—ran roaring away from the ogre, in the utmost terror, and meeting the parish clerk, or something of the same kind, went slap off with him."

"Quite a Templeton trick," remarked the officer; "her grandmother did the same, only she jilted a worthy squire in some out-of-the-way place. And what said Templeton when the young chip started off?"

"Said? not much—but he swore awfully, raged like a stung bear, beat his wife and the other girl, broke some china and furniture, drank lots of wine, and was carried to bed."

"I wish, Mortimer, you would condescend and talk sense, when you converse with any one who can understand it."

"Ah! but that is so rare, for he is sadly addicted to soliloquizing," slyly remarked the brother-in-arms, and then he continued: "Old Chilvers, I hear, is really dying this time."

"It is true—there is no hope—and, by Jove!" said Mortimer, "when one thinks of the miserable artificial life he led, it must be almost a comfort to him to have any thing so real about him as death. I vow when I think of him, and what his vanity and selfishness end in, I am ready to ask the first pretty girl I meet to have compassion on me, and save me from such a fate, by marrying me."

"Better ask your fair cousin," advised the elderly speaker; "report, however, says that you have, and you look guilty. Well, if so, I wish you joy. I married before I was five-and-twenty, with an abundance of nothing but love to begin housekeeping with—but the experiment answered so well, I mean my boys to do the same, if they like, so adieu."

"All very fine for him!" said the officer; "but such women as his wife are not quite so plentiful as blackberries."

Greatly as both Mrs. Templeton and Constance had enjoyed their visit to Scotland, and much as they felt the kindness the Sinclairs had shown, in omitting nothing that could interest them, they both felt glad when they left Edinburgh, where they had remained with some other friends more than a month; and, accompanied by their hospitable relatives, set out for England, whither the Colonel had preceded them.

Though to Mrs. Templeton the Priory, spite of the beauty with which both nature and art combined to clothe it, had few associations connected with happiness or even pleasure, she longed to return to it; for there alone could she contrive to correspond with the banished one, as their uncertain movements, while in the north, had greatly interfered with this; and she felt that one gratification, at least, would be hers, when again settled at Seabrooke.

Nor was Laurette less anxious once more to be at head-quarters, to see what could be done with the fragments of hope, which had been so ruthlessly dashed to the earth by Hubert's engagement. It had been arranged by her parents that she should pay a round of visits among her English friends, ending with the marriage of Constance, which it was presumed would take place soon after Hubert's return; Sir Archibald frankly expressing his hope, that she would then choose a husband from several admirers whom she coquettishly kept in suspense, dismiss the rest, and settle, like a douce lassie, into the duties of a happy and sensible wife.

How far was this common-place humdrum finale —at least, as her father meant it—from her intentions! as if, among those on whom she condescended to bestow her smiles, and to whom she doled out barely enough graciousness to keep their hopes alive, there was one who could compare with him who despised the love she had unsought given him.

Hubert, the invincible Hubert, at least toward her, was still the idol she worshiped. Hubert, in love with, engaged to, Constance, was the one she yet hoped to bring to her feet; and difficult as this seemed, she resolved to neglect no means by which it might be effected.

Her infatuation had in no degree blinded her to his faults—these she meant to render subservient to her purpose—his weakness would be her strength; his irresolution rendered her more determined; for these gave her hope—she remembered, and quoted to herself, the saying, that the strong mind governs the weak, and took courage. Had she known more of the world, she would have found that this is very far from being always true.

She had, besides, been so much at Forest Hill, and had had such favorable opportunities of studying and becoming acquainted with his character, that she fancied she knew it thoroughly, and that, skillfully managed, the materials were well adapted to insure success—especially if she also levied such contributions from the weaknesses of his parents as she possessed the art to extract—and taking this view of her case, Laurette decided that it was far from being desperate.

Constance she had never much liked; and as her extraordinary beauty had at one time excited her envy, so now, to a greater extent, did her superior intellect; it was rivaling her where she had thought herself most secure—it was infringing on what she felt was her best claim to admiration—it was therefore unpardonable.

When Constance had so earnestly pleaded for permission to return home with Helen, she had made the girlish promise of continuing her studies, and she fully intended to do all she promised. But events soon thickened powerfully and closely around her, which rendered all these fair resolutions of no effect,—at least in the manner she intended.

Constance was now to go through that course of instruction which none may altogether escape. She was to become a pupil in the university of the world—she was to listen to the harsh teachings of circumstances—to read the bitter experiences and learn the painful lessons of life; and, in recompense, she was to gain self-knowledge, self-guidance, self-respect—she was to acquire a consciousness of her own resources and powers, and of the solemn responsibility for the use she made of them; to find that trials may be made blessings and losses gains; and feeling that her own faults and failings needed forbearance, to be ever ready to extend this to others.

This was the training and discipline to which Constance had been subjected; and to which her loving, noble heart, her imaginative and poetic mind rendered her, at first, refractory.

Her sense of justice was wounded and roused, almost to passionate impatience, when she understood the situation in which her worshiped mother was placed; her brave spirit rose in rebellion against the petty tyranny and overbearing conduct of her father; as she gradually became conscious that the yoke was pressing on herself, she struggled violently against it; and when her sister, her gentle Helen, was so sorely tried, nothing but the assurance that open defiance would only aggravate the evil, restrained the strong expression of her indignation. Happily, however, her love and good sense here made her reasonable. She felt that she no longer loved her father, and oh! the pang this conviction gave her; still, in the character of parent, he had a claim on her outward respect, and with her mother's beautiful and consistent behavior ever at hand to guide and strengthen her, she resolved that no word should ever escape her unbecoming the duty of a child.

It was in this stage of her moral training, which had made her "older than her looks," that she was formally introduced at Lady Hurstwood's wedding; and it was then that the advantages of associating with well-cultivated minds began to influence her own. She listened and learned; she looked around and took in knowledge—as her intellect came in contact with the intelligence of others, she became aware of her strength, and used it; or discovered her deficiencies, and endeavored to supply them. The poetry of her nature, which had hitherto dwelt solely on evident and material beauty, now felt it where the cold and passionless never can. She "heard the voice they did not hear," which spoke to her of grandeur and sublimity—of truth and justice—of duty and patience; she "saw the hand they did not see," which beckoned her on in the pursuit of all that can elevate and ennoble. To her there was poetry in every thing great, generous, and unselfish—her sympathy was kindled, and beheld heroism in patient suffering—even in patient toil; and as she yielded to all these stirring influences, her true and lovely face was indeed the tablet on which might be read thoughts the highest and purest that humanity owns.

The visit to the Sinclairs had tended greatly to perfect this quiet process of intellectual and moral advancement. Nature, in her grandest and most sublime aspect, had there presented herself to a fervent admirer; and society, which sent some of its most cultivated and learned members as ever-welcome guests to Craigalan, found one who duly appreciated their worth, and its advantage to herself; so that, in almost every respect, to her mother and herself, time had lately shown his bird-of-paradise wings, as hours and days flew so pleasantly away. But there is ever some alloy; and they both thought of Helen, and sighed that she could not enjoy all this with them.

When the excitement of their return had subsided, Constance began to feel a little anxious about the arrival of letters from Hubert; some time had elapsed, and no direct news from him had been received.

Mr. Morton had accompanied his young friends as far as Seville, when they had left him, and proceeded to Naples. Here Hubert met with some agreeable English acquaintances, who wished to persuade him and Victor to remain for a long visit. This, Victor would have been quite as willing to do as Hubert; but he reminded his friend that he had business of importance to transact for his father in Cyprus, which he could not postpone, and therefore proposed that they should return to Naples when this was over. "Business first, pleasure after," said he; and he was much astonished when, after having delayed some days, Hubert proposed to remain where he was, and there await his companion's return.

Of course, to this, no objection could be made; and young Morton, who possessed, perhaps rather in excess the qualities Hubert so much wanted—decision and firmness—set sail that same evening.

In his letter to Caroline Vernon, with whom he had obtained permission to correspond, and of which he had availed himself very liberally, when alluding to the separation, he merely said he had left Hubert at Naples; for he had particular reasons for avoiding all mention of aught beyond.

But every one was not so scrupulous, nor is it needful that we should be.

Both Hubert and Victor had quickly obtained that share of popularity at Naples, which good introductions, good fortunes, good looks, and agreeable manners are sure to obtain for their possessors. If Victor were the cynosure of English eyes, Hubert had more than compensation in the almost furor his peculiar style of face and figure excited among the Neapolitan beauties, who, like most people, attached a factitious value to rarity.

His was the kind of complexion we should give the Apollo statue, if we ever associated it with the idea of color; and, like that glorious inspiration, Hubert's cast of features was slightly effeminate, but redeemed from this defect by his frank and manly bearing. Elegant, instead of noble, was the term that would have best described him; and when to this natural beauty we add the fascination of a smile few could withstand, and a voice of exquisite harmony and modulation, it will not be wrong to call him rather a dangerous fellow.

Such, at any rate, many a lovely daughter of Italy thought him—such, one found him. And it was not without a sigh for her, for Hubert, for Constance, whom, as Caroline's dearest friend, Victor greatly esteemed, that he sailed away alone.

This will, perhaps, explain why Constance had lately been anxious for a letter from Italy: she knew that Hubert was no longer hindered by the difficulty of writing while at sea; he was now stationary—or, at most, only going to Rome, and yet his correspondence was any thing but regular lengthy. He seemed to encounter epistolary impediments on land which Victor never met with on water—for he wrote when Hubert could not, or, most certainly, did not.

"Constance, have you heard from Italy lately?" inquired Laurette, about a fortnight after their arrival at the Priory.

"Not very lately," was the reply, and she blushed to think such was the case; "perhaps the letters have not been regularly forwarded from Scotland," she added, in the desperate hope that Laurette would think the same.

"Mamma's and mine have all arrived, and so have papa's, as I saw him take a goodly number away redirected only this morning; besides, we have been here a fortnight or more," she continued, maliciously, and determined that this subterfuge should not save her cousin. "But I thought you could not have heard, or you would have mentioned it, that Hubert had joined a party in an exploring visit to Sicily."

"Indeed!" said Constance, now thoroughly surprised; "how did you hear that?"

"A friend of mine, who has lately married, has been traveling with her husband in Italy. At Naples they were introduced to Hubert, and from her account the handsome Englishman is making sad havoc among Italian hearts."

"Nonsense, Laurette! how you rattle on," said Constance, laughing, and too unsuspicious to be wounded by this arrow.

"Nothing like credulity and incredulity," replied Laurette, "for I have constantly remarked that they usually walk hand-in-hand; so, my dear, let them both console you, till you discover for yourself that this gay Hubert is—now do not be angry—a sad flirt."

"Nay, Laurette, that is an odious word."

"Odious or not, it is the true and proper one here. Why, Hubert would have flirted with me if I would have permitted it; and when he found that I did not think this suitable amusement for a lady and gentleman, he would flirt with any of the village girls rather than be out of practice."

Constance was too angry to reply to this; but really wishing to hear about the Sicilian expedition, she checked any display of feeling, and asked, with affected composure, "Did your friend join this party?"

"It has struck," thought Laurette, noting the shade on that ingenuous face, and the pointed disregard of her censure. "No, she could not," she replied, "and much regretted the impossibility, as a Neapolitan family, with whose daughter she had formed an acquaintance, were the promoters of the party in which Hubert was included. I dare say," she added carelessly, "you have heard Lady Hurstwood speak of the Duca di St. Angelo?"

"No," said Constance, thoughtfully; but she was not now likely to forget the name.

Another week, still no letter—at last a very hurried one, dated Palermo—but no mention made of having joined any particular party; nor did he find time to say where her answer would reach him.

Pained, she scarcely ventured to ask herself why, Constance was too just, too generous, to dwell upon what seemed injurious to Hubert's character, especially as he was absent. She therefore busied herself as usual in any thing that needed her help, and sent for little Minnie Dallas, who, since Helen's departure, had been frequently for weeks her companion and amusement, and who was will with delight at hearing of the summons. She assisted Mrs. Vernon and Caroline in their village duties, and was as the apple of her eye to her fond mother.

Caroline was now preparing for her visit to London, as Mr. Morton had, within the last few days, returned to the Hermitage, for the purpose of escorting her and Mrs. Vernon to his townhouse.

"Oh, Caroline, how I envy you!" sighed Constance, having walked to the Rectory to bid her farewell. "You look shocked at my speech, but you can see our darling Helen, you, and Mrs. Vernon; and mamma and I can not," and tears rushed to her eyes at the thought that this happiness was forbidden to them by whom it was most prized.

"Dear Constance," replied Caroline, gently and soothingly. "I know this is your sad trial; but dear friend, it must work out its use, and then God will remove it; do not, therefore, lengthen your probation by repining."

"I try not, Carry," she said, sadly but humbly; but you never had a sister."

"No; but I have two brothers—one lost to us by marriage," she answered, trying to impart a ray of her own cheerfulness—"and the other swallowed up by law."

"Yes," said Constance, determined not to talk of her sorrows, though she could not forget them; "and that reminds me I have a message to send to Ashley. Tell him, I shall not forgive him for taking such ungenerous advantage of our absence, and making his visit then, till he comes and sues for it humbly in person. And mind, Carry, you send us drawings of all you see at Helen's; the inside and outside of their cottage, a sketch of dear old Gretchen, and pray take notice how she looks when you give her my copy of mamma's sweet face; and send us portraits, morally, intellectually, and physically, of all their friends, and in short tell us all you can of them—dear Reginald, and thrice dear Helen."

"You will not, then, refuse to pay the postage of these bulky descriptions?"

"Certainly not; they will be worth their weight in gold."

And when Mrs. Vernon returned, having left Caroline with the Mortons, by whom she was lodged and feted like a princess, it is wonderful how she managed to answer all the questions Constance poured forth.

"Dear child," said Mrs. Templeton, "let our kind friend take breath;" but she looked very happy herself to hear the replies, though tears were still on her cheeks.

"I have a great mind to punish you by being obedient, mamma. You pretend to stop me and yet sit there urging me to go on—yes, you do. What does your dear contented face say, but 'Go on, Constance, let us hear something else that will make us happy;'"

"I believe, then, that you can scarcely ask any thing to which my reply would not be satisfactory," said Mrs. Vernon, cheerfully. "Ashley says, that if ever he is inclined to feel dull, he goes to Reginald's, and comes away almost happy—why he should not say quite, I can not tell."

"He studies too hard," said Constance. "You must insist on his coming here, and that will cure him."

"And so the little Mortons are sweet birds, you say?" asked Mrs. Templeton; "and Caroline's introduction to Victor's relatives pleases you?"

"Very much. They have a noble, well-appointed house; Miss Newman is very amiable—older than Mr. Morton, and already Helen has won her interest. While I was in town I was also introduced to Mr. Turner and his sister—both of them studies in intelligence and kindness—and to a Mr. and Mrs. Stacey, of whom more hereafter."

"What a delight this visit has been, dearest," said Constance to her mother, as they drove home; "Helen seems to have quite a list of friends, and all of them people we should like to know—clever and intellectual, all more or less celebrated; and then, if she and Reginald do not mind giving up pomp and luxuries, how much better off are they than many others!"

"Does Minnie Dallas still occupy your dressing-room, Constance?" inquired Mrs. Templeton, as if, during this remark, her thoughts had been far away.

"Yes, mamma; I have taken Helen's ever since she left, and keep it sacred from any one else."

"Then, come, my dear, and have a chat with me to-night, instead of going to your room."

"Thank you, dear mother! I shall enjoy that; it is such a pleasure to feel I am your friend as well as your child—there is nothing better."

Had she forgotten her vexation about Hubert? In truth, this looked and sounded rather like it; and yet it was only the firm trust that love and respect bring, which made her so contented and happy. She was sure he had a sufficient reason for acting as he did; he must not be judged hastily; and her noble and truthful nature had its reward in being spared the agony of fear and doubt.

CHAPTER L.

"If Misfortune comes, she brings along
The bravest virtues." THOMSON.

"AND now, mamma, that we are so snug and comfortable, what have you to tell me?" inquired Constance, as she sat in her mother's boudoir.

"Several things, my dear, but first come here—" and she showed Constance the door through which Helen had passed on that memorable night, and repeated the explanation she had then given.

"I see it all," said Constance, with a look of intelligence, and a sigh which seemed as if a load had been removed from her breast—"and that I should never have thought of it—but we must not speak of it, I suppose."

"Not yet," replied Mrs. Templeton, pleased to find that Constance had divined what she wished her to know, and yet had hesitated to avow. "I show you this simple contrivance because I have still the same suspicions regarding Ruth that I then had—Dawson does not hesitate to say that she is not trustworthy."

"If you distrust Ruth, why not dismiss her?" asked Constance.

"Because I do not like to act upon mere suspicion—for I might do her a serious injury. No one could have been more attentive or useful while we were at Grantham, and during our Scotch visit. She seems attached to us—and yet I doubt her."

"Is Dawson prejudiced?"

"I believe not—but she asserts that she has often found Ruth lingering about this corridor, after she has been dismissed, as if listening or spying—that once she heard her shut a drawer hastily in your dressing-room, and, on entering, she smelt the peculiar scent of that Indian box in which you keep your letters, and which I know you lock up in your dressing-case. Dawson at once recognized the scent. What do you keep there? Hubert's letters, I suppose."

"No, mamma," said Constance, with a smile and a blush, "they live by themselves. In that box there are only letters and notes from my general correspondents."

"I am glad of that—we must be careful; and directly I can, without injury to her, I shall dismiss Ruth: but my greatest objection to her is still to be told—I know that she is intimate at Cooper's; and, Constance, believe me, that man is a rogue, and all his party good for nothing. But I have not yet done with my revelations—come here."

The rooms which especially were called Mrs. Templeton's consisted, as we have said, of four, the last being a bath-room.

One day, years ago, Mrs. Templeton remarked, that while the external wall ran in an unbroken line, this bath-room was internally much smaller than the dressing-room which it joined; and, on examining it, she felt sure that there was either a very large closet or some waste space.

"I mentioned this to Dawson," she continued, "who was amused at my having attached any mystery to the matter—the wall was built even outside, to preserve architectural symmetry, but as the fireplace of the bath-room could be placed only on that side, a double wall was run up—see this projection is made by the chimney and fireplace;" and Constance followed her mother into a long, narrow, but lofty slip or closet, the entrance to which was by a sliding panel neatly contrived, but apparently with so little desire for concealment, that it was surprising every successive housemaid had not detected it.

"I show it you because it gave me the idea of opening the door I had made from your rooms. I often think of that communication—" she suddenly stopped and became pale and agitated. "Constance," she continued, solemnly, "I have sometimes trembled at the thought that if ever your father should learn the particulars of Helen's flight, in his anger he would hesitate at nothing."

"Good heavens! mother;" and Constance cast her arms round her, as if to protect her from harm.

"Well," said Mrs. Templeton, after a pause, "I am glad that this is told—and now, my child, I am about to incur further risk, and I want you to help me—I must see Helen."

"Mamma, you really terrify me."

"I hope not, for I rely on your presence of mind and energy. Helen expects to be confined in a few months. I must, I will see her—but, if I delay, perhaps Reginald might object to my wish—indeed, I must go soon, or not at all,—and I repeat it, I will see her—why am I passively to submit to this? all else, all else—but not to lose my children;" and she laid her head on Constance's shoulder and wept convulsively.

Constance spoke not; tears silently rolled down her face, but she pressed her mother to her heart and repeatedly kissed her.

"I believe I have said all I need," resumed Mrs. Templeton, making a successful effort to be calm—"forgive me, my child, for having laid on your young heart part of a burden I sometimes find almost too heavy to bear alone, and in silence."

"Oh, mother! dearest mother! God knows I willingly accept it—and how willingly I would, if I could, take it all from you. Mother, is good to come from this also?"

"I firmly believe so," was the reply; "if not in the way we wish, in a way that will be much better for us. And now listen; my plan is this. The Sinclairs leave us for a week's visit at Hurstwood. In a few days your father is going to town on business. I know this, as Cecilia puts off her party in order that we may all be there—for she is kindly bent on keeping up a friendly appearance. Doctor and Mrs. Vernon are informed of my intentions—the latter will accompany me—we shall, or rather she will, ostentatiously leave in the evening early—we travel all night, and breakfast with my darling girl—a short rest, again a night journey, and home. You may, if you like, take Dawson into your confidence."

"And what can I do?"

"Show lights in my rooms—moving lights, as if I were there—disarrange the rooms as though they had been occupied, to avert suspicion—but above all, lights at night—I know there are spies without, I believe there is one within. Be especially on your guard against Ruth. Are you equal to all this? the pier-door will enable you to do it without crossing the corridor."

"Trust me," replied Constance; "in this cause I am strong and vigilant."

"And now, my precious, receive my thanks, and good-night—but stay, I have one trifle more to tell you;" and she informed Constance of the income she had secured to Helen, and how she had been enabled to do so—"and should any thing have occurred which you wish me to learn directly I return, if we can not meet, do not forget our broad-leaved letter-box;" and leading her through the glass-door she again kissed her, and they separated.

When Constance reached her own room, late as it was, she sat down to think over all that her mother had told her—how thankful she was that Helen's disappearance was sanctioned by that mother; for, to her, there had always been something painful and degrading in the suspicion that Helen, even in the desperate circumstances in which she was placed, should have arranged and carried on a clandestine correspondence—or that while her mother and sister were sorrowing and suffering with her, she should have planned an escape. From all this Helen now stood quite exonerated—as well as Reginald, who had shared in the secret censure which Constance could not help pronouncing.

How her mother had carried the matter successfully through, Constance knew not; but it was an infinite relief to believe that the whole responsibility rested on her.

The information relating to Helen's pecuniary matters, gave her also great pleasure. How often had she looked at the luxuries which everywhere surrounded her, and thought that, perhaps, the strictest economy could hardly make their present means suffice — for she knew that Reginald had scarcely any thing of his own beyond the rent of Sea-View Cottage—now, she could picture them comfortably off; and this, added to the charming description Mrs. Vernon had given of them and their society, made her feel quite happy.

But then suddenly rushed into her mind the dread of discovery; and Constance shuddered at the bare idea of what her father's rage would be, and of what it would lead to. She knew, that though he connived at her mother's hearing from Helen, perhaps only because he could not possibly help it, his anger was not at all abated—on the contrary, Cecilia's marriage had but served to sharpen his indignation against Helen. for having scorned those advantages he now, more plainly than ever, saw would have attended the match—while some annoying arrangements about money, which he had recently been forced to make, would have been unnecessary, had he had the wealthy peer for his son-in-law.

Constance dreaded also this fresh risk her mother was going to encounter, though she sighed to think that such danger should ever attend a parent's visit to her child. How she now wished for Hubert! his presence would so cheer and encourage her. Gay, happy Hubert, who always brought sunshine with him. "Perhaps," she said, "I shall have a letter to-morrow;" and with that hope she retired to rest.

"I expect Mrs. Vernon to-morrow morning, to breakfast with us, Helen," said Reginald, trying to speak, as if this were an every-day occurrence. "I have told Gretchen, and she is already as busy as a bee, preparing quite a banquet of coffee and cakes."

"When did she arrive?" inquired Helen; "I hope they are all well."

"Very well—but she has not yet arrived: her visit will be truly a flying one—for they imitate us, and travel all night."

"What an odd arrangement—does the Doctor accompany her?"

"No," he said, and he felt anxious, as he knew what a few more questions would reveal; "she brings a lady friend to see us—to see you."

"Oh, Reginald! Reginald!" and she fixed her expressive eyes wildly on his face.

"But they will not be admitted, if my little wife is not quite composed;" he put his arm round her, for she looked pale.

"It is mamma! my darling mother!" and she burst into tears.

"Yes, my love. it is—but do not make us repent having planned this pleasure, or it must not take place."

"Dear husband, let me weep—it does me good," said Helen; and after a few minutes' quiet indulgence in this luxury of tears, she raised her head from his shoulder, and said, "How kind of you—I have so pined for this, you can not think—and it will make me so happy."

"I know it, dear Helen, and therefore I have urged it; and now let us talk it over composedly, and let this dear mamma see that my wife is almost more beautiful than ever, and as happy as she is fair;" and he looked fondly at the sweet face which raised its grateful eyes to his.

And when, the next day, she rose earlier than usual, he was delighted to find that instead of exciting, the expected interview had almost quieted her. Her great wish was about to be granted, and Helen felt soothed and thankful.

And the breakfast was prepared in grand style, for Gretchen had seen after that; and Helen, in her simple dress, was looking so charming, that Reginald forgot lost wealth and station, and felt there was nothing wanting to complete his happiness but a reconciliation with her family.

But here is the carriage—Helen turns faint and pale—in a minute she is in her mother's arms—how it was all managed she does not know, but there stands Reginald, looking so proud and so handsome, and there was her mother's smiling face, while her arms were still round her, and Mrs. Vernon and Gretchen deep in the mysteries of the breakfast-table.

"We have usurped your throne, dear Helen," said the former; "but your mother and I have traveled all night, so we both require breakfast.

And the sound of the well-known voice completely restored Helen to consciousness, for a strange feeling of swimming had prevented her from fully understanding all that had so suddenly happened.

"Mamma!" and a shower of kisses fell on the dear form she had so longed to see—she kissed her hands, her hair, her very dress, in an ecstasy of rapture; and then followed question upon question, till Mrs. Vernon called "Order, order," and set them an example of what she termed sensible behavior, by commencing her breakfast in good earnest.

And a strange meal this breakfast was; nor was Gretchen's conduct the least extraordinary part of it; she came in, for at least, the tenth time, apropos to nothing, except to look at Mrs. Templeton, touch her bonnet, or shawl, or something that belonged to her; but when her mistress again put out her hand, and once more thanked her for all she had done for Helen, Gretchen could stand out no longer—she pressed the hand with deep reverence to her lips, and in her own language uttered a prayer over it, that the good Lord would, one day, see fit to let his face shine on her and hers, even in this life; and having thus relieved her pent-up feelings, she quietly resumed her household duties, and busied herself in preparations for her unexpected but cherished visitors.

"Now," said Mrs. Vernon, "I think half-an-hour's walk on your beautiful heath will refresh me more than any thing—so, if Mr. West will accompany me, I am ready."

"Will you not lie down in preference?" asked Helen; "there is a room quite prepared for you."

"Not till after my walk; then I may, perhaps, doze—at present I could not; now adieu, for an hour."

So mother and daughter were again left alone, for the first time since that eventful night when one had braved so much to save the other. And amply was this now repaid—there sat Helen, no longer pale, broken-hearted, desperate, and despairing—but blooming, happy, joy dancing in her eyes and smiles on her lips; and as Mrs. Templeton looked around and saw, not indeed luxuries, but comfort, and marked the love that spoke in every tone of Reginald's voice, she felt that she had done well to secure such great blessings for her child.

Ashley rode up for half-an-hour toward the middle of the day; he fancied that this interruption would be a relief to the continued indulgence of feelings which were almost painful from their intensity; and he was right—the thoughts of all were brought down to a more common level, while conversation was diverted into a more ordinary channel.

The Staceys, who had been told of this expected visit, of course kept away; but he had worked himself up to such a state of excitement in imagining the scene, that he struck off a short poem, which described so much that had really occurred, and this with so graceful a flow of language, that when he read it the next week to Helen, her eyes filled with tears; which he protested was the most flattering homage a poet could receive.

But now evening is come—and they must part, who have so lately met. Helen's smile faded away as her mother pressed her to her bosom. "But we will soon meet again, my dear girl; meantime, let us treasure the remembrance of this bright day, to cheer us through any gloomy ones."

Mrs. Vernon, who had had some refreshing sleep at the Cottage, now undertook to watch and arrange, while her exhausted friend reposed.

As they approached the end of their journey, which had been arranged on Mr. Morton's plan, though not performed quite so expeditiously, Mrs. Templeton began to be nervous and uneasy.

There is the Doctor's carriage waiting to convey them to the Rectory—here is the Rectory—"And see, my husband," said Mrs. Vernon; "and yes—it is—there is Constance."

"All safe, dearest mamma," were the first words.

"Heaven be praised for this mercy."

"Amen," said the Doctor, reverently, "we do not ask you to stay and breakfast, my dear friend; you will be better at home—and when you feel sad, remember this great blessing, and praise His name for it."

"We shall, most devoutly; and now adieu."

"And Helen?" cried Constance, looking as if the answer must be returned in some way more speedily than by words.

"Happy—happier and more beautiful than ever—for she looks cheerful and contented."

"Another mercy to return thanks for," said Constance, solemnly.

"You are right, it is indeed—but has all gone well, here?"

"Quite well—Dawson has helped me—you were not missed till last evening, when Ruth wanted particularly to see you—but I told her her business must wait till this morning. I was up long before any one—put your room into 'most admired disorder,' and when Ruth enters mine, she will find that I have flown—and as we return together, may suppose that we both rose early for a walk. I was sadly afraid last night, for the clouds threatened rain, and then my plot would have been a failure."

"And the lights?"

"Most ostentatiously displayed—especially last night—for I fancied when I entered the conservatory that I heard a step on the gravel."

"Had you a light then?"

"Of course not—or my means of access would have been discovered, had any one been watching. So I returned to my room and rang for Ruth, who was a very long time before she came. Dawson declares she had to be sought for, but she means to find this out, in her own fashion."

"Well, dear, and then?"

"Then I undressed, and dismissed her as usual, before I read a little. I again entered your conservatory—carefully lighted the taper in your bed-room—the boudoir table-lamp had been lighted before, so that the oil might be consumed—and then I paraded from your dressing-room to your bed-room, as if going to rest—put out the lamp, and left the night-light burning."

"Well done, dear; you have, by your courage, enabled me to secure a great and permanent pleasure, one that Helen also largely shares in;" and then she proceeded to give Constance all the minutiæ she could possibly remember relating to that dear banished one.

Still she was not satisfied; but smiled and shook her head, remarking that she feared her mother had no eye for the details of a picture, as she could tell neither the color of Helen's dress, nor give a catalogue of the furniture.

"I plead guilty to this—but in compensation, I can tell you that this journey has relieved my mind of a host of apprehensions and fears. I now picture Helen well and happy—instead of fancying her still the pale, dispirited girl who fled to avoid all but dishonor."

"And yet, mamma," observed Constance, "how happy Cecilia is."

"Yes—and you would say, in the very situation from which Helen shrunk with dismay—but Cecilia, though she had no decided preference for Lord Hurstwood, had certainly no decided objection—nor did she love another. Besides, she is altogether a very different character from Helen—not that I mean this as a reproach—perhaps, to the majority, it would sound like a compliment. Even I have sometimes questioned whether the possessor of great delicacy and refinement, strong affections and acute sensibilities, is to be envied—whether, in short, these are the fit materials with which to go through this work-a-day world. I fear they cause many a wound and bruise, from which others, who possess them not, escape: and, except strong affections, Cecilia is not much troubled with the rest —she is true, honorable, an excellent daughter, a firm friend, and will, I am persuaded, unless it be his own fault, make Lord Hurstwood very happy. She is one whom I greatly love and respect; and all the good qualities he has, and which have hitherto been perverted or warped aside, will, by her invisible management, be developed and confirmed."

"Still, mamma, great refinement, though it may be hurt where rougher natures never can, has pleasures which these can never know."

"You are right; for I never yet met with any one who possessed it that was willing to exchange it for more blunted feelings, though they might, at the very moment, be smarting from contact with the rude and rough."

"And now, I suppose, you will try and see Helen again?" said Constance.

"I shall, but not till after her confinement. I have no longer a feverish anxiety about her. I have seen that, hitherto, all has gone well, and this I hope will strengthen me to trust the future with One who does all things wisely; but, darling, can I not contrive to pleasure you—can you not share in what you have ably helped me to enjoy?"

"Me! oh, mamma!" her eyes sparkling with delight; "oh, if you could safely contrive it," and she began eagerly to pace up and down the room.

"Well, we will accustom ourselves to the idea, and then think and consult about effecting it."

CHAPTER LI.

"The devil knew not what he did when he made man politic; he crossed himself by it, and I can not think but, in the end, the villainies of men will set him clear."—Timon of Athens.

THE dinner-party at the Hall comprised most of those with whose names we are familiar, except the Forresters. A ministerial crisis required the presence of all their party, of which Mr. Forrester formed one.

"I am delighted to hear," said the host, addressing Lady Sinclair, "that Lady Hurstwood has prevailed on you to prolong your stay and favor her with your company during my absence. I am going to London to-morrow, to be at my post in the house," he continued, turning to Doctor Vernon; "a very important question is pending, and if the ministers are beaten on it, they must resign."

"Then there will probably be a dissolution," observed Sir William Dallas.

"No doubt—this is the sixth year of the Parliament's age—when it is generally pronounced superannuated, and receives the same fate, as I have read the Hindoos inflict on the aged and infirm—namely, is killed, to spare the pain of natural death."

"I wonder your Lordship does not exercise your privilege, and vote by proxy," said Mrs. Templeton.

"So I would, if I did not wish to show very pointedly that I am in opposition—I may safely say so—as our respected member, Mr. Forrester, is absent—for whom no one has more regard than myself, though we are political antipodes."

"Oh! I hope they will be beaten, for then there will be an election," exclaimed Lady Dallas, whose imagination was already busy with bows, ribbons, banners, chairing, and, finally, a ball at the Grange, the usual close to what was generally a very friendly and quiet little transaction; in the course of which Mr. Forrester would be nominated, seconded, and make a speech about Church and Constitution—would be returned in the most genteel manner possible; make another speech about Constitution and Church, assure his friendly supporters that Britannia was still very busy ruling the waves—return thanks in a somewhat lengthy wind-up, and dismiss them to a plentiful dinner, where they might eat and drink as long as they could.

"Ah! those were glorious times for country gentlemen—there was no Carlton with its snuggery—no gallant officer with his A.S.S. signature —or, suppose there were—there was no 'Times' to drag the convenient arrangements before the public—to tear the lion mask off the honorable initials and show that he signed truly—there was no rude violation of the Eleusinian mysteries performed in little dark rooms, and the hocus-pocus doings of the presiding priest—no inquisitive and prying election committee, vulgarly troubling themselves with their neighbors' affairs—oh, no!—"a fellow-feeling made them wondrous kind"—they remembered their Latin, and as they themselves lived in glass houses, forbore to throw stones—there was no cross-questioning of "frail" witnesses and agents, whether Black, Brown, or Grey—but when a gentleman was returned, his friends congratulated him, and wished his country joy of so honorable a member.

The day after this party, Colonel Templeton mentioned the rumor, of a probable dissolution, to Cooper—for it was no secret to all who took an interest in politics, that it was expected there would be a struggle, a mustering of forces, and, perchance, a defeat.

Cooper, when he returned home, in his turn named it to Mrs. Captain, as an event likely to excite her attention, on account of the festivities and amusement even this peaceful election caused. He forgot how trifles light as air are, by a strong will, made powerful instruments to serve a cherished purpose—perhaps he had never read the court gossip of how Abigail Masham's best silk gown was spoiled, and the disasters it caused —but it was too late if he had, for the words were spoken, and dauntless Mrs. Captain grappled at once with a new idea.

"Put Colonel Templeton in opposition," said this brave and patriotic dame.

"Good God! what are you thinking of?" exclaimed Cooper.

"Of myself," was the sublime reply.

"Return Colonel Templeton!" gasped the amazed agent.

"Who spoke of return?" withering scorn on her bold but handsome face. "I said, put him in opposition, and I mean what I say. How will that stately, pompous old empty head," such was her irreverent way of mentioning Forrester of Forest Hill and Hargrave likewise—"how will he like the man, or the daughter of the man either, who attempts this? for I know it will be but an attempt."

"And the money, where is that to come from? for I know he is hard up."

"It must come from the wood—it needs no fairy, in these days, to turn trees to gold—a good chopper does that."

"How often must I tell you," asked Cooper, impatiently, "that he will not cut any more? You know he almost quarreled with me about that last clearance. Will you never understand the difference between trees and timber?"

"Pooh!" she retorted, with infinite contempt; "a distinction without a difference."

"Maria, I told you then, that I believed he consulted some one in London about that fall, and found he had done wrong—besides, if you put this clearing project into his head, I would not give much for the stability of any thing he could convert into money; and I fancy it would not suit your schemes to have only the bare walls of the Priory left."

"Certainly not;" and she laughed a little merry laugh. "Well, then, he must borrow, and make those about him more economical; so, send him to me; I undertake that he shall come back primed and loaded, quite ready to take the field—there shall, at least, be an explosion, and a little mischief."

I very much fear that the old king who said women are the cause of all the disasters that happen, had reasoned from cause to effect, and from effect to cause, as closely as any Scotch metaphysician—for certain it is that from Eve, the first mischief-maker, down to the last little miss who encouraged her brother to steal the green gooseberries, which she ate, and for which he was punished, these fair creatures are perpetually tossing about apples of discord. It is a fact, that Colonel Templeton, who had laughed at Cooper, when that worthy hinted at the astonishment Mr. Forrester would feel, were he to offer himself as his opponent, and who had subsequently never thought of such a proceeding, returned from the village, bent on trying his chance in a contested election.

"Some demon whispered, Colonel, have a seat."

When this determination became known, it is more easy to imagine than describe the dismay of his wife and daughter, the sorrow of the Vernons, and the indignation of Sir William Dallas; who, though, like his father the General, he differed in opinion from Mr. Forrester, considered him so honorable and independent a man, that notwithstanding more than one application, both had always declined to oppose his return.

And now, Colonel Templeton, a man not liked even on his own property—a man who, for various reasons, was positively disliked in many other quarters, a man of no particular intelligence, influence, or weight—who had never done any one act likely to make him popular—he, above all others, to break through all precedent!—it was monstrous!

It is true that the Ashley family, who had agreed in politics with the Forresters, had, on one or two occasions, been returned instead of a Forrester—but this had never been on account of any unfriendly or adverse feeling—it had generally happened when, from seniority in age, an Ashley had the advantage.

"My dear Cecilia," said Lord Hurstwood, a few days after the event he had predicted, and helped to effect, had happened, "did you know that Colonel Templeton intends to oppose Mr. Forrester's return?"

"No, indeed, I did not," she replied, "and on every account I am surprised—for one reason, very sorry. How will this affect his son's engagement with Constance?"

His Lordship merely shrugged his shoulders, a movement which plainly and expressively said, "that is his affair."

"I think," he said, after a pause, "that if you do not object, we might very pleasantly pass four or five weeks in Paris. You have never been there. On our return this election will be over, and Lady Grantham will then perform her promise of spending a few months here."

"I am delighted with your plan, my dear Lord," she answered—she was almost always pleased with what he proposed, wise wife!—"and I presume you will like to start soon."

So to Paris they went; his Lordship giving his tenantry to understand that they were to vote as they thought proper; for, though the Colonel was his wife's uncle, and on his own side of the question, that was no reason why he should dictate to them; in short, he respected Mr. Forrester, but not Colonel Templeton.

CHAPTER LII.

"Here we go up, up, up,
And here we go down, down, down."
Nursery Rhymes.

Hubert was at Naples when he received a letter from his father, summoning him immediately to England, but in which no reason was assigned for this unexpected though peremptory call.

Happily for his character as an obedient son, this arrived at a juncture when his father's command was more readily attended to than it would have been a few weeks earlier; for the Duca di St. Angelo and his family had gone to visit a relative at Taranto.

Therefore, with some undefined idea that he would return, and complete his term of probation in that delicious climate, Hubert set out without any needless delay.

Had any one told him that his love for Constance had diminished with absence, he would have repelled the accusation with indignation; because it would have been equivalent to calling him fickle, false, dishonorable. But had he examined his own feelings, or taken a just view of his recent conduct, perhaps these offensive terms might have been suggested and whispered by himself.

But Hubert never did examine or justly view himself. He meant nothing dishonorable, he deliberately planned nothing faithless toward Constance by his attentions to Beatrice. But was he, therefore, guiltless?

His father's letter had, however, this good effect: it awoke recollections of home that had lately been rather drowsy; it recalled one fair image, which had gradually ceased to be the one most prominent; and the reply to his father, announcing his prompt return, was accompanied by one to Constance, so full of joyful anticipations of their approaching meeting and of expressions of unabated love, that she was vexed to remember how she had sometimes thought his letters uninteresting and unsatisfactory, rare as they had generally been.

It was, therefore, with double pleasure she read this, which told of his return, at the very moment when the thoughtless, the selfish conduct of her father might have provoked a very different tone; for she had never stopped to inquire if Hubert knew what had occurred, and his letter had led her to infer he returned because longer banishment was insupportable; for attaching but little importance to his father's desire to see him, he had not even alluded to it.

The Forresters, whose proud feelings had received a wound never anticipated, and from a quarter the least likely to have struck the blow, remained in dignified silence in town, "nursing their wrath to keep it warm," and meditating how, in a way most consistent with their family honor, they could revenge the insult it had received.

Of course, nothing was neglected by the Forest Hill party to secure the defeat of the intruder; and though this seemed by no means a difficult task, the zeal of Mr. Forrester's adherents made them most desirous that his discomfiture should be so complete as to prevent any future interference—at least, from him.

Nor, to do him justice, was Cooper less active; he was the very man of the situation—unscrupulous both in deed and speech—confident of success, and imparting this confidence to others; supple, and accommodating himself to the whims, prejudices, and ignorance of all; cajoling, coaxing, bullying, as any of these means seemed likely to succeed; and had his principal possessed the least chance of success, Cooper would soon have inflated that chance, and made it a man-to-man struggle. How miserably was all this talent now wasted! Surely such as he must have been in the mind's eye of the poet when he lamented over the flower that blushes unseen, and the gem that shines unheeded. How would a man like Cooper have been hailed and fêted during the progress of some of those elections which have lately become—we were going to say—"so famous;" elections, where blarney, bribery, and bludgeons—priests and perjury—fighting, ranting, and calumny, if used generously and boldly, are sure to carry the day—elections, where it is impudence, meanness, and lungs, versus honesty, reason, and brains. He, at any rate, even now, left nothing undone; and the very day that Hubert, not knowing his family were in London, arrived at Forest Hill, and there first learned what was going on, this faithful and zealous adherent was made practically to learn that there are other

> "dangers as environ
> Than come of meddling with cold iron."

Before Hubert left the Continent, the English papers had informed him that there would be a general election; and as he approached Seabrooke, the name of "Templeton, the coming man," and similar placards, had astonished and greatly annoyed him.

From his deserted home, where he was informed by his father's steward of the exact state of affairs, he rode immediately to the Priory, in order to understand, if possible, what had led to this extraordinary opposition; but, alas! for his father's cause!—his father's insulted dignity!—the first person he beheld was Constance, more beautiful than he had ever thought her, more bewitching than he had ever found her.

How rapturously he gazed on her! how proud he was to think that she was his, by promise—his, by her own free will! How could he ever have fancied any other comparable with her?—and so, with a brow unclouded by self-reproach—for really he felt none—he was as gay, as charming, as handsome as ever. And when Colonel Templeton came home, with a very grave face and in no amiable temper, the sight of this smiling vision made him look less gloomy, and checked his ill humor, especially as events had just occurred which made Hubert's arrival, evidently in a pacific character, most opportune.

Ah! Mr. Forrester! Mr. Forrester! if you do not legislate better for the nation than you do to gain your own purposes, your defeat would be no loss to your country.

Poor gentleman! he had blundered at every move. None the less enraged because he refrained from an open demonstration of anger, he thought it a capital stroke of diplomacy to summon Hubert without giving his reasons, lest his son, anticipating a rupture with Colonel Templeton, should refuse to return, and be implicated in the quarrel.

Had he told Hubert the truth, the whole truth, namely, that he intended to withdraw his promise, holding himself justified in so doing by the offensive conduct of Colonel Templeton, who knows whether that exemplary and dutiful son, with the lovely face of Beatrice di St. Angelo fresh in his recollection, might not have consented to relinquish the far lovelier one of Constance Templeton?

Why, also, had he not prevented his going to Seabrooke, by informing him that himself and his mother were in town? this, to say the truth, he had done, but the letter never reached Hubert, owing to his quick return.

It is easy to imagine why Constance was rejoiced to see Hubert; but her father was not in love, nor did he usually evince much pleasure at seeing any one; why, therefore, did he look glad, and say so?

It is all very easy to plan a great and glorious deed—the next thing is to execute it. Indeed, some common-sense people insist upon it, that the execution is the all in all, the only part that has any merit. They quote vulgar proverbs—the proof of the pudding, belling the cat, and such like—but then, common sense is so low!

Now Colonel Templeton had talked both largely and loudly of representing his country—so far, it was great and glorious. In aiding and abetting, as before said, Cooper was not slack; he composed addresses and had them printed—he, or Mrs. Captain, invented rude and insulting placards about dumb orators and silent speakers, in allusion to Mr. Forrester's being generally satisfied with recording his vote, without wasting the time of the House by a speech, when his reasons had already been well expressed by those with whom he agreed. He was contented with being recognized as a consistent, independent member—and this he was, without having recourse to brogue, bluster, or blunder, insolence or invective; he had no talents for becoming trumpeter in any demagogue's brass band; and was too much a gentleman and a patriot to serve in any political brigade, either as officer or subaltern.

This quality, which made him respected by all parties in the House, was now, by the broad caricatures of Mrs. Captain, turned into ridicule; and the gaping villagers were at first shocked, and then amused, to see these coarse but humorous jokes stuck in various conspicuous places, and freely distributed to all who would take them.

Not contented with collecting all the worthless vagabonds and trampers, who sniff the ale and beer of a coming contest from afar, and making them drunk and quarrelsome, Cooper, emboldened by the continued absence of Mr. Forrester, determined to carry the war into the enemy's quarters, and ventured to the village, from the public-house of which hung and swung the Forresters' arms.

Here he began with some random observations, till a little group, who had been lounging round the green, attracted by the subject, gathered close about him. Charmed with the apparent success of his manœuver, he began to harangue them, which was quietly listened to, till, coupling Mr. Forrester's name with some impertinent jest, he was at once made aware of his folly and rashness. For suddenly, strong hands pinioned him, strong hands blindfolded him, as securely as if he had been Dame Fortune herself; and before he could well understand it, he felt himself literally dancing on nothing—but air! for kicking and struggling, up he went—shouting and bawling, down he came—up again—down again—and all in perfect silence; he had soon no power to cry, his tormentors no intention—a woman's voice alone was heard singing—

> "An old woman tossed up in a blanket,
> Seventy times as high as the moon;
> And in her hand she carried a broom—"

till faint, and evincing this by being passive in the hands, or rather blanket, of his assailants; sick, dizzy, but carefully kept from bone-breaking, he felt himself laid in a cold bath, and after a short interval heard a voice, most suspiciously like the one that had sung, exclaim—"Lauk-a-day, Master Cooper! be it you, man? deary me! what be you a doing of here?" and the bandage being removed, he found himself in the horse-trough! Too sick and sore to move, he was lifted out by the landlord and hostler, who grinned and sniggered at each other, while a perfect roar arose from the tap-room, as he was carried through it up stairs to bed, where, as he lay sore and savage, he heard a full chorus shout out—

> "Old woman, old woman, says I, says I,
> Where are you going so high, so high?
> To sweep the cobwebs out of the sky,
> And I shall be back again by-and-by."

There he remained all night, and early the next morning, stiff, bruised, with aching head and feverish body, he was conveyed in the landlord's covered cart home, where he remained invisible to all eyes for several days. And when he did recover and emerge, so crestfallen and yet enraged was he, that Colonel Templeton advised a week's absence to some place where he could recover his nerves and, if possible, his temper.

But this incident decided the fate of the election. Colonel Templeton, who had never comprehended what standing meant, had already stood till he was tired; and he was now glad to sit—if not in Parliament, in peace and quiet, as he had done before. He therefore relinquished the matter with as much levity as he had taken it up.

To him, therefore, Hubert was doubly, nay, trebly welcome. He was to be ambassador, plenipotentiary, any thing, so that he did but make peace between his father and the Colonel; and this he confidently promised to do.

For a long time, however, his father and his mother also were inexorable—they declared that such an unprovoked insult freed them from every promise; so it might, had Hubert been willing to consent to this; but he insisted on keeping his plighted faith, and talked so like a modern Bayard of the dishonor that would attend a failure on his part, that any one who had peeped into his heart at Naples, and while in the society of Beatrice, might have asked, "Is this the same Hubert who was perpetually haunting her, and following her with looks of love? or is it only his exact likeness?"

But he won the day—though his parents were never, after this, even cordial in their manner to the Templetons; and Laurette, who, with her mother, was in town during the beginning of the rupture, and had, in her indirect way, done all she could to widen the breach and strengthen their objections, now protested that she must accompany dear Mrs. Forrester to Seabrooke, and remain with her a short time, to cheer her up after this very painful misunderstanding.

"Pray spare her to me for a few weeks," said Mrs. Forrester to Lady Sinclair; "she will be every thing to me at this particular moment;" and her ladyship, who loudly and openly blamed her brother's conduct to the family, whose son was engaged to his daughter, easily consented to this proposal.

CHAPTER LIII.

"Ne sont-ce pas les femmes qui ruinent ou qui soutiennent les maisons, qui règlent tout le détail des choses domestiques?"—FÉNELON.

"How your needle flies through your work, and how beautifully that is done!" remarked Mrs. Stacey one day to Helen, as she sat watching her progress on some pretty article of dress for her baby.

"To work neatly was made part of our education," said she; "Mrs. Loftus, who for many years was kept out of her property, found from experience that this was a resource too commonly but improperly neglected. She therefore made the completion of a portion of useful needle-work one of our daily duties. How grateful I now am, for being skillful in this despised art, I can not tell. My husband's very small income would sadly suffer if I could not hem and sew, or even put on buttons," and she smiled.

Very early in the progress of their acquaintance, Mrs. Stacey had made the discovery of Helen's superiority, and, happily, she had made it herself. No injudicious friend had placed Helen in the disagreeable position of flugel-woman, so Mrs. Stacey, of her own free will, and because she felt a pleasure in doing it, had adopted Helen as her pattern. The homage she rendered was, therefore, the deeper from being self-imposed; while the influence of Mrs. West was, unconsciously to either of them, producing a good effect.

Mrs. Stacey's self-love was never wounded by advice being offered unasked for, by censure well meant, but useless, because it was unwise; but her voluntary admission of her own inferiority, when she compared herself to this kind friend, led to a knowledge of her own deficiencies, and to an earnest wish to supply them; and when self is thoroughly roused to useful exertion, it is astonishing how it clears away obstacles, how remorselessly it tears up weeds, roots out deep-seated prejudices, and cuts down the tough hedge of long-indulged habits. To be convinced of this assertion, nothing more was requisite than to watch Mrs. Stacey; while silently but resolutely engaged in this clearance she proved herself quite a little heroine.

She and Helen were often together to their mutual advantage—they generally met during their walks; and sometimes, when Miss Baby was quiet for the evening, Stacey would bring his wife to the cottage and read to them, and to that Rhadamanthus of critics, as he called Ashley, the results of his literary labors.

They were all more or less musical, and though Mrs. Stacey, during her troubles and illness, had lost her voice, she almost feared forever, as she and Helen were superior musicians, these evenings possessed a charm which was often remembered in after years; and it was during one of these meetings that Mrs. Stacey had remarked on Helen's industry and the beauty of her performance.

The next morning it was not fine enough for a walk; and Helen, knowing the "wee thing" would detain Mrs Stacey at home, sent a little note, in which she said that she should brave the weather with wrappers and strong shoes, and spend a few hours with the mamma.

Of course she was welcomed with real pleasure, and soon seated very comfortably in a large chair by the fire.

"Now do not faint at the sight of my thimble," said she, "or think that I introduce it à propos to a compliment."

"No; but it will very well introduce a question I have to ask," was the reply; "if it becomes you, Mrs. West, to do so many things, because you are not rich—how disgraceful it is for me not to imitate you; so I am determined, henceforth, to work as much as I can for us all. And I blush to think how many useful and beautiful things my baby owes to you, while I have been little better than an idle looker-on."

"Nay, nay," said Helen, glad to hear this, and much too honest to compliment away what she felt convinced was a good and most needful resolution; "you have been very busy nursing her, and seeing after your house, and very comfortable it always looks."

"Even that is due to your example—you, born an heiress to great wealth, connected on every side with nobility, have taught me, a penniless girl, brought up to earn her living, how to keep my house and use my needle."

"Now you are too serious and too severe, especially upon faults which have disappeared," replied Helen; "and you must read me something merry as a cure."

"I would much rather, if you will have the goodness to allow me the choice, fetch my work, and, spite of the seeming egotism, tell you of myself."

"Do; I shall like that better than any thing," returned Helen, with that ready and true sympathy which was so beautiful a feature in her character, and which made all who knew her so implicitly trust her.

"Oh, it is commonplace enough, and soon said," remarked Mrs. Stacey, with a sigh. "I lost both parents when I was very young. My mother I remember as a pretty woman, always fashionably dressed. As to my own appearance, it was the great topic with almost all whom I met. My mother, I say it with reverence, treated me more like a live doll than a rational and responsible being. I was perpetually being dressed and undressed, and she was perpetually busy, making or devising something elegant and becoming for me, which foolish friends were called upon to admire in my presence, till I began to confound myself with my frock or bonnet; and when these were praised, to receive the admiration as something personally meritorious—of course, I did not then reason in this way, but such was the effect.

"My nurse would say, 'Be good, and you shall wear your pink or blue sash;' and when I was naughty, I was punished by being made to put on a shabby frock.

"I was about eight when both my parents died, and then went to live with a relation. I must now begin my education—and hard work it was. It seems that I early showed a talent for music—this must be cultivated; for I had, literally, nothing from the wreck which extravagance and waste had caused, so I must be taught to earn my own living. My aunt could barely afford the sum necessary for my instruction; but she did manage it, and treated me with great kindness. You must remember that the dressed-out baby of eight was almost entirely ignorant. I could read, but very badly—to compensate, I sang a number of songs very charmingly. I could not write at all; but I had a remarkable taste in arranging colors—so think of the labor!

"At length I was admitted to the Academy of Music; my ear was good—my voice gave promise of being very fine—and when the drudgery of piano was nearly over, came the fatigue of singing and learning Italian.

"As soon as I could, I tried to relieve my kind aunt of some expense, by endeavoring to obtain pupils; this was extremely difficult—I knew no one whose influence could serve me, and those with whom I most associated were rivals, each seeking for the same thing.

"At length I did succeed, by the help of one of the professors—and then—oh! the weary fag of going from place to place, through all weathers—and for so trifling a remuneration.

"However, I had what many had not—a respectable home and a kind relative; for these, let me hope, I was truly grateful. But when I was about nineteen, this dear friend died, leaving me all she had, which was but little, as her income died with her. Still I was not destitute, for I had a small connection; I really was industrious—readily took what was offered, if it only paid, and tried hard to please my employers—this was easy, where my pupils were clever and amiable—but as they were not all of this description, of course then I failed.

"But, not to weary you, in the course of a few years I began to feel that, if health were granted me, I had taken a step in the right direction; when the mother of one of my pupils offered to introduce me to her friend Lady De Vere, who, this lady said, was a most excellent patroness where she took a liking.

"I need hardly tell you that my musical career had given me very little knowledge of society beyond those of my own profession, and the few who employed me; I was young and wholly unprotected, and had, therefore, been rather careful to limit my acquaintance to an unusually small circle. Still I had heard and read a good deal of patrons and patronesses; and the impression left on my mind was not favorable to the idea of being dependent for more than the recommendation my talents really merited; but not understanding very clearly the limits which separated the reward of merit from the puff of patronage, I called on my old master, who had been particularly kind to me, and stating the offer and my own difficulty, I asked his opinion.

"'How are you doing now?' he asked.

"'Well,' I replied.

"'Are you laying by?'

"'Very little indeed?'

"'No matter how little—it is in favor of my opinion; why not trust to your own endeavors? gradually, as you become known, you may raise your terms, you may give lessons at home. I know what Lady De Vere will propose—a concert at her house; this will interfere with your teaching, perhaps give offense to your old connections—and if, from nervousness or cold, or any of the thousand accidents voice and fingers are subject to, you should fail to produce a sensation—why, then there is an end of you at once.'

"'But if I succeed?'

"'You succeed—and so you do now. You may say, but the introduction to titled and noble pupils is a chance worth securing; do not let that influence you—in the long run, your present wealthy pupils will be the best for you. But think well of it before you decide. I see you are a little dazzled.'

"I was very much dazzled; and the more I thought of the offer, the more brilliant and fascinating did it appear. In short, you know, I accepted it. The concert was proposed, arranged, and came off. I did not clear five pounds, though, in order to secure a dazzling array of noble names, the tickets were very expensive; and had not Mr. Stacey come to the rescue, I should certainly have failed altogether—for I was faint with excitement, fatigue, and anxiety; but he kindly helped me—he joined me in an unexpected duet, and then sang a song of his own composition, written, as he said, expressly for the occasion; and at the conclusion, more dead than alive, I was led about by Lady De Vere, to be complimented, fêted, and forgotten!

"Not a single pupil did I gain by that first appearance in public; but the time needed for rehearsing, organizing, coaxing rivals to put aside rivalry, and be generous for a few hours, lost me several of my best engagements—for few of the parties where I taught were on her Ladyship's list, and were consequently affronted at my presumption, and kept aloof; and the high bribes I was obliged to offer the avaricious to help me, and the insolent to be civil, swallowed up, as I before said, all the profit.

"Then dear Charles married me; and, all at once, carried up by his genius and popularity, I found myself in such society as I had never, in my wildest dream of ambition, aspired to.

"We sang, we acted vaudeville and comedy, till the tragedy came in earnest; and had it not been for friends, whom God reward and bless for their goodness! I know not what would have become of us. May the terrible experience we then had, prevent us from being ever again misled by such senseless ambition!"

"If that be the result, and you are happy and contented in your present circumstances," said Helen, "you will have but little cause to sigh that the delusion has vanished."

"I never was happier," replied Mrs. Stacey; "my husband is gradually working himself free from those pecuniary difficulties which, ever since our marriage, have painfully pressed on him—he is becoming known and esteemed among men of intelligence and high literary attainments; believe me," she added, with deep feeling, "it is no small reward to have won the regard of two such characters as Mr. West and Mr. Vernon, while you, on your part, kindly permit me the privilege of calling you friend."

"I am sure," said Helen, "you greatly overrate this, and quite forget my share of the pleasure."

CHAPTER LIV.

"——— What crime to me unknown,
Steep'd me in ink? my parents', or my own?"
POPE.

"MR. TURNER wishes to be introduced to you, Stacey," said Reginald the same evening, "but you must waive ceremony, and accompany me to town some morning—when can you do so?"

"To-morrow, if this will not seem too eager to avail myself of his invitation."

"Not at all; promptness, in this case, is a compliment."

And the next day Stacey was made known to the old gentleman.

"A friend of mine," said Mr. Turner, "a celebrated scientific man, though rather an oddity—I say this merely to prepare you for some of his notions—has papers and letters relating and once belonging to a man who formerly made a little noise in the world. Mr. Moore thinks the time has arrived for giving selections of these to the public; but being, in some sense, no more fit for the task himself than I should be to command a fleet; and, happily, being as well aware of his deficiency, he has consulted me on the subject. Now, I should like you to meet him, for I think you would suit his purpose, and I also think his purpose would suit you. Though he is a man of rare talent, the fame which follows the profession of, what is termed, elegant literature, would be readily relinquished to you; and as to any arrangement that may be requisite, you may depend upon his liberality and honorable character."

"I wonder," remarked Stacey, slightly nettled, to think that he was permitted to scramble for the crumbs of notoriety and fame, merely because another scorned them—"I wonder, with this lofty disdain of light literature, he should condescend in any way to contribute to it."

"That," replied Mr. Turner, dryly, "is his concern, not ours—and, perhaps, I have not well expressed my meaning. In this case, he contributes the materials, which originally were not his—and the money to insure their being well arranged, which is. In this undertaking, which must lay bare the deformities and weaknesses of genius, his purpose is to make one, who, during his life, exercised an injurious influence, and who had no idea of honesty or morality, repair, if possible, after his death, the evil; and by pointing a moral, warn from the rocks on which he himself split. However, as I really have not time now to enter into particulars and discuss them with you, dine with me the day after to-morrow, and meet Mr. Moore; you will afterward be able to see each other, and make your final arrangements—here is my card, half-past six punctually."

Stacey, who had inwardly fumed and fretted at the business-like manner of Mr. Turner, who, during their interview, seemed wholly unconscious that he was addressing the man whose verses, just published, were at that very moment being talked of by young lords, and by ladies, both young and old, and which had brought the author something very substantial in the form of a check from his well-pleased publisher, hardly knew how at once to descend from his Parnassian stilts, and walk with the common-sense companion just made known to him.

The truth is, we blush as we write it, Mr. Turner knew nothing of these poems but what his kind sister had occasionally read to him, when he was tired and sleepy, after a day of hard intellectual wrestling with some pro tempo rival; and at those times, more in deference to her than from any particular impression they produced, he murmured now and then, "Very pretty, very good;" and associating the author with one for whom Mr. Vernon was interested, he thought Stacey might be exactly the man to help his friend with his project; and so, as he concluded with "here is my card," he did, perhaps, by turning to his papers, dismiss the votary of Apollo rather cavalierly. "Mr. Turner, Bedford Square," muttered Stacey, and looked so clearly as if he longed to ask where that was, that this shrewd reader of character, glancing sharply at him, and saying, "Yes, it is known to all respectable Londoners, you will be sure to find it—good-morning," was, before Stacey reached the door, deep in the mysteries of his brief.

"That is a queer old governor of yours," was Stacey's remark to Reginald; "you have no idea how small he contrived to make me feel; and I was so provoked, that remembering the anecdote of a royal duke—when he gave me his card, I longed to ask where Bedford Square was."

"I hope you did not," said Reginald, gravely.

"No, faith, he looked too grimly clever, something as you do now," was his laughing reply. "I saw a sly devil twinkling in the corner of his gray eye, which told me I should feel the sting of his answer."

"Then, for once, a demon spoke truly," said Reginald; "but do you think the task one likely to interest and suit you?"

"If it be as I suspect, it will be the very thing—it is true, I shall be but little more than the arranger of materials; but as precious stones tossed in a disordered heap seem neither attractive nor valuable till the eye of taste disposes them in forms fit for the arm and bosom of beauty, thus it may be with these shreds and patches; and it must be my care to arrange them so that the silver thread, which connects, may here and there peep out."

Arrived at Mr. Turner's comfortable house, and seated at his well-served and well-arranged table, Stacey had time to look around on the guests, most of whom were men whose names were well known to fame, and respected by that bestower of celebrity—the public. And as he glanced from one intelligent countenance to another, he acknowledged, that not even at the fashionable and recherché dinners of Basingstoke House, the rallying-place of wit and talent among the aristocracy, had he ever seen heads and faces that promised a more agreeable party.

As he recognized name after name, he knew them to be all men of learning, education, and energy; many, he recollected, must have toiled their way up to eminence by the most indefatigable industry. They had considered nothing degrading or disgraceful that was free from meanness and dishonor; and by reviewing, revising, reporting, and all those mental labors which cause men to rise early and late take rest, they had, steadily and surely, established for themselves both renown and station; and long before dinner was ended, Stacey found that second-hand repartee and well-turned platitudes would here attract no attention; that the best substitute for silver, though passing current for the real metal among fine ladylings and lordlings, fell here with a flat and lead-like noise, when contrasted with the ringing sound of the pure coin, and its elastic rebound.

"And so," said a titled dignitary, whose versatile powers and extraordinary attainments rendered him one of the most remarkable men of his time, addressing Mr. Moore, "it is whispered that you are at last going to give us a peep into the life and career of Hammond. I sincerely hope that Rumor has, on this occasion, blown through the trumpet of truth."

"I think she has—I have long been contemplating this work. So many years have elapsed since his death, and there are now no relatives whose feelings can be wounded by any disclosures, that I am much disposed to consider this a favorable moment."

"But as he was so intimately connected with the most celebrated of his cotemporaries, and in brisk correspondence with many, whose fame may be a little tarnished by a revelation of these private matters, may not their collaterals wince."

"Certainly not, if these memoirs are published according to my notion of what is due to the living, as well as to the dead I purpose it to be the 'Life of Hammond'—not to be swelled to endless volumes by introducing anecdotes of every wit and vaurien with whom he occasionally associated; so the vanity of their descendants need fear no wound, nor their egotism anticipate much gratification."

"But the letters?" suggested a young gentleman, who had, as he said, once perpetrated a tragedy.

"I shall most scrupulously insert all that are necessary to place the character in a true light—neither suppress, nor aught set down in malice; but I shall not repeat the dose ad nauseam. There is also much correspondence, which, alluding to the political and public events of the day, is in one sense historical, which must be carefully gone over; and here I mean to entreat your Lordship to assist me, as from the enormous mass of letters sent and received, few, comparatively, will be published."

"I am right glad to hear that," said Mr. Turner; "it is really time to stem the torrent of violated private correspondence, which threatens learning with a second deluge. Men now write an order to their tailors and bootmakers, with the dread of publication before their eyes, or the inquiry of 'What will Mrs. Grundy say?'—and while this rage for rummaging the post-bag fetters persons of sense and ability, and destroys all the ease and freedom of confidential correspondence, it operates as injuriously in another way on men and women too, whose little coterie, which to them represents the universe, be-puffs and be-praises them, till they no longer exchange invitations without writing, as Pope is said to have done, with one eye on the note, the other on publishers and posterity. And many an honest soul who went respectably through life, becomes after death, by the foolish toadying of a friend, the butt for a spiteful reviewer or waspish critic. And I am truly glad, my dear Lord, that you will help in this selection."

"I could hardly have been asked to do any thing I shall more completely revel in," replied his Lordship. "I accept Mr. Moore's challenge con amore—when will the pleasure commence?"

"We shall settle that with Mr. Stacey," was the answer. And Stacey, bold as a lion in the salons of many a duke and marchioness, perhaps never more painfully felt his own inferiority than at this moment.

"I congratulate you on having found such a Plutarch," said a guest, whom Stacey had often met at Basingstoke House; "the man who can send us such sparkling poetry from the Heath, and burn the midnight oil while he writes so acute an analysis of Doctor White's ethics, is the very one to do justice to poor Hammond. Good heavens! it compels us to serious thoughts when we revert to that brilliant but brief career, and know that the end was gloom, darkness, and misery."

"Yes," said Stacey, taking courage, and pleased to be thus recognized, "that will be the most difficult, the most painful part of the biographer's task; but we may hope he will do it gently, and so interest all the kind and better feelings of readers, that they shall remember the fate of him whose memoirs are before them, and 'be to his faults a little blind.'"

"And what says Mr. Moore to that tender handling?" asked Reginald.

"He says." replied the party addressed, his his strongly marked but benevolent face full of expression, "that thus he would have it, not only toward the erring sons of genius, of whom we say with a sigh, 'How art thou fallen, oh Lucifer! star of the morning'—but in all our daily and ordinary intercourse, one with another, Mercy always holding Justice by the hand—not one inch more will I seek to 'draw his frailties from their dread abode,' than I think necessary to prevent others from following his specious but fatal example. Edward Hammond had a splendid fortune, and his sickly child was supported by the charity of friends till death closed her brief existence. He had talents of the highest order, they were applied to the meanest purposes—he attained to extraordinary eminence—he became at last infamous, and was avoided as a drunken nuisance by those who helped to support him; and though he showed occasional glimpses of his lost glory, he was generally a mean, depeudent sot. But enough of this. And so they cut you up famously, did they?" turning to a very young man, who gayly replied—

"Infinitely worse than any surgical dissection at the Hôtel Dieu—but you see I have saved the pieces, and here I am, ready to undergo another operation."

"Bravo! bravo!" said Mr. Turner; "at any rate you will not die of a review."

"No, I shall print again, and 'shame the fools.'"

And then, after a more general conversation, they adjourned to the drawing-room, where they found Miss Turner with a party of ladies; for her brother did not choose his guests from talent or station of that coarse kind which mates with cooks and laundresses—worthy as these may be, when wielding the spit or broom. His sister was highly cultivated, and delighted in good society as well as himself, so he gave it to her in the wives and daughters of his own associates

Mrs. West and Mrs. Stacey were now among those who formed her party; and with some other ladies gave such music as is not often heard out of the concert-room, while Stacey, now completely in his element, charmed them with his impromptu and improvising till the small hours had rung out twice before they separated.

"What a delightful evening, and what glorious fellows those are!" he said to Reginald; "by Jove! I was a monstrous fool not to stick to the law when I had so good a hold of its robe—but I always fancied a lawyer with a pen behind his ear, a blue bag in his hand, and his fingers and wristbands stained with ink. And only think, on Saturday, Mr. Moore and I dine with that Colossus who does bestride the world of letters—is not that something to talk of?"

"I am sure," said Mrs. Stacey, "we never can sufficiently express our thanks to the friends who have done so much for us;" and the grateful little creature quietly wiped her eyes—but such tears do good.

CHAPTER LV.

"Vous éloigner!—croyez moi mon ami c'est un mauvais moyen—l'absence ne fait rien sur un amour véritable. Vous ne l'oublierez pas et vous serez plus malheureux."—VALÉRIE.

HUBERT remained a few days at the Priory, as Forest Hill was still in solitary state; and seeing Constance, which he now did for the first time, as an inmate of the same house, he was more in love with her than ever; and as he made no secret of this, there can be no treachery in telling it.

Constance, perhaps, less demonstrative, or from maidenly reserve more silent, did not echo him on this subject; so we must remain in doubt whether her love still kept pace with his.

Shortly after Hubert's departure, her mother proposed that she should avail herself of Doctor Vernon's escort to town, and visit her aunt, Lady Sinclair, who had repeatedly urged it; and for the first time, Constance consented to leave home alone.

"It will be only a fortnight's absence," she said; "and during that time it will be odd indeed if we do not drive to Hampstead Heath—is it not so, mamma?" A smile and a kiss were the reply.

At Lady Sinclair's she was, therefore, safely left; and found no difficulty in gaining her assent to drive in the desired direction. Her aunt had always blamed the Colonel for forcing Helen to this extreme. She observed, that it was bad enough for the match to be broken off with Mr. West—but that was inevitable; and Helen's submission, in this case, her Ladyship contended, ought to have secured her from any persecution arising from other offers.

A little note apprised Helen of the guests she might expect, and, punctual to the hour named, they arrived.

Constance, who had resolved to be so calm and collected, could scarcely repress a scream when she saw this beloved sister smiling in the little porch; and was astonished, as she looked up through her tears, to hear Helen's gentle voice murmur, "Dear Constance, dear sister, you are overcome—lean on me."

The contrast from what she had pictured to herself, in which she was to act the heroine, was so great, that she was roused to exertion, and smiling, in her turn she exclaimed,

"So, this is the result of my bravery and self-control!" and she looked lovingly at Helen, whom she kissed and fondled as if she had been a little child.

"How delightful this is," said Helen; "how kind, how very kind of aunt Laura to leave us together. Constance, how you have grown—and dear mamma, tell me all."

These, and a thousand questions and remarks, were poured forth by both, during their first moments of meeting; for those who love and have been long parted, seem scarcely to know how to make the most of their happy re-union.

But when this effervescence of the thoughts and feelings had subsided, Constance had time to look about her, to look at Helen; and to see everywhere, and especially in her loved face, tokens of comfort and contentment. She then understood how it was that her mother had brought away such a treasure of peace, collected during her hasty visit.

"And Gretchen, I scarcely saw her in my delight at having you once more in my arms;" and forthwith Madame Stöpsel was summoned, to be thanked and chatted with, and to feast her affectionate eyes on her two nurslings, seated, with beaming faces, side by side. "Has she not grown, Gretchen?" said Helen. "Stand up, Constance."

"Grown! du Himmel! she has grown the loveliest thing I ever saw."

"Oh! fye, Gretchen! I shall certainly be jealous."

"No need," was the cheerful retort; "Mr. Reginald will soon set that to rights, and supply my deficiency—but, sure Miss Constance will stay and sleep here, and see him."

"Ah! Constance, if you could but do that—if aunt Laura could send for you to-morrow."

"I never ventured to hope for such a pleasure, but now you have reminded me of it, we will try our united eloquence."

And when Lady Sinclair returned from her visit to the Westroughs, she was so assailed that it was impossible to refuse; and Constance, half-wild at this prolongation of her furlough, flew about the cottage, looking into the very kitchen, and astonishing the staid German servant with her volubility and fluency in her own language.

But here is Reginald, and oh! unexpected joy, Ashley—and while Constance rushed into the arms of her brother-in-law, and received his first kiss of welcome, Ashley happily had time to take breath—though his voice shook, and he was very pale, as he took her extended hands, and muttered over them some unheard inquiry.

Constance had not seen either of them for a long time—Reginald, not since he departed for his Scotch tour; nor Ashley, since he so abruptly left her at the Priory, during the absence of his family; and when the first tumult of feeling had calmed down, how difficult it was to keep up a connected conversation—for memory was busy with all of them—and loaded with the stores which had accumulated during this long separation, they were poured forth with a prodigality and abundance which made silence almost a pleasure. It was truly l'embarras des richesses.

Ashley was, perhaps, the one most conscious of this tendency to ponder rather than to converse; for he made the most vigorous, and at length successful, efforts to free himself from this dreamy influence, when his sudden eagerness to learn particular news of all who were at Seabrooke drew on him the playful indignation of Constance—who assured him that there was not one of his old friends who did not feel hurt at the indifference his self-banishment implied. She especially submitted whether, in her case, there was not a marked avoidance, since the only visit he had made was during her absence. Nor would her justly-excited wrath be appeased till he promised to take the first opportunity of disproving all her allegations. "And, mamma," she continued, "to whom you vowed fealty — oh! you faithless knight, to leave us all deserted."

"This is too bad of you, Constance," said Reginald, coming to the rescue of his friend, for Ashley was uncommonly tired and out of spirits; "why, he left an excellent deputy in Victor Morton, who seems to have been at the Priory perpetually, when he could escape from the Hermitage."

"Yes; a deputy something like his principal, especially latterly, who started for the Priory and always stopped at the Rectory."

"Now, I will punish your duplicity. There was the handsome Hubert Forrester—did he also stop at the Rectory?"

She colored crimson; but, happily, Helen remembered she wished to know about Minnie Dallas, of whom her mother had made mention as their frequent guest.

Ashley left early, and declined the invitation to breakfast the next morning on the plea of business; but he made Reginald understand, when they parted in the garden, that, as Constance was limited to time, Helen might prefer having her society more entirely to herself.

But he was in no hurry to return to town after he left the little party; he walked rapidly for more than an hour on the broad road at the top of the heath, severely examining himself, and unsparingly taking himself to task. Was this the result of his many months of self-denial? What! had he refused himself the pleasure of joining his own loved family circle—had he condemned himself to such severe and unremitting mental occupation as began almost to affect his health—and was this his recompense—this his success?

Was the first glance at that lovely face, the first sound of that musical voice, to show him that his struggles, his resolution, were all in vain? Was the enchantress to come, and with a touch of her hand cause his shield to melt away and his armor to become useless?

Ashley loved Constance—passionately, hopelessly loved her—loved her with the romantic tenderness of a poetic temperament—with the enduring intensity of a faithful, affectionate heart; he had loved her childish beauty and grace, her girlish tokens of intellectual superiority, her brave truthfulness of character; and as her early promise of rare excellence was fulfilled, so did his love steadily increase and deepen.

They had been parted by sad circumstances, and as Ashley became aware of his affection its folly and hopelessness, they had been kept asunder by his own stern determination to strive against a passion which her splendid prospects rendered absurd, and which her subsequent engagement to Hubert made desperate, and its indulgence little better than insanity.

Unexpectedly they now met; a year has more than realized all he foresaw—ah! much more than all; for though, with lover-like credulity, he had prophesied that time would mature and strengthen her mental powers, he had thought it impossible for her loveliness to grow more extraordinary. Yet there she had sat before him, her old, sweet, playful expression chased away by a look of such deep feeling; and now again the smile returns, to yield to the grave intelligence which looks out from her eyes, and gives dignity and additional beauty to every feature. And, as he gazed, "Constance, Constance, oh, how I love thee!" was the simple, earnest language of his rebellious but worshiping heart.

"But I will no longer submit to this; I will no longer deprive myself of intercourse with my own family. Why should I, since the object of this sacrifice is not gained? I will see them; I will see her, and no longer tremble in her presence when with her, nor dread it when away. Above all, I will see them together; and though it will be torture, I must, I will endure it. Yes, I will see them together; I will see her happiness, and—his also. I will try and find him worthy of this treasure: and if so, God give me strength to bear my part in silence, and with calmness! I will not delay, but go at once." And, as if he meditated walking there forthwith, he set off toward town at a pace which few could have overtaken without running.

Constance, the next morning, amused her brother and sister with her account of the ignominious exit of the intruders at Hurstwood—that of the boy, she said, Dawson had told her, when they sat together the night of Mrs. Templeton's absence: and they all laughed heartily at the sang-froid with which they fancied Cecilia had gone through this.

She also told them of her performance while keeping watch; but here Reginald interrupted her, and charged her very earnestly to be careful if she or her mother had reason to fear treachery he informed her that Cooper and his relatives were held in the utmost disrespect by the villagers generally, who were quite justified in entertaining this feeling; and that Mr. Morton strongly suspected Cooper of having some deep design in all the acts of mismanagement to which he advised her father; and, above all, he strongly recommended that, if Ruth's conduct seemed doubtful, she her mother, and Dawson should compare notes, and dismiss her summarily if all did not seem clear.

"You have no idea, Constance," was his concluding remark, "of the dreadful mischief which may arise should this girl be—as from your account I think very likely—in league with the Coopers."

To all this she promised to pay attention.

Though the Forresters were in town during the whole time that Constance remained with Lady Sinclair, and though Hubert was almost a daily and welcome guest at Sir Archibald's, the senior kept very much aloof, on the plea that Mrs. Forrester was not quite well enough to pay and receive visits.

Whether Constance noticed this is not known.

as neither by word nor manner did she give any indication of being either hurt or disappointed. Not so quiescent was her aunt.

"This is rather odd behavior of the Forresters," she remarked, to Laurette; "they have called here only once, have declined an invitation to dinner, and I never expressed the most distant wish that Constance should spend a few days with them; not that I wish it; she is a sweet girl, and, I hope, enjoys herself here more than she could with them, in their hum-drum way; only, I repeat, that it is very odd; especially as Mrs. Forrester has made such a point of your visit to Forest Hill when they return."

"Perhaps you would understand it all much better if you had been behind the scenes, as I have been, both at the Priory and at Forest Hill. Mamma, I am sure they do not like this match."

"Not like it!" exclaimed her mother, looking both angry and astonished; "and why not? where can they expect to find any thing better—at least for them? The Templetons, if not originally so rich, are quite as respectable as the Forresters; here is a splendid fortune, for I suppose Constance will have almost all the Seabrooke property; and to my mind," pursued her Ladyship, proudly drawing herself up, "she is one of the most beautiful and accomplished girls in England."

Laurette had a tart reply at hand, but she prudently saved it for another occasion and another hearer, so she said quietly:

"Mrs. Forrester never forgets Helen's marriage"—but she did not say she took very good care to prevent this obliviousness—"and in addition to former indifference, my uncle Lionel has grievously offended Mr. Forrester by this foolish election business."

"I grant that is an annoyance," replied Lady Sinclair; "only as he permits the engagement to continue, it would show the good politician to do so graciously." After a pause she asked, "Do you think Hubert is very much in love?"

"I believe he fancies that he is," was the reply, with a scornful laugh; for it was with a jealous pang she was forced to admit even this.

"I thought so," said her mother; "there is not enough depth of character in him for any thing strong or enthusiastic. I suspect that the last speaker is his oracle, and the last pretty face his idol."

Lady Sinclair's judgment here was correct; and though Laurette liked but little in a speech which reflected so severely on one who was her divinity, she could not deny that her mother was right. But this very weakness in her Apollo was to be her assurance and means of success; could she contrive to be often the last speaker, could hers become frequently the last fair face, she thought she might triumph; and hence the pertinacity with which she contrived to be so much domesticated in the same house.

She forgot that, to Hubert, hers never had been a fair face. Though the clever and the intellectual might see much to admire in her speaking black eyes, in her flexible features; and truly as they could appreciate her cultivated and richly-stored mind—this to Hubert was not beauty—he could not understand it, value it, or sympathize with it. His gay and thoughtless nature could not comprehend her cutting irony, her sharp and caustic wit—his superficial observation was rather startled than pleased at her piquant remarks, her satirical analysis, her merciless dissection of character, while her undoubted superiority of intellect frequently only wearied or oppressed him.

Had she been a very little prettier, and a great deal less talented, Laurette might have won him with ease, and would most likely have found that her faith in the power of propinquity was not misplaced. But as it was—well—she was still hopeful, still patient, in spite of the French sneer at the last quality, "la patience; c'est la vertu des ânes;" still it is something to admit that it is a virtue; and as a proof that Laurette possessed it, she resolved again to establish herself at Forest Hill, in defiance of what her mother, with more frankness than politeness, termed the humdrummery of the old people—an opinion in which Hubert seemed fully to concur, who, finding the society at home more dull than usual, and his father's feelings still ruffled by the recent behavior of the Colonel, availed himself freely of a general invitation to the Sinclairs, where, besides the attraction of Constance, there was always some amusement either going on or being devised.

Lady Sinclair, who was kindly desirous to vary what she knew was rather a monotonous life to Constance when at home, determined that this short visit should include as much pleasure to her as the season afforded; and as she and Sir Archibald readily collected round them society of the best kind, she fully succeeded in rendering this absence from home, which was prolonged to three weeks, one of the golden eras in her niece's existence.

Here, for the first time, she beheld Hubert among those who were distinguished as scholars and men of literature and science. Without deliberately contrasting him with these recognized leaders of intellect, she could not help remarking his inferiority—his want of information, talent, and taste; and without attempting to account for this, she decided that here he was not in his proper sphere; that the gay vision which at the Priory she daily expected with impatience, was not suited to a London conversazione; yes, that was the reason, the deficiency must be caused by place alone, for Hubert must be still the same; and so he was. He was gay, amiable, kind; ever ready for pleasure; fluent and amusing about trifles; skimming all that was elegant, and using it adroitly—but silent, wearied, bored when any mental labor was necessary.

Still, this might not have been so evident, or have made any permanent impression, had not Laurette given it importance by her invidious remarks. And though she almost hated herself for speaking in disparagement of one she passionately loved, she yet determined not to lose this opportunity of enlightening Constance.

"Mr. Fergus is, doubtless, a very clever man," she remarked to her one morning, "but I own he is quite beyond me; and really my head aches only to think of the load his has to carry."

"Oh!" said Constance, "I have scarcely ever been so deeply interested in any one's conversation and descriptions, and I quite long for to-morrow, when we are to go and see the beautiful and curious collection he has made. He has kindly promised me some engravings of the marbles he has brought home."

"Ah! yes, I perceived that he was wooing you through your love of beauty, and it was equally evident that he ranked Hubert and me among the dunces."

"Hubert has no taste for antiques," said Constance, rather vexed at this remark

"To say the truth," replied Laurette, "I think that last night he seemed to have very little taste for any thing but our projected gay party to Richmond. He appeared quite ready to excuse himself from joining us at Lord Latimer's to-day—though his Lordship has one of the finest private collections of pictures in the kingdom. I suppose, during his intimacy with the St. Angelo family, he had a surfeit of the fine arts."

Constance had often been on the point of naming this family to Hubert and asking about them—but some feeling she did not well understand had always prevented her—and now she felt particularly annoyed when Laurette proceeded to ask, "Did Hubert ever speak of them to you?" and she was obliged to reply, "No."

"Well, that is odd, so intimate as they were; however, as Hubert has his secrets, it is not wise for friends to pry and guess"—and she sauntered away to dress—leaving her words to be remembered or forgotten, as the case might be.

CHAPTER LVI.

"Were't not affection chains thy tender days
To the sweet glances of thy honor'd love,
I rather would entreat thy company,
To see the wonders of the world abroad."
SHAKSPEARE.

UNLIMITED powers had been given to Mr. Forrester's bailiff, with regard to feasting his tenantry and voters who liked to avail themselves of beef, pudding, and malt liquor; but Lady Dallas wore a disappointed look, for she, and all who had fully counted on it, were defrauded of the ball, without which no election, in the memory "of the oldest inhabitant," had ever terminated. Sir William was as ready as ever to indulge her in this harmless pleasure, but in the first place Mrs. Forrester was far too poorly either in mind or body to attend; and next, there was a little difficulty, until it was clear how this ill-advised opposition would affect the relative circumstances of the two rival families. "A plague on both your houses!" was her Ladyship's ejaculation whenever visions of dress and ball-room rose before her.

But Hubert's conduct quickly reassured and comforted her—the ball need only be postponed; and her imagination relieved from this pressure once more ran rather riot, and beheld a succession of gayeties and festivities looming, to borrow a popular phrase, in the distance. First, as she remarked to one of her friends, the election ball, that would be given directly Mr. Forrester could attend—next she hinted, the wedding parties at both Hill and Priory—then, with a knowing nod, the christening at Hurstwood, and, perhaps, a few strays and waifs which those resolved on amusement would be sure to pick up from all this gayety.

"Ada is wild to be introduced," she said one day to Laurette, when they had been talking over probabilities; "but Sir William thinks she is too young."

"And so she is," said Laurette, remorselessly destroying all hope of help from her opinion; "it is bad policy to bring girls out too early—I was nineteen before I was presented."

"I suppose you are right," sighed Lady Dallas, who longed to indulge her daughter; "so she must give up the idea—only I hope there is no harm in her occasionally joining a quiet little party."

"That depends on what the quiet little party is composed of," replied the referee; for she felt that Ada, though only a pretty girl, shy and timid, might be dangerous to such a flirt as Hubert, and tempt him from his allegiance to—— her cousin—not to mention any diminution it might make in her own chances.

"So says her papa; but next year she shall put away governess and pinafore, and see what life is, before she settles as an engaged young lady, or, perhaps, a wife."

"I wish you would ride over to Hargraves with me," said Hubert to his father, about a week after they had all arrived; "I want to see what they are doing there."

"Willingly," replied Mr. Forrester, who knew very well that they were doing nothing there, but who gladly seized this opportunity of having some conversation with his son regarding his own views and wishes—a conversation which something had made him shrink from attempting at home, as that same something very significantly warned him that Hubert would most likely start off at the opening.

"Your mother and myself have been lately talking of the situation in which we find ourselves placed with regard to the Priory, and, to be candid, we find it rather embarrassing."

"I am not surprised at that," replied Hubert, much to his father's amazement, adding, "to me, it is very annoying."

"That is precisely the term I should have used," rather hastily interrupted Mr. Forrester, "only I wished to avoid any thing that might needlessly hurt your feelings."

"Thank you, dear father, for being so considerate—and this encourages me to proceed—for, I assure you, I never go there now without, in my own mind, reverting to the foolish way in which the Colonel suffered himself to be so ill-advised, and wishing the awkwardness removed by my immediate marriage with Constance."

"Good heavens! Hubert, how I have misunderstood you. I was in hopes that, upon mature reflection, you fully entered into my feelings with regard to this deliberate insult, for such I consider it, and would so far sympathize with me and your mother as to see the propriety, indeed, the necessity, of withdrawing from your engagement there"

"Withdraw!" broke in Hubert, "what! when we are engaged, pledged, plighted to each other—and because of a paltry electioneering squabble! you surprise me, sir."

"Not half so much as you do me, to call an affront offered to us a petty squabble. I should have thought my son knew too well what is due to a Forrester of Forest Hill, to have spoken so lightly."

"But I must be pardoned for asking in my turn, what notions of honor a Forrester must have, who, for such a cause, would expect his son to break his promise, to forfeit his word, and that, too, to one he loves? I thought, sir, we had sufficiently discussed this during our interview, soon after my return; and I repeat now, as then, that nothing shall induce me to give up Constance. I love her every day more and more."

"I regret exceedingly," replied his father, overcome by Hubert's impetuosity, and yielding when the latter insisted so strongly, "that on an occasion such as this we should have any difference of opinion. You know that from the first it was with reluctance I consented to this match. I never did, I never can, like Colonel Templeton; toward Constance I can not possibly have any objection, though I may have wished your choice had fallen elsewhere—but I assure you, Hubert, that this recent proceeding of her father's has increased ten-fold every motive for dislike which your mother and I have ever entertained—and, in my opinion, fully justifies me in desiring that further intercourse with his family should cease—his conduct releases us from all engagement—but of course, if you insist on his daughter's being introduced to our family, we submit—but I feel bound to say she will not be cordially welcomed."

Beautiful Constance! has it then come to this? thou with thy wealth of loveliness, thou so richly dowered with intellect, with a loving heart, with thy true and noble nature! and so thou art not to be cordially welcomed!

Something of this, perhaps, Hubert felt—for he turned his handsome face, glowing with indignation and love, to his father; but happily recollecting that it was his father, he rode on in silence.

After this had continued some time, Mr. Forrester said, with rather a hesitating manner, "As this subject seems ever to herald something unpleasant and painful, let me say now, that if I forbear urging any further objections, it is on the express condition that you complete your stipulated term of absence—indeed, whether you do or not, I could not permit the marriage at once to take place, as Hargraves is almost in the same state as when you left I have, hitherto, clung to the hope that it would never be needed for this purpose."

"I then only leave on the understanding that Hargraves shall be immediately seen after, and that, from time to time, a statement of progress be forwarded to me; and this very day, as you and my mother persist in your singular avoidance of the Priory—which to Constance and her mother must be very unpleasant—I shall speak to Colonel and Mrs. Templeton, as well as explain to Constance pretty frankly how matters stand, of course not affronting her by a repetition of the whole of your conversation."

And in no very peaceable mood did the two, abandoning the useless examination of Hargraves, separate—Mr. Forrester to seek the sympathy of his wife, and Hubert riding to the Priory, when he explained to the Colonel the state of his future abode, and his father's wish that he should delay his marriage till he could conduct his bride home.

Colonel Templeton laughingly told him, "That delay as he might, he would still have time to repent when fairly tied;" and added, "You must not expect me to hurry the bricklayers and carpenters, for what we shall do without Constance I do not know;" and feeling secretly much relieved that "that confounded election blunder" had not produced a serious quarrel, he was more than usually gracious with Hubert and the rest of his family when they met at dinner.

Mrs. Templeton, hearing that Mr. Forrester still wished Hubert to see a little more of life, strongly seconded his intentions; but she recommended that he should not remain permanently in one place, but avail himself more of his excellent introductions than he had done during his previous absence. She remarked that he and Victor, when in Germany, some time ago, had done little more than pay a hasty homage to its attractions, and said he ought now to examine more at leisure the beauties of both nature and art; and she added, "that delay would have been her own proposition, even had it not emanated from his father."

Baffled in this quarter, he sought Constance, hoping that she would listen to his murmurs; but she said, how delightful it must be to see so much that was grand and lovely.

"But, Constance, we could see it so much better together—and besides, to tell you the truth, I do not think I care much for these things. Now there was Morton, when we were at Naples, why, he used to go about raving of the beauty of effects—he would drag me about to look at the sea, one day because it was quiet, and the next because it was rough. One night it was the stars that kept me from sleeping; another, the moon. I must wake early to see the sun rise, and go dinnerless to see him set; and then he went poking and prying about after associations and facts, imaginations and realities, till it was rather a bore."

"The more reason you should go and complete your education," she smilingly replied; "for I see it has been sadly neglected: besides, if you took me," she added, gravely, "you would find me quite as bad as Mr. Victor—indeed, I may as well say the truth, a great deal worse."

This, of course, he gayly denied being possible; but the result was, that go he must; for Mrs. Forrester had communicated part of her husband's report to Laurette, who advised firmness—at least as regarded Hubert's absence

CHAPTER LVII.

"So holy, and so perfect is my love,
And I'm such a poverty of grace,
That I shall think it a most plenteous crop
To glean the broken ears after the man
That the main harvest reaps." SHAKSPEARE.

"AND dear Helen has a little boy," said Con stance, as she sat holding her mother's hand "Mamma, are you not very grateful for this joyful news?"

"Very, very grateful indeed, my love," was Mrs. Templeton's energetic reply. "You shall have this letter from Mrs. Loftus, and read it to Caroline, while I tell our kind friends the good news; so prepare for a walk to the Rectory."

"Do you know, dear mamma," said Constance, as they joyfully pursued their way along the beautiful path which led from the ground toward the church. "that I have sometimes had a thought, which, after all, is perhaps hardly just; but I have thought the marked avoidance of all reference to Helen, which Mrs. Forrester shows, is rather unkind Hubert very often inquires, but Laurette sometimes annoys me also by her apparent indifference, so that I never volunteer any information to her; therefore she can not repeat much. I do not like this forgetfulness or pointed omission And then Lady Dallas is always so kind in her inquiries, that the difference strikes me as more remarkable Have you ever felt this?"

"I have, dear; and I have tried to prevent its having any influence on my manner or feelings. I advise you to do the same. Has Hubert fixed a time for leaving home?"

"I believe the end of this month; he goes at once to Naples."

"I thought he purposed remaining some time at Venice."

"He did; but Laurette says he has some particular friends at Naples;" and as Constance said this she was conscious of blushing deeply, for Laurette had not told her this only, but had kindly added, "If I were you, Constance, I should forbid this visit Strange rumors have made themselves heard about a certain Italian beauty, and Master Hubert's conduct when he was there before;" but though Constance felt vexed, it was more, she believed, at Laurette's manner than at her matter, for she had returned no answer to her insinuations.

"What a blessing it is to have such friends as the Vernons," said Mrs. Templeton, as they returned from the Rectory, where the thankfulness and congratulations had been so sincere; "language fails to express all they have been to me. And here is that noble, generous Ashley insisting on making my obligations hereditary. Such friends—such rare friends to me and my children! God reward them for it!"

"Ah, mamma!" said Constance, "I think Ashley almost the grandest of human beings."

"I think him quite," replied her mother, rather quickly. But, without noticing this interruption, Constance went on:

"You should have seen Caroline when I read that part of the letter in which Mrs. Loftus speaks of him—she made me read it twice: and she is so delighted that the baby is to be called Reginald Ashley; and the tears actually sprung to her eyes when she heard that almost the first words of our darling Helen, when she knew it was a boy, were, 'Let me see my little Reginald Ashley.'"

"It is so like the grateful, affectionate character of Helen," said her mother: "and so like Mrs. Loftus to notice and relate it."

"I have been making a little romance out of this," said Constance, after a few minutes' silence. "Suppose Ashley, now he sees more of Kate Loftus, should fall in love with her"

"Oh! you are not half romantic enough, child; you should fancy him falling in love with Mrs. Loftus, or even Gretchen; either is as likely as your plan;" and her tone was rather sharp as she said this.

"Oh, mamma!" and she laughed; but wholly insensible to the evident annoyance the subject gave Mrs. Templeton, she continued: "I have often wondered that Ashley does not marry—do not you?"

"No, my dear," was the short reply; and as if determined to banish the topic she said: "you will not be surprised that I wish to see Helen and her baby, my grandson, you know," and her look was now nearly bright; "therefore you will have to contrive for me as before—will you?"

"Oh! I shall be delighted to help you to secure this great pleasure—shall you go soon?"

"I shall wait patiently till Mrs. Loftus sends for me. Ah, Constance! it is not thus that the son of Reginald and Helen should be visited by his grandmother."

"True, dear mamma; but if they were in India—"

"Right, my child! always remind me of my blessings and privileges when I sigh because they are not greater or more numerous."

And again did Mrs. Templeton, availing herself of the Colonel's first absence, see Helen, and again she returned, without having excited any suspicion that she had been away

It was now carefully and calmly debated whether an attempt should be made to effect a reconciliation. Helen was extremely anxious that the birth of her boy should be the cause of so desirable a result; and on her account her husband yielded; for he had felt deeply wounded that Helen's entreaties, accompanied by her own avowal, that nothing but the extraordinary circumstances in which they were placed could palliate their disobedience, had received the most contemptuous neglect and silence.

Only to Ashley had Mrs. Templeton mentioned the insulting behavior of her husband when the marriage certificate and the joint letters arrived; and on hearing of this violent token of displeasure and rage, he counseled delay and further consideration. It was his intention, he said, to spend the next week at Seabrooke, and while there they would be able to deliberate and avail themselves of any circumstance that would seem favorable.

Yes, Ashley was going to Seabrooke; he had determined to see Constance and Hubert together; after that, they would be so associated in his memory that there would be no excuse for thinking of her without him; there would be no possibility of her image presenting itself unaccompanied by her accepted lover—her affianced husband; and thus guarded, Ashley trusted that time would aid his own honorable and strong determination to hide this love in his heart, so that none should suspect its existence; root it out, he believed, nay, he was sure, he never could. And then, if he felt certain that her happiness was secured, what mattered it? then "let the stricken hart go weep;" but in order to pass through this silent martyrdom he must see them both.

"Happy, well, and lovely! so that is Reginald's description of his wife. I should not wonder, mamma, if, after all, he fancies he has married perfection."

"Oh! he has not the least doubt of that," replied Mrs. Templeton, "and Helen's appearance so fully warranted his description, as to leave me no feeling but joy and gratitude; and till I looked at you, dear girl, I thought it impossible to see any thing more beautiful."

"Oh! mamma," said Constance, with a gratified blush, "and the baby?"

"Like all other fine babies, if we could be rational enough to believe it—that the parents should think it a prodigy is nothing extraordinary—but, I assure you, Mrs. Loftus never rested till she made me say it was the sweetest little thing I had ever seen."

"Ah! and you thought so, you rational, philosophical grandmamma, I know," said Constance, kissing her mother's still lovely face, and smoothing her silky, dark hair. "It seems so odd to be an aunt; but, mother," and her gay countenance was suddenly overcast, "about papa, was any thing said?"

"Much, and we have decided on leaving every thing till Ashley comes—which he will do next week."

"Then all will go well," said Constance, with a sigh of relief; "he will arrange it wisely and kindly—perhaps," she continued, thoughtfully, "this may do papa good—who knows?"

"Who knows, indeed, dear child," replied her mother; "Providence, though it does condescend sometimes to use human means, does not work by the aid of giants—its most striking punishments, as well as its most signal mercies, are generally effected by agencies that seem the least fitted to produce them; and to that Providence we must leave this, and all other events."

Ashley came as he had promised; and after the joy occasioned by his arrival had a little subsided, he was all impatience to walk to the Priory—for under his acquired calmness there lay an impetuosity which it sometimes required all his good sense to govern and subdue.

"Dear Ashley, give me time to bonnet and shawl," pleaded Caroline; "how eager you are to open your budget of news!"

"Yes, I am very impatient to tell what will give so much pleasure;" but he did not add, "and to have an interview over which will give so much pain."

And it was with a pang which made him feel sick and dizzy, that, on entering the drawing-room, he found himself in the presence of Hubert, as well as of Mrs. Templeton and her daughter. He was conscious of his want of self-possession; but as this was his first visit to the Priory since Helen's marriage, he trusted his embarrassed manner would be ascribed to his recollection of all that had subsequently happened.

How joyful, how almost fond, was his reception. Mrs. Templeton declared afterward she longed to embrace him; and Constance told Caroline it was a good thing for her character that Hubert was present, or she must, in her delight, have thrown herself into Ashley's arms.

And Caroline told him what they had said, and it is odd how soon he forgot this, and she had to repeat it to her father and mother, and finally again to himself, before he understood it as an excellent joke, at which they all, except himself, laughed right merrily.

After a long tête-à-tête with Mrs. Templeton, they joined the rest in the conservatory—the very conservatory which had helped to decide the fate of Lord Hurstwood and Cecilia; when Constance, who, with Caroline, was laughing at Hubert's attempts to arrange a nosegay, deliberately owned she must hand him over to her mother, to be taught the A B C of that important art, while she learned news much more valuable to her than all the art in the world.

"This is the very first time," she said, taking his arm, as he expressed it to himself, just as if nothing had happened, "that you have come among us since our great trial. Oh, Ashley! you can not think how dear mamma and I have missed you—how often we have needed your kind, wise advice."

"Have you?" he asked mechanically; fancying some remark was necessary—and shrinking from the tone, the look, the touch, which all spoke so clearly the confidence of friendship, nothing more—fool, madman, he thought, what more were you wild enough to dream of?

"Ah, you know we have; there is no one on whom we more rely—you are the adopted son of mamma—the dear brother to Helen and me—even Caroline consents to this claim, so you will hardly refuse."

"Refuse! and to you?" then checking himself, he continued calmly, Heaven knows with what an effort—"yes, let me be so to you and Helen—and now let us talk of her. Your mother and I have been considering the best way of introducing this little stranger to your father's knowledge, to his affection—and my father thinks it will be better, and more in accordance with the position he occupies here, if he undertakes to inform him, and at the same time endeavors to plead the cause of its parents. You know he may safely be trusted with this important mission."

"No one else half so well," replied she. "Doctor Vernon will be so gentle, there can be no danger of his irritating papa; and then he is so forbearing himself, that there is no fear of his temper giving way. Besides, it is his boundeu duty to try and make peace, and counsel forgiveness."

"Precisely so," said Ashley; "and for these reasons he consents to become mediator, and let us hope that the result may show that a blessing has attended his exertions."

"God grant it," she fervently ejaculated; "for though they are so happy with each other, and so contented with their condition, I am sure this state of things must be the perpetual bitter mixed with their sweets. Not," she continued, "that poor Helen knows the whole extent to which papa's anger led him," and she trembled and turned pale as she said, "nor would I, under any circumstances, ever have her know; and oh! if Doctor Vernon could only have this unsaid, it would be an unspeakable relief to mamma and me;" and then, for the first time, did Ashley collect, from her look and manner, that some dreadful malediction must have burst from her father's lips during the paroxysm of rage.

"And Reginald's law, how does that go on?" she asked, after making an effort to banish the recollection of that dreadful scene.

"Nothing can be better; I assure you he rivals me in the good graces of Mr. Turner—and were not Helen to sound my praise now and then, he would do the same with Miss Turner."

"Miss Turner!" repeated Constance; "is that his daughter, and is she beautiful?"

"No, to your first inquiry—she is his sister. Yes, to your last—for she is one of the kindest and most benevolent old ladies I ever knew."

"Ah! I understand what you mean by that indirect reply and that covert rebuke; but I am nearly cured of that folly, and I—even I—can now see beauty in mind, in feelings, in acts. I have learned to look through or beyond the material—and you will not now hear me say, with the literal meaning I then attached to the words, 'I can never love what is ugly'—though in another sense I may still feel it—for I never can love what is wicked, or even base and mean; but I have seen the most homely features beautified with the light of intellect, and the plain face suddenly ennobled and made lovely by its sympathy with what is truly great and heroic."

And as Ashley looked at the enthusiastic countenance that was raised to his, he thought if these feelings beautify the homely, and give dignity to the ignoble, what will mind and sentiment do to one already of surpassing loveliness? and he sighed.

"But you doubt my good report of myself?"

He shook his head—he feared to speak.

"And you—you will soon be called? will you not?"

"Yes, very soon."

"And then you will not study so hard, but you will come among us?"

"Yes—no—I do not know;" but feeling that he had endured enough for the first attempt, he said, "I fear that Caroline is waiting for me."

"Then she is in an unusual hurry. I have not asked half I intended—but you both dine here to-morrow—mamma said so."

"Yes, I promised Mrs. Templeton," for he resolved to go through his self-imposed ordeal.

And the following day he met Colonel Templeton, with whom he had always been a particular favorite. Ashley and Victor were continually cited by the Colonel as specimens of what he called, real out-and-out fellows—handsome, spirited lads who had a will of their own, therefore his welcome to him was both warm and sincere.

Ashley thought him much altered; he looked older by several years, though little more than one had passed since their last meeting—he was less naturally cheerful, though at times loud in his mirth—and it was with deep regret that he perceived how he indulged in wine—and that he did not accompany Hubert and himself when they joined the ladies.

Ashley had now the opportunity he sought; for without any attempt on his part to draw Hubert out, Caroline unconsciously furthered his views.

Associated as Hubert and Victor had been, for some time before the latter left for Cyprus, it was natural that she should refer to various events of which his letters had subsequently informed her, and this naturally, also, led to discussions on these subjects, and involved an expression of opinion from which the tastes and habits of the speaker were rendered apparent. Ashley, who had been in Italy, was also curious to learn about many changes in public feeling which had since then taken place; but Hubert, finding that all these inquiries supposed that he had been a close observer, and that he had a greater knowledge of the progress of society and the arts than he possessed, candidly referred them to Victor Morton, who, he said, gossiped with all sorts of people about all sorts of things. And then, thoroughly weary of the conversation, he asked Constance to sing one of the pretty serenades he had brought home.

"I see," said Caroline, opening the music, "that it is dedicated to Beatrice di St. Angelo; did you not meet that family when you were at Rome?" she asked of her brother.

"Yes," he replied; "I met them, or rather, I should say, the Duca very frequently—he married an English lady—his only child I never saw—but I have since heard she has grown into a celebrated beauty. The mother died of decline, and at one time there were fears of this girl's health being delicate. The Duca is a man greatly esteemed. But," suddenly addressing Hubert, "you, of course, have been introduced to him?"

"Yes," replied Hubert, flushing to the temples, "he has a place in Sicily;" then turning to Constance he said, rather abruptly, "If you dislike that song, try this," substituting another in place of the first.

Why should he suppose Constance disliked that particular song?—had she given any indication of so doing?—none. Had he any reason for thinking she might?—and did conscience wake and utter a whisper?

Both brother and sister, on their return to the Rectory, for some time kept silence; at length Caroline said, "I hope Constance has done wisely in choosing Hubert."

"What makes you have any doubt about it?" asked Ashley steadily.

"Merely a vague feeling that, agreeable and amiable as he is, he is not exactly the person I think suited to her. Circumstances have very remarkably developed her character, which always gave promise of great superiority; but I suspect that Hubert's mind has done growing, and will never be taller or stouter."

"Hubert," said her brother, "has hitherto only played with life, and therefore his character seems stunted—it is the penalty the Sybarite must always pay—happily, however, very few are allowed to make a pastime of the world, and when they begin in good earnest to struggle against its trials—to grapple with its realities—to find that they must conquer or die, then men show of what they are made; and if this be of the true stuff, then qualities and powers undreamed of answer to the call."

"But all are not of the true stuff—all are not great."

"No," he replied, "for if all were great, none would be so;" and amused at her puzzled look, he continued, with a smile, "never mind the paradox just now, 'I will explain it when I have time,' as Doctor Rochecliffe says. In the common acceptation of the term great, it is not necessary that all should be so, though there is a moral greatness which all may achieve, and then society would be much benefited. But with reference to our present question, what I mean is, that a life of ease, with no acknowledged duty of sufficient importance to rouse to exertion, never can produce a character above mediocrity; but Hubert may's till be placed in a position that will develop qualities for which we now scarcely give him credit. However, Caroline, I do not think he ever could be either a Reginald or a Victor Morton."

"Still less an Ashley," she replied, fondly, pressing his arm. Then, after a pause, she added, "You can not think how happy your just appreciation of Victor makes me. And only think of my ignorance of character, for I once used to dismiss both him and Hubert with the disrespectful remark, "Two thoughtless, do-nothing lads."

Calmly as Ashley, to all appearance, had discussed Hubert's character, it was not so that he felt. Too noble and generous to seek for faults, even in his rival, and to rejoice when he had found them, he sighed to think that further observation had only served to confirm his previous impressions. He felt sure that though Hubert did, must love Constance for her beauty, accomplishments, and amiability, he was quite unable to comprehend the real elevation of her mind, the refined taste, the exquisite sense of the beautiful in feeling and morals which were so eminently her characteristics. And Constance, would she ever discover this superiority? and would this want of sympathy be then keenly felt? But, after all, what was this to him? All this thought and speculation would not help him to banish Constance, and prevent her taking so prominent a position in all his dreams; and yet it had been his firm resolution to achieve this, "at least," he said, with a sigh, "my firm resolution to attempt it."

The same day that Ashley left, Doctor Vernon set forth on his errand of peace. He met the Colonel in the grounds, and though there was no friendship between men so dissimilar, the sacred character of the Doctor's duties, and his unaffected piety in their performance, obliged all to respect him; while his Christian sorrow for those who, like Colonel Templeton, cast away their happiness with their integrity, imparted a gentleness and kindness to his manner which was not altogether unfelt by the most hardened.

"I have come to crave a little of your time and indulgence," said the Doctor, meeting him on the terrace and proceeding toward the house, as there, he knew, the Colonel could not abruptly leave or dismiss him; "and I hope I have chosen an opportunity as favorable to success as this sweet health-inspiring morning is to gratitude and kind feelings."

"Ah! you must not expect to find that I resemble that placid sky or these gentle zephyrs," replied he, laughing.

"Oh! but I do expect it," rejoined the Rector, "for a grateful spirit is precisely the one we desire for him of whom we are about to ask favors, and you have many causes for gratitude."

"I am not at all sure of that," he answered; and wholly unconscious of Doctor Vernon's business, he having never alluded, even the most distantly, to family affairs, the Colonel led the way to the library, where he politely waited for him to begin.

"My office and calling often impose that upon me as a duty which in others would be impertinent and officious. I come to you fully expecting a blessing—blessed are the peace-makers."

"If you come with any idea, Doctor Vernon, that I shall consider even your office justifies interference in my domestic arrangements, dismiss it at once," interrupted the Colonel rising and speaking with much excitement.

"Nay, call it not interference," resumed the Doctor, mildly; "remember, you have assumed that. I do not admit the charge. You have known me long enough to be sure that nothing but the best motives could induce me to say what might, perchance, annoy. Believe me, Colonel Templeton, that if my mission succeed, though but in the smallest degree, you will very largely share in the blessing—why then cast it from you? —why close your heart so that peace and love knock in vain for admittance?—if you can not wholly forgive, remembering that you—that all —need forgiveness—do not cherish bitter feelings and unhallowed hate."

"Doctor," said he, resuming his seat, "as I am willing to believe that a sense of duty animates you, and that you have no intention to offend, you must give me equal credit for the absence of any thing like disrespect toward you when I assure you that your attempt is useless. By that girl's conduct I have been placed in circumstances most irritating and mortifying to one of my character; and I never will forgive her—she left this house, and while I live she shall never re-enter it. Do not interrupt me," seeing the Doctor prepared to speak. "In my just indignation I pronounced a malediction on her. This I withdraw; but any further concession I never will make so long as I live—I never wish to hear her name pronounced —I care not what becomes of her nor where she goes;" and then seeing the excellent Rector quite overpowered with emotion, he added, with rather less vehemence, "This unpleasant interview was wholly unsolicited on my part—and I beg you to believe that my pleasure does not prolong it."

"Colonel," said the Doctor, rising in imitation of his companion, "for the withdrawal of words so fearful, and which no offense from another can ever justify, I rejoice on your account. Curses injure not those against whom they are hurled beyond the sorrow they cause, when we see that one human being should be so vindictive against another; your child is under the protection of that Power who can not only shield her from evil wishes, but cause them to return whence they came. If the day should ever arrive, and I pray that it soon may, when you repent of having cast away the blessing I brought for you, send for me —it may, mercifully, even then not be too late to secure it;" and feeling that further remonstrance would only more deeply exasperate the man whose suppressed passion spoke in every tone, every movement, every look, he bowed and withdrew.

Oh! how did his slow step thrill through the heart of Mrs. Templeton and Constance, whose impatience and anxiety as to the result had been almost agony—and who read, in the sorrowful expression of his benevolent countenance, that their hopes had been fallacious, and that the father's heart was steeled against the child's petition for pardon.

"No hope, then, dear friend?" murmured Mrs. Templeton.

"None—like the angels, we must wait to see why this mercy is still withheld"

Constance burst into a paroxysm of tears—but she said not a word.

"The Colonel consents to withdraw his terrible denunciation—but even this was accompanied with words of such cruel indifference, that we have scarcely gained by their substitution; and as poor Helen was never informed of the extent to which passion led her father—she is as she was."

"Did you tell him of the birth of her boy?"

"No—I would not risk the repetition of words evincing such cruel apathy—and shrunk from associating an innocent babe with an interview so very painful. Again I say to you and dear Constance, wait—the purpose is wise, though we discern it not."

"Oh! mamma, mamma," sobbed Constance, while her mother pressed her to her heart—"this is dreadful, dreadful!"

"My child it is—even I have not learned to bear it without a murmur."

CHAPTER LVIII.

"Men's evil manners live in brass."—SHAKSPEARE.

WHEN Stacey, according to appointment, called upon Mr. Moore, he found the old gentleman seated in his handsome and comfortable library, the table literally covered with books and papers—the latter, some tied up, others looking yellow and worn—were open, and seemed as if they had lately been perused.

Mr. Moore's intelligent countenance had an expression of deep and serious thought as he rose and kindly greeted Stacey.

"You find me here," he said, pointing to the opened letters, "seated like Marius amid ruins—the ruins of the Creator's best and noblest endowment—that of intellect; and it has saddened me to trace the decline, decay, and total downfall of one who had the fatal gift of genius."

Stacey was no less touched by the tone of earnest regret with which this was uttered, than stung by some remembrance that whispered "take warning!' but shaking off a mood by no means habitual to him, he remarked that it was painful to be forced to admit that the term "fatal" was here only too justly applied, but that, happily, such was not always the case.

"It is, indeed, but too properly used here, and in numberless other instances," replied Mr. Moore; "but, as you say, happily, it is not inseparably connected with genius any more than with beauty, the misuse alone renders it appropriate; and this is precisely one of the mistakes or fancies which I would gladly attempt to destroy. Instead of imprudence, extravagance, and, in some instances, vice, being thought the necessary and inevitable accompaniments of genius—nay, sometimes welcomed as sure indications of its existence—I should like to show that they are its disgrace, its annoy, its impediments, its certain destruction. Good God! are we to believe that the power which renders man's efforts imperishable is clogged with a condition so ruinous and hateful? Are men of the highest intellect, of the richest imagination, of the most elegant fancy, to pay for this distinction by being blind to moral elevation, and incapable of valuing the dignity of truth, honesty, and laborious independence? It is monstrous to suppose it!"

"Right!" cried Stacey, carried away by Mr. Moore's warmth; "we must no longer allow them to quote the hackneyed 'Video melior—' and so on, as an excuse for their inconsistency; and though it will never be as easy to do, as to know what were good to do, it will, indeed, be a grand victory to sweep away this cobweb which entangles the judgment and obscures the moral perceptions of so many."

"Yes; and to return to your quotation—'though I can easier teach twenty what were good to be done, than be one of the twenty to follow my own teaching,' let these master spirits henceforth no more neutralize the good effects of their lessons by the bad effects of their example."

"But how often does it fortunately happen that this evil example has little or no influence, from the ignorance which so commonly prevails, as to all that personally relates to authors," remarked Stacey.

"I grant that, but only in part; the author, let him be as personally unknown as you please, knows and feels the effects himself; and so, unhappily, do all who are connected with him; and this alone ought to be motive sufficient to make us expose this fallacy; but when he is not unknown, but courted, sought after, imitated, then no one can be insensible to the danger of his example. Besides, unknown as he may be during his life, in this biographical and autobiographical age, he is lucky who escapes being disinterred and dragged before the public, either through his own vanity, the folly of friends, or the cupidity of a publisher; only think what encouragement folly and extravagance then receive. They take refuge under one name of literary celebrity, and indulge in habits of destructive intoxication; under another, meanly take from honest industry to support their pampered and luxurious habits; under a third, for conduct still more disreputable; and so, under cover of one name of note or another, they play off pranks at 'which the angels weep,' but which they and the foolish public call vagaries of intellect, eccentricities of genius, as if intellect and genius did not pay the penalty of folly and crime. But you will think me a hot-headed old fellow, perhaps a soured one; only take these packets home, read them carefully, and before you judge me unfavorably, remember that, if I speak warmly, it is because I feel warmly and kindly toward these children of genius, who, in so many cases, never cease to be children. Ah! why should reason and poetry be antagonists?—why should common sense and talent so often pursue different paths? And now, adieu!—will you dine with me tête-á-tête this day week, and prove to me that I have not scared you?"

Pleased, interested, touched, and roused, Stacey pursued his way home; and finding, when he reached the Heath, that he had still food for meditation, he walked and sauntered about for a full hour, thinking over all he had heard; and so deeply were both judgment and imagination at work, that before he entered his own house he had collected from memory, and occasional glimpses at the papers he carried, materials for his introductory chapters — for the individual whose memoirs he had undertaken to write was one whose name, for good and evil, had, during his life, and long after his death, attracted public attention, and was even now often quoted as a proof that talent without principle is a curse.

CHAPTER LIX.

"O' my word, the father's son—I'll swear 'tis a very pretty boy."—Coriolanus.

MERRILY and cheerily rang out the bells at Hurstwood, and told in their musical tones and laughing voices that an heir is born to the Lord and Lady there. Busy figures flit about, and important faces are met here, there, and everywhere, announcing that no common every-day occurrence has taken place—smiling looks and happy voices report that my lady is doing as well as can be expected, and that the baby is the finest that ever was seen—"the very model of my noble master," said the dignified nurse; and Lady Grantham goes about with a more stately step than usual, oppressed, perhaps, with the weight of her newly-blown honor in being grandmother to a Lord.

"It's a very grand thing to be mother in-law
To a very magnificent three-tailed Bashaw."

But Lord Hurstwood!—never was a man more elated—his wife was safe, and to do him justice, that was his first thought—the child, oh! climax of joy, the child is a boy!

Already he began to doubt whether he had done quite wisely in having so decidedly retired from public life—he had certainly been rash and premature; at his age, it was rather absurd to suppose that his country could not benefit by his wisdom and experience—and he comforted himself with the reflection, that statesmen, like other celebrated performers, may have more than one positively last appearance.

He commanded the steward to have the usual rejoicings and festivities arranged on a larger scale than ever; so that directly her Ladyship could appear to receive congratulations, every mark of respect should be ready prepared—and he presented Lady Grantham with a splendid copy of Cecilia's portrait, which had lately been added to the family picture gallery.

And when he was admitted to see his lady and their firstborn, his expressions of joy and gratitude were so reiterated and sincere, as to make her threaten him with banishment if he did not moderate his transports—though she privately told Lady Grantham that that would be punishing herself, as it really gratified her to perceive how much this event had added to his happiness as well as to her own.

Mrs. Templeton and Constance were among the first to offer their congratulations; and it will not, it is hoped, detract from the character of the former, if we record that while she most sincerely rejoiced with her sister-in-law, the remembrance of her own little grandson came across her mind and made her sigh.

It was impossible to check the train of thought which was busy in drawing contrasts between two very similar events. Here the young mother was not only surrounded by every comfort and luxury that great wealth could procure, but she was cheered and sustained by the presence of her mother, and receiving openly the felicitations of her nearest and dearest relatives.

There, far from her care and watching, was her beautiful Helen; not, it is true, needing one comfort—these she could readily have—but in a small and humble abode, attended by strangers, an alien to her kindred, her father's blessing refused to her innocent babe, and her mother's caress prohibited.

But, thanks to her disciplined mind, here Mrs. Templeton stopped. What signified all these contrasts when such rich blessings had still been bestowed on her? She had the love of her noble, true-hearted husband; she had her mother's prayers and blessings, though denied the comfort of her presence; and above all, as with the noble Lady of Hurstwood, Providence had sent health to her and her child; and with a chastened mind and self-rebuked spirit she lifted up her heart in thankfulness.

"Mamma, I fancy I know what you have been thinking of," said Constance, remarking the silence and thoughtful look of her mother—"you were comparing Helen and Cecilia."

"I was going, dear Constance, to plead guilty; but at the very moment you spoke I was calling myself strictly to account for indulging ungrateful and discontented thoughts, and I hope I have succeeded in bidding them hence."

The little Lord Stanley, the son and heir, par excellence, was about six weeks old; and calls and congratulations were nearly over, when one day Lady Hurstwood was in her own private sitting-room, into which she often had a beautiful little cot introduced, with its still more beautiful inmate. Such was the case now, and seated by it she was fondly contemplating her sleeping boy, when a gentle tap and the gently opening door announced his lordship.

Happy man! he may easily be pardoned if he stopped for a few seconds to gaze with delight on the scene.

His handsome wife, dressed in a costly and most becoming negligée, was bending over the cot, holding back one of the lace-trimmed curtains, so that she might have a full view of that living and breathing picture which is the loveliest and best a mother's eye can rest on. Her face, always attractive when lighted by one of her sweet smiles, was eminently so now; for mixed with her look of love and pride there was an expression of deep thought which harmonized most touchingly with her occupation and attitude. It seemed as if she were trying to gaze into futurity, and see there what was to be the destiny of that innocent slumberer; as if she were endeavoring to raise the curtain which hid the history of his life from her eyes, and to learn from it all that the feeble, helpless little being, so unconscious at present, was to do and suffer hereafter; and she gently sighed as, dropping the muslin, she turned to greet her husband.

"How beautiful he looks, Frederic," she said.

"Very beautiful, indeed," he replied, always much pleased when his wife addressed him by his Christian name, which she occasionally did in private. To his ears this was especially agreeable—it sounded affectionate—it sounded youthful also—it awoke dormant feelings which were a little romantic—it united the happiness of the present with pleasant recollections of the past, and hopes of pleasure for the future; above all, to him it whispered an assurance of his wife's love, and this he had learned to value.

"We must think, my love, of giving some earthly name to that dreaming Cupid, and if you are at leisure I should like to consult you about it."

"My opinion is soon given," she said, softly touching the dimpled little hand that lay on the satin coverlet; "no name will be so pleasant to me as his father's."

"My dear Cecilia, you will positively spoil me; but to be candid, I intended to have proposed it, with the addition of Cecil, which will be a compliment to Lord Grantham that I shall be truly delighted to offer."

"Very kind, indeed," she replied; "but when are you not? I was thinking, just as you entered, of many things; some strangely at variance with what our sleeping infant seems likely to have suggested; and yet he was the most prominent figure among all the various groups. But with other things, my dear lord, I was framing a little request I have to make."

"You have but to speak; it is granted if in my power."

"That power I am not quite sure of; but as I know you have influence with the present government, I want it exerted for one whom I am certain you would esteem if you knew him."

"May I venture to guess?" he asked, with a smile. "It is Mr. Reginald West whom you mean."

"The same—how kindly and readily you read my thoughts. You are already partly acquainted with his unfortunate history; and though I find from Mr. Ashley Vernon that he has talents of the highest order, with industry and perseverance to render them useful, it may be years before his profession can make him independent, especially as, like you," she added, laughing, "he is burdened with a wife and son."

"I have more than once thought of this gentleman, dear Cecilia; but I felt delicate about mentioning him, as being your connection. Your usual good sense and candor now set me at liberty, and, in imitation of your conduct, I may say I actually have a commission from official quarters to name a gentleman, such as I believe Mr. West to be, for employment in a foreign court; which employment may continue for two years—scarcely less; but if performed in a satisfactory manner, it will be certain to lead to higher duties and preferment. Now I thought you would like this to be a little offering from us both, on this joyful occasion, to your cousin—what says my lady?"

But my lady was rather overcome for a brief space; indeed, she wiped her eyes before she could say, "Nothing can be better—more graceful—more thoughtful; and if I might suggest the best way of opening the business, it will be through Mr. Ashley Vernon, with whom you are already acquainted."

Ah! Reginald and Helen, is Preferment coming with a thundering rap-a-tap-tap at your humble door? and have you no presentiment that the great personage is so near?

CHAPTER LX.

"A momentary grace of mortal men,
Which we more hunt for than the grace of God!"
Richard III.

"I AM not quite comfortable about Stacey," remarked Reginald to his friend, some time after the birth of his son; "his little wife looks anxious, and he talks of changing the atmosphere, and running away for a short time with that good-natured but silly Lord Chalton."

"In that case I have no doubt that the atmosphere will, indeed, be quite changed; but I do doubt whether it will be more healthy for him. However, he has really worked on so steadily for some months, that I am not surprised he desires a little respite. His mercurial nature and thoughtless habits require a holiday now and then to make him work cheerfully when he returns to school; and I must own, the rapidity and success with which he produced that first volume of memoirs fairly took me by surprise."

"Well, if you are satisfied, I have no reason to croak and be dismal."

It would have been well had Mrs. Stacey been satisfied also; but such was not the case.

Since the remarkable success of part of the work, for the appearance of which public curiosity had been raised by all the machinery that publishers so well know how to put in operation, and which from its own real merit, both as regarded manner and matter, had produced quite a sensation in the reading world, Stacey's mind and pen had flagged. Like a racer that distances all others till near the goal, and then drops dead lame, so it was with him; instead of following up this success, and securing for himself a high and permanent place in the temple of Fame, he acted as if that were certain, or already attained—in truth, he seemed to have made an effort he had not strength to continue; and Ashley was partly correct when he said Stacey wanted a holiday.

We all want a holiday now and then—a kind of change; Nature herself requires it—she works hard, she lays in her stores, she prepares her vast laboratories, and silently continues her labors without giving much sign of even the faintest exertion. Spring comes, and she then evinces her taste and skill in making evident preparations for the beautiful and gorgeous attire in which she pranks herself, and takes her holiday amid flowers and fresh perfumes during the glorious summer.

And so, we repeat, we all want a holiday. But there is a great difference in the way of spending it. Some make it a season of over-feeding—too much plum pudding—too many mince-pies; then, after sundry natural punishments, comes the crowning penalty in the doctor, with his draughts and powders. By some it is spent in over-pleasuring—and though a different process is gone through, still there is the same result—a penalty of some kind to be paid.

A few enjoy it rationally.

But Stacey was not one of the rational animals—so he flew off with his rattle-brained friend, and soon found himself more than ever the observed of all observers—the petted—the fêted. Nothing could be done without him and his direction—so that, if he had thought, he might have asked, "Have all these people been in an enchanted sleep since I last met them? and am I the prince who alone can wake them? How have they done without me during this long interval?"

But it was enough for him that they offered incense; he asked not how long it was since they had burned it to the cap and bells, nor how soon they would do so again. He was once more on the pedestal—what mattered it that some creeping thing had squatted there before him, or that some bird of prey would alight on it after.

"This is a poor substitute for the second volume, which so many are looking for," remarked Reginald to his wife and Ashley, as he opened a splendidly bound and illustrated book of poems, by Charles Stacey.

"I can not tell you how greatly I am disappointed," replied Ashley; "not exactly in this, which is a fair average specimen of modern poetry, but I am sorry that a man who possesses the talents Stacey really has—the memoir evinces that—should allow them to be wasted in the trifling, shallow society into which he has so eagerly thrown himself."

"But they are not entirely wasted," observed Helen, apologetically; "witness this gay little volume."

"Which proves nothing for your argument, Helen," answered Ashley; "the best of these poems, as you may see by the dates and allusions, were written while living here—and even without those indications I would undertake to point out all that have been inspired—inspired, indeed! it is to profane the word—composed, under the influence of > 'The music, and the banquet, and the wine,

> The garland, the rose odors and the flowers,
> The sparkling eyes, and flashing ornaments,' of the world of fashion. It was not at Almack's that the true poet learned to 'give to airy nothing a local habitation and a name.'"

"You would insinuate, then, that these smell of the lamp?" asked Reginald, laughing at the other's warmth.

"In one sense, certainly. Ah! how inferior is all this finery, contributed by jewelers, upholsterers, and mercers, to that gentle but majestic beauty which is imparted by holding converse with Nature. How fresh are all the similes borrowed from her ever-varying aspect—how true and life-like all the images drawn from her boundless stores!"

"Oh! Ashley," pleaded Helen, "do you then forbid us ever to borrow from art?"

"Do not urge him just now," said Reginald, "or I foresee he will answer rashly—we shall have him denouncing art itself, and branding poor Stacey as one of the multitude, who 'indite much metre with much pains.'"

"And little or no meaning?" asked she.

"Not quite so bad as that," said Ashley, calming down; "though I am bold enough to assert, that the more we copy from copies, the less shall we find of the real spirit of poesie."

"Still," persisted Helen, willing to say what she could, in extenuation of Stacey, whose many amiable qualities made her lenient to his follies, though not blind to them; "still, you see, these poems, artificial as many confessedly are, sell well. Mr. Stacey writes for his patrons, and they buy what he writes.

"Yes, and he dedicates his rhymes to a woman who is quite unable to comprehend true poetry—who made use of himself and his wife while it suited her—and forgot them in their distress, when the remembrance did not suit her. She now again coolly invites him, because he is the literary pet of the day, and still leaves his wife unnoticed, as if she were not in existence. It is such people who, under the name of patronage, are the vampires of intellect and true genius. Happily, a man of real talent does not need a patron now—he has only to write or paint up to the mark, and society at large are his patrons; and, reversing the old order of phraseology, are his grateful patrons too."

"Ah! Ashley, you are not consistent—why, your old idols would never have lived till now had not their inspirations been fostered by the warmth of patronage, ay, and royal patronage too. Speak up, old Chaucer," continued Helen, "and say how your patron and friend aided and encouraged you. Faerie Queene, bring your own true poet, and bid him tell us of his brother bard and kindred spirit, the gallant Sidney. Why, if I were to summon them all, with their queenly and noble patrons, 'and they did come when I did call for them,' not this little room only, but not this large heath, would hold them."

"Well done, Helen" said Reginald; "you are fit to be Solicitor-General to defunct poets and their encouragers. Mind you ask for the appointment."

"She has spoken well," returned Ashley; "but she forgets that when John of Gaunt so nobly favored Chaucer, very few, but those in the learned professions, could do more than read the scanty range of religious books then in MS. —that the great mass knew absolutely nothing but what they heard read—that even in the reign of Elizabeth, learning was only beginning to be diffused—and that directly patronage emanated from the mere courtiers, as in the time of Charles the Second, never was our literature so near total destruction—elegance and grossness went side by side—the most noble sentiments were contaminated by union with the foulest ideas; so that, purified as it is, much of the treasure bequeathed by the fancy and imagination of that age is as useless to the general reader as if the benefit of a rich legacy were negatived by the condition that we should inhabit a pest-house, and there alone enjoy it."

"I entirely agree with you," said Reginald;

"and then, only think of the miserable fawning, the fulsome panegyric, which the man with brains so often paid to the man without."

"Ah! it rejoices me to think that we have at last made a step in the right direction," said Ashley," his fine face glowing with enthusiasm; "the man of letters has at last said he will also be the man of independence, and live respectably and honestly by his labor."

"What a fellow you are, Ashley!" exclaimed Reginald, who had been looking at him with friendly delight—"I wish Constance had been here to have caught your look, and transferred it to her collection of celebrated character portraits, about which she talked with such animation when in town."

Silenced, at least on this subject, Ashley walked toward the window, and in a tone completely subdued, turning soon after to Helen, he said—"When am I to have that portrait of you and my godson, which Mrs. C—— promised to send home last week?"

"Oh! it is done, all but the hands," she said, laughing; "and they are to have a sitting by themselves."

"And I promise you that Constance will give you no peace till she has a copy of this your modern Madonna—she was crazy about it, after having seen it when only half done," remarked the mal-a-propos Reginald; and again Ashley's eloquence forsook him—when, happily, Mrs. Stacey was announced. She apologized for seeming, as she said, to haunt Mrs. West, but the temptation was very strong; and the latter assured her that if the visits of ghosts were always as agreeable as hers, no one need dread them.

"And where is Mr. Stacey?" asked Helen of his wife when she came alone one evening, about a week afterward to see her; "though I shall not regret his absence, if it be the cause of securing me the pleasure of your company, as Mr. West dines to-day with Mr. Turner."

"That is quite an unusual event for him to leave you," remarked Mrs. Stacey.

"Our visiting list, to talk fashionably," said Helen, laughing, "is so limited, that he rarely has an opportunity; and then, you know, we are not rich, so that want of money and want of leisure are sufficient reasons for our quiet life."

"To tell you the truth," said the visitor, "I am a wee bit, only a wee bit, out of temper; and what will you say when I tell you that it is partly with Charles?"

"If it is only part of a wee bit," replied Helen, "I suspect this infinitesimal dose will not be very difficult to swallow; especially as I conclude the other, and larger part, falls on yourself for indulging in such undutiful conduct."

"You are not a true guesser, Mrs. West," said her friend, usually very easily mollified; "I am vexed and much hurt at Lady De Vere's conduct—she has invited my husband to Roehampton till the day after to-morrow, and never sends the slightest message to me to prove that I am not quite forgotten."

"Perhaps that shows that she is at least truthful, if not kind, or even courteous. But, my dear Mrs. Stacey, I thought long ago you had taken the measure of her Ladyship's regard, and put a just estimate on it. Suppose she had invited you, could you, or would you, have gone?"

"Probably not—certainly it would have been very inconvenient; still it is not pleasant to be thus ignored, and on that account I think Charles should not have accepted when I was not invited."

Suspecting that her little friend was much more hurt at her husband's going than at her Ladyship's bad memory or rudeness, Helen saw that she must act the peace-maker.

"I think," she said, "that when a man occupies a place in public attention, which it is important that he should retain, his wife, viewing him in some sort as a 'servant to posterity,' should be contented to share his society with that public—in return for which sacrifice she has the pleasure of sympathizing with his celebrity. I can scarcely imagine any thing more embarrassing than for a man devoted to literature and the arts, to feel it a personal slight if his wife be not invited wherever he is."

"But do you not think this exclusion seems as if the wife were not considered fit society for those who receive the husband?"

"I think the wife will do well not to encourage such Mimosa-like feelings, or she will pass through life perpetually suffering. An artist is frequently asked to visit for several days, in families where he is engaged to paint; but it is surely no affront not to include his wife."

"That is true," said Mrs. Stacey, though with rather an unconvinced face; "but here I have been a visitor."

"Now, dear Mrs. Stacey," answered Helen, and she felt that she must be that disagreeable person, the teller of unpalatable truths, "have you not often said, that the terms on which you were both received at that house were like those of persons hired to amuse, without the substantial equivalent of being paid?"

"You are right, Mrs. West; and I blush when I remember my folly in believing that I was considered any thing else. Still, I wish my husband shared my feeling—and this on many accounts—as I know that those who now tempt him into their charmed circle, do so because he amuses them, or because they like to show him off as the lion of the day."

Helen so entirely agreed with her, that, while careful not to own it, she mentioned this conversation to her husband; and both expressed a hope that when Stacey had once more found that all is not gold that glitters, or when he had tired of his friends, or vice-versa, they of him, that he would resume his industrious habits, without which his old difficulties, and from which he was not even now quite free, would again close round him and become fetters to both mind and body.

It was, however, some time before he returned to what he now termed the drudgery of life; while Mrs. Stacey with dismay discovered that during this effervescence of a few weeks, more money had been spent than would have maintained their frugal housekeeping for double the number of months.

As regarded wisdom, Mrs. Stacy was never likely to rival the Queen of Sheba; but she had a remarkably large share of that vulgar, though not common plant, honesty; and this throve all the more vigorously from being cultivated by gratitude and affection. She loved her husband, and was very proud of him—but her gratitude to the friends who had come, like ministering angels, between them and misery, amounted to enthusiasm, and she determined that no effort on her part should be omitted to prove this, and to secure the intimacy and friendship which to her were as precious as light and air.

To Helen her society had been extremely useful since the birth of her little boy; and when she, on one occasion, expressed this strongly, Mrs. Stacey, disclaiming all thanks said,

"If I shall not weary you, I should be glad to consult you about a plan I have been revolving in my mind;" and receiving an assurance that she should at least have a true opinion, she continued: "I have been trying to understand the position in which Charles and I really are placed. At present, the result of his literary labors maintains us; but since we moved and furnished our house, it does no more; and I never forget that we have pecuniary debts which ought gradually to be discharged. Now, before I married I earned my own living—why should I not try and do something now?"

"But your little Isabel?"

"I have thought of that—she must on no account be neglected; but if I had any success I should immediately engage a good nurse—the help of one I even now often need. If I am patient, I have great hopes also that my voice may be restored."

"And Mr. Stacey?"

"Oh!" she replied, coloring deeply, "he would not object; but now your opinion."

"I approve of it, provided you are not obliged to live in London—for, putting aside my own selfish desire to retain your society, it will be better for all of you to remain here."

"While Charles consents to remain, I will not move," was the emphatic reply; "and he has advantages here for which nothing in the heart of the great Babel could compensate. I have also ventured to think you would name me to Lady Westrough and Mrs. Loftus, who, as they both reside within a few miles, may be able to introduce my cards."

"I shall do so at once," said Helen. "I predict that in Mrs. Loftus you will have a most efficient ally; she has herself lived through a stormy day, and will readily give you her sympathy. While the affairs of Captain Loftus were unsettled, she did not sit waiting the result with folded hands; she knew what Jupiter advised in similar circumstances, and she put her shoulder to the wheel, and kept it there for many years, and this in spite of the remonstrances of her husband's family. But she used to say, that if poor relations are a burden, rich ones are often an impediment; and with two children to maintain and educate, impediments must be removed or jumped over: she did both, and finally proved that her way was the best. But here is my husband; wait till I tell him of your plan, and then he shall see you safely home."

"Well done, brave little wife," he exclaimed, when informed of it; "and may you succeed—for you richly deserve to do so."

And thus were matters at the Heath when the rap-a-tap-tap came, to which allusion has already been made.

CHAPTER LXI.

"I saw Bassanio and Antonio part.
Turning his face, he put his hand behind him;
And with affection wondrous sensible,
He wrung Bassanio's hand—and so they parted."
SHAKSPEARE.

"It makes me breathless," said Helen, when Reginald communicated to her the result of an interview he had had with a government member, in consequence of Lord Hurstwood's proposition; "St. Petersburg! and perhaps two years' absence!"

"But you, my love, would not object to accompany me?"

"Object, Reginald! why, you would never think of going without me?"

"Assuredly not—while we could struggle on together here—but we must talk this over with our friends when we have quietly considered it ourselves. After all they have done for me, I am not at liberty to accept or reject till I have heard their opinion; and then, dearest, there are mamma and sister Constance."

"Alas! as regards them, we are scarcely further of there than here. If you accept, so do I—your wife shall never hinder your progress."

"You are my best treasure," was the reply; "and long before this really kind and graceful act, Lord Hurstwood had my forgiveness—without him I should still have been without you."

When Ashley was taken into their counsel, he was at first disposed to advise rejection, without weighing all the reasons for and against. It so completely swept away all the visions in which he had indulged for his friend, it so entirely broke off that daily intercourse which was so valuable to him that he could scarcely be brought to listen patiently to all the advantages it offered; but at length struck with the selfishness of his opposition, he promised to withdraw it if the majority were against him.

Mr. Turner said it would spoil a capital lawyer. But when Mr. Morton was consulted, he strongly advised Reginald no longer to hesitate—but to accept it at once—and this the latter was much disposed to do.

He reminded Ashley, that when he accepted the help of his friends he was unmarried, and firmly resolved to continue so; but that with his unexpected happiness came additional expenses; and though the income Helen enjoyed freed them both from serious inconvenience, he owned that it often caused him grave disquietude to think what would be her position and that of her boy if illness or death interfered with his endeavors to support them; and that his utmost exertions, even if ultimately successful, could not free him from debt and dependence for many years, whereas—"

"Do not speak those odious words," said Ashley, infinite disgust expressed on his fine face.

"Let us speak the truth, old friend," returned Reginald, with deep emotion. "My debt to you and Mr. Morton weighs upon me more than you, who never think of it, can imagine. I almost grudge myself the least indulgence, and sometimes fear Helen must think me a dull companion, with my everlasting translations and originals; and yet these have added materially to our comforts.

"He is quite right," said Mr. Morton, who had been a silent but not unmoved listener. "God knows how happy he would make me, if he would accept, as a son from a father, some of my abundance—but I have ceased to urge it. This office, it appears, is one for which he is peculiarly qualified; and Lord Hurstwood says, 'He will have established such a claim upon government, when these duties are performed, as must insure his appointment to an equally good post for a permanency.'"

"That," said Reginald, "weighs with me more than any other advantage—without this, I would not drop the substance for the shadow. Helen has also heard from the Priory; and though reluctant to consent to our exile, her mother's good sense decides in the affirmative. Constance, who has frequently met them at the Hall, speaks in the highest terms of the Duke and Duchess of Isleford; about the former she has sent us a little romance, which already has had its effect on Helen."

"I see it is useless to stem such a torrent against me," said Ashley; "when are you to go?"

"In a couple of months; and in a note which Lady Hurstwood sent my wife, with a most splendid outfit for your godson, she informs her of their intended arrival in town the week after next. It is clear they do not anticipate a refusal, and I conjecture that I am expected to call on them."

"No doubt," replied Mr. Morton; "and greatly do I rejoice that thus all difficulties will be removed in that quarter. I wish, also, that you and Mrs. West would establish yourselves with my sister in town; it will save much time and fatigue, while making your preparations."

And Helen did partly accept of this thoughtful invitation, to the great sorrow of Mrs. Stacey, though she said she was quite angry with herself for indulging regret at what was so useful to her friend. As to Gretchen, she hovered about Helen like her shadow; and when the parting came, and they were really gone, she shut herself up in the little room which had served for a nursery, and, at first, was deaf to words of comfort.

Ashley, who felt their departure quite as much as she did, took pity on her distress, and resolved himself to occupy the now deserted apartments. He therefore offered to supply the place of Reginald, and good-naturedly asked if that would not be some equivalent—"Ja! ja! yes, for Mr. Reginald he would be—but who was to comfort her for the loss of Miss Helen?—no one but Miss Constance; she, indeed—" but Ashley waited for no more, and happily no one was present to witness his precipitate exit.

It is the day fixed for the departure of the Wests, and Constance was waiting for her mother to join her in a drive to the Grange.

Some refreshing showers which had fallen after a long drouth, had given additional beauty to the ever lovely scenery of the Priory. The air was full of odors, distilled alike from the bosom of the earth and the masses of flowers with which the gay parterres were adorned.

Constance, whose eye for the graceful and beautiful was always open, whether in the arrangements of drapery, the suitableness of ornament, or the contrasting of colors, had herself superintended the forming and laying out of these flower-beds; and now, while she was viewing the result of her taste, her ear was also gratified by the joyous songs which were being poured forth from shrub and tree. A rival and rural opera-house seemed to have established itself in that sweet spot—the notes of the happy birds making themselves heard with that delicious clearness which is the usual effect of a recently refreshed atmosphere; and as Constance watched the little musicians winging their flight from tree to tree, she thought, "Oh that I had wings like a dove!"—and tears silently, almost unconsciously, fell from her eyes as she remembered that her beloved sister was now, perhaps at that very moment, leaving England. Should they ever again meet on that broad terrace? should they ever again watch together those white sails steering clear of the coast, and yet approaching near enough to add all those attractions the prospect needed to make it perfect in beauty and poetry? All, Constance? did it need no gay vision, once thought so essential?

But as this question suggested itself, the face of the fair girl was more deeply overcast with a look of anxiety as well as sorrow—for Hubert had been away some months, and his letters had not been numerous. He had been told of this new trial which she and her mother had gone through, in bidding adieu, by letter only, to the travelers, and no word of sympathy had arrived, while Mr. and Mrs. Forrester since his absence seemed to have become more stately and chilling than ever.

They were now in Scotland, having returned with the Sinclairs; but before they went, Laurette found means to instill into their minds a greater dislike than ever to their son's union with Constance; while to the last she did not fail from time to time to enlarge on Hubert's want of punctuality in writing—a fact she contrived to learn, by pretended inquiries from Mrs. Forrester, respecting her son's movements and occupations, of which she expected, of course, Constance could inform her, and of which, by the way, Laurette, through her friends in Italy, learned more than any other person.

All these reflections crowded into the mind of Constance and made her feel very sad—a sadness she tried to ascribe wholly to the departure of Helen, who had gone without having again seen either Mrs. Templeton or her sister. This had been impossible—for the Colonel had never been long enough away, and a growing conviction that Ruth was in some way a spy on herself and daughter made Mrs. Templeton more cautious than ever.

Constance at last saw her mother approach; and trying to banish all traces of discomfort from her countenance, she hastened to meet her. Mrs. Templeton looked very pale, and as if she had been weeping; and wishing to draw her attention from sad thoughts, she forced a smile as she pointed to the sea in all its calm majesty, while a tiny speck of sail in the distance was the only sign of life on its boundless expanse. But, as is too often the case, she produced the very effect she had wished to avoid.

"Yes, darling," said her mother; "by this time our beloved Helen has left us—I realize it all."

"But she writes in such good spirits, dear mamma, and Reginald is so pleased with the appointment—and then it may not be so long as two years—and, you know, you have often told Caroline, when she spoke of Victor, that they soon pass."

